During the Spanish Civil War, Hemingway was involved in the production of two Loyalist propaganda documentary films. Later in the conflict, he served as a war correspondent for the North American Newspaper Alliance. For Whom the Bell Tolls expresses Hemingway's strong feelings about the war, both a critique of the Republicans' leadership and a lament over the Fascists' destruction of the earthy way of life of the Spanish peasantry. The novel is set in the spring of 1937, at a time when the war had come to a standstill, a month after German troops razed the Spanish town of Guernica. At this point, the Republicans still held out some hope for victory and were planning a new offensive. For Whom the Bell Tolls explores themes of wartime individuality, the effects of war on its combatants, and the military bureaucracy's impersonal indifference to human life. Most important, the novel addresses the question of whether an idealistic view of the world justifies violence.

Hemingway's novels are known for portraying a particular type of hero. Critic Philip Young famously termed this figure a "code hero," a man who gracefully struggles against death and obliteration. Robert Jordan, the protagonist of For Whom the Bell Tolls, is a prime example of this kind of hero. The tragedy of the code hero is that he is mortal and knows that he will ultimately lose the struggle. Meanwhile, he lives according to a code—hence the term code hero—that helps him endure a life full of stress and tension with courage and grace. He appreciates the physical pleasures of this world—food, drink, sex, and so on—without obsessing over them.

Hemingway is particularly known for his journalistic prose style, which was revolutionary at the time and has influenced countless writers since. Hemingway's writing is succinct and direct, although his speakers tend to give the impression that they are leaving a tremendous amount unsaid. This bold experimentation with prose earned Hemingway the 1953 Pulitzer Prize and 1954 Nobel Prize for Literature for his most popular work, the novella The Old Man and the Sea (1952).

Although Hemingway wrote several more novels afterward, he was never again able to match the success of The Old Man and the Sea. In the late 1950s, the combination of depression, deteriorating health, and frustration with his writing began to weigh heavily on him. His depression worsened, and in July 1961, he died of a self-inflicted gunshot wound in Ketchum, Idaho. Although Hemingway's long career ended sadly, his novels and short stories remain as popular today as ever before, and he maintains a reputation as one of the most innovative and influential authors of the twentieth century.

For Whom the Bell Tolls : Background of the Novel

For Whom the Bell Tolls, published in 1940, grew out of Hemingway's personal interest in the Spanish Civil War of the thirties. While still a foreign correspondent in Paris, Hemingway had watched the Spanish political situation developing under the reign of Alfonso XIII. He had visited Spain again during the summer of 1931 after the overthrow of the monarchy. He predicted the civil war would begin in 1935, and when it erupted in 1936, Hemingway began writing and making speeches to raise funds for the Loyalist cause. Later, in 1937, he went to Spain to cover the war for the North American Newspaper Alliance. In reality, the Spanish Civil War was the first battleground for World War II, testing the forces of Nazism, Communism, and Fascism against either the republican or royal form of government. Many young men from the United States and other countries joined the Spanish Loyalist forces in defense of democratic ideals in a war that was won by the dictator, Francisco Franco. Since that war has tended to slip into the dimness of the shadow cast by World War II, the following review of historical and biographical background should clarify a number of things pertinent to the novel.

In the spring of 1931, after several years of civil strife and strikes, municipal elections were held in Spain. The parliamentary seats won in this election were divided between the leftists and rightists in such a way that an extremely dangerous situation was created. In view of this, and in the hope of avoiding civil war, King Alfonso XIII decided on voluntary exile. On April 13, 1931, the republic was proclaimed.

The Communist-Socialist coalition which ruled Spain during the first two years of the republic was, like its predecessors, plagued by strikes, and a general election was called for November 1933. In this election, the rightists were returned to power with a large majority.

The Conservatives were, however, only able to keep themselves in power for about the same length of time that the leftists had. By February 1936, when another general election was held, public opinion had swung back to its previous position. The leftists won this election by a small majority — 256 seats to 217 for the Conservatives.

Five months after the leftists regained control of the government, José Calvas Otelo, a powerful Monarchist-rightist, was assassinated. This was credited with precipitating a revolt which was led by the army, but which had obviously been planned for some time. General Francisco Franco was recalled from the Canary Islands, where he had been sent to keep him out of politics. He flew to Spanish Morocco on July 17 and quickly overthrew the government there, continuing on to Spain the next day.

Within a few hours after Franco's arrival in Spain, his forces had taken several of the larger Spanish cities, and garrisons of the army all over Spain were in revolt. Surprising and stubborn resistance from the government's militia brought this initial surge to a temporary halt, and the capital city of Madrid remained in the hands of the Loyalist-leftists.

Foreign intervention in this revolt which had turned into a civil war was an accomplished fact by August of 1936. Russia was sending "observers" and "volunteers" as well as financial aid donated by its citizens to help in the leftist cause, but they were not industrially capable of giving a great deal of aid in the form of material. In support of the Monarchist-rightists, both Germany and Italy sent planes, tanks, and munitions in addition to the usual "observers" and "volunteers."

The quickly formed Loyalist-leftist forces managed to bring the war to a stalemate during the winter of 1936-37, but this situation was only temporary. By the spring of 1937 (the time during which the incidents of For Whom the Bell Tolls occur), the leftists had, however, gathered enough men and equipment to prevent Franco from overrunning the country. The Monarchist offensive proceeded, but slowly.

International politics played a great part in the civil war during the next two years, giving the advantage first to one side and then to the other. Throughout this period, both sides committed sickening atrocities. The Loyalists were charged with the murders of hundreds of members of the clergy as well as the assassination of their political enemies, and the systematic bombing and strafing of nonmilitary objectives by the Monarchists was a portent of things to come in World War II.

By January of 1939, an almost completely effective blockade was preventing Loyalist troops from receiving further munitions and supplies. Resistance in towns and cities which had managed so far to hold out against Franco's troops began to collapse. Finally, on March 28, 1939, the well supplied Monarchist forces overcame the resistance of the besieged city of Madrid. The long and bitter civil war was over.

After World War I, Hemingway returned to the United States, but by 1921 he was married and back in Europe as a foreign correspondent. He traveled extensively in Spain and was vitally interested in the political developments during the reign of Alfonso XIII, from 1923 until 1931. In 1928 he moved to Key West, Florida, and so was not present for the overthrow of the monarchy in 1931. He returned to Spain for a visit that summer, however, and learned what had happened from his friends there.

When the Conservatives were returned to power in 1933, Hemingway was traveling in Africa. He was not surprised by the failure of the liberal government for two reasons. First, he felt that "the mass of the people were not ready for it and did not want it." Second, though Spain had become more prosperous under the liberals, and though he agreed at least in principle with the civil reforms instituted by them, he realized that the peasants were receiving very little benefit from the government. The money was going where it had always gone — into the pockets of those in power.

Between 1933 and 1936, Hemingway carefully watched the political developments in Spain. When the civil war finally began in 1936, the only surprising thing to him was that it had come so soon, for as early as the summer of 1935, he had predicted that war would come before the end of the decade.

In 1936 and 1937, Hemingway wrote and made speeches for the purpose of raising money for the Loyalist cause in the Spanish Civil War. Later in 1937, he went to Spain to cover the war for the North American Newspaper Alliance. His announcement, some months after he arrived in Spain, that he was writing a novel with the Spanish Civil War as its background, caused a great stir of excitement and anticipation in the literary world. The result was For Whom the Bell Tolls.

For Whom the Bell : Plot Overview

The Situation: - Robert Jordan, an American volunteer in the Spanish Civil War, is given the assignment of blowing up an important bridge in the Guadarrama mountains. The significance of the bridge is that it is situated on the road which is the only supply line for the Fascists. The bridge is to be blown up when the attack on the pass by the Republican forces starts so that the Fascists cannot bring in either supplies or reinforcements. Anselmo, a guerrilla, leads Jordan across the Fascist lines to the hide-out of Pablo.

Pablo's Resistance to the Plan: - Pablo immediately recognizes the danger implicit in the plan because not only is it risky but he will have to move out of these hills after the bridge has been blown up. He is sick of being hunted.

The Guerrillas' Bands: - This band consists of Pablo, the leader and his gypsy wife, Pilar. Besides these two there is a young girl, Maria, who falls in love with Robert Jordan. Rafael, the gypsy, is useless as a guerrilla. Agustin, a youngman, and three other men constitute the entire band. Another band headed by El Sardo is also there in the vicinity. Pilar is for blowing up the bridge if it can help the cause.

Jordan Inspects the Bridge: - Anselmo guides Jordan to a point from which he can watch the bridge unobserved. Jordan sketches the bridge to calculate how much dynamite is needed to blow it up, and where to place the sticks. The bridge is guarded by sentries on either bank of the stream, and there are two pickets for sentries. In order to destroy the bridge, the pickets will have to be destroyed too.

Pablo Escapes Being Shot Dead: - Jordan is informed that Pablo is capable of treachery. He also learns that the band is divided on the question whether the bridge is to be blown up or not. Pablo is against it, and the rest are for it. Pilar is the new leader and supports Jordan's plan. In the heated argument that follows, Jordan at one time is tempted to kill Pablo but being uncertain of his own position desists. Jordan consults Pilar who approves of his decision of not killing Pablo.

Maria Comes to Jordan's Sleeping Bag: - Maria, who was the daughter of a village Mayor and was a victim of Fascist atrocities, comes to Jordan's sleeping bag at night. She has been sent there by, Pilar. They make love that very night. For Maria, Jordan is the first man whom she has loved. Jordan regards the whole affair as a windfall because h cannot think loving a woman on a permanent basis, especially whets he is carrying out a dangerous assignment.

Fascists Know of the Attack: - Next morning many Fascist planes are sighted which strike terror in the hearts of these guerrillas, even though there is no bombardment in the area. Anselmo and Rafael are assigned by Jordan the tasks of watching the road and the pickets respectively. Fernando, who has returned from Segovia informs Jordan fan that there are rumours circulating in Segovia that some bridges will be blown up in this area as a prelude to a Republican attack on these Pilar Reveals Pablo's Past: - Leaving the explosives in Agustin's charge, Pilar, Maria and. Jordan set out for El Sardo's camp. On the way, Pilar narrates how Pablo had destroyed all the Fascists in his home town at start of the revolution. It was a cruel operation, but the worst came when the Fascists retook the town.

El Sardo Meets Jordan: - El Sardo confirms Fernando's information. He also realizes how difficult the assignment is but he agrees to help El Sardo's part will be to destroy one picket while Jordan plants explosives. He also decides to steal sore horses for the retreat to the Gredos.

Jordan and Maria Make Love Again: - On their way back, Pilar goes ahead leaving Jordan and Maria together so that they may make love. Pilar intuitively knows that the lovers do not have much time at their disposal. After making love, Jordan's head is very clear and he wonders whether he could marry Maria. It is against the Communist discipline that he has accepted for the period of the war. He wonders whether it were possible to lead a life of seventy years in seventy hours.

Snow Spoils Jordan's Plan: - An unexpected snowstorm overtakes Jordan, Maria and Pilar before they search the camp. In the cave, Pablo describes to Jordan how he came to have Pilar, who was formerly a bull-fighter's woman. Pablo worked for a horse contractor in Zaragoza where he met Pilar. Pablo teases Jordan that his plan cannot work now that it is snowing outside.

Anselmo and Rafael Report: -There has been much movement on the road that day because the Fascists are carrying their reinforcements to the site of the attack. Jordan also learns how often and when the guards change.

Pablo Escapes Death Again: - Pablo is drinking heavily. He teases Jordan for being a false _professor, for making love to Maria, and for his foolish plan. Jordan cannot fire his pistol inside the cave because of the presence of dynamite there. Agustin picks up a quarrel with Pablo so that he may kill Pablo but the latter backs out of the quarrel. Pablo is convinced that Jordan is a bird of ill omen. He leaves the cave to have a look at the horses but he stands near the mouth of the cave to hear how his fate is being decided. It is decided that Pablo .should be liquidated but Pablo on his return declares that he is with the group and thus survives.

Jordan Reflects on His Past and Future: - Jordan is aware of the possibility of his death; so he instructs Anselmo how to blow up the bridge if the former dies. Maria's love makes him wish to live with her for a long time. He recalls how Karkov, the Russian journalist, had been instructing him in the Marxist ideology which does not go well with his love for Maria. However, he is determined to blow up the bridge at all costs.

Jordan-Maria Affair: - Maria comes to Jordan's bag for the second night also. Jordan promises to marry Maria after this assignment, even though Maria considers marriage of no consequence ; for her Jordan's love is enough.

Jordan Shoots a Fascist Cavalryman: - Jordan while lying in the bag hears the sound of the arrival. of a horse. He sees a Fascist soldier on horseback, whom he shoots at once. Pablo takes away the horse to hide. Jordan predicts that there will be more cavalry to deal with, so he prepares to meet this threat.

Preparations For Escape: - Jordan camouflages a machinegun so that if the cavalrymen penetrate the camp they may shoot at them. Horses are kept in readiness for escape, while their luggage is being packed. Jordan wants to avoid a confrontation that day because a battle will destroy his plan to blow, up the bridge. If the worst came to worst he would take Anselmo with him and escape, and blow up the bridge after. Rafael, who is on duty, had been negligent in his watch to let the first cavalryman come in.

More Cavalrymen Appear: - First, a batch of four cavalrymen comes following the trail left by their companion. They come very close to the blind but do not see these guerrillas. They follow the trail and go out of this area. Twenty more cavalrymen appear. They also leave the area without creating any problem. Jordan's restraint saves the guerrillas' lives.

El Sardo's Fight: - The Fascist cavalry following the trail reach El Sardo's camp where a battle ensues. El Sardo pushes back the attack, reaches the flat top of a hill in a wounded condition, digs in, and prepares for his end. In the afternoon Fascist planes come and bombard El Sardo's hill and return to Segovia. Agustin and others who want to go to El Sardo's help 'are restrained by Jordan in whose judgment it would be no more than a Quixotic gesture. In the evening Pablo and Anselmo bring back reports of El Sardo's end. El Sardo's end increases the element of risk in Jordan's plan.

Andres Marty Leaves For Golz's Headquarters: - Jordan realizes the futility of Golz's attack because he knows that the Fascists will not be taken by surprise. All preparations for meeting the attack have been completed. Jordan decides to send Andres Marty to Golz advising him to cancel the attack. Andres Marty leaves for Navacerrada with the dispatch.

Jordan's Psychological Problems: - Jordan wants to survive now so that he may live with Maria but it has nothing to do with his fear of death. His father who had committed suicide makes Jordan ashamed of himself. Jordan prefers his kinship with his grandfather who had fought in the American Civil War as a Republican and acquitted himself well. Jordan is under some psychological compulsion to prove that he is not a coward, and that he will face death boldly. Despite his despatch to Golz, Jordan knows that he will have to destroy the bridge.

Maria Narrates Her Past: - On the third night Maria informs Jordan that they cannot make love because there is "soreness and much pain". Jordan is disappointed butt consoles himself. Maria describes how she was raped by many Fascists, and how she was rescued by Pilar. Jordan assures her that he loves her as he loves Spain, and all the comrades who have died in defending this country. Jordan's resolve to destroy the bridge, is strengthened by his knowledge of Maria's suffering.

Pablo Betrays Jordan: - At about 2 o'clock in the morning Pilar comes to Jordan to inform him that Pablo has disappeared taking with him something from Jordan's, rucksacks. They are an exploder, detonators, fuse and caps. Pablo has also taken with him two of the best horses. Pilar feels guilty of having been negligent in her duty of guarding Jordan's equipment. As the loss is irreparable Jordan decides to get some sleep. He brings the rucksacks out of the cave so that he may guard them himself. The danger to his life now has increased many times.

Maria Makes a Soothing Gesture: - Towards dawn while Jordan lay fuming and fretting Maria asks him to make, love to her. On this occasion he has a sort of mystic experience in love Maria becomes for him not only his wife but his sister and his' daughter as well. His head being clear now, he makes a new plan to destroy the bridge.

Andres Marty's Futile Journey: - Andres Marty, in the meanwhile, slowly moves towards his destination. The arrangements for the attack are complete. When the message finally reaches General Golz, the Republican planes are taking off to go and bombard the pass.

Jordan Improvises: - In the morning, with the luggage packed, Jordan gives last minute instructions to the remaining guerrillas who know that they may not live to see another day.

He is going to use hand grenades instead of detonators and the fuse. The exploding will be done by pulling the pins of hand grenades mechanically. The bridge will be destroyed but so will be the band that has agreed to help Jordan. Pilar is to lead the attack on the lower Agustin is to man the machine gun, and fire upon every approach object while Jordan plants the dynamite sticks.

Pablo Returns: - As the details are being finalized Pablo returns with five more guerrillas who are brave but stupid. He undertakes to attack the upper post. He has destroyed the stolen equipment ; so Jordan's new plan stands. After breakfast, they move to their respective duties.

The Attack: - Anselmo and Jordan have to shoot the sentries on duty. As the morning light filters through the leaves Jordan hears a thud, the signal that the Republican attack has started. Jordan and Anselmo shoot the two sentries. Pilar and Pablo attack their respective posts. Jordan, with assistance from Anselmo, plants the dynamite sticks. Pablo has to deal with not only the post but also some vehicles and a tank. Finally, the bridge is blown up. Anselmo dies on the spot. Pilar loses two men. Pablo shoots the five guerrillas who have helped hi in over-running the post. The band assembles near the horses and prepares to leave.

Jordan is Hurt: - Maria is happy to receive Jordan in her arms. Agustin accuses Pablo of murder but Jordan keeps his mouth shut. They move down a slope to cross the road at a point about 200 yards from the bridge. They cross the road successfully except Jordan whose horse is hit by a bullet as a result of which it falls. Jordan's left thigh-bone breaks and he cannot resume the journey. After a hurried leave-taking, the guerrillas escape towards the Gredos, leaving Jordan behind to deal with the Fascist cavalry that is bound to chase them. Jordan awaits his end lying on the pine-needles. He is tempted to shoot himself but he decides against it. Lieutenant Berrendo who fought against El Sardo is moving towards Jordan, who aims his rifle at him. It is obvious both will die at the end.

Critical Analysis of For Whom the Bell Tolls

A New Developments Hemingway: - Hemingway' had signed "a separate peace" in A Farewell to Arms and his writings in the Thirties are a sort of narcotic which kept him from thinking about society and a writer's social obligation. The period was devoted to writing a treatise on bull-fighting, a safari in Africa from which resulted Green Hills of Africa, and some admirable short stories like "The Snows of Kilimanjaro" and "The Short Happy Life of Francis Macomber". But the Thirties were a time of self-analysis for all thinking men in America ; and Hemingway broke fresh ground in To Have and Have Not, whose hero, Harry Morgan, in his dying moments gives the new message for his age : "A man alone ain't got no bloody chance."

Separate Peace Ends: - It is a far cry from what Henry, the protagonist in A Farewell to Arms, had thought about man's role in society. According to Henry : "I' was always embarrassed by the words sacred, glorious, and, sacrifice and the expression in vain……and now for a long time ...I had seen nothing sacred, and the things that were glorious had no glory and the sacrifices were like the stockyards at Chicago if nothing was done with the meat except to bury it. There were many words that you could not stand to hear and finally only the names of placers had dignity ... Abstract words such as glory, honour, courage, or hallow were obscene beside the concrete names of villages, the numbers of roads, the names of rivers, the numbers of regiments and the darts" Henry liked a boy named Gino but his patriotism separated him from Henry who was completely disillusioned with slogans, and The causes that they stood for.

A Commitment to Mankind: - In the play, The Fifth Column, the hero who like Jordan is fighting for the Loyalist cause in Spain declares that he has left love behind, for his love of mankind and his love for his beloved cannot go together. And where I go now I go alone, or with others who go there for the same reason I go." He also shares Jordan's ambivalence: "I don't know where it (his destination) is." What is of paramount importance is his devotion to the cause, he has chosen to espouse. Jordan likewise is fighting for a cause: "Liberty and dignity and the rights of all men to work and not be hungry." Jordan has been very pure in his ambitions because he had no thought of anything except the movement and the winning of this war.

Mixed Motives for Participation: - The depression in America and the Spanish Civil War woke his social conscience-and in his capacity as a human being he helped the Loyalists in Spain as far as he could. For Whom the Bell Tolls is a product of a tumult of experience and emotions; the overthrow of the author's non-political attitude in the face of a pressing need for action, the hate of. Fascism and sympathy for the Loyalist Republic, a romantic love of old Spain, and the enthusiasm and anxiety for the future of the world which flung many artists into the international brigades as if to fight a decisive crusade for human liberty.

A Deep Commitment: - All these themes are present in the novel. The compact structure of the novel, the heightened eloquence of the language, the poignant heart-searching in the novel, the desperate search for new moorings, the seriousness of the intent of the novelist are ample proof of the author's intense involvement in the movement. He has deeply felt what he has written' in this book, for it embodies a brusque tenderness and compassion of the author for the suffering Spanish masses who became involved in this human crisis.

An Individual Commitment: - As mentioned earlier Hemingway had broken loose of the aestheticism of the Thirties and entered a new phase of development as a novelist. Jordan is a lost young man who has staked his life for the sake of a people he has come to love. He is doomed to die according to the logic of Hemingway's vision of the world but this time there is a major difference. "The only difference", according to Nemi D' Agostino, "is that now the individual failure is overtly seen as part of a collective failure, a common drama in which the new ideals and hopes one by one prove fruitless, and in the end only this which remains is the unbroken chain of pessimism and despair." Jordan lying on the floor of the pine forest and waiting for the Fascist cavalry reflects: "And if you wait and hold them up even a little while or just get the officer that may make all the difference. One thing well done can make."

Is this all that one pins one's hopes on? Why is he so dependent on the approval of his grandfather or Karkov for his actions? It is a fatalistic universe, centering round the drama of the individual. It is an elegy sung in praise of the "lonely rebel".

Contradictions in Jordan's Ideology: - Jordan came to Spain to learn the Spanish language better so that he could teach it more effectively. Here he becomes involved in the Civil War because he feels for this country a strong liking and sentiment. He develops an illusion that there is a cause to fight for. He acknowledges that he has learnt much in this war and he would perhaps write a book about it but the truth of the matter is that he has not learnt much in this war. He still believes in Equality, Liberty and Fraternity and man's right to pursue happiness but he has accepted Communist discipline for the duration of this war. He is ignorant of the inherent contradiction in these two positions that he has taken. 'He has experienced love, a fact which challenges the red assertion that in a purely materialistic conception of society there is no such thing, as Love. He is overwhelmed by the dilemma of his position and consequently he has decided to put his thinking and power of judgement in abeyance. Actually each new faith frightens and unsettles the writer, and Jordan-Hemingway is the old tormented individualist divided between his need for the community and the scorn and fear it excites in him. And the novel is not so much imbued with history as impregnated by the confused attitude of that no-man's party to which Hemingway belongs.

Only Death Triumphs: - The book in spite of the heroic stand and the fight of its hero is an elegy on a dying man. It celebrates a triumph of death, dissolution and destruction of all that is good in man. Death hovers over this book from the very opening scene in which Jordan is seen lying on the floor of the pine forest. If the reader is in any doubt Pilar's prophecy seals Jordan's fate. The guerrillas are disillusioned despite the bravado shown by some of them. Pablo is a mockery of his former self, and Pilar affirms it. El Sardo, a heroic figure, is, destroyed by the Fascists' planes and he embodies the utter helplessness of man in a mechanised war. Even Anselmo who is reluctant to kill Fascists meets a fate no different from that of Eladio, or Fernando, or El Sardo. The theme of dissolution is interwoven, in fact in the very texture of the book.

A New Prose-Style Evolved: - This gloom connected with the theme of dissolution is relieved by "the breath of poetry". Hemingway in this novel broke away from his earlier bleak and bare prose which critics had admired and amateur writers tried to imitate, but seldom successfully. He attempted a freer and broader rhythm which has immense potentiality and power. It touches at times moments of true intensity and genuine dramatic power. Pilar's account of Pablo's exploits at the commencement of the movement, Maria's account of the death of her parents and Fascists' atrocities, El Sardo's last stand on the hill-top, and Andres Marty's journey from the first Loyalist out-post to the head-quarters of General Golz are classic examples to show Hemingway's power as a story teller. The last scene in which Jordan awaits the arrival of the Fascist troops lingers long in the memory of readers for here Jordan becomes a solitary figure who symbolises all human loneliness in the hour of death which is unrelieved by hope.

A New Range of Characters: - More than the new prose rhythms the novel is valued for its range of human characters that Hemingway has created. Maria and Jordan are almost types in Hemingway's fiction but Pilar—a larger than life and mysterious character, and Anselmo—a true Christian, something very unusual in Catholic countries, and Pablo—a sort off debased Ajax, and El Sardo—an inveterate fighter, and many others reveal a new development in Hemingway's art. According to Nemi D' Agostino : "He has tried to create varied and trenchant characters, succeeding in setting besides the somewhat inadequate protagonist and the conventionally picturesque portraits of Pilar and Maria such fierce and poetic figures as El Sardo, Joaquin and Anselmo."

Some Flaws: -The novel is one of Hemingway's most ambitious works and to this fact one can trace some of its strength and weakness. Its language was intended to be in part the intimate expression of the intellectual protagonist, and in part to shape itself around the simple heroes of the guerrilla, and to throw a new light on the epic events. It is dim and turgid in the long meditations of the hero ; and in the passages of dialogue, where Hemingway tried to create a platonic language composed of the Spanish idiom, the Bible, and the Elizabethans, it is overloaded with dialectical quotations (which is a critical transfer and not an artisitic solution), weighed down with over much local colour, and often forced into melodramatic effects.

Elements of Melodrama: - The elements of melodrama are also present in the plot as well and they have weakened the tension of the plot. Pilar's long description of the smell of death is a case in point. It may be very interesting in itself but it does not contribute to the development of the story nor does it throw any fresh light on any character. Similarly, Jordan's love-making, and Pilar's inquiry whether the earth moved, weaken the plot to a great extent. In the long meditations of Jordan, similarly, critics have found flaw for, though they throw light on the hero's motivation, these is a repetitive quality about them. "There are a good many passages", according to Philip Young, "in which Jordan appears to be struggling for the faith on which he acts than to have achieved it." Young also points out that the love story is highly idealized and very romantic, if not sentimental.

In the final analysis the novel demonstrates that Hemingway's talent was once again intact and formidable, despite the flaws pointed out above. It remains one of his masterpieces.

Whatever the ideologically committed critics may say, the reader if he is unbiased, feels a sense of life, which is an achievement by any standard.

Main Themes in For Whom the Bell Tolls

Hemingway is one of the major novelists who touched the apex of literary skies in American literature. He has written many great novels and his contribution has got international acclaim and fame. He is contribution to literature earned him prize. He attracted the attention of readers and critics because of his themes and style of telling a story. He is so unique in these two areas that he heroes and writing style have come to be known as Hemingway heroes and Hemingway style. Hemingway's themes are unique and different from many other American writers. It is true that he carried the influence of many American and English writers

Hemingway's choice of a John Donne poem as the source of the novel's title and epigraph emphasizes a major theme of For Whom the Bell Tolls: "No man is an island," that is, no person can exist separate from the lives of others, even others living in far-away countries. The theme is demonstrated by the actions of Robert Jordan. Throughout his participation in the Spanish Civil War, he has fought actively for a cause of antifascism. As the novel progresses, his involvement with the guerrillas and his love for Maria, teach him the value of the individual as he or she affects a larger society.

He doesn't believes in the abstract ideology which doesn't represent people. For Jordan, Maria represents human love, the first he has ever known. It is for her that he stays behind to allow the rest of the band to escape, demonstrating his realization that others depend on him as he has depended on them. His decision not to commit suicide at the end of the novel represents his ultimate understanding that he must fight for the people whose lives are affected by the cause. Apart from the relationship of individual and society, death is another theme: "his heart beating against the pine needle floor of the forest."

The main topic of the novel is death and violence as effected by war. When Robert Jordan is given the mission to blow up the bridge, he knows that he will not survive it. Pablo also knows that it will lead to their deaths. El Sordo faces that inevitability also. Almost all of the main characters in the book contemplate their own deaths, and it is their reaction to the prospect of death, and what meaning they attach to death, especially in relation to the cause of the Republic, that defines them. Violence haunts the novel, death of Maria's parents, Joaquin's tragedy and above all, Robert Jordan awaits his death feeling his heat beating on the floor of Spanish land at the end. The war has affected the lives of people physically as in Maria who loses her physical innocence when she is raped by Fascist soldiers and also psychologically as the changed behaviours of characters like Anselmo who has to suppress his aversion to killing human beings, and Lieutenant Berrendo to quell his aversion to cutting heads off of corpses. War even costs the innocence of people who aren't involved in it directly as War journalists, writers, and we as readers who abandon innocent expectation. In war, Hemingway shows that morality is subjective and conditional, and that the sides of right and wrong are almost never clear-cut. All these conditions are resulted by fascism which Jordon calls ‘a lie told by rods’. Later, he talks of the threat of fascism in his country: “…many who do not know they are fascists but will find it out when the time comes”

Thus, salvation lies in romantic love which is another main them of the novel. Even though many of the characters in For Whom the Bell Tolls take a cynical view of human nature and feel fatigued by the war, the novel still holds out hope for romantic love. Even the worldly-wise Pilar, in her memories of Finito, reveals traces of a romantic outlook on the world. Robert Jordan and Maria fall in love at first sight, and their love is grand and idealistic. Love endows Robert Jordan’s life with new meaning and gives him new reasons to fight in the wake of the disillusionment he feels for the Republican cause. He believes in love despite the fact that other people like Karkov entertain “purely materialistic” outlook. Romantic love is one of the most important ways in which Robert Jordan rejects abstract theories in favor of intuition and action over the course of the novel. Loving her transports him from his intellectual world of ideology to the world of real-life relationships. Maria represents the love that humanizes Jordan, making possible his transition from a political partisan to one who recognizes the worth of the individual. For Maria, Jordan's love is the healing touch she needs to cure the psychic wounds and a moving spirit for Jordon as he declares: “I have not found one [woman] that moved me as they say they should move you.”

The most important theme which is the integral part of Hemingway’s novel is heroism, especially code-heroism. To be a hero, Hemingway believes that a man must display grace under pressure. Most of his characters put themselves into dangerous situations and then act with remarkable bravery in the face of danger. Robert Jordan is no exception. During the novel, Robert Jordan becomes the true Hemingway Code Hero, displaying a penchant for action and grace under pressure. Even though he realizes the dangerous nature of his mission and questions the orders of General Golz to carry it out in daylight after the offensive has commenced, he never doubts his own ability to accomplish the task. Even after Pablo steals and destroys some of his key equipment, he does not run from the danger. Jordan more clearly displays grace under pressure after he has been injured by fascist gunfire. Paralyzed and unable to easily escape with the others, he insists upon being left behind with a gun. When Maria begs to stay with him, he convinces her to leave by telling her his mission will have been worthwhile if her life is saved. Thus unable to travel to safety, he faces death with bravery, firing his gun at the enemy to give the others time to get away. He exemplifies the Hemingway code because the code heroes also fight to the last bit as he stated: "there is something you can do yet"

Finally, there are other themes in Hemingway’s ‘For Whom the Bell Tolls’ ranging from the power of superstition and divination as in Pilar, suicide as in Jordon’s father, the Spanish War and its tragedy and hypocrisy and theme of solidarity as in Robert Jordon. Jordan laid down his life for a cause but the irony of the situation is that he couldn’t make a total commitment to his "cause" for the Fascists to be killed are, also human beings. "No man is an island". Thus the novel takes a pure ironical stand in the situation of Spanish War.

The Structure of For Whom the Bell Tolls

Complex Structure: - For Whom the Bell Tolls is one of the most complex novels written by Hemingway for it is more than the story of love of Robert Jordan and Maria ; or even the story of the Spanish Civil War in which the protagonist loses his life for a cause. It extends beyond the country in which the central event takes place, as it transcends the allotted seventy hours which according to Robert Jordan can be as significant as a life of seventy years.

The Bridge Central to the Plot: - In the centre of the action is the bridge that Jordan has come to destroy. The bridge is situated on the road from Segovia to the pass that General Golz is going to attack. That it is a vital bridge is made clear to the reader as soon as the novel begins. "That is the only road on which they (the Fascists) can bring up reinforcements. That is the only road on which they can get tanks, artillery, or even move a truck toward the pass which I attack. I must know that bridge is gone. Not before, so it can be repaired if the attack is postponed. No. It must go when the attack starts and I must know it is gone." General Golz has chosen the most reliable person who can perform this difficult operation. Even before Jordan has left the General in Madrid he has assured him that he "will do it all right".

The Spanish Society Represented: - The bridge is situated in the Guadarrama mountains and in. these hills are scattered the hide-outs of guerrillas who are supporting the Republic. El Sardo and Pablo are the two leaders of guerrillas on whose help Jordan has to depend. These hills are a microcosm of all Spain for in Pablo's and El Sardo's caves we have representatives of all sections of the Spanish society.

Pilar, the gypsy woman, is a mother who looks after the band like the mother-earth itself ; Pablo is the evil father, for Jordan at least ; Anselmo, the old man, is a true Christian whose principles do not permit him to kill men but he is compelled to shed human Jordan's out of necessity ; Joaquin, the nineteen-year brother who has suffered at the hands of the Fascists as Maria has done ; El Sardo is the brave guerrilla, who defies death and exemplifies for Jordan the code that laughs at death for it cannot conquer man if he is strong enough in his belief ; and then there is Maria who is Jordan's wife ; and then she becomes for him the sister as well as his daughter. Similarly, Agustin, Fernando and the two brothers, Andres Marty and Eladio, are part of the community to which Jordan goes for help to complete his mission.

Pablo's Role: -The skirmish between the Fascists cavalry and El Sardo's band highlights the dangers that the partisans face every day of their life in these mountains. Pablo had realized immediately what Jordan's mission meant to his band—it spelt danger, destruction and death. He was not at all willing to help him and he tried his best to dissuade Jordan from carrying out this suicidal plan. He tried to create a split in the band but it failed. Then he was relieved because he knew that if the snow-storm continued Jordan would not be able to carry out his mission. However, the snow melted away continued to harp on the old theme. The next day when El Sardo and his band were wiped out by the Fascists he felt confident that Jordan would give up his plan. Even this disaster did not prevent Jordan from thinking that he still had a chance to demolish the bridge. In despair Pablo stole his detonators, fuse and the exploder because now it would be well nigh impossible to destroy the bridge and thus Pablo would be safe in his "fox-hole". However when he returned at three in the morning and found that Jordan was sticking to his plan he changed his mind and decided to help him. He was the only one who could lead his band to the Gredos and he could not escape his self-imposed responsibility. The civil war is made very real to us this way. All the loyalty and treachery in the Republican ranks is present here in this small group.

The Whole World is Involved: - While keeping the bridge at the centre of our interest Hemingway extends our awareness beyond the Guadarrama mountains. First, there are the Russian commanders who are guiding the operations from Madrid. They have trained some Spanish farmers in their military academies who have now taken over the management of the war from the spontaneous leaders of the Spanish people. The Russians are not the only foreigners in Spain. The observation planes that scan the Guadarrama mountains are of German and Italian makes. The Heinkel bombers and Fiat pursuit planes make it clear beyond doubt that there are other interests involved in Spain. The International Brigades are testimony enough to prove that the Spanish Civil War was not a local issue because for one reason or another many countries were involved in this human crisis. Hemingway has rightly called this war a dress rehearsal for the Second World War. Jordan's presence in Spain proves that the ripples of this war have travelled beyond the Atlantic as well.

Flashbacks Enrich the Plot: - Through the device of flash-backs, Hemingway has enveloped the whole of Spain in this narrative. We get from Pilar an account of what happened in the town where she lived with Pablo before the start of the movement. The ruthless manner in which Pablo had massacred the local Fascists throws light on the Spanish character. So does Maria's story of her misfortune. Her father had been murdered because he was a Republican and her mother was put to death for she supported her husband. The issue does not remain political because Maria's rape is a human issue. She becomes blood-thirsty for revenge because she has suffered for no fault of her own ; it is enough that she is the daughter of a Republican. She becomes the bride of the "Red Christ". Joaquin's story of his suffering adds up to the same conclusion. No wonder Jordan thinks that the entire future of mankind may eventually depend upon this bridge and he is conscious of his responsibility in this enterprise.

Flashbacks Extend the Scope in Time: - These flashbacks also in a way extend the time of the action of the story from seventy hours to not only the proverbial seventy years but also the entire history of mankind. There are frequent references to Jordan's grandfather who fought in the American Civil War. He believes that his "juice" came from the old man rather than his father who, he believes, was a coward. Again, we are told that Jordan did not want to be another Horatius on the Bridge because he wad in love with Maria and he would love to live with her a long time. Hemingway's glorification of "now" is meant to make us aware of what he called the fourth and the fifth dimensions in prose. The mystical dimension of his love for Maria links him with all the lovers who might have experienced or will experience love in such intensity in any part of the world. This type of love is beyond time and is in fact timeless. This he believes in despite his cynicism which tells him "there isn't supposed to be any such thing as love in a purely materialistic conception of society." The idea is that the Spanish Civil War, for the author of For Whom the Bell Tolls and the protagonist in the book, is a landmark in human history—it is a pivotal point for history. The attack to be launched by General Golz is the first by the Republicans and- since they have been at the receiving end for a long time Jordan does not want to make a mess of it for if this attack is a flop the Republican morale will go down and whatever is valuable in Spain will be lost for ever. The consequences of the success or the failure of Jordan's mission are going to travel far and thus the history of the human race may turn on the fate of this bridge. It is to this end that Hemingway has quoted approvingly from John Donne on the cover page of the novel :

> No man is an Iland, intire of itselfe; every man > is a peece of the Continent, a part of the maine;
> if a Clod bee washed away by the Sea, Europe > is the lesse, as well as if a Promontorie were, as > well as if a Manor of thy friends or of thine > owne were; any mans death diminishes me, > because I am involved in Mankinde;
> And therefore never send to know for whom > the bell tolls; It tolls for thee

Epic in Character: - Carlos Baker maintains that the structure of the book is epic-an epic of modern times. In the opinion of this critic the novel reaches epic proportions for the seriousness of its conception and execution. The language of the various speakers has a quaint touch about it ; almost Elizabethan in its ring. It is an intentionally heightened language which is quite appropriate to the function to which it has been put. The implications of what is written are much more than what meets the eye. In the visible part the past and the present meet and look forward to the future. The past is present in the present and the future can be seen in the present. For Whom the Bell Tolls is a tragic epic, not unlike the Iliad and "Madrid, like Troy, was fated to fall." Elaborating his point Baker adds.

Despite the obvious gap between Spain and Ilium, the student of epic may find part of his answer in considering the Homeric parallel. A primitive setting, simple food and wine, the care and use of weapons, the sense of imminent danger, the emphasis on masculine prowess, the presence of varying degrees of courage and cowardice, the rude barbarism on both sides, the operation of certain religious and magical superstitions, the warrior codes—these, surely, are common ties between the two sets of protagonists. Jordan is not to be scorned as the type of, Achilles, and one can recognize in Pablo the rude outlines of debased and sulking Ajax. Pilar the gypsy, though she reads the life line in Jordan's palm instead of consulting the shape and colour of animals' entrails, makes the consciousness of the supernatural an operative factor.

As if these were not enough to establish the novel as a modern epic Hemingway seems to have added a few more details to complete the picture. The Fascists' planes—what Hemingway has elsewhere called mechanized doom—come in threes. They are compared to sharks that are ruthless in their hunt. Pilar is a half-witch, half-woman who predicts Jordan's death almost infallibly. Her prediction hovers over the book like an evil spirit. Jordan tries to keep it out of his mind but he cannot. Maria confirms it when she comes to Jordan's bag for the last time. Golz's despair is evident in his outburst when Jordan asks for the exact time of the attack. In this picture of Nada–nothingness–Jordan and Anselmo are veritable islands of hope for the Republic.

Irony in For Whom the Bell Tolls

Free From Politics: - When For Whom the Bell Tolls was published reviewers and critics from both the Right and Left accused Hemingway of having gone over to the other side. Critics from the Right thought that Hemingway had become a victim of the "red rash", or "the Marxist measles" ; while those of the Left accused him of distorting facts and being unfair to the Republicans in general and Comrade Andre Massart, in particular.

The Marxist critics were disappointed in this novel for they believed that Hemingway, despite his own contribution to the war effort of the Loyalists, lacked a true understanding of the cause of the Spanish people. What these critics failed to comprehend was that Hemingway was not writing a political novel ; the Spanish Civil War was only the back-drop-of this human tragedy. He wanted to show something true about human life ; and he had come to take a more complex view of humanity at war than he projected in A Farewell to Arms. Similarly, they failed to fully appreciate the significance of the epigraph from John Donne : "And therefore never send to know for whom the bell tolls : it tolls for thee." Jordan is not a patriot : he suffers from no illusions about the Spanish people. Hemingway was also aware of the limitations that partizan loyalty imposes on an artist and therefore he chose to remain above party politics and presented life as he knew it. It becomes obligatory for an artist to present "a series of situations pregnant with irony", if he is to present life as he sees it.

Jordan Has Fascist Tendencies: - Robert Jordan is trying to be an ideal soldier who is to carry out the orders as he has received them. He has scrupulously avoided asking why he should carry out those orders given by General Golz, even after he has realized that they are inoperative because of the changed situation. The Fascists have already carried their tanks to the pass that Golz is going to attack and Jordan knows this too well. He still sticks to his original plan of destroying the bridge and consoles himself with the thought that his job is merely to blow up the bridge and not question Golz's strategy it is not for him to cancel the attack. His attempt to communicate to Golz what he has known about the Fascists preparation to meet the attack is almost half-hearted for after sending Andres Marty with the despatch he is sure that he will have to blow up the bridge. He goes to bed with this certainty within hint ; he had to he sure. His inability to change the plan on his own in the light of his superior knowledge betrays Fascist tendencies, even though he is fighting against Fascism. The irony of this predicament is too obvious to be missed. Irony reveals inner turmoil and the author of For Whom the Bell Tolls leaves no doubt in the mind of the reader about Jordan's ambivalence and inner conflict.

Non-Spanish Activists in the Spanish War: - The war is being fought in Spain but the chief protagonist is an American, who happened to be in Spain when the civil war broke out. His love for Spain is due to the fact that he is a student of Spanish and he teaches the language in a small college in America. "……the fact that the principal characters in the novel have to be wheedled and cajoled into a sense of duty by an American reinforces the gathering cynicism of the leader for the Loyalist cause." Nor is the reader allowed to forget that the guerrillas, upon whose help Jordan is so dependent are mostly gypsies of non-Spanish descent.

Anarchy in the Loyalist Rank: - For Whom the Bell Tolls reveals the absence of co-ordination in the Loyalist ranks and there is a state of anarchy in the Loyalist lines, for the despatch that Andres Marty carries from Jordan to Golz is delayed inordinately by the inefficiency of the bureaucracy. Hemingway also exposes the inability of the commanders to enforce discipline. Anarchism in organised combat leads inevitably to defeat. It is to this outfit that Jordan is attached and he hopes for victory. The irony of the situation is enhanced by the fact that the discipline and co-ordination necessary for victory are present among the Fascist officers. The Loyalist cause is doomed for these reasons from the very start.

Atrocities Committed by the Loyalists: - That the protagonist's position is paradoxical is supported by a number of contributory situations. The most outstanding example is Pilar's account of the start of the movement in Pablo's home town. She seems to be confessing to Jordan and is bent upon leaving out nothing. She reveals in Pablo a strain of sadism that mounts with every murder that he instigates the farmers to commit. The most shameful atrocities have been committed by decent peasants who initially had revolted at the thought of killing the very people whom .they had known all their lives. The grisly and nauseating acts that Pilar is at pains to describe, ironically, have been committed by the Loyalist who are fighting for human dignity and a decent life for all men. The Fascists who had been arrested during the night are flailed and led between a double row of men to the edge of a steep cliff below which flowed a river. Pablo's plan is to give them a watery burial. The cowardly behaviour of the Fascists leads the mob to become violent and finally sadistic. Pablo's hatred of the priests makes him torture the priest until the mob gets him and leis regret is that the priest had not died well. To the main frame of this highly ironic episode minor ironies contribute in no small measure.

Minor Ironies: - The irony that these very people are Jordan's supporters is not lost on the reader. It is for these people than he is prepated to lay down his life. Robert Penn Warren thinks that the irony runs "counter to the ostensible surface direction of the story", but as Halliday points out "this is the nature of irony". The prevailing darkness is occasionally relieved by a glimmer of hope as each one of us must do what we can.

Jordan is Betrayed by a Friend: - The theme of betrayal which is one of the most recurrent themes in Hemingway's fiction is also present in For Whom the Bell Tolls, and it heightens the irony in the novel. Jordan had come to Pablo for help thinking that he was one of the most staunch supporters of the Republic and that he could not blow up that bridge without his help—it lay in his country, Pablo provides him with sufficient provocation as to make it convenient for him to liquidate him. He has also been warned by Agustin that Pablo constitutes a substantial danger to the project. He has also been given the green signal by the group to kill Pablo. In spite of these clear indications Jordan abstains from carrying out what was a necessity. And he has to pay a heavy price for this lapse. In the ordinary course of events it would have been excusable but since this treachery comes from a friend or a supporter the irony is heightened.

The Irony of El Sardo's Death: - Similar is the case with El Sardo's annihilation by the Fascists. He had gone to steal horses for the retreat but the unseasonal snow makes the venture a big hazard and as a consequence Jordan loses a big ally. Jordan does not let any of the guerrillas in Pablo's band go to his rescue and it is highly ironical again that they, despite their keen desire to help a comrade in trouble cannot do so.

An Ironic Comment on the Human Situation: -There are a number of situations in the novel that contribute to the impression that Hemingway intended the book to be an ironic comment on the human situation in Spain. The central event of blowing up the bridge is rendered an exercise in futility for the loose tongues of the Loyalist comrades have betrayed their own cause. The Fascists know in advance the Loyalist plan to attack the pass, and they have taken proper precautions to meet it. Jordan's promise that nothing will go across that bridge is a mockery of the intention with which it was given. It is due to the treachery of a friend that Jordan loses such a venerable old man as Anselmo. Pilar's party which attacked the saw-mill post loses Eladio and Fernando. Even when Jordan has successfully destroyed the bridge he cannot escape to the Gredos on account of a fall from a wounded horse-Jordan of all the people ! Jordan had put his thinking in abeyance during the course of the war in order to win the war first, but now in his hour of death he has to do the final reckoning and he is not sure that he was right in doing what he did. The doubts about the rightness of his actions had assailed him previously as well :

How many is that you have killed ? I don't know. Do you think you have a right to kill any one ? No. But I have to But……you like the people of Navarra better than those of any other of Spain. Yes. And you kill them. Yes……Don't you know it is wrong to kill ? Yes. But you do it ? Yes. And you still believe that your cause is right? Yes.

Both Parties Pray to the Same God: – Similarly, Anselmo who wants to kill no one is committed to shedding human blood and his sadness is highly touching. The irony is that a man who upholds the Christian ideal of loving thy neighbour is compelled to sacrifice his principles for a cause that is doomed to fail from the very start. Since the start of the movement Anselmo confesses that he had not prayed because he had come to believe that there was no God otherwise He would not have allowed such things to happen which he had seen. But when he sees the dead bodies of the Fascists and the heads of the members of El Sardo's bands he prays to the same God to which Lieutenant Berrendo addresses his prayer for his dead friend Julian, who has died at El Sardo's hands. Captain Mara, completely oblivious of his imminent death, goes on shouting obscenities at the hill-top. What could be more ironic than the fact that the two become fellow voyagers.

Good People on Both Sides: – Hemingway has portrayed Berrendo in very sympathetic colours. He is as committed to his cause as Jordan, or even Anselmo, and believes in the rightness of his cause as firmly as any member of the International Brigades. He is religious as well as kind. He gives orders for beheading the dead guerrillas but cannot see those orders being carried out. "It is he", writes Halliday, "who looms in the sights of Robert Jordan's machine-gun in the last paragraph of the story, lending the finale an ironic depth that protects it from false heroics. For these two young soldiers, preponderant as our sympathy may be for one rather than the other, the same bell tolls." It is tragic irony because both of these youngmen are human beings of whom mankind could be proud but they are fated to die

For Whom the Bell Tolls : War – A Great Cause of Disillusionment

In the late 1930's, Spain was in the midst of a civil war. The country had been in a state of disarray since 1931, when King Alfonso XIII went into voluntary exile. This was followed by a five-year power struggle between the fascists, led by General Francesco Franco, and the Republicans. This struggle became violent in the summer of 1936, and the war lasted until 1939, when Franco's forces triumphed. (Thomas 600)

Ernest Hemingway's 1940 novel For Whom the Bell Tolls tells the story of Robert Jordan and his Republican comrades as they resist the fascists in the fall of 1937. Although a work of fiction, Hemingway's novel accurately portrays the events of the period, and the characters display many of the attitudes prevalent among Spanish revolutionaries. The two central characters, Robert Jordan and Pablo, begin the war as idealistic fighters, but both become disillusioned as the war progresses.

The Spanish civil war had a violent beginning. Across the country, local peasants revolted against the fascist bourgeoisie, killing 512 people during the first months of the war (Thomas 176). In For Whom the Bell Tolls, Hemingway poignantly and accurately describes the execution of the upper classmen of the Spanish town of Ronda. The peasants of the town, led by a man named Pablo, corralled the town's fascists into the city hall. Pablo had the peasants, armed with flays, form two lines that extended from the door of the hall to a cliff overlooking a nearby river. One by one, Pablo forces the fascists to leave the city hall and walk between the two lines towards the cliff, which the fascists are thrown off; meanwhile, the peasants beat them to death with flails.

Pablo is ruthless in executing the local fascist police in Ronda. As he prepares to shoot one man in the head, Pablo says, "And you are an ugly thing, you murderer of peasants. You who would shoot your own mother" (Hemingway 112). Later that morning, Pablo remains stoically brutal as he prepares to send the fascists out of the city hall to face the angry crowd outside. The fascists are with a priest, and they pray with him before they are sent to their death. Pablo's wife describes how Pablo acts towards these men, and she says,

"I watched Pablo speak to the priest again, leaning forward from the table and I could not hear what he said from the shouting. But the priest did not answer him but went on praying. Then a man stood up from among the half circle of those who were praying, and I saw that he wanted to go out….Pablo shook his head and went on smoking. I could see Don Pepe say something to Pablo but could not hear it. Pablo did not answer; he simply shook his head again and nodded toward the door" (Hemingway 135).

Pablo may be a brutal man, but at this point in the civil war, he is still dedicated to the Republican cause. He is willing to risk much by leading the local rebellion, and he is successful in doing so.

It is interesting to note the way in which Hemingway describes the crowd as they kill the fascists. He compares it to the way people act when they are inebriated. Pablo's wife says,

"But cruelty had entered into the lines and also drunkenness or the beginning of drunkenness and the lines were not as they were when Don Benito had come out…Drunkenness, when produced by other elements than wine, is a thing of great ugliness and the people do things that they would not have done" (Hemingway 127).

In this description, drunkenness is used as a metaphor to describe mob mentality. No person would normally beat a man to death with farming tools unless he were drunk. The people of the town are sober, but because they have formed a mob, they act as if they are drunk. Pablo utilizes the crowd's inhuman thirst for blood and directs it against the fascists.

Despite his initial courage, within a year, Pablo had lost his revolutionary fervor. One year after the seizure of the town, Pablo and his comrades have retreated to the hills, and he is not willing to take risks. Robert Jordan, one of Pablo's companions and the main character, is sent to destroy a bridge in the hills near Pablo's hideout. However, Pablo does not support Jordan because he is afraid that he will be forced to leave his homeland due to fascist retaliation. He says to his comrades, "And it means nothing to thee to be hunted then like a beast after this thing from which we derive no profit? Nor to die to it?" (Hemingway 58). Pablo is no longer a bold commander of men who is fighting for a cause; he has become a coward who is only looking after himself.

The main character also begins the novel as an enthusiastic brave man who is dedicated to the Republican cause. Unlike most of the characters in the book, Robert Jordan is an expatriate from the United States. He believes in the cause of the Republicans so much that he is willing to leave his country and travel half way around the world to risk his life for it. At the beginning of the novel, Jordan's commander asks him if he will accept a mission to destroy a bride. Jordan replies, "I will do it. I will do it all right" (Hemingway 9).

At the end of the novel, Jordan and his comrades are on horseback trying to escape a fascist attack. During the escape, Jordan falls off of his horse and is fatally wounded. As he dies, he is no longer concerned with the cause of the Republicans. Instead, he thinks of his comrades. Dying, Jordan thinks,

"Think about them being away. Think about them going through the timber. Think about them crossing a creek. Think about them riding through the heather…Think about them O.K. tonight…Think about them. God damn it, think about them" (Hemingway 506).

In his struggle to fight the fascists, Jordan ends up giving up his life. But when the time comes to die, he does not care about the Republican cause. He cares about his friends.

Both Pablo and Jordan begin the war as dedicated Republicans. Pablo leads a successful revolt in his local town, and he goes from being a normal peasant to being the commander of a group of revolutionaries. Yet after a year of fighting, Pablo is no longer concerned with the outcome of the war. He is only concerned with saving himself. Jordan also changes his priorities as the novel unfolds. In the beginning, he is a dedicated anti-fascist. Yet as he dies, he realizes that he cares more about the welfare of his friends than for the Republican cause.

Through the plights of these two characters, Hemingway shows that war is a great cause of disillusionment. Initially, both Pablo and Jordan want to fight for freedom and justice. But as the war progresses, they become more concerned with self-preservation and the safety of their comrades. For them, war is transformed from an abstract fight against fascism into a personal struggle for themselves and their loved ones.

"In Hemingway there is no morality, only ritual ; and For Whom the Bell Tolls admirably illustrates this." Support, modify or contradict this statement.

Two Schools: - On the question of morality, Hemingway specialists are divided. into two well-defined camps. One school believes that Hemingway's honest and uncompromising standards of thinking and acting contain all that matters about morality in the modern world ; others dismiss his ideas of right and wrong as crude, neurotic, and intellectually stunted. There is little hope of reconciling these views but the fact remains that Hemingway's works reflect a deep concern with the questions of right and wrong. It is also true that he did not spell out very clearly his concepts of moral right and wrong because for him the 'what' got transformed into 'how'. His concern for the observance of ritual overshadowed his morality.

Definition of Morality: - He defined morality in Death in the Afternoon : "I know only that what is moral is what you feel good after and what is immoral is what you feel bad after." His writing is pervaded by an ironic tone associated with moral austerity. Honesty, integrity, honour and truth without having been defined carry strong emotions with them. He, as is well known, shied away from abstractions, while he has lavished enormous care on details of how certain acts are to be performed.

Morality Rooted in Something Outside Oneself: - An accepted assumption about morality is that it is rooted in something outside oneself-say in God, mankind, country or even family. Obligations to these are not arbitrary, and they are of a fundamental nature. True morality does not reside in one single act but is comprehensive enough to cover an individual's entire conduct.

Ritual Defined: - From the point of view of a strict moralist, ritual is artificial, contrived and even whimsical. Ritual is a kind of game and a serious game. It creates its own occasions, its own setting in which to act. But it has its own morality, or rather its own aesthetic. In an important sense, it is an art to be judged in aesthetic terms. It has been rightly called "a disciplined rehearsal of right attitudes." A prescribed series of gestures mechanically symbolize one's feelings about ultimate things. The emphasis in ritual is on the performance of a preconceived drama which has its own meaning. Morality adapts itself to the occasion ; the form of ritual is fixed. The meaning of ritual is in the action itself.

Jordan's Naive Belief: - When Jordan came to Spain with a view to fighting against Fascism he was a naive person. He accepted communism and felt like a religious convert. In his own words

It gave you a part in something that you could believe in wholly and completely and in which you felt an absolute brotherhood with the others who were engaged in it. It was something that you had never known before but that you had experienced now and you gave such importance to it and the reasons for it that your own death seemed of complete unimportance, only a thing to be avoided because it would interfere with the performance of your duty.

Realities of War Destroy That Faith: - Jordan cannot sustain this faith for long. His belief in communism disappears as he becomes familiar with the ugly realities of war. When we meet him in the novel, he has no politics. He accepts communist discipline for the duration of the war because it is the best available. Discipline becomes an arbitrary set of rules for him—a ritual, in fact.

The Need to Suppress Thinking: - Under these circumstances, it is clear why Jordan suppresses all thoughts. He understands the role of the communists in Spain but to take his thinking to its logical conclusion implies that he must give up his activities. He knows who the peasant commanders in reality are, but he continues to work with them. He understands Pablo's intentions wren he brings those five guerrillas with their horses to help Jordan, bat he keeps his mouth shut. He terms his insoluble problems discipline and goes on functioning because lie has a bridge to blow up. It is the grand ritual to which he sacrifices truth and other moral values.

Blowing up the Bridge : A Ritual: - The destruction of the bridge becomes his supreme goal even when he knows that it is futile to destroy it. Fernando learns in Segovia that Fascists know of the Republican attack and El Sardo confirms it. But Jordan persists. El Sardo's death makes the task all the more difficult and yet his determination to blow up the bridge is unshaken. Pablo steals his exploding device and detonators, but Jordan has other alternatives. Since Agincourt, he has found fault with others' battles, therefore he wants to fight his own so that it is fought the right way-ritualistically. And all along his pretext is that he is following Golz's orders.

Death : A Ritual Too: - Finally, when he has to face death, the earlier feeling of the brotherhood of mankind is no longer there. Death is no longer unimportant for he wants to live. Hemingway specifically shows that Jordan's death is to be a waste, that it does not contribute substantially to the cause because the attack of which it is a part is doomed to failure by bad communications. And Jordan is aware of the waste, and that by blowing up the bridge and sacrificing himself no useful purpose will be served. In fact, he is prepared to sacrifice the guerrillas with whom he has established strong ties of loyalty, friendship and love. His courageous encounter with death, when it finally happens, has become almost wholly a ritual action. The emphasis all the time is on correct acting and correct dying. He must attain ritual correctness. "You follow orders. Follow them and do not think beyond them." His last battle and death are "a festival" for him ; he has become so dispassionate about his own death.

An Aesthetic Experience: - In the last scene Jordan is no different than Romero in the bull-ring who must give a. perfect, demonstration. The odds do not matter ; his performance will be appreciated by a few aficianados. There are no moral questions left, or at least they are so oversimplified that at they do not matter. The beauty of the act lies in its correctness. The audience plays up the aesthetic character of the performance, and also links up with the fact that primitive ritual is almost always public and tribal ; calling for some sense of community. The ritual fails to effect moral good in the last analysis Hemingway does not seem to have distinguished clearly between ritual and morality.

"For Whom The Bell Tolls" as a Modern Tragedy

"For Whom The Bell Tolls" is a modern tragedy, as it depicts the conflict, struggle, tension and frustration of a modern man.

A modern tragedy is quite different from classical standards. According to Aristotle, tragedy is a story of conspicuous man who fall from prosperity to adversity because of his error judgment, i.e., hamartia, his death is not essential, but his fall arises a sense of pity and fear for him, in us. But in a modern world, there are no kings and princes, who could be regarded as "conspicuous", therefore, modern tragedy is the story of a common man who falls from prosperity to adversity, because of his error of judgment, i.e., his hamartia, but his death is not essential, but his fall arises a sense of pity and fear, in us. Secondly, now a modern man is not confronted with the supernatural forces of his surroundings and society. Thus a modern tragedy is different from a classical tragedy.

Hemingway writes in an effort to reduce the harms done by the two world wars. He presents a picture of the post war scenario, when the atomic weapons shattered all the dream of global peace. There was a big generation gap in the society and a sense of lost ness. Hemingway portrays in his novels, a microcosm of that larger universe, and gives a lesson of constant and untiring struggle.

Robert Jordan is a typical Hemingway protagonist. He is an American volunteer. He is very sensitive and intellectual man who wishes for the global peace. He believes that liberty diminished at one place means some liberty lost everywhere. Because of his this belief, he is fighting Spain for republican he is not only fighting the war of the freedom of Spain, he is also fighting a mental and psychological war of self-realization and self-assessment. He has been assigned the duty of blowing a supply line bridge up, of Fascists and through this duty; he wants to judge his mental and physical usefulness for the world.

Hemingway's hero is usually a disillusioned but a reluctant man. He is aware of the futility of action but tries to avoid this awareness by indulging into sensual pleasure. Robert Jordan also tries to avoid his thoughts and seeks refuge in Maria's arms and intoxication. But being an intellectual he cannot escape from his thoughts. He knows that his action of blasting the bridge would not help the Republicans and the Fascists would not be stopped; yet he continuous his work. The reason is the accomplishment of duty, which has been assigned to him, and an inner satisfaction that at least he has done what he could do. He feels that he is fighting for his love of Spain, for his love of Maria and for his love of freedom as he says: "You believe in life, liberty and the pursuit of Happiness"

But this is a kind of self-deception and false justification of his useless act and this proves his flaw, which leads to his tragedy.

However, it is a preoccupation of a Hemingway Hero, which he goes too far in the accomplishment of his duty, regardless of any danger. Hemingway adopts this trait to achieve his moral end, and this gives a new dimension to tragedy. He has moralized the tragedy, "despite Hemingway's preoccupation with physical contests, his heroes are almost always defeated physically, nervously, practically; their victories are moral ones". As we see that Jordan remains stick to his duty. He says: "You can do nothing for yourself but perhaps you can do something for another".

This belief keeps him firm, even when Pablo betrays him and leaves with the blasting material. This is the moment of his moral uplift.

There is a sure fear of his death, but he goes on. Though life is dear to him, but dearer than life is the justification of his courage, which his father lacked. He also hints this in his saying: "May be I have lived all my life in these seventy hours".

Jordan successfully blows up the bridge but, while moving away from the scene, he falls from his horse and breaks his leg. This is the most pathetic and tragic situation, when a man achieves success at one moment and loses everything at the other. The reader feels extreme pity for Jordan at this stage.

The ending moments of the novel are the most convincing and magnificent ones, when Jordan is lying on the ground waiting for fascists to come. So that he may be able to prove his courage and strength by fighting till the end. He repeated utterance: "I wish is not made for defeat".

I create a moving effect. The dramatic ending of the novel gives a message, a lesson and also hope to the reader that: "Man is not made for defeat". Jordan proves that: "A man can be destroyed but not defeated".

Jordan fights till end and sacrifices his life for duty. He dies not only for Spain, not only to save the girl, Maria, whom he loves, but also for his own sake and in fulfilment of a moral duty. So his only reward is the consciousness of duty done. And again: "Winner takes nothing".

But it seems that Hemingway had found something to die for, and he seems to imply that if you die as Anselmo or Jordan died, then physical death means nothing, death has no sting for the dying man rather he dies victoriously and his death is a moral victory.

Thus we can conclude that "For Whom the Bell Toll" is a modern tragedy in which an ordinary hero –an American volunteer falls from prosperity of adversity because of his hamartia, i.e., his extreme sense of duty. He dies a physical death but wins a moral victory. His sufferings arise a sense of pity and fear in us.

Hemingway's Nihilism

The term nihilism implies the negation of any authority and code at the heat of the universe. Hemingway has largely been accused of being nihilism. It is said that his heroes have no code to follow; that they are living on their own, that they are lost in this world thus they are hopeless and chaotic. A critic remarks: "---Again and again, Hemingway was writing of the – the end of life, the end of love, the end of hope, the end of all".

But to condemn his writing, by pronouncing nihilism, is to do injustice to him. Though Hemingway writes of the chaos and desperate situation, yet he provides a hope and code for life. If he denies the presence of God, heals creates new gods, for his heroes, in the apparent forms i.e., honour, dignity and struggle. He gives the code of constant and untiring struggle for life.

In his writings, Hemingway focuses at the lost generation, which emerged in the consequence of the two highly explosive World Wars. In19th century mankind was enjoying global peace, economic stability and scientific progress. People were thinking that Man has conquered the beast in him and has learned to live peacefully. But all these idealistic dreams shattered away, when the First World War emerged due to this very industrial progress. The men who entered war with patriotic ideals were stunned atman's inherent Barbarity when they realized the horrible uncertainty, pithiness and meaninglessness of life, they were desperately disillusion with the hollowness and emptiness of the high sounding slogans of religious and political leaders. Moreover, Darwin's theory of evolution added fuel to fire and crumbled the roots of Christianity. It was felt that "God does not exist and man has to face all the consequences of this". Hence: "Man is forlorn; because neither within him nor without does her find anything to ding to".

Hemingway captures all this nothingness and forlornness in his stories. His heroes represent the lost generation. They are usually expatriates, disillusioned with war. They have utterly disappointed with the nothingness of life and seeks refuge in drinking, sex, wandering. Hemingway depicts his heroes at war, sometimes physically but most often metaphorically. Then, within the course of their war, they get the code is of unending struggle regardless of victory or defeat.

His hero in "The Old Man and the Sea", Santiago says: "Pain does not matter to a man". Then: "Man is not made for defeat". And finally, he says: "A man can be destroyed but not defeated".

In "The Sun also rises", there is a massage of hope: "A man can live only through the manly encounter against death".

Robert Jordan in the "For Whom the Bell tolls", is confused about his aims. He is disillusioned with war; he loves humanity and wants peace. But to establish peace, he has to fight against the evil. He is not certain about the usefulness of his action, though takes refuge in Maria's arms, yet he resolves to continue his task. He says: "You can do nothing for yourself but perhaps you can do something for another".

It is an understanding assumption of Hemingway's philosophy that there is no world beyond the grave. Therefore, one's victories and losses are to be measured in terms of this world and not in the world beyond the grave. Life is tragic, sad and there is no escape from pain, therefore, it is useless to try to escape the inevitable. Hence what one can do is to be a man. When man is afflicted with misery pain or sorrow or even death, the proper way to face it is to remain true to oneself and one's companions, to endure pain and must fight like Santiago against the heavy odds. To give up a fight would be unmanly. One must achieve moral victory even though he has nothing to win. Robert Jordan has to remain undefeated, to prove his moral victory. He fights not only for the sake of Spanish freedom, but also for the fulfilment of his moral duty and his reward is the consciousness and his satisfaction in the duty done.

This constant struggle and absoluteness of duty is something, which one can cling to in the present times. Hence, Hemingway should not be pronounced as nihilism, prevailed in his time, and presents the solution of it rather he gives the faith of constant struggle and a moral victory to his readers. Thus the outlook or the background of his novels is nihilism but the message of his novels is the message of hope and confidence.

Hemingway's Message : Man Can Be Destroyed but Not Defeated

Hemingway was considered to be a man more than life. He thrived to reduce the life than its gigantic stature. He wanted to explore more and more about the gravities of life. He had seen both pre-war and post war situations. He had deeply observed the change in the attitude of people, towards life and their scattered dreams and desires. Thus, he sought to give message to the post war generation –the message of struggle for life. He taught them that man can live only through the manly encounter against death and miseries.

Nineteenth century was the period of the boon of humanity. There was industrial rise and scientific progress. Mankind was enjoying global peace and stability. Man was thinking that he had conquered the beast in him and had learnt to live peacefully. But them, this wide spread scientific progress brought two most destructive and fierce worldwide wars. With the advent of these wars, all the thoughts and dreams of a peaceful and progressive future shattered. People look refuge in sensual pleasure i.e. drinking, free sex and wandering and avoided thinking. These people, after the wide spread devastation of wars, were pronounced as the Lost Generation.

Hemingway writes his stories, to guide his lost generation. They are expatriates, confused and frustrated beings, indulged in drinking, gambling and sexual pleasures. Hemingway wants to give them a code of life, higher than any ethical code. This is a code of "constant struggle".

Hemingway creates a microcosm of the post war scenario in this story and delineates his characters, very close to real men, with their tensions and conflicts. Almost all of his protagonists are representatives of lost generation. They are all disillusioned with war, but each experiences this situation differently. Yet one thing is common in all of them that they have to struggle for life. Henry hates war; at he has to fight for life. Jordan knows that war is destructive; he wants peace and is aware of the feet that to attain peace, it is necessary to suppress force, by force.

Hemingway perceives life as a struggle, in which man has no choice except to fight. Santiago has to go far away, on the sea, to fight with evil, regardless of any loss. Robert Jordan has to blow up the bridge without considering its usefulness. It also gives a view that duty, must be done at any cost, and a duty assigned to an individual should be considered special in its way. Jordan says: "If I have to do what I think, I will have to do; it will be very select indeed".

Besides fighting with the outer circumstances, Hemingway's protagonist also fights a battle of inner self. He knows the worthlessness of his act, yet he fights to prove his courage and strength by accomplishing that act. Jordan realizes the futility of his act; he also loves life and feels: "This world is a fine place". Though life is dear to him, yet dearer than life is the need to justify his courage, which his father lacked.

Hemingway feels that winner gets nothing in this world. The victory of his protagonist is never physical but always moral. Santiago, after successfully achieving victory over Marline loses it during his journey back to home. Jordan successfully blows the bridge, yet, in the end, his is a loser –loser of his life. All that is achieved in all this exercise is the insight that one must go on struggling come what may and whatever is the cause. Thought he winner gets nothing yet he attains moral dignity. Jordan says: "You can do nothing for yourself but perhaps you can do something for another".

Hemingway holds the view that whatever has to be done, has to be done with good grace. He says in "Old man and The Sea": "Pain does not matter to a man"

Robert Jordan repeatedly wishes for the arrival of Fascists, to the end of the novel, because of his increasing pain. Yet he does not choose to kill himself. He feels that to die a courageous death is better than to live, as a coward in owes own eyes. He says: "I wish, they would come now". He fights bravely and does not lack courage. He proves: "A man is not made for defeat".

Jordan fights till end and sacrifices his life, for duty. He dies not only for Spain, not only to save the girl, Maria, whom he loves, but also for his own sake and in fulfilment of a moral duty. So, his only reward is the consciousness of duty done. Thus he proves that: "A man can be destroyed but not defeated".

Hemingway's Concept of Hero and Code Hero

Robert Jordan, a tall, a thin young man, with sun streaked fair hair, and wind and sun burned face, is one of the most complicated heroes, in Hemingway's fictions. He is a typical Hemingway hero who fights till end and wins a moral victory for him.

Two categories of heroes are found in the novels of Ernest Hemingway. One of which is a round character who finds himself unfit for the circumstances in which he is surrounded, but with the passage, of time he evolves certain values, which make his survival possible. According to the critics, this kind of character is "Hemingway Hero", or "the Tito". In the other category of hero is a developed character that does not need for further improvement. He is a confident man who knows his area of action and his skills. He serves to teach, the Tito, and thus is called "the Tutor" or "the code hero".

Jack Barnes, Nick Adam, Fredric Henry etc., are all Hemingway's typical heroes. They have been presented in the background of First World War. They portray the attributes of "Lost Generation". They have got disillusioned with war and, therefore, remained under great stress. War has shattered their all the ideas of religion, humanity, love and peace. Hemingway at first shows through them the death of love, lost ness and forlornness' and finally the moral code of life that "a man can be destroyed but not defeated". Hemingway hero is a sensitive and intellectual being, but he suppresses his thoughts, he suffers from "Nada" the extreme feelings of nothingness. Inconsequence, he leads a life of sensuousness and seeks pleasure in sexuality, drinking and roaming about.

Hemingway takes life as a battle, in which man has to fight till his end. Therefore, his hero is always revealed in a war or war –like conditions, fighting against natural or human forces. This war can either be physical or spiritual or both. Within the course of his war, he learns the code of his life that: "A man is not made for defeat". And that: "A man can live only through the manly encounter against death".

This code helps him to achieve a moral victory. Hemingway believes that "a winner gets nothing in this world", therefore, we see. "Despite Hemingway's preoccupation with physical contests his heroes are almost always defeated physically their victories tries are moral one".

Robert Jordan is considered to be the most complex of all heroes, presented by Hemingway. He has seen excessive violence and bloodshed and is thoroughly aware of the cruelties of war, yet he is ready to fight for the cause of "humanity". He is an idealist as well as a realist. He knows "neither all fascists are black nor all republicans are white", but he fights for the betterment of Spanish people, as his meditations reveal: "You believe in liberty equality and Fraternity. You believe in life, liberty and pursuit of happiness". Thus, as it is common with Hemingway's heroes, Jordan is also shown under great stress and tension –at the same time though he criticizes his actions yet he is also ready to blow the bridge.

He is very sensitive and intellectual being but he feels that thoughts are not appropriate for the world in which he is living, he takes refuges in drinking and sexually. Though he does not want to keep his mind busy in thinking about the rightness of his action, as he feels "to worry is as bad as to be afraid". Yet he keeps himself busy in the unrealistic thoughts of a happy future with his beloved Maria. "When there was no understanding only the delight of acceptance".

Though he likes "good things" of life yet he is so committed and honest to himself and his duty, that he does no let these things, come in his way. Even he attributes his love for Maria to his love for Spain as he says: "I love thee as I love that we have fought for".

He is so honest to the job that is assigned to him that he can understand that to blow the bridge is futile, yet he blows it, for it is the very order given to him.

Being a main character of Hemingway, he also fights his personal psychological battle in Spain. Jordan is extremely ashamed of his father, who attempted suicide instead of fighting. He wants to wash out his guilt. Though the life is dear to him, yet dearer than life is the need for the justification of his courage, which his father lacked. Thus, the war has a "double importance" for him. He says: "My mind is in suspension until we win the war".

He idealizes his grandfather, who was a courageous warrior and had died in a battle. Fighting against the enemy, Jordan seeks his code within the thoughts of his grandfather and is determined to fight till his death. When he falls from the horse and it breaks his leg, Jordan remains there to cover the escape of his companions. At this time it is the memory of his grandfather, which keeps him firm on his decision. Though he is disappointed yet not desperate. He has learnt the lesson like Santiago that: "A man can be destroyed but not defeated".

Near the end, he bears the pain courageously, and proves that "pain does not matter to a man". He appears to be satisfied on achieving the moral victory over his enemy. This is the lesson Hemingway wants to give through his writings that fighting matters more than winning and one who fights till the end, is the winner in true sense.

Thus we can conclude that Robert Jordan is a typical Hemingway hero, with all the heroic qualities in him. He also retains some of the autobiographical touches in his characters; this quality of his personality also enriches his personality in the eye of the readers.

For Whom the Bell Tolls : Background of "Lost Generation"

Seeking the bohemian lifestyle and rejecting the values of American materialism, a number of intellectuals, poets, artists and writers fled to France in the post-World War I years. Paris was the center of it all. American poet Gertrude Stein actually coined the expression "lost generation." Speaking to Ernest Hemingway, she said, "You are all a lost generation."

The term stuck and the mystique surrounding these individuals continues to fascinate us. Full of youthful idealism, these individuals sought the meaning of life, drank excessively, had love affairs and created some of the finest American literature to date.

There were many literary artists involved in the groups known as the Lost Generation. The three best known are F. Scott Fitzgerald, Ernest Hemingway and John Dos Passos. Others usually included among the list are: Sherwood Anderson, Kay Boyle, Hart Crane, Ford Maddox Ford and Zelda Fitzgerald.

Ernest Hemingway was the Lost Generation's leader in the adaptation of the naturalistic technique in the novel. Hemingway volunteered to fight with the Italians in World War I and his Midwestern American ignorance was shattered during the resounding defeat of the Italians by the Central Powers at Caporetto. Newspapers of the time reported Hemingway, with dozens of pieces of shrapnel in his legs, had heroically carried another man out. That episode even made the newsreels in America. These war time experiences laid the groundwork of his novel, A Farewell to Arms (1929). Another of his books, The Sun Also Rises (1926) was a naturalistic and shocking expression of post-war disillusionment.

John Dos Passos had also seen the brutality of the war and questioned the meaning of contemporary life. His novel Manhatten Transfer reveals the extent of his pessimism as he indicated the hopeless futility of life in an American city.

F. Scott Fitzgerald is remembered as the portrayer of the spirit of the Jazz age. Though not strictly speaking an expatriate, he roamed Europe and visited North Africa, but returned to the US occasionally. Fitzgerald had at least two addresses in Paris between 1928 and 1930. He fulfilled the role of chronicler of the prohibition era.

His first novel, This Side of Paradise became a best-seller. But when first published, The Great Gatsby on the other hand, sold only 25,000 copies. The free spirited Fitzgerald, certain it would be a big hit, blew the publisher's advance money leasing a villa in Cannes. In the end, he owed his publishers, Scribners, money. Fitzgerald's Gatsby is the story of a somewhat refined and wealthy bootlegger whose morality is contrasted with the hypocritical attitude of most of his acquaintances. Many literary critics consider Gatsby his best work.

The impact of the war on the group of writers in the Lost Generation is aptly demonstrated by a passage from Fitzgerald's Tender is the Night (1933): "This land here cost twenty lives a foot that summer...See that little stream--we could walk to it in two minutes. It took the British a month to walk it--a whole empire walking very slowly, dying in front and pushing forward behind. And another empire walked very slowly backward a few inches a day, leaving the dead like a million bloody rugs. No Europeans will ever do that again in this generation."

The Lost Generation writers all gained prominence in 20th century literature. Their innovations challenged assumptions about writing and expression, and paved the way for subsequent generations of writers.

The Lost Generation is a term used to describe a group of American writers who were rebelling against what America had become by the 1900's. At this point in time, America had become a great place to, "go into some area of business" (Crunden, 185). However, the Lost Generation writers felt that America was not such a success story because the country was devoid of a cosmopolitan culture. Their solution to this issue was to pack up their bags and travel to Europe's cosmopolitan cultures, such as Paris and London. Here they expected to find literary freedom and a cosmopolitan way of life.

A cosmopolitan culture is one which includes and values a variety of backgrounds and cultures. In the 1920's the White Anglo Saxon Protestant work ethic was the only culture that was considered valued by the majority of Americans. It was because of ethics such as this which made the cosmopolitan culture of Paris so alluring. American Literature went through a profound change in the post WWI era. Up until this point, American writers were still expected to use the rigid Victorian styles of the 19th Century. The lost generation writers were above, or apart from, American society, not only in geographic terms, but also in their style of writing and subjects they chose to write about. Although they were unhappy with American culture, the writers were instrumental in changing their country's style of writing, from Victorian to modern.

Hemingway is probably one of the most celebrated authors of his time. Hemingway is well known for his fiction. His take on fiction is something invented or imagined. Main topics were centralized around his love of embellishment of the facts. Hemingway did not have the education as many other writers of his time, rebelling against his parents attempts to send him to colleges. His idea of education did not consist of lectures, and research papers, but of life experiences, and his love of reading. Hemingway's readings centered around Russian writers such as Tolstoy and Turgrnev, Tolstoy was a primary influence in Hemingway's writings. WWI also had a profound impact on him as well, as he was an ambulance driver during the war. He hated the abstract, especially abstract words such as honor, glory, and courage.

Hemingway held strong to old beliefs, and symbolism, as he used symbolism to depict the Protestant religion he could not accept. He used observation and description in his works, rather than rhetoric views. The concept of war fascinated Hemingway, as well as the experiences one could endure in a lifetime. One of the most famous works, "Farewell to Arms" depicted the uselessness for words such as honor and glory, because they were not the first things in a soldier's mind as he walked onto the battlefield. Hemingway's works were raw, and dilled with the notion that one could be inside the characters mind, the concrete, and not around in the abstract view of his works.

The Aimlessness of the Lost Generation: – World War I undercut traditional notions of morality, faith, and justice. No longer able to rely on the traditional beliefs that gave life meaning, the men and women who experienced the war became psychologically and morally lost, and they wandered aimlessly in a world that appeared meaningless. Jake, Brett, and their acquaintances give dramatic life to this situation. Because they no longer believe in anything, their lives are empty. They fill their time with inconsequential and escapist activities, such as drinking, dancing, and debauchery.

In “The Sun Also Rises” it is important to note that Hemingway never explicitly states that Jake and his friends’ lives are aimless, or that this aimlessness is a result of the war. Instead, he implies these ideas through his portrayal of the characters’ emotional and mental lives. These stand in stark contrast to the characters’ surface actions. Jake and his friends’ constant carousing does not make them happy. Very often, their merrymaking is joyless and driven by alcohol. At best, it allows them not to think about their inner lives or about the war. Although they spend nearly all of their time partying in one way or another, they remain sorrowful or unfulfilled. Hence, their drinking and dancing is just a futile distraction, a purposeless activity characteristic of a wandering, aimless life.

Hemingway’s Contribution to the Art of the Novel

A Spokesman of the Age: – Hemingway, by writing of the condition of the modern man and his agonized and futile responses to the calamities that befell him, carved a niche for himself in the temple of immortality. The Swedish Committee set the stamp of approval on him by awarding him the Nobel Prize in 1954, even though he did not come up to the ideals of the philanthropist. Primarily the learned committee commended his contribution to the style of modern narration especially in The Old Man and the Sea yet they had in their minds Hemingway's writings of the last thirty years. The literature of the Twenties would be poorer for the loss of The Sun Also Rises and A Farewell to Arms. For Whom the Bell Tolls remains a landmark in American fiction of the Forties.

Revitalises the Novel: - The nineteenth-century fiction with its overwhelming emphasis on realism had more or less come to a dead end. It needed revitalisation. And some fresh blood had already been injected into its veins by powerful writers like Henry James, D. H. Lawrence, Joseph Conrad and others but it remained for Hemingway to revive the dying art of the novel and give it a new lease of life.

A New Style: -Hemingway in his apprenticeship as a journalist had learnt to be sceptical of decoration, embellishment, flowery language and metaphorical fat. He brought to fiction the colloquial style of speech to serve literary ends. His sentences were short and crisp. They were usually not qualified because when they are qualified the reader's attention is diverted from the main clause. Therefore, in Hemingway's early style in the Twenties one finds a sort of machine gun burst of short sentences, sometimes linked by a conjunction "and" or "but" going directly to its target. This style, in part imitation of the Bible, is an excellent medium for expressing an exact but limited truth. The language may be bleak and bane but there is poetry in it. His prose rhythms have transformed the staccato rattle into the liquid, cadenced ripple of his later works. Compare the following paragraph:

Walking carefully, downhill, Anselmo in the lead, Agustin next, Robert Jordan placing his feet carefully so that he would not slip, feeling the dead pine needles under his rope-soled shoes, bumping a tree root with one foot and putting a hand forward and feeling the cold metal jut of the automatic rifle barrel and the folded legs of the tripod. then working sideways down the hill, his shoes sliding and grooving the forest floor, putting his left hand out again and touching the rough bark of a tree trunk, then as he braced himself, his hand feeling a smooth place, the base of the palm of his hand coming away sticky from the resinous sap where a blaze had been cut, they dropped down the steep wooded hill side to the point above the bridge where Robert Jordan had Anselmo watched the first day. (For Whom the Bell Tolls)

Two Styles Compared: - If the first passage reflects the newly forged medium to express an intense emotional response to a brutal, animalistic and chilly world the second is a specimen of grace and poise in which the author seems to have acquired a peculiar vision of the world but a vision nonetheless. His preoccupation with action is reflected in his earlier style as well as in his later style. It moves in a rhythmic pattern in which the reader's attention is focused on the action all the time but he can afford to relax occasionally.

Unique Ability to Transmit Experience: - Whether he was writing in the Twenties or in the Fifties he reflects a youthful response to light, colour, form, and atmosphere of particular places that he has visited and which he is utilizing in his novels and short stories. He remains one of the supreme masters who have the unique ability to transfer on paper what they have felt and experienced. In the last period of his life when he wrote The Old Man and the Sea he brought about a synthesis of the controlled style of the early Twenties and the relaxed style of the Thirties. In The Old Man and the Sea one can sense the austerity of the biblical style and at the same time the beauty of the world that has charmed him :

He no longer dreamed of storms, nor of women, nor of great fish, nor fights, nor contests of strength, nor of his wife. He only dreamed of places now and of the lions on the beach. They played like young cats in the (tusk and he loved them as he loved the boy. He never dreamed about the boy. He simply woke, looked out the open door at the moon and unrolled his trousers and put them on. He urinated outside the shack and then went up the road to wake the boy. He was shivering with the morning cold. But he knew he would shiver himself warm and that soon he would be rowing. (The Old Man and the Sea)

Maintains High Standards: - Throughout his life he did not let his standards for the exact word, the concrete statement and his concentration on the physical world of things relax. He makes a scene so real, that we can almost smell the pine-covered slopes or the surf on a sea-beach. In A Farewell to Arms the fall is vividly depicted in Chapter 1, and the famous Caporetto retreat remains a landmark in realistic technique. Similarly, El Sardo's last stand on the hill-top creates on the mind of the reader an impression not very different from that of a coloured movie.

A Mastery on Dialogue: - To this admirable gift of his he brought another talent : the art of writing dialogue. His ear, because of its somewhat erratic training in music that he might have received from his mother, was a very sensitive device to catch the peculiarities of accents of various speakers. He also captured their speech rhythms. They are not literally transferred on to the paper but they are transformed into brilliant dialogue by the unique process of artistic transformation. He shunned all authorial comments and let the conversation convey to the reader what it stands for by itself. If an authorial comment, in Hemingway's opinion, is needed then the writer has not visualised the scene or listened attentively to the conversation that he is putting on paper. He applied to prose the kinaesthetic test that Robert Jordan felt when he heard Maria's story.

Pilar Among Memorable Characters: - Hemingway has created some of the most memorable characters of our time. Beginning with Prick Adams who is a symbol of the twentieth-century shocked sensibility, to Santiago in The Old Man .and the Sea his characters are individuals and at the same time representative of a whole generation of men and women whom they portray. Orville Prescott thinks : "It is the guerrilla chieftain's wife, the super-woman Pilar, who alone survives in memory and who will continue to do so as long as the bitter courage and heroic defiance of the Spanish, people in the civil war are not forgotten. Pilar is Mr. Hemingway's only triumphant feat of characterization" On My Opinion, p. 67).

Many Memorable Characters: - One cannot agree with Orville Prescott entirely because in Leslie Fiedler's opinion Brett Ashley (in The Sun Also Rises) is the only al female character in Hemingway's fiction. Again, Carlos Baker thinks that Margot Macomber is a perfect representative of the predatory Anglo-American bitches and at the same time an individual. Whatever be her morality and her code of ethic she is certainly a living character and will last as long as Hemingway's stories are read. Similarly, Manuel in "The undefeated", not only exists as a symbol of the undefeated human spirit but also as an individual whom we see charging at the bull with a sword in his hand forgetting all the pain of a broken wrist. Even characters like Count Greffi or Dr. Valentini in A Farewell to Arms make much deeper impact upon us than what their brief appearance, in the novel warrants.

Cyclic Plots: - Hemingway's plots are extremely simple. With the exception of For Whom the Bell Tolls in which social and political forces are introduced and_ they play very important roles in the lives of the main characters, the rest of the novels have very simple plots. They depict one or two major characters, their ordeals, their disappointments and their failures and their vain or successful struggle to achieve a measure of dignity. The novels end usually at a point where they begin. Jake Barnes love for Brett Ashley cannot be consummated because of his physical injury. At the end of the novel he has gained a measure of maturity and learnt to live without love but the love still remains unconsummated. Similarly, in A Farewell to Arms one crazy lover (Catherine Barkley) at the beginning of the novel is replaced by another shocked lover (Frederic Henry). In For Whom the Bell Tolls, Maria carries the wound of having loved and lost which is as deep as the shock of rape committed by the Fascists. Robert Jordan's attempt to blow-up the bridge, in spite of his success, is an exercise in futility because the Fascists have already known of the Republicans' plan of launching an offensive and they have already carried their reinforcements across the bridge which Robert Jordan is supposed to destroy just before the offensive. In his last novel, The Old Man and the Sea, Santiago returns as empty-handed after three days of his ordeal on the sea as when he set out hopefully on the eighty-fifth day.

Characters Grow Up: - Carlos Baker calls the plots of Hemingway's novels cyclic but if they were cyclic there would be no insight obtained in the course of the action depicted in the novels. It would be far better to say that the plots of his novels are spiraled rather than cyclic, because in a spiral there is a difference of level even when one comes to the starting point and it indicates the maturity of the main character, as a result of the action. The main character grows in stature in the course of the novel.

Now Becomes Eternal: - In Green Hills of Africa, Hemingway mentions that an author can attain fourth and fifth dimensions in prose if he is sincere enough and lucky too. Critics have not reached any definite conclusion as to what he meant by the fourth and fifth dimensions. However, there is some agreement that the fourth or fifth dimension could mean the raising of "now" to the level of eternal now. By concentrating on the present and the intensity of its experience, the "now" becomes "eternal now". And in this intensity of experience the participants share their experience with people in other times and at other places who have had or will have similar experiences. They share with these people a sort of mystical union and a sort of immortality not very unsimilar to what Robert Jordan has experienced in his love for Maria.

Fragile Affirmation: - Hemingway tried to be a realist all his life. But as time went by he moved toward some affirmation from his earlier near-nihilism and this is reflected in the deeper layers of his prose narration. He has utilized the techniques of irony, allusion, extended metaphor, symbolism, and even myth to connote meanings that are not apparent on the surface. Frederic Henry's experience of the First World War reflects the experience of 'the whole American nation which was betrayed by the politician. Jake Barnes' experience as embodied in The Sun Also Rises is the experience of a whole generation—the lost generation, the American expatriates wandering aimlessly in the cities of Europe. Again, his use of rain as a symbol in A Farewell to Arms is highly suggestive. Rain in itself is no evil but the way it is associated with Henry's misfortunes and finally. Catherine's death it becomes a symbol of disaster, death, defeat anti decay. His use of the hyena and the vulture as symbols for artistic betrayal in "The Snows of Kilimanjaro" suggests a new dimension in his art. Even a short scene in A Farewell to Arms, in which Frederic Henry empties his glass on a burning log of wood so that he may have his whisky and by this action kill hundreds of ants prematurely, even though they were born to die, becomes a symbol of man's fate in a deterministic universe. There is "no exist" for any of us but we all try to make our little contributions to the welfare of the, human race. That is why one should not ask for whom the bell tolls; it tolls for thee.-

His Vision of Nada: - More than all these, Hemingway is one of the supreme spokesmen of the twentieth-century man. His vision of Nada–nothingness–penetrates to the depth of the existential dilemma that man faces today. Man is lonely, and he has seen that the world is purposeless and that there is no meaning beyond what meaning man gives to his life. Action is to be performed for its own sake and it is its own justification. There are no gods or superhuman agencies that will support man in an hour of crisis. If man is to live meaningfully, he must evolve a code for himself based upon the empirical evidence of his senses. There is no life beyond the grave and therefore one must realise one's identity in this life on earth. It is the picture of a solitary man in an indifferent universe that Hemingway seems to project in his novels and short stories. Jordan, in the last scene of For Whom the Bell Tolls is a symbol of "the lonely rebel" whose despair is unrelieved by any hope. Love, drink, religion, community life—all are no good. It is a stark and bare statement of a stark and bare truth; and it is not easy to be reconciled to this vision of nothingness and meaninglessness. One can occasionally seek comfort in fishing or love-making or drinking or the company of friends but man is basically alone. But Hemingway is no nihilist for his is an art of affirmation.

Affirmation in Art: - It is his devotion to art that ultimately redeems him from nihilism. It. is his craft that gives him the scope for creativity and his sense of identity. It is an art .that he wants to practice without fakery and without tricks. He wants it to be the religion of a creative artist and it will give him the justification for his life. Similarly, even, when the winner takes nothing he attains dignity in the manner of his losing like Robert Jordan. This is where the matador, the artist, and the ordinary man become one; and one can face life as the matador does in the bull-ring.

High Quality Art: - Hemingway has not written much and the impact that he has made on the reading public is far too great as compared to the volume of his work. But they are chiselled jewels and in the service of his art he has spared no pains and in spite of the limitations that Earl Rovit mentions he has achieved almost a permanent place in the history of the twentieth-century novel.

Hemingway's Concept of Physical defeat and Moral Success

Life Seen As Struggle: - Hemingway achieved maturity as a man during the First World War in which he had been wounded seriously. As a result of this unfortunate occurrence his vision of life became coloured because in - those impressionable years he had seen life from very close quarters and he had discovered that violence was one of the real and rude facts of life, the most important, in fact. He saw life as a struggle in which man has no choice except to fight—sometimes literally and quite often metaphorically. Paolini, an Italian critic, commenting on this aspect of Hemingway's art says:

Here (in Hemingway's works) the inner motive is precisely that antithesis between professionalism and dilettantism, interpreting these two opposing concepts in their broadest and universal sense. For the Hemingway man to belong to the category' of 'professionals' implies a choice–either by instinct or as a result of a series of experiences ; it means he has taken up a solid strategic position in life-war which by its very nature can no longer be stormed by the enemy or engulfed in the abyss of nada. The choice determines whether life is worth living and fighting for or is 'a nothing and then nothing and then nothing'. Hence the dilettante is a failure: he has failed in his duty, in the true categorical imperative of the conscience; he has wasted his talents and energies. The other category is that of the undefeated; the winner, even when they win nothing, even when they seem to be routed. It is in these that Hemingway solves the dilemma of 'to be or not to be', in which the 'nonbeing', probably deriving from the mysticism of the Slav writers, is both an obstacle and a calamity to being.

Jordan is Ideologically Confused: - Jordan in For Whom the Bell Tolls is a typical Hemingway hero and he suffers from some of the same nightmares as Nick Adams. In his early childhood he had seen a Negro being lynched and this human degradation haunts him even now. In Spain, he sees similar atrocities committed by man, whether it be Maria's tale or Pablo's exploits. He has made his choice to fight for the Republic in order to safeguard the interests of man, anywhere in the world. In his opinion Fascism constitutes a potential danger to the rights of man and he does not mind laying down his life for the Republic. But as has been made obvious beyond doubt he is not sure of his commitment: he is perhaps still trying to justify his choice. In his moments of doubt he prefers to either dull his senses by liquor, or escape from the necessity of thinking in the arms of Maria. He confesses that he has kept thinking in abeyance for the duration of the war. After the war has been won he will, he thinks, form his judgments. He is as confused as Henry in A Farewell to Arms with the only difference that he has accepted the illusion of a cause which Henry had rejected. At the end of the novel he is merely an individual fighting to protect his beloved whom he has raised to the level of a symbol for Spain.

Life is Defeated: - However, this should not blind us to the realities of life as they are presented in the novel. Due to the treachery of Pablo and Pilar's lack of vigilance he loses his vital equipment, a fact which makes human sacrifices a necessity. He loses a true Christian like Anselmo whose life could have been saved. On his instructions El Sardo goes to steal horses and due to the unseasonal snow he is traced to his hide-out and eventually wiped out by the Fascist planes. The gypsies who do not understand the causes of the war and the motives of Jordan's sacrifice escape. Jordan also is eventually overtaken by death; and he lies on the floor of the forest waiting for his end. All this bloodshed is rendered, unless for the Fascists have learnt of the attack and they have made the necessary preparations to meet the attack. Jordan's attempt to get in touch with General Golz reveals on the one hand inefficiency in the Loyalist ranks and on the other the futility of the attempt. Andres Marty thinks that by being given the task of delivering the dispatch he has been given a reprieve because all the guerrillas are so depressed by what they have seen of the war that they are convinced that their cause is lost forever. They are symbol of the desperation that has eaten into their entrails. Pablo is not an exception because El Sardo knows equally well how dangerous Jordan's plan is: and Pablo tries to oppose him because he is more than ever convinced that the time to make a move from the Guadarrama Mountains has not come as yet. Agustin is bored with his stay in the hills and he wants action for the sake of action. He lacks the education which is necessary for a cause to succeed. Pilar knows from the moment she has seen Jordan's hand that Jordan is bound to die. With the smell of death being so strong in the air, it is quite clear that the forces of life are defeated.

Ideologies Translated Into Physical Combat: - Having reduced the opposing forces to a physical combat Hemingway gives the hero enough courage and daring and resolution to enable him to last somehow until the end. Jordan avoids carefully any conflict with Pablo so as not to endanger the success of his mission. Even during the period when the Fascist cavalry are almost knocking at the door of Pablo's hide-out, Jordan thinks of escaping from there with his explosives. He does not want to fight. He does not let anybody go to help El Sardo in his last fight. He prepares himself for the final effort to blow up the bridge which, as we come to know, does not remain such a necessity. He does it out of a false sense of duty to the Republic and against his better judgment.

Mere Action Replaces a Clear Vision: - Hemingway poses the problem of politics but sees no way out. Not that a novelist is compelled to give solutions of the problems that he has posed but in terms of the characters in the story he is under obligation to delineate clearly what their thinking implies. Hemingway at the crucial moment brusquely brushes the vital issues aside and makes the hero take part in action which is breath-taking of course, but it is a literature of evasion. Action must lead to some 'results, inevitably, but in Hemingway action becomes a substitute for a clear vision of life. It is here, the charge levelled by some critics that the Hemingway hero is incapable of thinking, finds its support.

Jordan Does His Part Well: - As Paolini points out the hero in For Whom the Bell Tolls belongs to the category of "Professionals". He is like Manuel in "The Undefeated" who must perform his duty and whether he lives or dies becomes immaterial. Similarly other values also lose their glamour and charm. He is not after gains, for the real satisfaction must come, in the last analysis, from within. Man must overcome pessimism and find "his own unit of measurement". Jordan finds his measurement in his satisfaction that he has done his little bit as this is all be could do.

Action Solves No Ethical Problems: - As a matter of fact, war solves no ethical problems which Hemingway's work invariably raises. For the Hemingway hero death becomes an easy solution of the intricate problem of living. Kashkin, a Russian critic, argues that For Whom the Bell Tolls champions "the invigorating and inspiring role of work", but he forgets due to his cultural background and political commitment that work, or action in itself cannot be justified. Work in order to be psychologically satisfying must be a result of inner motivation and not a necessity to deaden one's inner questioning.

Contradictions in Jordan's Thinking: -Jordan has tried to submerge his individuality in the Loyalist cause but it is very doubtful whether he succeeded, for the Hemingway "hero is usually a great individualist. He has learnt from Karkov, the, Russian journalist, that political conviction is. essential for any meaningful partisan activity ; he has accepted communist discipline for the duration of the war because it is the best, and the communists alone offer the programme that he can accept, and yet he upholds the guiding principles of the American constitution, like equality, liberty, fraternity, and the pursuit of happiness. The Red ideology tells him that there is no such thing as love, and Jordan has experienced genuine love. He has seen what the Loyalist discipline is like and still he fights for these people.

A Sense of Futility Haunts: – It is true that in For Whom the Bell Tolls the irresponsibility of the "Lost Generation" is superseded by heroism and a sense of duty and a commitment to the human race yet if this were so in any real sense the futility that overwhelms the hero and the reader would not have been there. The final gloom is absolutely unrelieved; the human cause is lost forever on the Spanish soil. Franco's rule in Spain was a testimony to the author's vision of the Loyalist cause having been lost for practically all times to come. Even such a strong supporter as Kashkin of the philosophy of action and the solidarity of the human race cannot but admit the futility of the hero's action:

He dies not only for Spain, not only to save the girt Maria whom he loves, but also for his own sake and in fulfilment of a moral duty. Jordan knows that to live properly is impossible without 'going where you have to go and doing what you have to do.' So his only reward is the consciousness of duty done. And again 'Winner Takes Nothing'.

At Best Wins Moral Victories: – It seems Hemingway had found something to die for and he seems to imply that if you die as Anselmo or Jordan died, then physical death means nothing. You may ask as you breathe your last: "Death, where is thy sting ?". But this vision faded in the next decade because this commitment to mankind is absent from the next two novels he wrote. They deal with individual problems of the heroes and Hemingway seems to have retreated from his social commitment if it meant the solidarity of all the working people of the world. However, the artist's role remains to understand and present, which he did admirably. That is what makes his hero a limited achievement because his victories, at last, remain moral ones.

"He did not wish to write a political novel, but one in which political events should form the setting for a timeless story of personal tragedy." Discuss this statement with reference to For Whom the Bell Tolls.

A Human Document: – Leicester Hemingway records in My Brother, Ernest Hemingway "The early spring of 1938, Ernest worked intensely while he was in Key West, revising The Fifth Column and thinking beyond it, he began to feel that there must be a great novel buried in the treachery, courage, and sacrifice that he had seen during recent months in Spain." Of course Hemingway's personal sympathies were with the Loyalists yet what impressed him more than the struggle of the Spanish people for a decent life was "the treachery, courage, and sacrifice that he had seen in Spain."

The fact that this happened in Spain is incidental: what is more significant is that these traits are human traits and will be found anywhere in the world. In this respect For Whom the Bell Tolls is not purely a political novel; it is basically a human document which praises what is good in man and condemns, though with a deep understanding, what is evil.

Focus on One Minor Event: - Hemingway has chosen to write not of the Spanish Civil War in its entirety but of a minor incident in the war. Although the story extends beyond the Guadarrama Mountains due to what the hero learns of some other events from other characters, yet what we are shown is confined to the action that takes place in the vicinity of the bridge. Jordan's arrival in the company of Anselmo, the split in the band due to Pablo's decision not to participate in the blowing up of the bridge, Jordan's love-making, El Sardo's willingness to help and his destruction by the Fascist planes, Pablo's treachery and his eventual return to the band, and finally the destruction of the bridge and Jordan's death-these are the key events. The flash-back scenes take us to Madrid and Hotel Gaylord's where the Russians are staying, Pablo's home town where he destroyed the Fascists, Maria's home town where her father and mother were killed and she herself was raped, the dynamiting of the Fascist train by Kashkin and Maria's rescue. The only action which takes place away from the bridge is Andres Marty's journey to the head-quarters of General Golz. The Spanish Civil War was a complex affair, as we are told by a number of intellectuals including George Orwell in his Homage to Catalonia ; therefore, it would be naive to believe that the war was confined to the hills near Segovia ; nor are there any political discussions in the novel which highlight the issues involved. What we are told is the experience of a young American volunteer during his three-day stay in the hide-out of a guerrilla leader. And this does not qualify it as a political novel.

A Fruitless Action: - The political events and discussions, if any, are no more than a backdrop against which a personal drama is enacted. It is a tragic story of the failure of an individual who is swayed by idealism, and his strong common sense—one could call it his pragmatism—creates a conflict in his mind whether what he is doing is worth doing. He suppresses his doubts and persuades an indifferent band of guerrillas to help him to destroy a vital bridge so that the Fascist reinforcements may not reach the pass which Golz is attacking. On a purely personal plane one could argue that Jordan's effort is highly admirable but he knows as well as any one else that what he is doing and at such a heavy price is fruitless. The Fascist reinforcements have been carried across the bridge already; they have known before-hand of the attack and they are a disciplined army. On the other hand Fernando informs Jordan that he learnt in Segovia that the Loyalists were going to launch an offensive in the vicinity of Segovia and that it was an open secret. The loose tongues of the Loyalists have been the cause of their ruin. At best, one could say that the events narrated here are representative of what went on elsewhere in Spain but it is not the whole truth about the Spanish Civil War or the, political situation in Spain.

Jordan's Sole Purpose: - As a personal story of an individual it is admirable. When Golz tells Jordan: "I do not like to ask people to do such things and in such a way. I could not order you to do it. I understand what you may be forced to do through my putting such conditions" Jordan promises that whatever be the difficulties he will blow up the bridge on time. Having seen how the guerrilla morale stood in Pablo's band he cleverly wins over the loyalty of Pilar and the other guerrillas and he thus isolates. Pablo. When El Sardo's band has been wiped out by the Fascists his devotion to duty compels Pilar to take on some of the responsibilities of "the very select" offensive that Jordan is planning to launch against the Fascist posts on both sides of the bridge. He loves the good things of life but he will not let them interfere in his work. Pilar very aptly remarks: "You are a very cold boy." Before he becomes committed to Maria he declares: "I have not found one [woman] that moved me as they say they should move you." And when it has become obvious to him that due to the absence of the exploder and the fuse the assignment might prove fatal to him he is prepared to carry out his job, even though he would have liked to live, and for a long time, with Maria. Love is one of the good things of life but he rejects it in favour of his duty to the Republic which he equates with "Life, Liberty, and the Pursuit of Happiness". When it is a question of duty even Maria, whom he loves more than his life, has no place in his life. He tolerates Pablo, a murderer, and is not too critical of him. He is useful to the Republic even though he is highly debased, therefore, he may be allowed to live. He is ready to exploit the guerrillas for his own purpose but once the bridge has been blown up he sacrifices his own life so that they may escape to safety. He does not like to murder men but he kills the Fascist cavalryman who threatens to invade their privacy and thus spoil the chances of his successfully blowing up the bridge. He shoots the Fascist guard on the bridge because it is essential. He orders Anselmo to kill because knowing Anselmo's Christian character he makes sure that he does not falter and thus endanger the success of the operation. He is an intellectual and still he suspends his thinking for the duration of the war because too much preoccupation with unnecessary thought might hamper him in his work. Such a devotion to duty (to the solidarity of Man) borders on fanaticism but it is admirable in a partisan who, even though an American, is fighting for the Spanish people.

Hemingway Writes of the End: - Jordan represents certain aspects of Hemingway's character and thus in Jordan he expresses some of his own fears and hopes. Kashkin, the Russian authority on Hemingway, remarks that in the middle years (1928-38) his activity "was the purposeless activity of a man vainly attempting not to think, that his courage was the courage of despair, that the obsession of death was taking hold of him, that again and again he was writing of the end—the end of love, the end of life, the end of hope, the end of all."

As An Elegy: -In Jordan's courage, critics have detected an element of, despair. The picture of the world that Hemingway delineates in For Whom the Bell Tolls is that of "a fatalistic world". "Not an epic of the war, nor even the story of Robert Jordan's education in the war, but almost an elegy sung in praise of the lonely rebel, serving in a foreign country with a foreign army, though now with the illusion of a cause ; a lost man whom the war overwhelms without changing him. In the face of this central feeling of the impossibility of belief, the Marxist ideal, can only be the opium of the people, an austere facade hiding deceit." The book is a monument to the confused thinking of a man who really belongs to "no-man's party".

Jordan is Lost but Perseveres: - There are four distinct stages in the novel when Jordan is, compelled to think that the cause he is espousing is lost irredeemably. On his arrival Pablo's initial hostility, which he later on successfully conceals, is the first indication of what he might expect in this oasis. El Sardo's destruction should have made any man wiser but Jordan persists. He also has learnt that the Fascists know of the attack and they have made preparation for the attack but he continues to harp on the theme of his choice. Finally, Pablo's treachery and Pilar's lapse arouse his ingenuity and out of sheer desperation he decides to use hand-grenades in place of the fuse and detonators. All through his three-day stay in this hide-out with the exception of the love of Maria and Pilar's unquestioned loyalty to him he meets nothing that could cheer up his spirits. The novel is concerned with what happens between "two supine postures" —Jordan lying on the floor of the forest in the beginning of the novel, and then at the end of the novel. Nemi D'Agostino remarks

The utter uselessness of the attempt on the bridge, upon which the future of the human race might depend, is made clear from the start, as is the uselessness of the pathetic heroism of that group of solitary eccentrics which Hemingway selects as his chief characters. The sky overhanging the sierra is without depth and beyond the mountains there is no crusade but only the confused movements of heterogeneous crowds, a massacre iii a betrayed land. Jordan is a new Frederic Henry, who finds a code of behaviour by which to endure life in the exact fulfilment of his mission, and in the end is driven to 'sacrifice' more by desperation than by any certainty. His drama is too oppressive and restricted to reflect the so much wider and more complex tragedy of Spain. There is too much disenchantment with Jordan's idealism in the novel.

Borders on Melodrama: - For this very reason the heroics produce an effect not very different from melodrama. But for the sure touch of the novelist the tragedy of Jordan could have become an actual melodrama and the bathos of his death could have degenerated into pathos. The presence of such heroic figure as Joaquin, El Sardo and Anselmo redeem the novel and the author from absurdity. But for Anselmo's true sentiment and El Sardo's true heroism the book would not have been what it is.

Irony Saves the Novel: - Last but not the least, For Whom the Bell Tolls cannot be a partisan novel because of the extensive use of irony in the novel. Some critics feel that it goes against the main drift of the novel. Hemingway who supported the Loyalist cause in the Spanish Civil War could not shut his eyes to the realities of the Spanish life. He remains an artist first and foremost; therefore, he could not be a partisan as a novelist. Lieutenant Berrendo is portrayed with sympathy and understanding, even though he is fighting against the Loyalists. The Fascist discipline is shown superior to the commitment of the Loyalist supporters; and the fact that they are irregular gypsies hardly mitigates the adverse criticism.

Remains an Imperfect Novelist: – Lincoln Kirste in his article on Hemingway, "The Canon of Death", writes: Hemingway is an incomplete tragic artist whose wilful limits, as yet exclude him from the company of creators of living characters, but they have the signatures of his choice attached, and he had personally endowed them with their characteristics. They do not exist independent of his approval, as do Anna Karenina, Starbuck, or Leopold Bloom. Convinced and a master of a physical world as he now is, can he dare to acquire a knowledge of the others?

Mourning Becomes Electra

Eugene O'Neill (1888–1953) was the son of an actor whose work meant that the family led a difficult life on the road. O'Neill would later deeply resent his insecure childhood, pinning the family's many problems, including his mother's drug addiction, on his father. Educated at boarding schools, O'Neill gained admission to Princeton University but left after only one year to go to sea. He spent his early twenties living on the docks of Buenos Aires, Liverpool, and New York, sinking into an alcoholism that brought him to the point of suicide. Slowly O'Neill recovered from his addiction and took a job writing for a newspaper. A bout of tuberculosis left him incapacitated and he was consigned to a sanitarium for six months. While in recovery, O'Neill decided to become a playwright.

O'Neill wrote his first play, Bound East for Cardiff, in 1916, premiering it with a company in Provincetown, MA that took it to New York that same year. In 1920, O'Neill's breakthrough came with his play Beyond the Horizon. Historians of drama identify its premiere as a pivotal event on the Broadway stage, one that brought a new form of tragic realism to an industry almost entirely overrun with stock melodramas and shallow farces. O'Neill went on to write over twenty innovative plays in the next twenty years, to steadily growing acclaim. The more famous works from his early period include The Great God Brown (1926), a study in the conflicts between idealism and materialism, and Strange Interlude (1928), an ambitious 36-hour saga on the plight of the Everywoman. His late career brought such works as his masterpiece, The Iceman Cometh (1946), an Ibsenian portrait of man's hold on his pipe dreams, and A Long Day's Journey into Night (1956), the posthumously published and painfully autobiographical tragedy of a family haunted by a mother's drug addiction.

O'Neill wrote morality plays and experimented with the tragic form. O'Neill's interest in tragedy began as early as 1924 with his Desire Under the Elms, a tale of incest, infanticide, and fateful retribution, but would come to maturity with his monumental revision of Aeschylus's Oresteia, Mourning Becomes Electra (1931). O'Neill chose Electra because he felt that her tale had been left incomplete. More generally, as his diary notes indicate, O'Neill understood his exercises in tragedy as an attempt to find a modern analogue to an ancient mode of experience. Thus Mourning aims to provide a "modern psychological approximation of the Greek sense of fate" in a time in which the notion of an inescapable and fundamentally non-redemptive determinism is incomprehensible. Accordingly, the setting of the trilogy, the American Civil War, springs from O'Neill's attempt to negotiate the chasm between ancient and modern. For O'Neill, the Civil War provided a setting that would allow audiences to locate the tragic in their national history and mythology while retaining enough distance in time to lend the tale its required epic proportions. Mourning also provided O'Neill with an occasion to abandon the complex set design of the Art Theater, which he had long bemoaned as a constraint on the playwright's creative freedom.

Introduction to Mourning Becomes Electra

Greek Sources

The title of the play suggests its relation to the Greek drama. The story of the house of Atreus was set down by Homer, Pindar, Aeschylus, Sophocles, Euripides and diverse other Greek writers whose works are not extant. From this house shadowed by an ancient curse, Agamemnon, brother of Menelaus, goes forth to the war at Troy.

His wife, Clytemnestra, the sister of Helen, during: her husband's absence takes for her paramour Aegisthus and shares the government of Argos with him. In due time Agamemnon, having at the God's behest sacrificed his daughter Iphigenia and bringing with him Cassandra, Priam's daughter, returns and is murdered by Clytemnestra and her lover. Electra, her daughter, is shamed and degraded and prays for the return of her brother Orestes, long ago sent out of the country by his mother and now become a man. Orestes returns, kills Clytemnestra and Aegisthus. Hey is pursued by the Erinyes, and only after wandering and agony and a vindication of himself before the tribunal of Athena's Areophagus is he cleansed of his sin.

Narrative Pattern

Mourning Becomes Electra begins with the mother and daughter, Christine and Lavinia, waiting there in the house of the Mannons, the return of Ezra Mannon 'from the war, which with Lee's surrernder is about over. A thread of romance is introduced between. Lavinia and Peter, and between Lavinia's brother, Orin and Hazel, Peter's sister. Meanwhile, Captain Adam Brant comes to call ; he pays a certain court to Lavinia, and she, acting on a cue from the hired man, who has been on the place sixty years, traps him into admitting that he is the son of one of the Mannons who had seduced a Canadian maid servant and been driven from home by his father, Lavinia's grandfather. She has all her data straight now. She has suspected her mother, followed her to New York, where -Christine has pretended to go because of her own father's illness, but has in fact been meeting Adam. Lavinia has written to her father and to her brother, hinting at the town gossip about her mother. We learn that Adam had returned to avenge his mother but instead had fallen passionately in love with Christine, who loves him as passionately as she hates her husband. From this point the play moves on, with the father's hatred of the son, who returns it, the son's adoration of his mother, the daughter's and the mother's antagonism, the daughter's and father's devotion, to Christine's murder of her husband with the poison sent by Adam and substituted for the medicine prescribed against his heart trouble. Orin returns, after an illness from a wound in the head. Christine tries to protect herself in her son's mind against the plots of Lavinia. Lavinia, in the room where her father's body lies, convinces, him with the facts ; they trail Christine to Adam's ship, where she has gone to warn him against Orin. Orin shoots Adam. Christine next day kills herself. Brother and sister take a long voyage to China, stop at the Southern Isles, and come home again. Substitutions have taken place, Lavinia has grown like her Mother, Orin more like his father. Meanwhile, his old affair with Hazel, encouraged at last by Lavinia, who now wants to marry Peter, is cancelled he finds himself making an incestuous proposal to Lavinia and is repulsed by her. He shoots himself. In the end, Lavinia, speaking words of love to Peter, finds Adam's name on her lips. She breaks with Peter, orders the blinds of her house nailed shut, and goes into the house, to live there till her death. Justice has been done, the Mannon dead will be there and she will be there.

Parallel Characters

It is now obvious that the American dramatist, as the Greek did, used a well known outline which he could fill in to his purpose. Obviously, too, Ezra Mannon is Agamemnon, Captain Brant is Aegisthus, Christine Clytemnestra, Lavinia Electra, and Orin Orestes. But to dismiss the matter by saying that O'Neill has merely repeated the classic story in modern terms is off the track. Let it go at that and you will miss even the really classic element in the play and get only the Greek side of it that is self-evident and that would be easy for any dramatist to imitate.

Departures From the Greek Play

The story itself follows the Greeks up to the middle of the third division of the play, and here the incest motive, the death of Orin and the transference of the whole situation and the dramatic conclusion from the mother to the sister depart from Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides. Adam's relation to the family adds to the role of the lover the motif of a blood relationship. The old hired man, the confidant, parallels to some extent a Greek device, familiar to us in countless plays. The townspeople and workmen are now and again a kind of chorus. Many of the shadings and themes are from the older plays ; for a good example, the servant's line in Aeschylus about the dead killing one who lives, which underlies one of the new play's main themes. The death of the lover, as in Aeschylus and Euripides, not as in Sophocles, comes before that of the mother, which throws the stress where the O'Neill play needs it. The division of the play into three parts is, of course, like the trilogy of the Greek dramatist. On the other hand, the dividing line is much less distinct in Mourning Becomes Electra ; the final curtain of the first part, for example falls, it is true, on Mannon's death, as in Aeschylus it does on Agamemnon's, but there is not the same effect of totality because of the stress put on Lavinia ; in Agamemnon Electra does not even appear.

Magnificent Theme

The magnificent theme that there is something in the dead that we cannot placate falsely is there in the Greek plays and in, the O'Neill play as well. The end of the play is by imaginative insight Greek in spirit Lavinia goes into the house, the blinds are closed for ever, the stage is silent, the doors shut, the exaltation is there, the completion, the tragic certainty.

Summary of the Play

The Homecoming

It is late spring afternoon in front of the Mannon house. The master of the house, Brigadier-General Ezra Mannon, is soon to return from war.

Lavinia, Ezra's severe daughter, has just come, like her mother Christine, from a trip to New York. Seth, the gardener, takes the anguished girl aside. He needs to warn her against her would-be beau, Captain Brant. Before Seth can continue, however, Lavinia's suitor Peter and his sister Hazel, arrive. Lavinia stiffens. If Peter is proposing to her again, he must realize that she cannot marry anyone because Father needs her.

Lavinia asks Seth to resume his story. Seth asks if she has not noticed that Brant looks just like her all the other male Mannons. He believes that Brant is the child of David Mannon and Marie Brantôme, a Canuck nurse, a couple expelled from the house for fear of public disgrace.

Suddenly Brant himself enters from the drive. Calculatingly Lavinia derides the memory of Brant's mother. Brant explodes and reveals his heritage. Lavinia's grandfather loved his mother and jealously cast his brother out of the family. Brant has sworn vengeance.

A moment later, Lavinia appears inside her father's study. Christine enters indignantly, wondering why Lavinia has summoned her. Lavinia reveals that she followed her to New York and saw her kissing Brant. Christine defiantly tells Lavinia that she has long hated Ezra and that Lavinia was born of her disgust. She loves her brother Orin because he always seemed hers alone.

Lavinia coldly explains that she intends to keep her mother's secret for Ezra's sake. Christine must only promise to never see Brant again. Laughingly Christine accuses her daughter of wanting Brant herself. Lavinia has always schemed to steal her place. Christine agrees to Lavinia's terms. Later she proposes to Brant that they poison Ezra and attribute his death to his heart trouble.

One week later, Lavinia stands stiffly at the top of the front stairs with Christine. Suddenly Ezra enters and stops stiffly before his house. Lavinia rushes forward and embraces him.

Once she and Ezra alone, Christine assures her that he has nothing to suspect with regards to Brant. Ezra impulsively kisses her hand. The war has made him realize that they must overcome the wall between them. Calculatingly Christine assures him that all is well. They kiss.

Toward daybreak in Ezra's bedroom, Christine slips out from the bed. Mannon's bitterly rebukes her. He knows the house is not his and that Christine awaits his death to be free. Christine deliberately taunts that she has indeed become Brant's mistress. Mannon rises in fury, threatening her murder, and then falls back in agony, begging for his medicine. Christine retrieves a box from her room and gives him the poison.

Mannon realizes her treachery and calls Lavinia for help. Lavinia rushes to her father. With his dying effort, Ezra indicts his wife: "She's guilty—not medicine!" he gasps and then dies. Her strength gone, Christine collapses in a faint.

The Hunted

Peter, Lavinia, and Orin arrive at the house. Orin disappointedly complains of Christine's absence. He jealously asks Lavinia about what she wrote him regarding Brant. Lavinia warns him against believing Christine's lies.

Suddenly Christine hurries out, reproaching Peter for leaving Orin alone. Mother and son embrace jubilantly. Suspiciously Orin asks Christine about Brant. Christine explains that Lavinia has gone mad and begun to accuse her of the impossible. Orin sits at Christine's feet and recounts his wonderful dreams about her and the South Sea Islands. The Islands represented all the war was not: peace, warmth, and security, or Christina herself. Lavinia reappears and coldly calls Orin to see their father's body.

In the study, Orin tells Lavinia that Christine has already warned him of her madness. Calculatingly Lavinia insists that Orin certainly cannot let their mother's paramour escape. She proposes that they watch Christine until she goes to meet Brant herself. Orin agrees.

The night after Ezra's funeral, Brant's clipper ship appears at a wharf in East Boston. Christine meets Brant on the deck, and they retire to the cabin to speak in private. Lavinia and an enraged Orin listen from the deck. The lovers decide to flee east and seek out their Blessed Islands. Fearing the hour, they painffully bid each other farewell. When Brant returns, Orin shoots him and ransacks the room to make it seem that Brant has been robbed.

The following night Christine paces the drive before the Mannon house. Orin and Lavinia appear, revealing that they killed Brant. Christine collapses. Orin knees beside her pleadingly, promising that he will make her happy, that they can leave Lavinia at home and go abroad together. Lavinia orders Orin into the house. He obeys.

Christine glares at her daughter with savage hatred and marches into the house. Lavinia determinedly turns her back on the house, standing like a sentinel. A shot is heard from Ezra's study. Lavinia stammers: "It is justice!"

The Haunted

A year later, Lavinia and Orin return from their trip East. Lavinia's body has lost its military stiffness and she resembles her mother perfectly. Orin has grown dreadfully thin and bears the statue-like attitude of his father.

In the sitting room, Orin grimly remarks that Lavinia's has stolen Christine's soul. Death has set her free to become her. Peter enters from the rear and gasps, thinking he has seen Christine's ghost. Lavinia approaches him eagerly. Orin jealously mocks his sister, accusing her of becoming a true romantic during their time in the Islands.

A month later, Orin works intently at a manuscript in the Mannon study. Lavinia knocks sharply at the locked door. With forced casualness, she asks Peter what he is doing. Orin insists that they must atone for Mother's death. As the last male Mannon, he has written a history of the family crimes, from Abe's onward. Lavinia is the most interesting criminal of all. She only became pretty like Mother on Brant's Islands, with the natives staring at her with desire.

When Orin accuses her of sleeping with one of them, she assumes Christine's taunting voice. Reacting like Ezra, Orin grasps his sister's throat, threatening her murder. He has taken Father's place and she Mother's.

A moment later, Hazel and Peter appear in the sitting room. Orin enters, insisting that he see Hazel alone. He gives her a sealed envelope, enjoining her to keep it safe from his sister. She should only open it if something happens to him or if Lavinia tries to marry Peter. Lavinia enters from the hall. Hazel moves to leave, trying to keep Orin's envelope hidden behind her back. Rushing to Orin, Lavinia beseeches him to make her surrender it. Orin complies.

Orin tells his sister she can never see Peter again. A "distorted look of desire" comes into his face. Lavinia stares at him in horror, saying, "For God's sake—! No! You're insane! You can't mean—!" Lavinia wishes his death. Startled, Orin realizes that his death would be another act of justice. Mother is speaking through Lavinia.

Peter appears in the doorway. Unnaturally casual, Orin remarks that he was about to go clean his pistol and exits. Lavinia throws herself into Peter's arms. A muffled shot is heard.

Three days later, Lavinia appears dressed in deep mourning. A resolute Hazel arrives and insists that Lavinia not marry Peter. The Mannon secrets will prevent their happiness. She already has told Peter of Orin's envelope.

Peter arrives, and the pair pledges their love anew. Started by the bitterness in his voice, Lavinia desperately flings herself into his arms crying, "Take me, Adam!" Horrified, Lavinia orders Peter home.

Lavinia cackles that she is bound to the Mannon dead. Since there is no one left to punish her, she must punish herself—she must entomb herself in the house with the ancestors.

Critical Appreciation of 'Mourning Becomes Electra'

Eugene O'Neill[1885-1953], a dramatist of USA could not keep pace with the progress in other branches of literature. Upto 18th century the puritan prejudice in the USA playwright was neglected if the play was poor. The people's need for drama was satisfied often by imported stuff.

At the end of 19th century English drama came to end. Standards of the drama had also fallen. By the next decade playwrights became increasingly aware of the richness of the American sense.

The American theater in the 1920's experimented in many different ways. Expressionism was also brought to America from Europe. The artists tried to depict state of mind and psychological condition. Due to the expressionism American theatrical spirit grew.

O'Neill's Contribution to Drama

O'Neill was genius. He brought change in American drama depiction. He used realism and expressionism. He did bold experiment. He used naturalistic details with symbolist mood, suggestiveness that was known only on the Greek stage where an Aeschylean triology kept the people spellbound for hours. John Gassner says-

"The stature of Eugene O'Neill casts a long shadow on the American theater whether it stretches or contracts in the critical estimates of a particular period or critic, this much is certain: the height and breadth of the American theater is measured by it. Find fault with O'Neill and you find fault with O'Neill and you find fault with the entire American stage, find merit in him and you find worth in this striving or straining toword significant drama."

In order to communicate inner reality O'Neill used expressionistic techniques. He used poetic devices as aside, soliloquy. He used poetic devices as aside, soliloquy, masks, etc. With the same end in view. He used myth and restored to epic dimesions in order to convey the sense of over-hanging fate driving men to their doom, eg, Mourning Becomes Electra. O'Neill uses symbolism to communicate.

In 'Mourning Becomes Electra', O'Neill has used myth and legend as symbols to give a broad and universal significance to his theme. In this play he used the Electra legend to achieve an approximation to the Greek sense of fate, such as would appeal to modern audiences. O'Neill writes- 'Not masks for all plays, naturally. Obviously not for plays conceived in purely realistic terms.' His symbolism is quiet near to realism.

O'Neill grew a lovely Pastureland in the barren land of American literature. Drama was the weaker side of America. Until the first world war no worthwhile play was written in the USA Eugene O'Neill was the beginner in drama. Before him force, comedy and melodrama were written. No greatly moving and powerful play was written. O'Neill wrote moving and powerful tragedies. His famous plays are 'The Hairy Ape', 'The Emperor Jones' and 'Mourning Becomes Electra'.

O'Neill violated "The sacred rights of the play-goer to discharge his obligations to the stage in two hours and a half of theatre attendance" His play were very lengthy. His play had epic dimensions. Through lengthy plays O'Neill brought a spaciousness that was only on the Greek stage where an Aeschylean triology kept the people spell bound for hours.

John Gassner, "the height and breath of the American theatre... Find fault with O'Neill and you find fault with the entire American stage; find in him and you find worth in striving or straining towards significant drama. It is possible to single out American playwright endowed with greater refinement and facility than can be attributed toi him but none who made a comparable impression on the twentieth century. Chiefly as a result of his persistent efforts after 1918, the American drama actually entered the century and made contribution to world theatre that could be considered significantly modern."

O'Neill, like T.S. Eliot, went to the Greek for inspiration. He said,- "tragedy, I think, has the meaning the Greeks gave it. "Like the Greek tragedy writers like Aeschylus, Sophocles and Euripides he saw humanity tortured and tormented in anguish. O'Neill's plays also have serious moral purposes like, Greek plays. Like Greek plays O'Neill plays also have serious moral purpose. He also has a modern equivalent of the Greek concept of fate or Gods. O'Neill studied Freud and Jung which made him discover the unconscious. In the Greek drama the struggle used to be between man and God; in the plays of O'Neill the struggle is now with himself, man's own past and future. To him God, Fate, Mytery are all aspects of the sub-conscious. O'Neill's tragic heroes are the modern equivalent of the Gods. Pride is responsible for their tragedy.

O'Neill brought back to life many conventions of Greek drama; like the chorus, the aside and the triology Maurning Becomes Electra is an American version of the Greek trilogy of the murder of Agamemnon, the death of Clytemnestra and the result that follows. O'Neill has adopted the Greek story to the necessity of American setting. The Trojan War and Agamemnon is General Ezra Mannon. Christine Mannon is Clytemnestra Electra is Lavinia, Orestes is Orin Aegisthis is captain Brant like Eliot in murder in the cathedral O'Neill is also greatly fascinated by the Greek dramatists and their techniques.

"The Electra complex derives from the 5th century Electra, who plotted matricidal revenge with Orestes, her brother, against Clytemnestra their mother, and Aegisthus, their stepfather, for their murder of Agamenon their father Sigmund Freud developed the female aspect of the sexual development theory-describing the psychodynamics of sexual competition with mother for sexual possession of father as the feminine Oedipus complex, yet it was his collaborator carl Jung who coined the term Electra complex in 1913”.

Eugene O’Neill’s stature as a dramatist was summed up by Times in its laudatory obituary this: “Befor O’Neill, the United States had theatre: after O’Neill it had drama”.

Mourning Becomes Electra is a triology designed on Oreseia showing the destruction of characters. This play refers to ‘Fate’ and ‘Greek’ Mythology. The play shows the psychological conflicts of the modern man. The Triology includes Home Coming, The Haunted and The Hunted. The play views Mannon family of New England. Ezra Mannon-the brigadier General and an ex- Judge, has gone to participate in the civil war and the mother- Christine and the daughter-Lavinia awaits the return of Ezra Mannon. Ezra is to return as the war ended on surrender of Lee’s forces.

Captain Brant, a man from the Navy is courting Lavinia. Lavinia learnt from a hired man who has been there for sixty year that Brant is the son of Lavinias’s Grand uncle who had seduced the Canadian maid servant. Brant’s father was expelled from the Mannon household by Lavinia’s Grandfather. Lavinia has visited New York where her mother is supposed to go on the pretext of her father illness but she has been meeting Adam Brant. Lavinia informed her brother Orin about her mother. Orin was in love with Hezel, Peter’s sister. Peter loved Lavinia.

Adam Brant’s mother has been ill-treated and he would like to be avenged on the Mannon family. But he has fallen in love with Christine who hated her husband. Ezra Mannon is sick and in place of medicine Christine poisons him. Brant sent this poison to her. Ezra dies. The differences between mother and daughter increases. Lavinia was very dear to her father. Brant was very close to his mother. The first part ends here. Now, we shall go through the second part of the trilogy.

The Haunted is the second part of the Trilogy. In this part Orin returns from war. He got injury in head. Christine was successful in getting favour of her son. Lavinia gives minute details regarding Christine in the room where her father’s dead body has been lying. Lavinia and Orin follow Christine to the ship in which she has gone to warn Brant against Orin. Orin shots Brant. The next day Christine commits suicide. Lavinia gives the impression that he mother has father’s death. In first part ‘The Homecoming’ Ezra Mannon is killed and in the second one Brant and Christine died. Now let’s see what happens in the third part.

In ‘The Hunted, Orin and Lavinia are back after visiting china and various other islands of the south East Lavinia has grown more beautiful like her mother and her brother has incestuous love for her. Lavinia wanted Orin to marry Hazal who was peter’s sister but her wise could not be fulfilled. She herself wanted to marry peter but this wise of hers remained unfulfilled. Orin shoots himself. Lavinina loved peter very much but breaks with him. She decides to share the fate of other Mannons and she orders the curtains on the window to be drawn to exclude the sunlight. She decides to remain in her house till her death.

O'Neill was not satisfied with the realistic details of his first draft of the play. He was eager to introduction psychological fate and symbolism. For this he brought the sea as a symbols and mask. The playwright has presented the sea as a symbol of escape and the house has become on image of tomb or love and hate. O'Neill has referred to the sea-symbol.

"Develop south sea Island motive-its appeal for them all-release, place, security, beauty, freedom of conscience, sinlessness etc. longing for the primitive and mother symbols yearning for pre-natal non-competitive freedom for fear makes this Island theme recurrent motive" Orin and Lavinia after the death of their mother escaped to sea to come in contact with the sea and the island the image of mother to get peace.

O'Neill does not follow Greek plot blindly. He makes changes according to the need of American stage. In Greek play brother had no incestual love for the sister. O'Neill adheres Greek plot, he widens the perspective by introducing the incest motive between Orin and Lavinia. There was not such motive behind the relation of Orestes and Electra. According to stark young-

"The story itself follows the Greeks up to the middle of third division of the play and there the insect motive, the death of Orin and transferences of the whole situation and dramatic conclusion from Aeshylys, Sophocles and Euripides. Adam Brant's relation to the family adds to the role of the lover the motif of a blood relationship. The old hired man, the confident, parallels of some extent a Greek device, familiar to us in countless plays. The town's people and workmen are a kind of chorus. Many of the shadings and themes are from the older plays. The division of the play into three parts is, of course, like the Triology of the Greek dramatists. On the other hand, the dividing line is much less distinct in Mourning Becomes Electra. The final curtain of the first part, for, it is true, on Mannon's death as in Aeschylys it does on Agumemnon, out there is not the same effect of totality because of the stress put on Lavinia. In Agmemnon, Electra even does not appear. In this way we find similarities and dissimilarities with the Greek theme".

The servant's role, the play's division in three sections, the role of charous resemble the Greek Triology psychological condition of the tragedy. The house of Mannon was sepulchre. She said-

"Each time I come back after being away, it appears more like a mask on puritan Gray ugliness. We can see the ugliness of Puritanism in old Abe,and later on in Ezra Mannon and Abe Mannon resembled in the way they exhibited David, his brother because he fell in love with Marle Brantome, a maid-servant. No supernatural power is found in the play. The force of denial and destruction dominated the characters.

The determinism of the play attracted the modern audience. The conflict of the play lies in love and lust. Ezra Mannon was the image of pride and egotism. There was no difference between love and lust for him. The Mannon believed that one is born to die. Whereas Marie and Christine had instinctive love for life. Orin and Lavinia inherited Mannons. Brant's mother died. Christine did suicids. Christine had physical charms. She had rich copper hair and beautiful eyes. Lavinia inherited her attractiveness from her mother. She was her copy in figure and charms.

Lavinia becomes the embodiment of Christine and her brother embodies her father. Lavinia did not accept her brother's incestuous love. Orin kills himself Lavinia remains alive in the Mannon family. Orin could not bear his sister's hatred that's why he shoot himself. Lavinia remains alone to suffer Mannon's doom. Lavinia shoots at the partraits of her ancestors with the supremacy of the Motherhood in her. Her Puritanism was was defeated but she walks stiffy.

We find neurotic pride present somewhere in Shakespearean and Greek plays. Heroes and heroines of O'Neill's plays are quite different. Doris Falk writes-

"He must make a choice between alternate images of the self in order to discover the real self which he often fails to do. Certainly he performs acts-if nothing else, he antagonizes other characters who are engaged in their own search for self and it is of this conflict with other is only a byproduct of the protagonist's conflict with himself"

Robert Frost Whitman, slights the incestuous motives and O'Neill's debt to Freud in the play-

"This essentially incestuous relationship which control much of the action of the play, may send the unwary reader to his Freud, but it will be a fruitless trip. It is true that O'Neill hoped-to get modern psychological approximation of Greek sense of fate".

The mask-like face staged, was new technique. This device was criticized. This play is a great work in its delineation of the 'psychological fate through the paralleling of the plot with the Greek tragedy. This play has many characteristics including tragic intensity, expressionism, experimentation, depth etc. It has psychological significance. The playwright has given us an opportunity to peep into the characters inner conflict. The play also satisfies some of the codes of tragedy laid by Aristotle. It's interesting that the length of the play doesn't deviate our attention.

Themes of Mourning Becomes Electra

The Inner Conflict

In Mourning Becomes Electra, O'Neill leaves for a while the war between God and science and returns to the more limited conflict within the 'suffering' individual. But the conflict and the suffering are traceable more specifically than ever to the fixations upon father and mother, to the tension between puritanism and freedom, pride and love, death and life. As before, in most of the plays since Desire Under the Elms all other masks and values stem from the power of the father-and-mother-images, the Oedipus and Electra complexes.

In his detailed "Working Notes and Extracts, froth a Fragmentary Work Diary", O'Neill outlines his purpose and method in Mourning Becomes Electra, emphasizing repeatedly his equation of the complexes with destiny. They are "a modern tragic interpretation of classic fate without benefit of Gods––for it (the play), must before everything remain (a) modern psychological play––fate springing out of the family."

Working out of the Family Fate

As with the original Atreidae, the family fate of the New England Mannons is ancestral, not limited to one generation. It has been set in motion before the opening of the play by Abe Mannon, father of Ezra (Agamemnon) and grandfather of Lavinia and Orin (Electra and Orestes). Abe's younger brother, David, had been involved in a liaison with a French-Canadian governess, Marie Brantome, resulting in her pregnancy. David married her, but Abe (in Lavinia's words) put them both out of the house and then afterwards tore it down and built this one because he wouldn't live where his brother had disgraced the family. The child of David and Marie is Adam Brant, the Aegisthus of the play, who returns to avenge his parent's death in poverty and misery after their exile.

Pride as a Source of Death

The house of Mannon, therefore, was built upon outranged pride and puritanism, leading inevitably to death for the Mannon line. For them pride is the source of death, and love is the source of life. Existence for the Mannons is life-in-death from which love, represented by Marie Brantome, has been shut out. In their longing to escape the ugly reality of their actual lives the Mannons yearn for release in love untainted by pride and sin, and in death itself.

Christine's acceptance of sexuality, has been embittered by Ezra's Puritanism––distorted into a possessive passion; but to her husband, lover, and children, she still represents release and spinelessness. Even to Lavinia, who hates her because she "stole all love from me when I was born", Christine is still the longed-for mother, as well as the image of herself, Lavinia, as giver and lover.

Shift of Emphasis

Since O'Neill has shifted the emphasis of the trilogy from Orestes to Electra, the changes which take place in the character of Lavinia provide a new dimension to the theme of the play. Caught like Nina Leeds in the father-complex, she struggles at once to realize and to escape from a self-image which is only a reflection of her soldier father. Her physical appearance tells the story: tail like her mother, her body is thin, flat-breasted and angular, and its unattractiveness is accentuated by her plain black dress. Her movements are stiff and she carries herself with a wooden, square- shouldered, military bearing. She has a flat dry voice and a habit of snapping out her words like an officer giving orders. But in spite of these dissimilarities one is immediately struck by her facial resemblance to her mother. This facial resemblance, the mask of the mother in Lavinia, will have its moment of fulfilment, but only briefly, until God the Father's lightning strikes again.

Pride, Puritanism and Vindictive Justice

The father, Ezra, embodies the characteristics of the family which constitute their fate–– pride, puritanism, and a strong sense of vindictive justice. Because of his ingrown egotism and his guilty attitude towards sex, Ezra does not, at the beginning of the play, know how to love. Desire for his wife takes the form of brutal and clumsy lust. Not until he has known the comradeship of other men on the battlefield and has seen death, does he become aware of the significance of love and life; "Death made me think of life. Before that life had only made me think of death……That's always been the Mannons' way of thinking. They went to the white meeting-house on Sabbaths and meditated on death. Life was a dying. Being born was starting to die Death was being born." Ironically, his ability to love and his insight into life come to Ezra only when he returns home to Christine's hatred and his own death.

Suicidal Frustrations

Christine has fallen in love with Adam Brant, the son of Marie Brantome. When Ezra is in the throes of a heart attack, Christine deliberately withholds his medicine. To the outside world, Ezra appears to have died from natural causes; Lavinia however, discovers her mother's guilt. She plans her vengeance––driven, not only by the Mannon sense of justice and her love for her father, but by her frustrated love for Adam and hatred and jealousy of her mother. Since Christine has 'stolen' the love of both men from Lavinia, the fitting relation for Lavinia is not to take her mother's life, but to take from her the love which is her life. At Lavinia's instigation, Orin murders Adam Brant. Christine takes her own life, and after Christine's suicide the spirit of vindictiveness and death in the Mannons seems to be temporarily satisfied, and Lavinia can come to life. She takes on all the attributes of, her mother; "She seems a mature woman, sure of her feminine attractiveness. Her brown-gold hair is arranged as her mother's had been ... The movements of her body now have the feminine grace her mother had possessed." Now, at perhaps her guiltiest, she has lost her, sense of sin and death. Her father's ghost in Lavinia has now been placated; like him, she could find life only after experience of death.

Chained to Mannons

And as Lavinia assumes the characteristics of the mother, Orin takes on those of his father. He even wears a beard and walks like a "tin soldier". Together they take a trip to the East, stopping at the South Sea Islands. Orin watches Lavinia's new sexuality with puritanical disapproval and jealousy. He feels that he and Lavinia have actually become their father and mother ; "Can't you see I'm now in Father's place and you're mother ?...I'm the Mannon you're chained to !"

Symbolic Incest Pattern

To complete the symbolic incest pattern representing the lonely Mannons' introversion and their narcissistic inability to love any but another Mannon, Orin falls in love with his sister. The same duality of love and loathing for oneself and its reflection in another which has always dominated Mannon relationships now governs this one. Orin hates Lavinia as much as he desires her; she has become to him what the Furies were to Orestes, a constant reminder of guilt, driving him towards madness. He wants to become her, lover in order to force her to share his guilt. "How else can I be sure you won't leave me? You would never dare to leave me––then! You would feel as guilty then as I do……" Lavinia, both fascinated and repelled, shouts her hatred at him: "I hate you you're too vile to live! You'd kill yourself if you weren't such a coward."

Crumbling of the Illusion

With these words Lavinia has committed her last murder. When Orin shoots himself Lavinia's, last illusion of her own innocence begins to crumble. The puritan conscience (or superego or father-god), from which she has found release in identification with the mother, now reasserts itself. She shouts defiance at the portraits of her ancestors, "I'm Mother's daughter––not one of you……!" but even as she does so, the Mannon pride claims its own. The feminine Lavinia now "squares her shoulders, with a return––of the abrupt military movement copied from her father which she had of old-as if by the very act of disowning the Mannons she had returned to the fold––and marches stiffly from the room."

Last Effort to Reach For Life

Lavinia takes one more desperate effort to reach from behind her mask of death toward life. She begs her childhood sweetheart, the innocent, untempted, and unsuspicious Peter, to marry her. Even as she pleads with him, however, she knows that the dead have not forgotten, and, will not rest until justice has been performed. She must pay. for their lives with her own, not in the easy expiation of actual death––that would be the release for which,' she has always longed––but in a return to the living death which is the Mannon fate, and which, as always, is to be accomplished by Mannon pride. She tells Peter goodbye, as Seth, the gardener, sings the refrain of his "Shenandoah".

The Trap of Self Claims Its Prey

When Lavinia "pivots sharply on her heel and marches woodenly into the house, closing the door behind her", the tension between love and pride, life and death, is dissolved;

only, pride and death remain. Violated order has been restored the trap of self has finally and with finality claimed its inevitable prey.

Mourning Becomes Electra as psychological play

A play primarily concerned with the emotional and mental lives of the characters rather than the external events of the plot. Character and characterization are of extreme importance in such works. In a psychological drama the stress is laid on the motives which impel to perform an action rather than the moral consequences. This kind of drama rests on the discoveries made by Freud and his successors in the field of psychology.

Freud and his followers described human relations in terms of sexual connotation which laid the bases of critical approaches which try to interpret literature with respects emotional and mental bent of characters. They also give the concepts of Oedipus and Electra complex. Moreover, they said that repressed sexual desires mould the whole character of human beings.

Their work gave a new understanding of human actions and deeds. From their work came the concept of psychological realism. Modern writers never neglect psychological realism. With help of psychological realism humanism took a great leap further. Before Freud and his doctrines, human beings were considered either virtuous or vile. Hence virtuous were adored and loved, while were hated and loathed. But psychological realism showed that human beings are neither virtuous nor vile. Rather they pushed into their role by a number of circumstances. These circumstances can have their roots in social, biological, religious and many other sources.

If we apply the above mentioned remarks on the play Mourning Becomes Electra by Eugene, we find that the play abides by the remarks mentioned above. Mourning Becomes Electra is about an aristocratic family. This family is ruined and finally wiped out because of some flaws in the members of the family. Ezra Mannon fails to love his wife Christine because she is below in status. Christine falls in love with another man, Adam Brant. When she is discovered by her daughter, Lavinia, she kills her husband by poisoning him.

It not difficult to interpret why Christine falls in love with Adam Brant and why she finally kills her husband or the behavior of any other character in the play. Ezra loved Christine before their marriage because of her physical beauty and charm. But as soon as they are married and Christine comes without any dowry, his love ceases. And when Christine watches this change in the behavior of her husband, she is emotionally cut off with her husband. She finds solace in her children, especially in her son Orin, but when Orin is taken away from her she becomes very desperate. Her position in Mannon House was that of an extra man. Conversation between the servants in Act one of the play is an ample proof of her status in her home. Again behavior of her daughter shows the magnitude of torture she was undergoing on basis in the Mannon House. A person facing this kind of circumstances becomes surely desperately. Though we cannot approve her action, we can understand them and it is this understanding that we feel sympathy for Christine in spite of the fact that she commits an unforgivable sin by murdering her husband.

Now her murder of her husband was the vilest thing ever expected from any woman but had she any other option? Perhaps no. She could not have secured divorce from Ezra as Lavinia tells her bluntly and if she had run with Brant, her life could have become very miserable because Ezra was an influential person. And even if Ezra had not got Brant blacklisted, she could not have gone on living with Brant without marriage because Brant would have got tired of her finally and she had the example of Marrie Brantome. Her only chance was if Ezra had died some way. Then she could have married Adam and she could have got her share out of Ezra's property to live comfortably with Brant. She was hoping that war would that but her hope did not come true and she had to do it herself.

Similarly we can understand the actions of all other characters because the playwright has laid their minds and souls bare before us by their psychological portrayal. Lavinia's love for her father and Christine's love for Orin can be explained in psychological terms. Here the writer used to hint at what Freud and his successors termed as Oedipus and Electra complex.

On the surface the play seems to be a revenge story and the playwright seems to hinting that revenge is a self-destructive passion. In other words revenge destroys both parties involved. And this is what actually happens in the play. Adam Brant uses Christine to revenge sufferings of his mother and Orin kills Adam Brant to revenge the murder of his father. But the story does not end here. It has other dimensions and avenues. At the end of the story, we can safely say that a family with upbringing like Mannons was sure to suffer because pride and hypocrisy had gone deep in their bones. Abe's pride and hypocrisy showed the seeds lf their destruction when he disowned his brother who fell in love with a maid. However his action can be interpreted in psychological terms. He was forced to that decision because of fear of society and religion. Eugene shows us how these forces make a human being what he becomes.

In conclusion we can say that Mourning Becomes Electra is a psychological play because in this play the playwright shows how the past experiences of people influences their life. All the characters have been drawn with great psychological insight. That is why we fell sympathy fall the characters. Although all of them perform vile deeds, we feel that we will not do justice if we say any of them vile because they are forced into those actions because of circumstances in which they are placed. Anyhow whatever they do and howsoever they behave is convincing and based on realism. It does not that everyone will do what they did or behave the way they behaved. It only means that human beings are capable of behaving the way they behave if they find themselves in the kind of circumstances in which they playwright has placed the characters of Mourning Becomes Electra.

Symbolism in Mourning Becomes Electra

Edwin Engel, in his brilliant analysis of the play, pointed to the dominant symbols and philosophy of Mourning Becomes Electra:

Symbolism is the practice of representing objects or ideas by symbols or of giving things a symbolic character and meaning. For example scales symbolize justice; a dove stands for peace; a lion stands for .strength and bravery. In all literary works, symbolism uses a concrete image to express an emotion or abstract idea. A symbol shows more than what is actually seen. Symbolism as ' a literary movement started in France in the nineteenth century.

O'Neill's use of symbolism is highly artistic. His use of symbolism is, artistically intended to extend the scope and meaning of the play. In "Mourning Becomes Electra", O'Neill uses Freudian psychological symbols.

He has used in his play a number of symbols - the mother image, the Blessed Isles (Desert Island), the Mannon portraits, etc. The very house of the Mannons stands as a symbol of hatred and callousness (cruelty, coldness). As Edwin Engel says, In Electra the Mother is a primordial (ancient) image, an archetypal (classic, conventional) experience shared by all the Mannons. Thus, Lavinia is identified with her mother, Christine, and both are the image of Marie Brantome.' Adam Brant falls in love with Christine because he associates her with his mother Marie. To him Lavinia looks like her mother. Only his mother (Marie Brantome) had hair like hers. O'Neill uses the Mother-image in details in the case of Orin. His love for his mother has sexual overtones (hint). He is his mother's cry-baby. He used to wait as a child to get an extra goodnight kiss from his mother. When he comes back from the war he finds his mother beautiful, she is his 'only girl'. And Christine replies, 'You're a big man now, aren't you?' Lavinia and Orin are drawn to the parent who belongs to the opposite sex. With Orin, his mother means everything that is sweet, pure, lovely and comforting and peaceful.

He feels his mother around him in the Blessed Islands; the breaking of the waves was her voice. The sky had the colour of her eyes;" the whole island was Christine. So the mother symbol means much more than mother - peace, security, love, freedom from fear. After the suicide of Christine, Lavinia occupies the mother image for Orin and he loves her with all the guilt in him, the guilt they shared. Orin's subconscious motive, in taking Lavinia is to possess his mother completely and Lavinia would be able to share the burden of his guilt.

The Blessed Isles are a symbol of joy, purity and innocence of Orin, 'Lavinia and Christine and Adam. O'Neill is voicing (expressing) a yearning in the heart of the puritan man for an ideal paradise full of beauty and sinlessness. The islands are a place of beauty for Adam; a refuge and paradise for Orin and a lode (level) star for Christine and Lavinia. Thus the Blessed Islands have been invested with psychological dimensions of peace and new trouble-free life. The islands are thus an image of fresh new life. The islands motif (image) runs through the whole play tantalizing (tempting) and attracting Orin, Lavinia and Christine to a life of peace and nature and unalloyed happiness -their dream of an earthly paradise. As Lavinia says, 'I love those islands. They finished setting me free. There was something there, mysterious and beautiful- a good spirit - of love - coming out of the land and sea. It made me forget death. The islands stand for freedom from all puritan tabs (, bounds, check) freedom from pain and misery. O'Neill shows an average American's yearning to escape and return to paradise. But it remains a paradise lost a vision unachieved for grief is the lot of the Mannons and mourning becomes Electra.

The song of Shenandoah serves the purpose of a choral song. In the first part - Home Coining - Seth sings that melancholy song which has the brooding (gloomy, threatening) rhythm, of the sea. The song foreshadows (predict) unattainability and frustration for the characters. The song is there again after Christine's suicide; 'Oh, Shenandoah. I can't get near you,' casting a veil of finality (conclusiveness, determination) and mystery on Christine's death.

The symbol of the Mannon House shows us much more than a large house. It is a house built in hatred (of Marie Brantome's marriage with David). It is a house of death and the dead Mannons' portraits always intervene in the path of' happiness of their younger generation. It is a house, haunted by ghosts and sin and evil.

The use of symbolism adds a poetic quality to O'Neill's prose and universalizes the theme. It adds a new, dimension of emotion and depth of meaning to the dark events of the play. Thus as Travis Bogard puts it,

"Mourning Becomes Electra, perhaps O'Neill's most secular (worldly) play is also his least symbolic work to date. Such symbols as exist in the play, the house, for example, or the portraits, or the flowers, are all ' related to the human-beings at the central focus. Now, none of the conflict between character and symbol that beset (plagued, under pressure) many of the minor works and such major plays as Strange Interlude enters to plague this study of crime and retribution (revenge). There are no ambiguities; nothing is vague or suggested. The characters are drawn precisely, their story fully told, and they move toward a comprehensible (clear, understandable) and convincing destiny."

Destructive Power of The Romantic Ideal in Mourning Becomes Electra

O’Neill’s Anti Romanticism

S. K. Winter says; “Critical thought in the modern world has. been a relentless-enemy of the romantic’ ideal, and no. modern writer has attacked it more consistently or more bitterly than Eugene O’Neill.” The exaggerated romanticism which enveloped the American theatre nurtured the mind of O’Neill’s youth and provoked the rebellion of his maturity. Against that tradition his plays are a direct challenge. He hates the false dreams and false ideals and false endings that have dominated the American stage and are still the, inspiration of the movies.

Romantic Ideals as Disease

To O'Neill these ideals are not harmless entertainment, but s virulent disease that has eaten into the core of life, rotting and destroying the only hope for salvation that is possible for man. O'Neill believes that man's hope lies in his being willing to face lifer as it is, accepting its limitations and, on the foundations of these very shortcomings, erecting a new world free from the tyranny of romantic dogmatism.

Criticism versus Seduction

The creative imagination will not always obey the logic of cold reason, and nothing is more characteristic of O'Neill than the conflict between his criticism of the romantic ideal and the manner in which he succumbs, at times to its seductive appeal. I doubt if there is a character in the whole range of his work who could be described as truly realistic in the sense that Bazarov, Pelle, or Sister Car might be called realists. Perhaps the greatness of O'Neill's characters lies in this very fact : that they are too complex, too involved with the cross current of life to be purely one thing or the other. Their conflicts give them a quality "which'' inspires confidence in their humanity and enlists the, reader's sympathy and understanding in a' way that more consistent and unified personalities never could.

The Dreamy Eyes

A study of the men and women that move through the world of O'Neill's dramas reveals some noteworthy characteristics that many of them have in common. One is 'impressed by the courage and fortitude with which they face the unfavourable circumstances of the world in which they live. They are determined to give life meaning and, value in defiance of a world that is impersonal and unconcerned about the ambitions of, human beings. It is not this characteristic that I wish to emphasize at this point but something that is purely physical and, at the same time, suggests a hidden romantic passion in the nature of O'Neill. Buried deep in his inner being is a love for some quality that the materialistic interpretation of life does not seem to bring out in its proper perspective. In order to discover just what this is, it will be necessary too note, in some detail, his descriptions of the Reading characters in many different plays to observe what physical characteristics they have in common. In the pursuit of this study a curious fact comes to light. No matter who the character may be or what his occupation or position in the social order is the favourite character of an O'Neill play has dreamy eyes. His characters live in two worlds : one the outward world of physical reality, the, other, a world of unfulfilled and passionate desire. This latter world is one which the dreamer wishes for with all the pent-up powers of his being. To this world he will sacrifice all that life has given him, for there is nothing in life that for a moment is comparable to the genuine reality of his dream. Captain Bartlett commits murder because his longed for dream of pirate treasure seems to, have come true, and in another play, another sea captain sacrifices the sanity of his wife in order that his desire for a full load of whale oil may become a reality.

Tragedy of Romantic ideal

The incest theme began in Dynamo, and in a sense wrecked the play, only to find its proper expression in the story of General Mannon's family. The tragedy that ends with Lavinia's resolve to "Live alone with the dead, and keep their secrets" began in the home of her grandfather long before she was born. Ezra Mannon as a child had been in love with Marie Brantome, but it was his uncle, David, who was the successful lover. So deep was Abe, Mannon's against his brother who had stolen the affection of the Young woman that he himself had loved––loved in the thwarted Mannon sense of love, which dares not face the truth––that he drove him and his sweetheart from his home, and eventually destroyed the house in order that all members of the cursed experience might be obliterated forever from his life.

False Romantic Ideal

In that episode begins the false romantic ideal which finds its, culmination years later in the grandson as accomplice in the murder of his uncle and the long series of crimes that follow. From the beginning the misfortunes of the Mannons grow out of an inability to face, the reality of life. They live by false Puritan standards of behaviour. They did not know and could not learn that man as a psychological phenomenon is doomed to disaster if compelled to five within the confines of a limited creed. One by one "Death" came tacitly and took them from the sunlight of a world they had never seen except through the coloured glass of the "Meeting House" windows. They didn't know what it was all about until too late to learn a new way of life.

Romantic Ambiguity of the Islands

The world tour of Orin and Lavinia is one of the great tragic conceptions of O'Neill, for these two children are doubly doomed because they do not know that their tragedy Ties within, and that were they able to flee from the plane itself they would still bear it with them. As they travel they make one faint gesture in the direction of freedom, but the scars on the past had left a tissue which inhibited forever a turn into a new world. I refer to the Islands of the South Seas that had been so dear to the memory of Captain Brant, and dear also to the imagination of O'Neill as they were to Melville, one of the very few authors that are mentioned by name in O'Neill plays. No single passage in the play touches the heart more than Orin'S sad speech in which he tells of these Islands with a bitterness born of his disillusionment. For, as he says "They turned ,out to be Vinnie's Islands, not mine. They only made me sick ––and the naked women disgusted me. I' guess I'm too much of a Mansion, after all, to turn into a pagan.' To Lavinia they were real, they were an escape, so she thought, from all that had cursed her family for generations. They were to her all that her young lover had promised her, but she could not accept that which she wanted. The cruel hand of tradition led her back to her doom, where she told Peter the story of the Islands in these words : "I loved those" Islands. They finished setting me free. There was something there mysterious and beautiful––a goad spirit––of love––coming out of the land and sea. It made me forget death. There was no hereafter. There was only this world-the warm earth in the moonlight––the trade wind in the coco palms––the surf on the reef––the fires at night and the drum throbbing in my heart––the natives dancing naked and innocent––without knowledge of sin.

Realization Comes Too Late

It is a characteristic of the Mannons that they knew or realized in a dim sort of way what was wrong with them, but always the realization came too late to set straight their crooked path of life. General Mannon discovered a new philosophy on the night that he was murdered, a discovery that, made twenty years earlier, would have saved him and his family. And what may he said of him in this respect may be said of many of O'Neill's characters with reference to the romantic ideal. An uncritical analysis might lead a reader to believe that O'Neill had stacked the fates against them. The opposite is really true, for it is typical of the romantic dreamer that he does not, nor can he comprehend the falsity of his position until it is put to the crucial test, and them it is too late to turn back. It is O'Neill's clear development of this point that gives tragic reality to his work, and it is the failure to grasp this truth which has led many people to condemn him. But he is too much of an artist not to realize truly a fact of life that is the very essence of his own nature. He is the romantic dreamer who knows the deadly power of the dream's appeal. In his life, as in his work, he has striven against it, and out of the struggle he has created the hitter tragic' beauty of his art. He never forgets that life will exact a double, toll from those who believe that dreaming of what life ought to be will make it other than it is.

Theme of death in Mourning Becomes Electra

Imminence of Death

Beyond the stereotyped message that "adjustment is all", and in ironic contrast to it, there is in Mourning Becomes Electra an overwhelming, unrelenting sense of the imminence of Death. The events of the plot––murder, murder-suicide, immurement–– objectify this sense of death as does the sepulchral facade of the Mannon house. Death is the goal of O'Neill's Puritan ; he meditates on it, he walks in its shadow, he lives for it. Since this Puritanism does not include a theological dimension, Death is an end in itself, not a passage to another world.

Death as Epiphany

Thus Death is not merely a thematic image in the play or simply a way of dispatching the personae and cleaning up the stage. It is the Epiphany that concludes the action, the vision to which the plot progresses. If Greek tragedy included the death of the hero, it also provided a means of encompassing the idea of death in a framework of death-and-rebirth. O'Neill's modifications, however, result in a hopeless reiteration that death is final, absolutely conclusive, the end. In addition to the agony and the pathos, the conflict and the suffering, the Oresteia includes a "rebirth" or epiphany, in which the hero is purified by both society and the gods. In Mourning Becomes Electra however, the epiphany is a vision of Death, of existential nothingness, the individual confronted by the void. "Rebirth" and purgation become simple release from suffering through suicide or self-immurement.

The Ubiquity of Death

John Henry Raleigh says : "Underneath the play's Freudianism ; its analogizing to Greek myth ; its recurrent incest motifs generation after ; its contrast between the uninhibited sexuality. of the South Seas and the rigid prudery of New England and the accompanying contrast between the freedom, rhythm, brightness, and beauty of life at sea and the restrictions, mechanizations, darkness, and dreariness of life on land ; underneath all these devices and themes is the ubiquity of death." Yes, it is true. It is not only a question of the two murders (those of Ezra Mannon and Adam Brant) and the two suicides (Christine Mannon and Orin Mannon), but of the very fabric of the thought of the play, wherein the characters are not only trapped by their own dead but are also continually, tortuously meditating upon death. No one ever reaches a conclusion ; all they know, with any certainty, is that death is surely, inexorably devouring the Mannons, their power, and their way of life. In act third of Homecoming the newly returned Ezra Mannon, back home from the war, cannot stop talking about death, despite his wife's plea that he cease : "That's always been the Mannons' way of thinking. They went to the white meeting-house on Sabbaths and meditated on death. Life was a dying. Being barn was starting to die. Death was being." But the war, seeing too many white walls splattered with blood "that counted no more than dirty water", made all this seem meaningless, "so much solemn fuss over death !" Real death has thought him the meaninglessness of imagined death, the Mannon obsession. But by dawn he will be death's victim, murdered by his wife. Ironically, he had earlier observed to his wife : "All victory ends in the defeat of death."

Death Symbols and Themes

Death symbols and themes are woven into the play in all kinds of ways. For example, the ancestral Mannons, whose portraits glare down from the walls of the house, were "witch-burners". Again, the black-white symbolism that is endemic in O'Neill's plays, and in American literature generally, is pervasive in Mourning Becomes Electra : the white faces set off by black clothing ; the white porticos of the house dimming into darkness ; and so on. And as in Melville, white does not signify purity ; rather it means the charnel house. The sound effects concur. The first song heard is "John Brown's Body". The theme song of the play, "Shenandoah", is meant to signify the more sombre aspects of the sea ("a song that more than any other holds in it the brooding rhythm of the sea"). The drunken chantyman of the fourth act of The Hunted staggers off singing "Hanging Johnny". Even American history plays a role in generating this aura of the charnel house, for the seminal national events in the background of the play are the Civil War, the greatest carnage experienced on American soil, and the assassination of Lincoln, its greatest single political tragedy. Moreover, beautiful, rhythmic ways of life are dying too, with the clipper giving way to the steamer. As the chantyman drunkenly and lugubriously laments to Adam Brant, the owner of a beautiful clipper: "Aye, but it ain't fur long, steam is comin' in, the sea is full smoky tea-kettles, the old days is dyin', and where'll you an' me be then? (Lugubriously drunken again) Everything is dyin' ! Abe Lincoln is dead."

Attack on Puritanism in Mourning Becomes Electra

Suggestive Setting

Mourning Becomes Electra is a psychological dramatization of the evils of puritanism. The puritan heritage of the personae in the play is established in a way by the setting. O'Neill situates the action in New England. The locale––in literary convention at least––is rugged, cold, sea-bound. The thin-soiled, rock-strewn countryside with small, barren mountain-ranges and rivers running down to the gray Atlantic creates an atmosphere of severity, inflexity, firmness. The people are like the landscape-tight, thrifty, joyless, merchant class puritans, descendants of Anglo-Saxon nonconformists. The Mannons live in this setting ; their attitudes are defined by the locale.

O'Neill's Version of Puritanism

Within this general situation O'Neill specifies, his puritanism. It is not a careful historical approximation of New England attitudes vintage 1865 ; it is puritanism as O'Neill understood it through the eyes of his own generation. And, in the early twentieth century, among the avant-garde of the literary world, it was the sum total' of everything that was wrong with American society. No matter what the private views of individuals, the official American posture was a hypocritical, righteously irreligious (or a-religious) puritanism.

The Voice of Mencken

The puritan background of Mourning Becomes Electra comprises, along with broader classical elements, that complex of attitudes described and decried by Mencken and his associates. O'Neill weaves these attitudes into the background of his action. As the-locale calls puritanism to mind; O'Neill visualizes the tradition in his stage setting. The Mannon house characterizes the family. The facade of the mansion is fronted by a white Grecian temple portico with six tall columns and a gray stone wall behind. This portico is like an incongruous white mask fixed on the house to hide its sombre gray ugliness. If the audience fails to mark the significance of the setting, early in the first act it is called to their attention. In the words of Christine :

Every time I come back after being away it (the house) appears more like a sepulchre ! The "whited" one of the Bible––pagan temple front stuck like a mask on Puritan gray, ugliness ! It was just like old Abe Mannon to build such a monstrosity––as a temple for his hatred.

It is highly unlikely that a New Englander of 1865 would see the family home in this light ; the voice is the voice of Mencken. The action is played against this parisaical facade as the house of the Mannons visualizes for the audience the traditional attitudes of the "House of Mannon".

Cultural Base of the Mannon Heritage

This interpretation of the puritan heritage rests on a broad cultural base; the Mannon background also includes those features characteristic of the nineteenth-century New Englander. Grandfather Abe, whose Biblical name has dynastic implications, established a shipping business that made the family fortune. (The name Mannon, with resonances of Agamemnon, also has an appropriate resemblance to "Mannon".) As a result of their dedication to business, the Mannons are the most prosperous family in the community. After learning law, he became judge and mayor of the town. Devotion to business is part of the traditional Protestant mystique. Diligence and industry lead to financial success–– and this success carries with it a debt to society.

The Mannons its "The Elect"

To all outward appearances, the Mannons are "the elect". Their prominence in the community and the lavishness of the mansion testify to their probity, according to the orthodox standard. Christine, whose adulterous union would hardly be explicable in a rigid puritan, is set apart from the real Mannons ; her ancestry is not new England or even Anglo-Saxon. She is "furring lookin' and queer, French and Dutch descended." Her -family has not been financially successful––"She didn't bring no money when Ezra married her." "She ain't the Mannon kind" sums up the xenophobic reaction of the townspeople This background is contrasted with the family's––Anglo-Saxon stock, old settlers, successful merchants, in short, puritan "elect".

No Relish of Salvation

Though the family has all the visible earmarks of the predestined, these are simply outward show. Like the mansion, their puritanism is full of dead men's bones, and their theology has no relish of salvation in it. "The Mannon way" is a preoccupation with death, the cold remnant of Calvinistic dogma. For example, Ezra says, "Life 'had only made me think of death...That's always been the Mannon way of thinking. They went to the white meeting-house on Sabbaths and meditated on death. Life was a dying. Being born was starting to die. Death was being born…That white meeting-house. It stuck in my mind––clean scrubbed and white––washed- a temple of death." According to the cultural analyses of historians; like Weber, the virtues of the puritan––industry, thrift, social responsibility, regular habits, careful avoidance of sensuality, all stemmed from a search for certainty about election. Somewhat oversimplifying Calvin's theology they depended on cautious organization and a clock-like regularity as protection against an irretreivable lapse––a fall whose implications extended out of time into the illud tempus of predestined election, that "moment" which melds the beginning with the end of time, the arche with the eschaton. No redemption is possible for the sinner within this system ; once fallen, he is forever reprobate. The Mannon concern with death, however, does not relate it to grace, election and after-life. There is no theological foundation to the puritan code in Mourning Becomes Electra. Like the puritanism that Mencken describes, it is an appearance without substance, an ethic without a dogma. These attitudes provide a basis for the motivation of the personae, but, unlike the tribal code of the Oresteia, they do not include an Olympian dimension.

Sex and Puritanism

Another prominent feature of the Mannons' puritanism is their attitude towards sex. For O'Neill's generation, puritanism was .associated, first and foremost, with a repressive attitude towards sexual impulses. This appetite posed the greatest problem for the Calvinist; it exercised the strongest pull and thus had to be most zealously guarded against. The "fall from grace" gradually assimilated sexual overtones ; the fallen woman fell only in one direction.

Sex and the Family Curse

O'Neill's characters are caught between this revulsion and fascination. The origin of the family curse is, in the first instance, Abe Mannon's hatred towards his brother David because of David's seduction of, and subsequent marriage to, Marie Brantome. He went so far as to destroy the house in which the seduction took place. This hatred has implicit approval in the puritan way––no association of the elect with the reprobate. By sustaining the orthodox position on sexual errance, Grandfather Mannon––who, it turns out, was in love with. Marie himself––bequeathed his righteous hatred to the family. In the play this strain in the Mannon ethos finds full expression in the; reactions of Lavinia and Orin. In her first conversation with Captain Brant, Lavinia declares that she "hates love", and equates it with "naked women and sin". "Love" means the physical act of love ; the Captain, like all men, dreams dirty dreams––of love. Christine, whose descent explains her liberal attitude––the French are traditionally a passionate people––derides her daughter for prudishness : "Puritan maidens should not peer too inquisitively into spring ! Isn't beauty an abomination and love a vile thing ?" Love is sometimes vile also for Christine ; her own marriage soon turned "romance into disgust". She made her husband feel the burden of her distaste, and he expresses his reaction in good puritan style : "What are bodies to me? ...Ashes to ashes, dirt to dirt ! Is that your notion of love ? Do you think I married a body ?...You made me appear a lustful beast in my own eyes––as you've done since our first marriage night." For the Mannons, dirt and animality and abomination spell out the implications of sex.

The Fascination-Revulsion Syndrome

The obverse of the coin is depicted also ; their revulsion is. attended by a fascination. Though bodies are only bodies, when Ezra sets out to effect a reconciliation with his wife, he becomes passionate. Christine allays his suspicion about her affair with Brant by kissing him and allowing him to press her "fiercely in his arms". Lavinia's repugnance for mother's sensuality is flavoured with jealousy, especially about her father's affection. Of all the Mannons, Orin reveals this fascination-revulsion syndrome most. His passionate attachment to his mother, rife with sexual overtones, has kept him from marrying Hazel, but he is drawn by the girl's purity, and he sees her passionless love for him as cleansing. On their return from the Islands, he finds Lavinia's blossoming attractiveness repulsive––because he sees her now as desirable. The climax of the brother-sister relationship is Orin's proposal that they have incestuous relations ; this would both satisfy his desire and cement their mutual guilt. From the puritan point of view, the physical act of love between brother and sister is the fullest expression of their mutual damnation. The "curse" which began with David's seduction of Marie Brantome spirals down to an incestuous proposal. No seventeenth-century divine would conceive in more suitable symbol for the ultimate reprobation of the Mannons ; no libertarian would devise a clearer picture of the fascination--revulsion combination that Mencken and his school saw in puritanism.

Conventional Puritanism

The attitudes of the townspeople-chorus underscore the conventionality of the play's puritanism. The middle-class conspiracy which aspires to Babylonian practices while proclaiming Christian values weds hypocrisy with a practical view of sex. The women gossip in orthodox fashion ; coming away from Ezra's wake, Mrs. Hills blurts out : "You remember, Everett, you've always said about the Mannons that pride goeth before a fall and that some-day God would humble them in their sinful pride." This version embarrasses the company ; afterward the mew draw aside for a less pious assessment. They make sniggering references to the General's love-making as the probable cause of his angina. The lower classes are even blunter about their sexual preoccupation. Before the climax of the second play, the murder of Adam by Orin, the drunken sailor who serves as chorus complains about the "yaller-haired pig who put her arm around me so lovin' " and then cleaned his pockets. Similarly, in the knocking-on-the-gate episode which opens The Hunted, the crones who gather round the gardener allow that Christine was a "looker". Owe offers to let her ghost sit on his lap if "ghosts look like the living". The middle-class and the proletariat fill out the picture ; they reflect Menckew's contention that the puritan sexual code does not really present the aspirations of the society. And, while practice and appearances may differ among the classes, their attitudes with regards to sex have a common root ; sex is animal, and degrading, not to be associated with "pure" love.

Limitations of Puritanism

O'Neill's understanding, of puritanism provides conscious motivation for the personae. The Mannons think in puritan categories.; they see their plight in these terms. But the playwright and the audience see their actions in a wider context that conflicts with but also in some sense explains, the puritan mentality. Puritanism does not clarify the darker matters that make the action, inevitable, that link crime to crime in necessary progress.

"Mourning Becomes Electra" : A Tragedy in Modern Sense

Eugene O'Neill is a one of great playwrights that America has ever produced. His plays reflect classical sense of tragedy coupled with modern psychology. His play "Mourning Becomes Electra" qualifies this statement on great extent. The classic and notorious problem about tragedy in modern appearance has been that the characters, not being over life-size but rather below it, excite pity without admiration and therefore without terror. Though O'Neill has talked of an "ennobling identification" with protagonists, he has only once tried to do anything about it: only in "Mourning Becomes Electra "are the characters over life-size. Unhappily this is no because of the size of their bones but, as it were, by inflation with gas, cultural and psychological.

One of the modern critics Schopenhauer declares that in "Mourning Becomes Electra" we find the true sense of tragedy that "it is not his own individual sins, i.e. the crime of existence itself". So devoted was he to this conception, that he permitted it to inform the entire trilogy. The pessimism of the Greeks may have been equally black, their tragedies just as aware of the crime of existence, still "They would have despised", as William James observed,

"A life set wholly in a minor key, and summoned it to keep within the proper bounds of lachrymosely".

The unfulfilment, exhaustion, and apathy which are significant possessions of O'Neill's tragedy are effectively manipulated in the play. The Greeks were never as contemptuous of life as to seek consolation in death, nor as afraid of death as to calm did their fears by promising themselves, have the fulfilment after death of all that they vainly yearned for in life. O'Neill is not to be censured for the predicament, in which he found himself, or for the fashion in which he chose to extricate himself, but rather for misinterpreting his dream. For however ingeniously he substituted the premises of a rationalistic psychology, however adeptly he interpolated his allegory, however glibly he spoke of fate and destiny, crime and retribution, guilt and atonement, his dream in tragedy was not the Greek dream.

The appearance of "Mourning Becomes Electra" subsequent to Krutch's estimate in 1929 of modern tragedy gave Crutch no cause to revise his assertion that the:

"Tragic solution of the problem of existence, the reconciliation to life by means of the tragic spirit is…. Only a fiction surviving in art".

Indeed, O'Neill's play bears out the statement by achieving precisely the opposite result: Electra offers a solution not to the problem of existence but to that of non-existence; it reconciles not to life, but to death. Nor did O'Neill invoke that Tragic Spirit which Krutch regarded as the product either of a "religious faith in the greatness of God" or of "faith in the greatness of man" although by 1932 it seemed to Krutch that he had satisfied this demand, that he had, in short, succeeded in investing man "once more with the dignity he has lost". He insisted, begging the question,

"The greatness of the plays lies in the fact that they achieve a grandeur which their rational framework is impotent even to suggestion".

In "Mourning Becomes Electra", he convinces, that human beings are great and terrible creatures when they are in the grip of great passions, and that the spectacle of them is not only absorbing but also and at once horrible and cleansing. Here, it seems Krutch is entirely wrong. Not only has he missed the "meaning" of O'Neill's trilogy, he has discerned in O'Neill's characters qualities that are mostly non-existent. They are characters, moreover, whose passions are infantile rather than great, are spectacle that is horrible but scarcely cleansing. Catharsis is a condition, which O'Neill seldom achieved, preferring, as he did, narcosis or necrosis. That the deficiencies of "Mourning Becomes Electra", when it is compared "with the very greatest works of dramatic literature" are limited only to its language is an opinion, which, if our judgments have been even moderately sound, has little to be said in its support. There is equally little to be said for Krutch's contrast of Ibsen and O'Neill and, wherein he finds that O'Neill avoided the central fault of Ibsen's tragedies, namely, that they are "Too thoroughly pervaded by a sense of human littleness to be other than melancholy and dispiriting".

Having defined "true tragedy … as a dramatic work in which the outward failure of the principle personage is compensated for by the dignity and greatness of his character", Krutch concludes that "O'Neill is almost alone among modern dramatic writers in possessing what appears to be an instinctive perception of what a modern tragedy would have to be". Yet one has only to strip "Mourning Becomes Electra" of its spiritual malaise, its Freudian machinery, its self-conscious symbolism, its Gothic properties, its turgid style, to see how little better O'Neill has succeeded than Ibsen in satisfying Krutch's definition of "true tragedy". Ghosts, too, was a tragedy of family guilt in which the original scene is traced to the life- denying impulse. One side is happiness; on the other is "the source of the misery in the world": law, order, and duty. Living in the house polluted by her husband's profligacy, Mrs. Alving, the counterpart of Christine, revolts against the restrictive virtues which society has imposed upon her and which prevented Alving from finding "any outlet for the overmastering joy of life that was in him". Oswald, haunted by his father's sin, suffers not only physical consequences thereof, but repeats – like Orin –the parents ‘behaviour. Where Orin is afflicted with a stubborn case of Weltschmerz, and complications induced by a wound in the head –the dowry of the Mannons in general, Ezra is particular –Oswald suffers from congenital syphilis –the indirect of the Mannons way of life, but the direct consequence of his father's dissolute actions. When, at the conclusion of the tragedy, Oswald locks himself and his mother inside their haunted house for paying out the family curse much as Lavinia is. Surely the madness of a paretic is not more melancholy and dispiriting than the masochism of a woman who denies herself the pleasure of dying.

More restrained than Krutch, George Jean Nathan never compared "Mourning Becomes Electra" "with the very greatest works of dramatic literature", but he did declare it to be "indubitably one of the finest play that the American theatre has known". Like Krutch, he mistook Weltschmerz for tragedy and ascribed purgative powers to hyper-emotionalism and to the manifestations of a neurotic sensibility. But Nathan came closer to the truth when he observed that O'Neill's "passionate inspiration", "the sweep and size of his emotional equipment and emotional dynamics" transcended the characters and the play. This is a euphemistic way of saying that "Mourning Becomes Electra" contains no adequate equivalent for the playwright's excess of feeling. It is a fault that is present in most of O'Neill's plays, and O'Neill himself was apparently aware of it when in "Mourning Becomes Electra" he consciously shunned "the many opportunities for effusions of personal writing about life and fate". If the trilogy is less effusive than some of the preceding plays, its grandiosity is threefold greater than most. If it contains less "personal writing", it is far from reticent concerning the author's conception of life and fate, a conception which suggests that the glow felt by Nathan to be spreading over all "the glow that is O'Neill" is less "Luminous and radiant" than feverish.

Mourning Becomes Electra follows the pattern of the Greek trilogy in the essentials." Discuss.

Suggestive Title

The title of the play itself suggests the relation of the play to the Greek drama. The story of the house of Atreus was set down by Homer, Pindar, Aeschylus, Sophocles, Euripides and diverse other Greek writers whose works are not extant. From this house shadowed by an ancient curse, Agamemnon, brother of Menelaus, goes forth to the war at Troy.

His wife, Clytemnestra, the sister of Helen, during her husband's absence takes for her paramour Aegisthus and shares the government of Argos with him. In due time Agamemnon having at the God's behest sacrificed his daughter Iphigenia and bringing with him Cassandra, Priam's daughter, returns, and is murdered by Clytemnestra and her lover. Electra, his daughter, is shamed and degraded and prays for the return of her brother Orestes, long ago sent out of the country by her mother and now become a man. Orestes returns, kills Clytemnestra and Aegisthus. He is pursued by the Erinyes, and only after wandering and agony and a vindication of himself before the tribunal of Athena's Areopagus is he cleansed of his sin.

Bare Outlines

Mourning Becomes Electra begins with the mother and daughter, Christine and Lavinia, waiting there in the house of the Mannons, the return of Ezra Mannon from the war, which with Lee's surrender is about over. A thread of romance is introduced between Lavinia and Peter, and between Lavinia's brother, Orin, and Hazel, Peter's sister. Meanwhile, Captain Brant comes to call ; he ;pays a certain court to Lavinia, and she, acting on a cue from the hired man, who has been on the place sixty years, traps him into admitting that he is the son of one of the Mannons who had seduced a Canadian maidservant and been driven from home by his father, Lavinia's grandfather. She has all her data straight now. She has suspected her mother, followed her to New York, where Christine has pretended to go because of her own father's illness, but has in fact been meeting Adam Brant. Lavinia has written to her father and brother, hinting at the town gossip about her mother. We learn that Captain Brant had returned to avenge his mother but instead had fallen passionately in love with Christine, who loves him as passionately as she hates her husband. From this point the play moves on, with the father's hatred of the son, who returns it, the son's adoration of his mother, the daughter's and the mother's antagonism, the daughter's and father's devotion, to Christine's murder of her husband with the poison sent by Brant and substituted for the medicine prescribed against his heart trouble. Orin returns, after an illness from a wound in the head. Christine tries to protect herself in her son's mind against the plots of Lavinia. Lavinia, in the room where her father's body lies, convinces him with the facts ; they trail Christine to Brant's ship, where she has gone to warn him against Orin. Orin shoots Brant. Christine next day kills herself. Brother and sister take a long voyage to China, a stop at the southern isles, come home again. Substitutions have taken place, Lavinia has grown like her mother, Orin more like his father. Meanwhile, his old affair with Hazel, encouraged at last by Lavinia, who now wants to marry Peter, is cancelled ; he finds himself making an incestuous proposal to Lavinia and is repulsed by her. He shoots himself. In the end Lavinia speaking words of love to Peter, finds Adam's name on her lips. She breaks with Peter, orders the blinds of her house nailed shut, and goes into the house, to live there till her death. Justice has been done, the Mannon dead will be there and she will be there.

The Essential Pattern

Thus it is clear that Mourning Becomes Electra follows the pattern of the Greek trilogy in the essentials. The first play, entitled the Homecoming is closest to its original. It tells of the return of General Ezra Mannon (Agamemnon) from the Civil War, and of his murder by his wife, Christine (Clytemnestra), at the urging of her lover, Adam Brant (Aegisthus). And it ends with the confrontation of the mother by her daughter, Lavinia Mannon (Electra).

Difference Between the Two Plays

Physically, the chief difference of the modern play from its original is that Christine and her lover do not stab the husband in his bath ; she administers poison to him instead of the medicine he expects. But, if this difference of action seems minor, it points to a major difference of character, neither Ezra nor Christine Mannon shares the heroic stature of the Greek Agamemnon and Clytemnestra. Ezra seems less the conquering hero than the lonely old man, and his guilt is disproportionally small––it is not the cruelty and self-willed pride of the Greek ; it is only a puritanical failure to satisfy his wife in their love-relationship. And Christine shares neither the passionate hatred of Clytemnestra for her husband; nor her passionate love for Aegisthus. Rather she seems a neurotic, vindictive woman whose nature is poisonous rather than heroic. Although the first play explains the actions of the classical Agamemnon in modern psychological terms, it substitutes neurotic hatred for the full-blooded passion and violence of the original.

The Essential Outlines

The second play of the trilogy, entitled The Hunted also follows, the essential outlines of its Greek original. It centres upon the character of Orestes––now Orin Mannon, who has just returned from the war as this play begins. Confronted with the proof of his mother's guilt, Orin hunts down her lover and shoots him. But he does not murder his mother, as in the original Greek. Instead he tells her of her lover's death and confronts her with her guilt and with his own confused hatred of it, so that she is driven to commit suicide. The substitution of this suicide for the murder of the Greek original again emphasizes the anti-heroic nature of the modern protagonist. Nevertheless, in the case of Orin (Orestes), "the Furies" which were externalized in the Greek myth, now have been realized more dramatically in the tortured conscience of the modern "hero" and in the psychological confusions of his mind. And these psychological Furies have been motivated more fully by the modern incident of Orin's mad laughter and wounding in the war. Therefore Orin seems to be driven by the tortured conscience of all modern man, in their realization of the evil of world war.

Departures From the Greek Originals

The third play of the trilogy entitled The Haunted departs more radically and purposefully from the Greek originals. It centres upon the character of Electra rather than that of Orestes, and it ascribes to this new Electra the only heroism––and the only true tragedy––of the three plays. In the Greek, Electra had been married to a peasant farmer and had remained subordinate to her brother. But, in his earliest note for the future plays, O'Neill directed : "Give modern Electra "gure in play tragic ending worthy of character. In Greek story she peters out into undramatic married banality." And throughout the planning and writing the trilogy he consistently developed this new conception until "Electra" became the title figure.

The Change of Action

Moreover, in changing the character of Electra from the Greek original, O'Neill also changed the action and the dramatic conception of the final play. Now, Orestes can no longer find absolution from the Furies which drive him (as he does in the Greek) ; he accepts damnation for the evil of his nature, and commits suicide, concluding : "The damned don't cry !" But Electra triumphs over the evil of her heritage by recognizing it clearly, and by determining to live with it to the end : "I'm the last Mannon. I've got to punish myself." And she begins her penance by telling Hannah "to throw out all the flowers". She locks herself in with her memories : she will escape damnation by learning fully to understand her own past and how to "cry" or "mourn" for it. At the end the modern heroine regains her humanity by undertaking a tragedy greater than that of her ancestors. She, like her creator, begins her "long day's journey into night".

Mourning Becomes Electra is concerned with the fated family life of the Mannons. Discuss. (P.U 2004)

R. D. Skinner rightly observes that "Mourning Becomes Electra is the drama of a soul at mortal grips with the love of self, the deadly poison of the spirit that denies all creation because it would be self-creative, self-sufficient, both creator and creature, man: coequal with God."

The House of Mannon in this play is the summation of man in which the multitudinous characters that have gone before are only. pale, premonitory shadows of the realities at last revealed––the false prides, the timid abasements, the yearning for childlike peace, the struggles for freedom, exultant discoveries and crests of hope and the heartrending plunges into renewed darkness. Each of the male Mannon himself must die if the soul is to live, killed by, dying to his old self in the mystic formula of the poets and saints, if he is to be reborn to life and love. In this struggle to the death, it is only the spirit of the woman which lives on in solitary expiation, "until the curse is paid out and the last Mannon is let die." Behind the closed doors of that house, the feminine soul, last to die to itself, must find the secret of purgation in silence and alone, beyond the gaze of men, in the sanctuary of the immortal inner will, where only the breath of God may touch its darkness.

Main Threads of Plot

In the first play entitled The Hunted General Ezra Mannon, one of a long line whose wealth and position have been gathered from the sea, returns from the war at a time when his partly foreign wife, Christine, has secretly been giving her love to a sea captain, Adam Brant. She knows him to be the son of another Mannon who "disgraced" his family by marrying a French-Canadian servant girl. Brant is genuinely in love with Christine, but in first seeking her out his sole purpose was revenge on the present head of the house of Mannon. Christine's daughter Lavinia is devotee to her father with an almost fanatical attachment, and doubly resents her mother's infidelity, partly because she herself is attracted to Brant, who resembles her father, and partly because she has always instinctively taken her father's part against her mother, whom she hates and of whom she is inwardly jealous.

Sinister Cloud of Love-of-Self

In the first play, Lavinia's brother, Orin, is still away in camp, recovering from a serious head wound which has weakened his whole nervous system. But we learn that Orin is as much devoted to his mother, of whom he constantly dreams in his illness, as Lavinia is devoted to her father. Yet between brother and sister there is a similar bond of deep attachment––part of that sinister cloud of love-of-self, as reflected in one's own family, which hovers over the ill-fated house. Lavinia lets her mother know that she has discovered her infidelity, but instead of-threatening to tell her father, offers to keep silent if her mother will send Brant away forever. Christine is quick to strike at the truth of Lavinia's action. "You wanted Adam Brant for yourself", she says accusingly, "and now you know you can't have him, you're determined that at least you'll take him from me! ...But if you told your father, I'd have to go away with Adam. He'd be mine still. You can't bear that thought even at the price of my disgrace, can you ?...I know you, Vinnie ! I've watched you ever since you were little, trying to do exactly what you're doing now ! 'You've tried to become the wife of your father and the mother of Orin ! You've always schemed to steal my place !" Of course Lavinia denies and resents these charges bitterly, but persists in her, determination until her mother, in desperation, promises to send Brant away.

A Strange Homecoming

The return of General Mannon is indeed a strange homecoming. In Lavinia alone he finds genuine pleasure and affection. But he has determined, during his long years of facing death, to rediscover the secret of life and to break down, if possible the barrier he has felt between himself and his wife, ever since the earliest days of their marriage. With great difficulty, he throws aside the reserve of years and tries to tell her of his loneliness and his love. But he faces only the mocking mask of a woman who has is already determined that the only way to free herself is to kill him. She has already arranged to have Brant send her some poisonous, tablets which she plans to give her husband instead of the medicine his doctor has prescribed for an increasing trouble of the heart. His heart disease will explain his death to world at large. She and Adam will be free.

In the intimacy of their first night together, when Ezra Mannon feels the false atmosphere of her pretended affection, she suddenly goads him with an open statement of her love for Brant, and tells him, moreover, Brant's true identity as one of the "outlawed" Mannons. The emotional strain brings on as she has planned, a severe heart attack. She substitutes for his medicine the poison Brant has sent her. But in his death agony, Ezra Mannon calls out for Lavinia who reaches his room just in time to see him point an accusing finger at Christine and cry out "She's guilty––not medicine !" This miscarriage of her plans is too much for Christine. She faints before she can conceal the package containing the poisonous tablets. Lavinia finds them, and at last, like the children of the House of Atreus, knows the full measure of her mother's guilt. The play ends with Lavinia's cry to the dead man, "Father ! Don't leave me alone ! Come back to me! Tell me what to do!"

O'Neill's Long Journey

In even the first part of this trilogy, one finds, of course, innumerable links to the struggle of the past which have beset O'Neill's imagination. The strength of the Mannon family, for example, has' come from the sea. But it is also the sea, in the person of Captain Brant, which helps to kill Ezra Mannon. Ezra, in his great loneliness of soul, is not unlike any number of the lonely souls, old and young, who wander through the stages of the O'Neill's long journey, seeking but never finding understanding and completion.

Redemption From Self-Love

Christine herself is not of the Mannons. She is the unattainable "outsider" to those who love only themselves or the image of themselves. She can love Brant but only because, though, part Mannon, he is the son of another stock and, like herself, part outsider, "foreigner". He is despised of the proud Mannons, because he comes of a servant stock, and the Mannons cannot serve others, being without humility. Outsiders are poisoned to the self-love of the Mannons. Yet Christine is the mother of the Mannon children, of those who are destined to expiate the primal sin of the house. That which kills is also fated to be that which will bring new life, because it comes from without the charmed and deadly circle of self-love. In this, the playwright touches instinctively upon that astounding paradox of mankind's experience, that the redemption from man's self-love can be found only through the death of man himself at the hands of what is itself evil–– the outsider, the Caligula, the Pompeia, evil, in spite of itself, serving the ends of good.

Subtle and Terrific Struggle

The second part of the trilogy, The Hunted, comprises the revenge of Lavinia and Orin for their father's murder. Orin returns from the hospital camp two days after the tragedy while the body of Ezra is still laid out in his study. There is a subtle and terrific struggle between Lavinia and Christine for the control of Orin's weak will. Christine tries to mother him as of old, to play on his deep affection for her, and to warn him of the terrible charges he may hear from Lavinia. Christine tells him that Lavinia is really out of her mind. Intuitively, Orin feels a deep suspicion of his mother, but emotionally he cannot bear to think any evil of her. Deep in his heart, he is almost relieved at his father's death, as he can now have his mother entirely to himself, and be as a child completely immersed in her love. During the long and murderous days of the war, he has often had the vision, as he killed men, that it was "like murdering the same man over and over" and as if "the man was myself!" Their faces, be says, "keep coming back in dreams––and they change to father's face––or to mine." To be rid of his father, and also of the man in himself, so that he could return to childhood in his mother's arms had become his half conscious obsession. He wants to be alone with his mother in the enchanted Islands of his dreams, with the whole world apart from them. Christine encourages this mood in the hope that it will make Orin her champion against Lavinia.

Old Image of Death

But Lavinia, with something of the severity of her dead father, holds him grimly to a realization of the truth. She makes him, in spite of himself, acknowledge his mother's guilt, and then, finding that alone might not be enough to move him to vengeance, plays upon his instant jealousy of Brant. The thought of another man claiming his mother's love is too much for him. He and Lavinia secretly follow their mother to her rendezvous with Brant on his ship, in Boston harbour, and overhear her plans to escape. When Christine has left, Orin enters Brant's cabin and kills him. As he does so, the same old image of death comes before him. It is as if he had again killed his father !

Lavinia's Assumption of Her Mother's Role

Orin and Lavinia return to the ancient house of Mannon to tell Christine what they have done. Orin, immediately under her spell again, now that Brant is dead, begs for her forgiveness. But it is too late. Christine goes into the house and shoots herself. Orin remains to the last under the cloud of desire to have her protecting arms about him. And then the new and final theme appears––the assumption by Lavinia of her mother's role. She takes the bewildered Orin in her arms and whispers soothingly to him, "You have me, have'nt you ? I love you. I'll help you to forget." Thus Christine's accusation is justified, that Lavinia wished to take her place.

The Ghosts of Parents

The third play, The Haunted, begins a year later, after Lavinia and Orin have completed a year's voyage to China and the Far East. In the far land of Kublai Kaan and the Princess Kukachin, a great change has taken place. Lavinia has lost the stern angularity of former days, in which she closely resembled her father, and has become strikingly like her mother. She even wears a dress of the same green colour her mother used to wear, instead of the black she once affected. Orin, on the other hand, who was formerly unable to hold the bearing of a soldier, now carries woodenly erect. "His movements and attitudes have the statue-like quality that was so marked in his father. He now wears a close-cropped beard in addition to his moustache, and this accentuates his resemblance to his father." The children are now living in the ghost of their parents.

Both Orin and Lavinia are aware of the change. In his moments of morbid bitterness, Orin even boasts of having become a Mannon and accuses Lavinia of having acquired a soul like his mother's "as if you were stealing her––as if her death had set you free––to become her!" But Lavinia, in spite of welcoming the change in herself, cries out "What we need most is to get back to simple normal things and begin a new, life.” Lavinia tries sternly to make Orin face his hunting ghost, to acknowledge fully to himself his mother’s double guilt and her free choice of suicide. But the attempt is only partly successful.

Fresh Touch of Reality

A fresh touch of reality also comes into Lavinia’s life through her friendship for Peter Niles, whom she has known since childhood. The thought of him has been growing, in her mind during the long months of her voyage. The sea has had a cleansing effect upon her. “The ship and the sea––everything that was honest and clean” has reminded her of Peter. And another thought has come to her, too. “Remember I’m only Mannon”, she reminds Peter when they are at last together. The blood of the “outsider has been doing its work, to give her a new strength to face life. She now wants to marry Peter. But the spectre of Orin comes between them––Orin who is still sick with the old guilt of the Mannons, “possessed by the hate and death”. Orin discovers Lavinia kissing. Peter, and jealousy seizes him. The woman who has taken the place of his mother cannot be permitted to love another man !

A Living Tenor For Lavinia

Orin becomes a living terror for Lavinia. His increasing sense of guilt makes him want to confess everything. He has allowed himself to become engaged to Peter’s sister, Hazel Niles, but he is afraid to be alone with her and Lavinia is afraid to have them alone together. His guilty conscience might make him confess. He is secretly preparing a written confession of his crime-––and this Lavinia suspects rather than knows. She at last forces an admission from him, and then brother and sister lacerate each other with accusation. It is again as if the ghosts of Christine and Ezra were walking in the house. And then a deeper terror than -the dread of Orin’s confessing intervenes. In his growing insanity and in his jealous determination to present Lavinia from marrying Peter, Orin sees Lavinia as neither mother nor sister but a woman, like the French––Canadian servant girl who was the mother of Brant. In an agony of revulsion and rage at _ this crowning revelation, Lavinia turns on Orin. “I wish you were dead !”, she cries, “you’re too vile to live ! You’d kill yourself if you. weren’t a coward !”

Orin’s Suicide and Lavinia’s Self-Punishment

Slowly the idea takes possession of Orin’s deranged mind. In death he can join his mother. He will be able to ask her forgiveness. He will find peace. He starts to rush from the room. Lavinia makes an attempt to stop him, but at that moment Peter- comes in and Orin escapes to his father’s study. Lavinia throws herself hysterically into Peter’s arms, murmuring “no one has the right to keep anyone from peace !” Peter, alarmed, starts to go after Orin, but Lavinia holds him tightly to her and talks against time. There is the sound of a shot. Orin has killed himself. Lavinia is the last of the Mannons. In the closing scene of the tragedy, after Orin’s funeral, Lavinia is again in black. The resemblance to her mother has disappeared. She is filling the house with flowers for Peter, whom she feels she must marry. She must escape forever from the house of Mannon. But Hazel, to whom Orin has hinted just enough to make her feel the terror of the Mannon story, comes to accuse Lavinia of the guilt of Orin's death and to plead with her to give up Peter. Lavinia is steadfast in her determination to marry him. But when he comes to her, she finds a growing suspicion and bitterness in his eyes. The dead are already standing between them. Almost in a frenzy, she asks him for his love, but even as she does so, the name of Adam, like the ghost of Adam Brant, escapes her lips. "I can't marry you, Peter", she cries in sudden defeat, "the dead are too strong !" And then, to drive him from her, she lies about herself. She takes a jealous word that Orin has dropped about a native in the far-off Islands they had visited and pretends the charge was true. As Peter loves her, horror-struck, she calls after him that it was a lie. But her cry is too feeble, too defeated. He does not hear. Lavinia is alone again with the Mannon dead.

Lavinia as Victim of Orin's Self-Love

To Seth, the old gardener, Lavinia confides her last resolve. There is nothing left to do but return into the house. "Don't go in then, Vinnie !" he exclaims in superstitious fright. But she is grimly determined now. "Don't be afraid", she says, "I'm not going the way Mother and Orin went. That's escaping punishment. And there's no one left to punish me. I'm the last Mannon. I've got to punish myself ! Living alone here with the dead is a worst act of justice than death or prison ! I'll never go out or see anyone ! I'll have the shutters nailed closed so no sunlight can ever get in. I'll live alone with the dead, and keep their secrets and let them hound me, until the curse is paid out and the last Mannon is let die." As she enters the house, to remain there in lifelong expiation, her movements become the wooden, angular embodiment of the Mannons.

Lavinia's Strange Cruel Smile

There is still pride left in the soul of Lavinia, and a "strange cruel smile of gloating over the years of self-torture" on her face as she begins her penance. But above and beyond the words of the playwright's description, there is feeling of deepest introversion, of the turning back of the feminine soul into its innermost depths, as if to discover, in death to herself, the one last chance of a new life. Beneath the Mannon mask of utter love of self flows the blood of the "outsider", that which brought death to all the males of the fated line, but may still find in the woman a chance for rebirth... "What we need most is to get back to simple normal things and begin a new life." That was Lavinia's cry after feeling the cleansing of the sea. One feels that in the deliberate, purposeful turning back into her past, Lavinia, the woman unlike the frightened childman who turned back to the maternal past, may discover the secret of living with fears until they are tamed, of opening her eyes to truth instead of mocking shadows, of finding tenderness in place of the sinister giants that seemed to block the agonizing path to maturity and peace.

From this point the play moves on, with the father's hatred of the son, who returns it, the son's adoration of his mother, the daughter's and the mother's antagonism, the daughter's and father's devotion, to Christine's murder of her husband with the poison sent by Brant and substituted for the medicine prescribed against his heart trouble. Orin returns, after an illness from a wound in the head.

Christine tries to protect herself in her son's mind against the plots of Lavinia. Lavinia, in the room where her father's body lies, convinces him with the facts ; they trail Christine to Brant's ship, where she has gone to warn him against Orin. Orin shoots Brant.

Christine next day kills herself. Brother and sister take a long voyage to China, a stop at the southern isles, come home again. Substitutions have taken place, Lavinia has grown like her mother, Orin more like his father. Meanwhile, his old affair with Hazel, encouraged at last by Lavinia, who now wants to marry Peter, is cancelled ; he finds himself making an incestuous proposal to Lavinia and is repulsed by her. He shoots himself. In the end Lavinia speaking words of love to Peter, finds Adam's name on her lips. She breaks with Peter, orders the blinds of her house nailed shut, and goes into the house, to live there till her death. Justice has been done, the Mannon dead will be there and she will be there.

The Essential Pattern

Thus it is clear that Mourning Becomes Electra follows the pattern of the Greek trilogy in the essentials. The first play, entitled the Homecoming is closest to its original. It tells of the return of General Ezra Mannon (Agamemnon) from the Civil War, and of his murder by his wife, Christine (Clytemnestra), at the urging of her lover, Adam Brant (Aegisthus). And it ends with the confrontation of the mother by her daughter, Lavinia Mannon (Electra).

Difference between the Two Plays

Physically, the chief difference of the modern play from its original is that Christine and her lover do not stab the husband in his bath; she administers poison to him instead of the medicine he expects. But, if this difference of action seems minor, it points to a major difference of character, neither Ezra nor Christine Mannon shares the heroic stature of the Greek Agamemnon and Clytemnestra. Ezra seems less the conquering hero than the lonely old man, and his guilt is disproportionally small––it is not the cruelty and self-willed pride of the Greek; it is only a puritanical failure to satisfy his wife in their love-relationship. And Christine shares neither the passionate hatred of Clytemnestra for her husband; nor her passionate love for Aegisthus. Rather she seems a neurotic, vindictive woman whose nature is poisonous rather than heroic. Although the first play explains the actions of the classical Agamemnon in modern psychological terms, it substitutes neurotic hatred for the full-blooded passion and violence of the original.

The Essential Outlines

The second play of the trilogy, entitled The Hunted also follows, the essential outlines of its Greek original. It centres upon the character of Orestes––now Orin Mannon, who has just returned from the war as this play begins. Confronted with the proof of his mother's guilt, Orin hunts down her lover and shoots him. But he does not murder his mother, as in the original Greek. Instead he tells her of her lover's death and confronts her with her guilt and with his own confused hatred of it, so that she is driven to commit suicide. The substitution of this suicide for the murder of the Greek original again emphasizes the anti-heroic nature of the modern protagonist. Nevertheless, in the case of Orin (Orestes), "the Furies" which were externalized in the Greek myth, now have been realized more dramatically in the tortured conscience of the modern "hero" and in the psychological confusions of his mind. And these psychological Furies have been motivated more fully by the modern incident of Orin's mad laughter and wounding in the war. Therefore Orin seems to be driven by the tortured conscience of all modern man, in their realization of the evil of world war.

Departures from the Greek Originals

The third play of the trilogy entitled The Haunted departs more radically and purposefully from the Greek originals. It centres upon the character of Electra rather than that of Orestes, and it ascribes to this new Electra the only heroism––and the only true tragedy––of the three plays. In the Greek, Electra had been married to a peasant farmer and had remained subordinate to her brother. But, in his earliest note for the future plays, O'Neill directed: "Give modern Electra "gure in play tragic ending worthy of character. In Greek story she peters out into undramatic married banality." And throughout the planning and writing the trilogy he consistently developed this new conception until "Electra" became the title figure.

The Change of Action

Moreover, in changing the character of Electra from the Greek original, O'Neill also changed the action and the dramatic conception of the final play. Now, Orestes can no longer find absolution from the Furies which drive him (as he does in the Greek) ; he accepts damnation for the evil of his nature, and commits suicide, concluding : "The damned don't cry !" But Electra triumphs over the evil of her heritage by recognizing it clearly, and by determining to live with it to the end: "I'm the last Mannon. I've got to punish myself." And she begins her penance by telling Hannah "to throw out all the flowers". She locks herself in with her memories : she will escape damnation by learning fully to understand her own past and how to "cry" or "mourn" for it. At the end the modern heroine regains her humanity by undertaking a tragedy greater than that of her ancestors. She, like her creator, begins her "long day's journey into night".

John Ashbery's Selected Poems

John Ashbery; 1927-Till Date

John Ashbery is recognized as one of the greatest twentieth-century American poets. He has won nearly every major American award for poetry, including the Pulitzer Prize, the National Book Award, the Yale Younger Poets Prize, the Bollingen Prize, the Ruth Lilly Poetry Prize, the Griffin International Award, and a MacArthur "Genius" Grant. Ashbery's poetry challenges its readers to discard all presumptions about the aims, themes, and stylistic scaffolding of verse in favor of a literature that reflects upon the limits of language and the volatility of consciousness. In the New Criterion, William Logan noted: "Few poets have so cleverly manipulated, or just plain tortured, our soiled desire for meaning. [Ashbery] reminds us that most poets who give us meaning don't know what they're talking about."

Ashbery's style—self-reflexive, multi-phonic, vaguely narrative, full of both pop culture and high allusion—has become "so influential that its imitators are legion," Helen Vendler observed in the New Yorker. Although even his strongest supporters admit that his poetry is often difficult to read and willfully difficult to understand, many critics have commented on the manner in which Ashbery's fluid style conveys a major concern in his poetry: the refusal to impose an arbitrary order on a world of flux and chaos. In his verse, Ashbery attempts to mirror the stream of perceptions of which human consciousness is composed. His poetry is open-ended and multi-various because life itself is, he told Bryan Appleyard in the London Times: "I don't find any direct statements in life. My poetry imitates or reproduces the way knowledge or awareness come to me, which is by fits and starts and by indirection. I don't think poetry arranged in neat patterns would reflect that situation. My poetry is disjunct, but then so is life." His poems move, often without continuity, from one image to the next, prompting some critics to praise his expressionist technique and others to accuse him of producing art that is unintelligible, even meaningless.

Ashbery's poetry—and its influence on younger poets—remains controversial because of just this split in critical opinion: some critics laud what Paul Auster described in Harper's as Ashbery's "ability to undermine our certainties, to articulate so fully the ambiguous zones of our consciousness," while others deplore his obscurantism and insist that his poems, made up of anything and everything, can mean anything and everything. Reflecting upon the critical response to his poem, "Litany," Ashbery once told Contemporary Authors, "I'm quite puzzled by my work too, along with a lot of other people. I was always intrigued by it, but at the same time a little apprehensive and sort of embarrassed about annoying the same critics who are always annoyed by my work. I'm kind of sorry that I cause so much grief."

W.S. Di Piero described the reaction of critics to Ashbery's style as "amusing. On the one hand are those who berate him for lacking the Audenesque 'censor' (that little editing machine in a poet's head which deletes all superfluous materials) or who accuse him of simply being willfully and unreasonably perverse. On the other hand are those reviewers who, queerly enough, praise the difficulty of Ashbery's verse as if difficulty were a positive literary value in itself, while ignoring what the poet is saying." Helen Vendler offered her summary of the debate in the New Yorker: "It is Ashbery's style that has obsessed reviewers, as they alternately wrestle with its elusive impermeability and praise its power of linguistic synthesis. There have been able descriptions of its fluid syntax, its insinuating momentum, its generality of reference, its incorporation of vocabulary from all the arts and sciences. But it is popularly believed, with some reason, that the style itself is impenetrable. . . An alternative view says that every Ashbery poem is about poetry."

"The Painter" by John Ashbery

Introduction and Theme of the poem: - Ashbery’s interest in painting led him to write this poem. The painter is fully representative of Ashbery’s poetry. Ashbery uses a persona to reveal his poetic urge. The Painter is the mouthpiece of Ashbery. The poet uses cinematic images in the poem to make it as dynamic and visual as possible. The poem tells us that the painter is sitting between the sea and the tall buildings. He is attempting to create something impossible but remains unsuccessful. The people in the building encourage him to write common subject. He uses his wife as subject of his painting. He does it so exquisitely but again turns to his previous subject of sea. His efforts to paint the sea automatically are not realized and he is mocked by the people in the tall buildings. The painter is crucified by his subject. His desire of innovative and futuristic art remains only a prayer and longing. He is not able to achieve the extraordinary because of the ordinary demands of the audience.

The main theme of the poem is that innovator, modern and creative artists are crucified by the traditional and conventional people. This is not the only theme because the poem is to be understood at many different levels.

A CRITIQUE OF THE PAINTER

Ashbery’s poems are abstract paintings in words.

Introduction: - John Ashbery uses painter as persona to present before us his conception of poetry. The painter like Ashbery is innovator and wants to capture the vitality of life rather than the mere surface transmit beauty of the same. The painter is the most representative of Ashbery’s poems and it is a key to understanding Ashbery both as and poet and artist. The painter breaks down the traditional and orthodox restrictions on the art laid by the classicists and wants to steal the essence of art. Ashbery is no moralist and conceives the art for its own sake. As the bird sings for its own sake, Ashbery writes in the same fashion. The poem has been composed in Sestina.

A Sestina is a form of rhymed or unrhymed poem of six stanzas of six lines and a concluding triplet in which the same six words at the line-ends occur in each stanza in six different sequences, apart from the final triplet, in which each line contains two of these words, one at the middle and one at the end. There are many salient features of the poem that we can analyse as under.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THOUGHT

Symbolic elements: - The poem is highly symbolic and packed with symbols that it seems like an allegory. The poem is not imaginative rather it is concrete pregnant with symbolic allusions:

Sitting between the sea and the buildings
He enjoyed painting the seas portrait.
But just as children imagine a prayer
Is merely silence, he expected his subject

The sea is a symbol of creativity and the unexplored depths of human consciousness. It also resents the vitality and essence or life, which has been long ignored. The buildings and their architecture are the explored and achieved conditions of art. The painter symbolizes the creative and modern urge and the people in the buildings are traditional critics who fail to understand the philosophy of art.

Symbolically, the poem shows the condition of the artist sandwiched between two contrasting forces behind art; conventional, traditional and superficial approach on the one hand and modern, creative, experimental and innovative on the other. The modern artist is not restricted by the limited and restrictive view of life. He is the controller of his art and defines its parameters. He believes that art is all-powerful and vast and it cannot be conceived in a traditional narrow thinking. His analogy is child's prayer is not analogy only rather through it, he presents a philosophy of art. The artist should be a meditator and start art like a prayer. Ashbery knows; is insane and even a common mind cannot entertain such an idea. So such conception of art in reality can be achieved only through prayer in silence. The difference between artificial art and vital art is presented by the artist with his back to the buildings and the face to the sea.

To rush up the sand, and, seizing a brush,
Plaster its own portrait on the canvas.

Subjectivity and Objectivity

There was no paint on the canvas

Objective art is difficult to attain but it lends realism and universality to the artist's masterpiece and the objective art is not bound by the artist, his consciousness or his artistic ability, so the painter meditated for long but nothing appeared on the canvas. The painter wanted either to paint objectively or nothing at all. He was an iconoclast, his representation of art must be perfect otherwise; he will be just another artist in the echoes of the millions of artists in the world. But the people in the were urging the artist to

Try using the brush
As a means to an end. Select, for a portrait, Something less angry and large, and more subject
To a painter's moods, or, perhaps, to a prayer

Because they were the upholders of the traditional art of subjectivity which was delimited by the artist's mind and couldn't survive in the limitless regions of the vast universe. This is the reaction of the traditional artists to the experimental nature of the modern artists.

Definition of Art: - The painter responds to the rationalists with a true conviction of a perfect artist in the following lines;

How could he explain to them his prayer
That nature, not art, might usurp the canvas?

The painter's conception of art is like that of a child's prayer which is a direct relationship between the artist and the art like that of a prayee to God. This concept cannot be materialized and explained to the traditionalists, for they cannot understand the artist's avant-garde approach. The painter's definition of artist that objective representation of reality must be the basis of art, the art confined by the artist's feelings and emotions is not true and genuine. Soul, spirit, vitality of life, the essence of reality are the features which the painter is aspiring in his portrait. The painter further asserts:

My soul, when I paint this next portrait
Let it be you who wrecks the canvas.

Political and Religious Allegory: - Allegory is fictional literary narrative or artistic expression that conveys a symbolic meaning parallel to but distinct from, and more important than, the literal meaning. The Painter is both a political and religious allegory. The pathetic state of the painter lends political and social interpretations of the poem. The Communist Manifesto, the Puritan Theocracy, The Martial Laws and Hitlarian and Fascistic authorities all crucify the innovators and curb freedom of expression of those who champion a new cause for the welfare of humanity or art. The line:

Try using the brush for a means to an end

Shows the selfishness of the political gains. The writer should be a representative of a political party as well as was the case in Russia which demanded the Socialist Realism. The painter was a genuine artist who opposed these political and Hitlarian manifestos and their restrictions on art. He was a free agent and wanted freedom in his art, so he could easily attempt his poetic vision, but this freedom is not allowed as Ashbery depicts:

The news spread like a wild fire thought the buildings
He had gone back to the sea for his subject
Imagine a painter crucified by his subject.

The visionary painter was crucified by the so called custodians of political beliefs who never allowed a novelty or change which will pose a danger to their established government and systems. The poem was written in 1956—a period of tussle in which the freedom of action and thought was restrained by the Russian Communists. The poem tells a story of a painter who was a visionary and pioneer of a new approach in art which practically meant an opposition to the existing system or order so he was crucified or burnt at the stakes by the politicians.

The word 'crucify' has religious connotation so the poem becomes a religious allegory too. And reminds us of the story of Christ who brought a system of theocracy as a welfare to humanity but was rejected by the selfish so called chiefs of Judaism and was commanded by Pontius Pilate to be crucified for the political gains of Roman Empire. In this way, the innovates are punished in a society of selfishness, greed and power which denies welfare to humanity.

Tragic Elements in the Painter: - Ashbery is very akin to T.S. Eliot and Robert Frost. Most of his poems are like theirs speaking of sense of uncertainty, the looming fear, gloom and loneliness.

The atmosphere of fear, gloom and loneliness is also visible. The painter is alone with sense of gloomy uncertainty in his art for perfection. The sea symbolizes loneliness too. The people in the buildings have alienated the painter for his self-chosen seemingly impossible task rather than supporting him in his quest for the objective representation of reality. The painter is the protagonist feeling conflict sandwiched between traditions and modernity. All modern tragedies show conflict of the protagonist with society and its established norms and tragically doomed for this Hamartia that the protagonist bears. The painter is the protagonist working as opposed to the demands and conventions of society. The society may accept him if he becomes rational enough to understand the mere creative vision doesn't suffice the creation. His Hamartia causes his crucifixion and ends the poem with tragic touches and a bit of Catharsis.

Style, Technique and Imagery: - The poem has been composed in an arresting and forceful. His technique to the poem is one such as employed by the abstract painters. So Ashbery's rightly gives the concept of his poetry in the following words:

"My poems are paintings in words.''

His approach in the poem is objective rather than subjective. The diction is simple and relevant to the subject. John Ashbery is a perfect craftsman like Alexander Pope, Spenser, Tennyson and Surrey-Wyatt, the American examples being Richard Wilbur and Robert Frost. He is renowned for artistic galore in his poetry. His diction is simple and colloquial and must conform to the themes and ideas presented in the poem. The painter is no exception. All these stylistic features are perfectly applicable to the poem. All the key words which point to the main theme of the poem have been wrapped at the end to give them extra significance.

The imagery is fresh and startling. The images of sea, canvas, portrait and prayer all contribute to the thematic development of the poem.

Conclusion: - The Painter is perfectly a representative of John Ashbery's poems and a key to understanding his concepts regarding poetry. In Painter, Ashbery achieves artistic perfection with simplicity of diction. The painter can be interpreted at many different levels of understanding that is the beauty and charm of the poem. The language, themes, imagery and style make the poem an exquisite piece of literature. The title of the poem is also radically, very few poems would have been written with such titles. Ashbery combines surrealistic techniques of painting with poetic grandeur.

John Ashbery's 'The Painter' as representative of the Avant-garde

Avant-garde (From French, "advance guard") refers to people or works that are experimental or innovative, particularly with respect to art, culture, and politics. Avant-garde represents a pushing of the boundaries of what is accepted as the norm or the status quo, primarily in the cultural realm. The notion of the existence of the avant-garde is considered by some to be a hallmark of modernism, as distinct from postmodernism. It is often related with surrealism.

The Surrealist movement was founded in Paris by a small group of writers and artists who sought to channel the unconscious as a means to unlock the power of the imagination. Disdaining rationalism and literary realism, and powerfully influenced by Sigmund Freud, the Surrealists believed the conscious mind repressed the power of the imagination, weighting it down with taboos. Influenced also by Karl Marx, they hoped that the psyche had the power to reveal the contradictions in the everyday world and spur on revolution. Their emphasis on the power of the imagination puts them in the tradition of Romanticism, but unlike their forbears, they believed that revelations could be found on the street and in everyday life. The Surrealist impulse to tap the subconscious mind, and their interests in myth and primitivism, went on to shape the Abstract Expressionists, and they remain influential today.

Ashbery's poems are 'abstract paintings in words'. Ashbery is the most creative of all avant-gardes. His poems justify what he advocates in his prose or theoretical criticism. In fact Ashbery's efforts were to unite the techniques of poetry and painting. While doing so he has to explain the similarities in these arts to their procedural outputs. In his view the practice of a painter is quite akin to a poet's.

The movements in painting therefore had their special link to the movements in poetry. The Pinter is written in the light of surrealist art. Surrealism is a technique which used fantastic images and incongruous juxtapositions in order to represent unconscious thoughts and dreams.

"Sitting between the sea and the buildings
He enjoyed painting the sea's portrait"

The touch of abstractism is seen in the painting of sea but in a poetic abstract way. What the painter wants to paint about sea is attempted by poets like Shelley in poetry. But the difference lies in the fact that the painting concerns our sense of seeing whereas poetry hearing and feeling as in 'But just as children imagine a prayer'. It was surrealism the painter was trying to adopt as a theory. The most controversial of all surrealist aspects is it aspect of automatism. Ashbery in these lines gives a view of painter's conception of this aspect. He wants the sea to rush up the sand and plaster its own portrait on the canvas. What comes next is Ashbery's rejection of this view, 'So there was never any paint on his canvas'. For him the possibility of automatism lies in its adopting some means. The canvas and brush are the means a painter adopts in painting. The means for a poet are the emotional overflow and conscious indulgence. What the people living in buildings advise him to do is the same Ashbery himself supports:

"Try using the brush
As a means to an end"

All poems are subject to automatism. But the automatism Ashbery defines is totally different from one the poets of generations have been practising. In his view, the selection of subject at least should not fall prey to automatism. The poet and the painter both should try to choose something intimate to their feelings and bents. The inability to choose such a subject is expressed in painter's inability to explain his choice to the people, 'How could he explain to them his prayer'. But to show the approach of the critics as genuine and practical, Ashbery presents his painter acting upon their suggestion, 'He chose his wife for a new subject'. The success this time though unexpected comes to the painter and the portrait gets appreciated by the critics. As if forgetting itself, the portrait, 'Had expressed itself without a brush'. It is in fact the practicability of theory that Ashbery wants to express. Surrealism in itself is not the genuine thing. If the painter or poet has mixed it with the artistic conscience it becomes genuine or practicable. The artistic conscience from art therefore should not be absent. All arts should be artistic in nature, and all artists should be artistical. Ashbery's avant-garde approach is in this way quite clear. All experimental and innovational work should not cease to artistic. Surrealist conceptions are in fact the initial stages of all conceptions. It is the genius of an artist that makes them different from the conceptions of a common person. The artistic efforts in all works of art should always be there. It is the artistic effort that gives some idea or vision an artistic genre. All conception before being adopted in form or medium may look the same. But it is the artistic effort that gives them form or medium. Further, the form or medium should not be considered enough to give some conception its artistic identity. Colours and canvas should not be considered enough to make some idea a portrait. It should be the approach of painter that should help make it painterly. The painter forgot to understand this point and tried to paint the portrait of sea again.

'Slightly encouraged, he dipped his brush
In the sea, murmuring a heartfelt prayer'

In fact he forgot to understand that the portrait praised by the critics was painted up to the requirements of the medium. It was not the subject but the medium they had stressed upon. The sea is not less angry and large a subject. The sea is a subject, but to be less and large deals with the particularities of medium. So it was the medium they in fact talked about. The painter took it for subject and theory and started painted the portrait of sea again. The mode and attitude he adopted was again surrealist as in "My soul, when I paint this portrait'. If the news of his painting the sea spreads like a wildfire, it is because of painter's inability to understand the true spirit of a theory. When he came to his old angry and large subject, he had to be disappointed again. The disappointment had become his ultimate fate as in 'Imagine a painter crucified by his subject'. It simply means that the subject should not dominate and overcome the true spirit of an art. The medium and attitudes should always be accepted as true spirit of some art.

Ashbery's avant-garde views are not totally strange for art. What Eliot says about the importance of individual talent in the supremacy of tradition is proved. Tradition does not mean modes and attitudes. It should also be meant in the sense of medium. Canvas and brush are the media of painting. An artist should not transcend his media. It shall simply mean that he is misled in his concepts. If the painter had not been too exhausted to lift his brush, he might have painted something up to the requirements of theory. The theorists refused to accept his efforts. They simply thought it non-professional. To remain and survive in the limits of art is the first requirement of art. If the artist breaks these limits and gets out of art he will never be accepted. All indications of a subject began to fade and the fate of to be out of art is to be dead in art. The sea devoured the canvas and the brush means the subject needs some medium.

Basic concepts of art in 'The Painter'

In 'The Painter', Ashbery touches upon some of the basic concepts in imitative arts. He does not attempt a poetic reconciliation of the warring schools of criticism. Rather he presents a situation in which the artistic creativity may come in direct conflict with the demands of modern society. The poem presents the situation of an artist who wants to paint the sea. His ambition is to present the sea rather than paint it. He wants that "nature, not art, might usurp the canvas"

Ashbery concludes that such an ambition would result in a total denial of modern urban values and would be met with violent rejection. Ashbery establishes a relation between the sea and the buildings in the very beginning of the poem. The artist sits between the symbols of nature and the urban jungle of cement and steel. He was enjoying his work and expected that his subject would easily yield to creative reproduction, but his expectations were thwarted. Reality refused to be captured so easily by art. Ashbery compares his ambition to children's view of prayer showing the simplicity of his desire. Ashbery contrasts the artist's expectation to realistic theory of art asserting that even the most naturalistic presentation of life is still not nature as it exists in a different medium which changes its attributes. The artist with this realization is unable to present reality and so "there was never any paint on the canvas"

Ashbery contrasts the artist with the people in the buildings. He emphasizes the basic difference between their modes of thinking. They want to "put him to work" desiring him to paint something less "angry and large", something "more subject to a painter's mood". It is obvious that they consider art to be an imitative skill in the service of urban, commercial interests. It is "more subject to…a prayer" or as one may say 'an order'. The concept of presentation of reality in the sense that reality may actually "usurp" the canvas is alien to them. The artist's choosing his wife for a subject and making her "vast" is Ashbery's way of defining bathos. Ashbery being a gay poet could hardly have expressed matrimonial love in any other way. However this time it was as if the portrait "Had expressed itself without a brush". With this encouragement the artist now arises to paint with seawater, letting the medium of reality to be the medium of artistic expression. This was as if the artistic creation would "wreck the canvas", putting an end to the illusion of presentation and letting the reality to be expressed without any alien medium of expression. This new mode of creation in which the artist is overtaken by his subject is blasphemous to the people in the buildings who consider it to be the case of "a painter crucified by his subject". Others declare it the egotistical expression of the artist's self and not presentation of reality. The work of the artist is such that: "all indication of subject began to fade"

Immaculate reality untouched with art is the final expression and provokes a destructive violent response form the people of the buildings. The portrait is tossed into the sea where it becomes one with its subject and thus the expression of the subject remains a prayer. The poem presents many contrasting views related to art and its relation to reality and society. Ashbery finds an appropriate locale for the presentation of ideological discord. The artist sits between the sea and the buildings, i.e., between nature and the urban civilization. The buildings are tall and overcrowded, apt representation of overpopulated urban scene. The tallness of the buildings also reflects the way the people look down upon the artist. But the artist has his back to the buildings. His independence of thought is met with advice from the buildings. People want to "put him to work".

Ashbery with his usual figurative way of presentation makes the artist paint his wife whom he makes "vast, like ruined buildings"

He very cleverly hides whether the portrait of the wife was made in paint on the canvas or if it was a real-life portrait. The poem makes use of figurative language throughout thus making every simple detail stand for a more complex thought related with theory of art. Phrases like "sea's portrait, plaster its own portrait on the canvas, the brush as means to an end, usurp the canvas. As if forgetting itself the portrait, had expressed itself without a brush, wrecks the canvas, crucified by his subject, all indications of a subject began to fade, to howl, that was also a prayer, the sea devoured the canvas and the brush", all have figurative meanings expressing or reflecting significant artistic concepts. Ashbery uses the word prayer several times, in this poem every time meaning something different. The artist's prayer and the people's howl which was also a prayer have contrasted meanings and so Ashbery uses the same word to mean different things to show how reality can be seen from many different perspectives.

Conclusively, Ashbery's interest in painting led him to write this poem. The painter is fully representative of Ashbery's poetry. Ashbery used a persona to reveal his poetic urge. The poet uses cinematic images in the poem to make it as dynamic and visual as possible. The Painter's desire of innovative and futuristic art remains only a prayer and longing. He is not able to achieve the extraordinary because of the ordinary demands of the audience. The main theme of the poem is that innovator, modern and creative artists are crucified by the traditional and conventional people.

Ashbery makes a genuine effort to portray the poetic vision of an artist's mind by concentrating on the dictum "ut pictura poesis"--"as is painting, so is poetry". Through poetry he glorifies a mere painter's struggle to find his true artistic form and inclination towards a specific way of being creative in "The Painter".

"For some people the fear of inner torment is such that the desire to create has to be repressed: 'He does not embark on any serious pursuits commensurate with his gifts lest he fails to be a brilliant success. He would like to write or paint but does not dare to start' (Horney 107). Or if the desire to create is not repressed, the creative process will be wracked with anxiety or hampered by self torment." This quote from the book Therapeutic dimensions of autobiography in creative writing by Celia Hunt aptly captures to some extent the condition the painter in the poem goes through, who seems confused on whether to draw the painting of the sea or not. And how this feat of capturing the sea can be achieved.

A similar theme is also tackled by the great American poet, Emily Dickinson. In her short poem she writes: "Artists wrestle here! /Lo, a tint Cashmere! /Lo, a Rose! /Student of the Year! /For the easel here/Say Repose!" This poem lays bare the fact that the artist always juggles with his tools and crafts in order to create what he wants. For him to relax is unthinkable likewise the painter in the poem faces a lot of troubles in making this special piece of art (the sea). The painter seems to self actualize himself by materializing the urge to paint a portrait of the sea which will give the chaos of his creative world a poetic and appeasing feeling.

Ashbery is known for his surrealist poetry and in "The Painter he uses his skill to masterfully create connections between varied images. Using the modified form of sestina (last words of the verses are mostly changed) he is able to make these images jump into a creative hotchpotch. But the irony of the poem is that the artist portrayed in the poem seems to go through a rough patch in his life yet the creativity by which the poet himself writes, speaks volume of about the work of art he produces; the poet is able to create with the painter in the poem a smooth imagery of an artist's struggle towards his creative independence--a mere human's effort to fight for what he deems right. In order to fulfill his creative vision he goes against all the odds set by the society. Ashbery was himself a painter and his surrealist automatic writing in the poem seems to give power to the automatic drawing the painter is trying to achieve in the poem, as the artist wishes: "he expected his subject / To rush up the sand, and, seizing a brush, / Plaster its own portrait on the canvas.

Interpretation of this poem is complicated. On the surface level one can judge what is happening but on a deeper level the reader may not be able to interpret the unfathomable depth. One reason quite evident is the surrealism employed. Just like the artist's mind the poem is also free of conscious control. It takes on its own route and it paints with its own brush strokes with the artist's creative vision.

Ashbery takes into account many aspects of syntax and rhyme in his poetry and one of it is the repetition of words. The reader may not notice immediately about it but after a careful examination it comes to light that, Ashbery repeats the word "canvas", "buildings", "brush", "subject", "prayer" seven times and "portrait" eight times in the poem. This repetition creates a surrealistic effect in the poem.

The painter in the poem is on the beach and contemplates his tempestuous subject. Sea here symbolizes the freedom, the chaos, the harmony of the waves and the creative space for the painter. The sea symbolizes freedom as it liberates the painter from the hustle bustle of the city life behind him ("the building"). The painter is like a child imagining a prayer. His innocent imagination muses over what to draw on his canvas. Though the painter loves to paint the sea but he is confused by the daunting question of how to draw and live in one's own creative vision, how to capture the universe around us. Even though he has brush in his hand but his canvas seems empty, this paint-less canvas brings out the fact that the painter himself has lost his creative vision, or he is going through the phase of imagination blockage and he is unable to take a plunge into mind's eye where haphazard brushes could be waved like a magic wand and a beauty of its own kind would emerge into a classic piece of art. His lack of strength to take on a decision leads the people around him to take control of his mind. They ask him to make a portrait of "Something less angry and large", that is to say; do not draw the sea due to its turbulent nature and gargantuan effect which is unfathomable by human mind to capture. The painter seemed unable to convey "his prayer" to the people that he wants "nature, not art, [to] usurp the canvas".

The skillful painter then tries to paint his wife. He does that without really making a creative endeavour because she seemed a ruined building in the first place that is not something he would want to paint. He does make an attempt, though unwillingly. It is throttling to the painter as an artist is a free will creature and no matter what happens he has to go to his roots of desire that is he has to be a creative by not conforming to traditionalists. He has to fulfill his urge to create his own tradition. His desire to go back to the sea appears to be the only right thing to do.

"Imagine the painter crucified by his subject." signifies a powerful figure that could draw faultlessly the things he see, and be astonished and spiritualized by the creative vision he has with the drawing. The painter in the poem proves his creative vision and creative authority when "He provoked some artists leaning from the buildings"; suggesting their eagerness to stick to the roots; the traditional way of painting. The poet clearly implies that the traditional painters are bent towards following an authority by which they could judge the painter and his work.

The people, the critics and the painters of traditional sort did not appreciate the effort of the painter and thus life's way of taking the unconventional approach irrationally by not getting accepted by his own people fell upon the painter as they threw the portrait of the sea from the tallest building. This "portrait" symbolizes something that the people, the critics and the painters of his age were not able to handle the pressure posit on them by the painter or his creative vision of the sea. Such non-conformist and cavalier attitude is also visible in Ashbery's life, as he nonchalantly says that his goal is "to produce a poem that the critic cannot even talk about."

In the end of the poem "the sea devoured the canvas and the brush". It signifies that the portrait drawn by a mere artist cannot be fathomed by man himself because chaos of the sea is unfathomable and it was as if "his subject had decided to remain a prayer". Thus the freedom and turbulence the sea entails with it consumes man's creation as well. The chaos of the world cannot be painted in a canvas, at least people around them would not let the painter do that, yet his creative drive would urge him to create what he instinctively desires. Neither the painter would stop nor would the chaos around him end. The cycle of life would go on like this.

A CRITIQUE OF MELODIC TRAINS

Introduction: - The poem shows melodically sounding related series of thoughts that are developing in your mind. They are called Melodic trains for they have the power to transform the minds of people from some ordinary experience to some particular. The poem is a fine example of stream of consciousness technique.

The poem shows the complexity of thoughts as they pass through a sensitive mind of a poet. A poetic mind has a great capacity for associating this similar and distinct thought. That is why; the poem has more than one layer of meaning. The title itself suggests the thought process growing on within the poet's mind. The outer journey in her real train is paralleled by a symbolic train of thoughts and melodies, poetic ideas running through the mind.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THOUGHT

Vanities expressed through appearances: - The first thought or theme present in the poem is the expression of vanities through appearances, when the little girl in the stanza asks the poet what time it is:

> A little girl with scarlet enameled fingernails
> Asks me what time it is—evidently that's a toy wristwatch
> She's wearing, for fun. And it is fun to wear other
> Odd things, like this briar pipe and tweed coat

It is surprising how children satisfy their vanity with toys and fake objects, which cannot fulfill their need. The toy watch doesn't tell the time. It is not only children but adults also do the same and are caught up in vanities and appearances. The poet discovers that the color of his overcoat resembles the color of brown mountains; in fact the seams of his coat actually look like the white paths running down the slopes of the mountains. His thoughts drifting to his clothes suddenly discover that clothes are like a mask hiding the reality. Just as one cannot find out the reality under the clothes, we cannot find the reality of the appearances. The theme of appearance and reality and the vanities to satisfy one's self on fake foundations starts right from the beginning. Delight in seemingly beautiful objects without any special unity is what associates the elders with the youngers because psychologically, they are the same. Basic instinct, at all levels, remains the same all over the world regardless of race, age, region or nation. But it is very difficult to understand human psychology only by appearances. As far as the appearances are concerned, we are all children. This is only one of the ideas and feelings that the poet experiences while traveling in the train.

The process of meditation and Meaning in Life: - Though Melodic Trains is Ashbery's secondary work, yet it was hailed as 'Marvelous' by David Bromwich and 'great' by Hollander. The poem is highly personal and in the words of Huybernsz, 'throws the reader out of the poem'. According to one critic, the poem suggests 'the premise of this marvelous poem is a journey around New York City.' The opening metaphor is that of music which sets the poet in meditation and find meanings in life. The main purpose in life seems, how to live and what to do?

This process of meditation begins when a little girl asks the poet time. The poet is attracted towards the jagged peaks of the mountains by the seams of his coat and later caught up in the humdrum of everyday life. Rather than a meaning, the poet finds confusion, crowds and tensions everywhere. A sense of entrapment encapsulates us, we find surrounded by troubles all around us and find no way out. The Pisa figures ultimately end this process of mediation and life seems a perpetual struggle against the odds of society. We keep oscillating between the complex beginning and peaceful end and sometimes, peaceful begging and complex and disturbing end.

Symbolic Elements – Melodic Trains as drama of life: - Only the wait in stations is vague and Dimensionless, like oneself. How do they decide how much Time to spend in each?

> One beings to suspect there's no
> Rule or that it's applied haphazardly.

Next the train takes turns like a pencil and the poet experiences that life too is like a train full of complexity and running to its destination – death. As in an ordinary journey, the strain stops at various stations for brief moments. We also pause at some state of life before turning into a new direction. The faces of the passengers standing outside the platforms of different stations melt into the faces of those million faces, the poet reads different expressions. Some carry on eternal sadness. Some reflect disillusionment with life and its receptive appearance; some show anxiety about the future. There are questions in every mind. Will the taxi be available; will someone come to welcome me? These and many others perplex the mind of travelers. As the following lines show:

> Sadness of the faces of children on the platform,
> Concern of the grownups for connections, for the chances
> Of getting a taxi, since these have no timetable.
> You get one if you can find one though in principle

These questions asked in ordinary life reflect those questions in the next world. The poet contemplates some spiritual and metaphysical issues at this point. The complexities of the world symbolize those of the hereafter and regarding the future of man in the next world. The is haphazard dimension in life which disturbs all routines and the same is to be found on the Day the Judgment when this haphazardness blends into a unique Death which rampages everything on the earth.

One of these issues is the role of chance in the course of life. Although, chance is just a segment of the total certainty, but chance govern a large part of our existence. The total existence of human activity is controlled by chance, which may be termed as Fate.

Chance, fate, stages of journey and chorus lets us enter into the drama of life which is more visible in the following remarkable lines:

> It's as though a visible chorus called up the different > Stages of the journey, singing about them and being them

The train journey becomes a semblance to the drama in real life. As the play has acts and chorus as the character, so is the situation here. Every man and woman along with their family members act as chorus throughout all the stages of their life – tragic or comic may be.

Oneness and Identification
The platform or waiting to board the train are my brothers

In a way that really wants to tell me why there is so little Panic and disorder in the world, and so much unhappiness. If I were to get down now to stretch, take a few steps

Realizing the basic anxieties of the heart, the poet feels complete oneness and identification with the fellow travelers. Since this journey symbolizes life. It is a moment of human unity which the poet experiences. He wonders whether complete communication between the individual and community is possible. The journey of train is taken lightly by the little girl and the likes, but for the poet is a serious activity, perhaps a moment of contemplation which he identifies himself with the fellow travelers who also share the same problems and who are also human beings like himself. They are like brothers, as poet calls them and require our perfect sympathy and attention. And we need to convince each other because if there is little panic and disorder, why are we creating for ourselves. Sometimes, it is our attitude that makes us tense rather than the tension itself. The gap that exists between one man and the other in the modern period can be only bridged if communication barriers, such as alienation, estrangement and personal entrapment are removed.

The symbolic journey of the train ends when the poet receives a warm welcome and as the journey of the train stops, the melodic trains of his mind also stop as depicted in the following lines:

Of good fortune and colossal welcomes from the mayor and Citizens' committees tossing their hats into the air

Style, Imagery and Technique: - The poet employs a traditional image of train journey to denote life and its non-stop voyage. There are also associated images such as station, marking a temporary stopover and passengers representing fellow human beings. The images of toy and enameled nails signify the theme of false appearances and deceptions. This idea is further enhanced by the Big White Apples or the fumes of the train covering up the plat farm. The poem is a good example of stream of consciousness technique the poem's start immediately by the little girl's question about time began to express might issues like mortality, chance and time.

The poem is perfectly a representative of modern American Sensibility. The striking images of tweed coat and its seams and the enameled nails of the little girl are such powerful images that they transpose us to the very place in whose imagination, the poem was written. The natural imagery of date-palm trees and the Alps lend freshness to poem in contrast to the artificial imagery of tweed coat and enameled nails. The image of Pisa Tower is a true reflective the modern man's psychological complexities. Melodic trains, in terms of images, techniques, symbols and style is a modern piece of poetry.

Conclusion: - Melodic Trains is a fine piece of poetry in which the poet addresses a number of issues, political, social, familial and psychological. It is a journey of life and the end of the journey ends in optimism and happiness on the typical note of 'Welcome Home!' Even then the complexities of life surround us because home introduces new problems for us, the end of the poem is only a temporary happy moment of life.

The poem imparts a deep philosophy of life. Life is full of restlessness, tensions and discontentment, but it is also true that most of the problems in life are caused by the insane attitude of modern man.

> Clouds of anxiety, of sad, regretful impatience
> With ourselves, our lives, the way we have been dealing
> With other people up until now. Why couldn't
> We have been more considerate?

Clouds of anxiety are scattered everywhere, at each stop. During these anxious moments, we create more trouble for other people and forget that there are also humans like us and demand our full sympathy and respect. The poet raises the issue of sympathy and its importance in everyday life. Haste and race has spread panic and disorder in our mechanical life. The hurry to reach home makes life only complex rather than solve any practical issue.

'Melodic Train' : A Post-Modern Poem reflecting Complexities of Urban Life

John Ashbery traces the factors, which directly influence and alter attitude of the modern man in day-to-day situations. Thus Ashbery brings before us the complexities of urban life, discussing the social, political and psychological issues along with personal trains of feelings of the poet.

The Melodic Trains is written in the perspective of modern American society. The social aspects are discussed on an emotional scale. The temperament, attitude and behaviour of modern man are dependent on circumstances and transubstantiations. The feelings of poet remain else-oriented. He does not feel anything irrelevant to his surroundings. The self is replaced by else all the time.

The first feelings he gives while sitting in the train are about the girl wearing enameled finger nails. A little girl with scarlet enameled fingernails asks me what time it is— evidently that's a toy wristwatch she's wearing for fun. And it is fun to wear other

Like date-coloured Sierras with the lines of seams Sketched in and plunging now and then into unfathomable Valleys that can't be deduced by the shape of the person Sitting inside it—me,

What he feels about or for this girl is totally social or impersonal. He reckons his look and position from outside. The girl is not funny in herself. Likewise the poet is not funny in himself. He is funny for other people – and that too with respect to their own judgment. The way and the comparison he uses to convey his opinion about himself is however quite modern. In nature anyhow they are too American to be global. We can say that these are not the feelings of a common man. But they are expressed in so impersonal a way that they look familiar enough to be of a common man. The artistic involvement of the poet in the expression of these feelings makes them poetic and general.

The concept of distance however is dealt with a philosophical touch. It is also enhanced by a brisk comparison.

and just as our way is flat across
Dales and gulches, as though our train were a pencil
Guided by a ruler held against a photomural of the Alps
We both come to see distance as something unofficial
And impersonal yet not without its curious justification
Like the time of a stop watch

The distance is not without its curious justification yet it is unofficial and impersonal because the poet and the girl are not in their usual mood and behaviour. The words 'unofficial' and 'impersonal', however, seem opposites of each other. How one can be unofficial and impersonal at the same time? This is the question that we feel ourselves unable to solve. But this what the poet has taken as a model theme for his poem. The dilemma of a modern man is to be unofficial and impersonal at the same time. The people sitting in the train are unofficial because they are not on their usual places. And they are impersonal because they are involved with the other people going to their particular journeys separately. The distance or journey is like the time of a stop watch – right twice a day. It temporary and momentary. It makes one unofficial and impersonal at the same time. As the distance has a curious justification it is not dimensionless.

Only the wait in stations is vague and Dimensionless, like oneself.

The wait in the stations on the other hand is vague and dimensionless. It is so because it was not calculated and perhaps is never calculated.

How do they decide how much Time to spend in each? One begins to suspect there's no Rule or that it's applied haphazardly.

The dimensionlessness of this wait is conveyed through the extrovert social behaviour of the people. One thinks about others when one is in trouble.

Thematically the poet has shifted himself from relaxed to tense feelings. This is what the modern poets practice very commonly. The themes are mostly sense, emotion and feeling oriented. These elements were there in the old poets also. But they had not made them the bases of their poems. Theirs were mostly thought oriented. It was the poetic thought that inspired them to write not the poetic feelings. The poetic thoughts aroused in them the poetic feelings and they wrote in a spontaneous over flow of powerful feelings. But it used to be thoughts they wrote not feelings. With the modern poets the things are different a little bit. Their feelings inspire them to write. These are the feelings they experience first not the thoughts. This is why the reader of a modern poetry will feel himself sensitively mature not thought wise. The theme of this poem is therefore the feelings of a modern man or so many modern men. The poet has conveyed their feelings through feelings not through thoughts.

Sadness of the faces of children on the platform, Concern of the grownups for connections, for the chances of getting a taxi, since these have no timetable.

It is not the thought that the taxis have no timetable but a feeling. The taxis of course have their timetable but the person speaking this thought is in a state of mind that suffices to convert his thoughts into feelings.

This approach towards themes and topics is very common in modern poets. What makes this approach truly American is the logical way they convey it to you.

You get one if you can find one though in principle
You can always find one,

This is further the style they convey their feelings and thoughts through. The interference of thoughts in the depiction of feelings however is imperceptibly constant. What Ashbery gives as a logical explanation of his feelings is felt as a piece of philosophy.

but the segment of chance
In the circle of certainty is what gives these leaning Tower of Pisa figures their aspect of dogged Impatience, banking forward into the wind.

We can say the style has rendered simple poetic feelings and thoughts to those of philosophical ones. But this is not true. One becomes philosophical when one feels and thinks so deeply. It is in fact the depth of feelings that is conveyed in so philosophical a mode not the philosophy itself.

In short any stop before the final one creates

Clouds of anxiety, of sad, regretful impatience
With ourselves, our lives, the way we have been dealing
With other people up until now. Why couldn't
We have been more considerate?

The outcome of deep feelings at the level of expression or thinking is philosophy. But at the level of feelings it is anxiety. The deeper we feel the more anxious we become.

The anxiety, however, results in an expression of modern attitude towards various directions. It seems as if the modern people are always ready to be annoyed and worried. The variance in thoughts and feelings has made them impatient with their surroundings. They seem no more tolerant and considerate. But actually it has become their second nature. It has become a part of their feelings and expressions. The sooner they get anxious the less latter they get relaxed.

These figures leaving the platform or waiting to board the train are my brothers in a way that really wants to tell me why there is so little Panic and disorder in the world, and so much unhappiness.

The lines though thematic in nature yet indicate the feelings of a person who see these people in such a tense condition. They are not philosophic in any way. They result from the complex interplay of feelings the modern poets are so adept in. This is what Ashbery wants to say – the complexity of modern mind at the level of sensitive sights. It seems as if the modern man starts thinking when gets tense and confused. In the same way the other men start feelings when they see tension and confusion. The problem is not of identity but of individuality. They do not know where they become different from others and similar to them. Why does the poet feel different from what the people at platform do? Because he is sitting in the train and the others are standing outside at the platforms. The difference in their resulted thoughts is the difference in their identity. What the poet feels in the above and the following lines is the crisis of identity. In the first stage he feels them unjustified. But in the second desirous to be one of them.

If I were to get down now to stretch, take a few steps
In the wearying and world-weary clouds of stream like great White apples, might I just through proximity and aping
Of postures and attitudes communicate this concern of mine to them?

The poet's concern to the people is not of individuality but of identity – identity in the sense of similarity. But he is so much conscious of his position that he seems failed to find out any similarity. What he will do to them shall be a kind of aping. The description of the way he will get down and reach the people is however American. This attitude is symbolic of the attitude of whole nation – and perhaps of the whole modern community. The points of concern he wants to communicate are however very individualistic.

That their jagged attitudes correspond to mine,

That their beefing strikes answering silver bells within
My own chest, and that I know, as they do, how the last Stop is the most anxious one of all, though it means Getting home at last, to the pleasures and dissatisfactions of home?
These are the similarities that strengthen the individualities.

It's as though a visible chorus called up the different Stages of the journey, singing about them and being them: The visible chorus in the different stages of journey is not only particular about itself but also about the others. The members of chorus are different and similar at the same time.

Not the people in the station, not the child opposite me
With currant fingernails, but the windows, seen through,
Reflecting imperfectly, ruthlessly splitting open the bluish
Vague landscape like a zipper.

The difference is not that of the position but of scenic background the people sitting in train are covered in and the people waiting at platforms are not.

Each voice has its own Descending scale to put one in one's place at every stage: One need never know where one is Unless one give up listening, sleeping, approaching a small Western town that is nothing but a windmill.

This is how the people sitting in the train and those waiting at the platforms are the same. Their voices put them in one another's place and one loses ones identity in the clouds of anxiety.

Then
The great fury of the end can drop as a solo
Voices tell about it, wreathing it somehow with an aura
Of good fortune and colossal welcomes from the mayor and Citizen's tossing their hats into the air.
To hear them singing you'd think it had already happened
And we had focused back on the furniture of the air.

In this perspective it looks very strange that the difference remained only up to the difference in position. As soon as the passengers get down they forget all their anxieties and worries. A new situation seems waiting to devour them. With the change in positions the people are transformed from one set of feelings to another – from one set of differences to another, from one set of similarities to another. Things seem taking place at momentary scales. The identities and individualities are but momentary. They seem depending on some particular sets of conditions and situations. The advantages and disadvantages are but timely. Change the positions and get the newer sets of identities. What the poet is in the beginning remains no more so in the middle and end. It simply means the people sitting beside in the train and waiting at the platforms will also be different from their present ones.

The poem is so perfect in theme and treatment that it seems dealing with nearly all the modern problems and issues. The life of a modern man is hinted from all sides. The canvas though social in extension yet outlines with domestic contrasts.

Melodic Trains : Critical Evaluation

In the poem Melodic Train the narrator is boarding inside a train. There is a little girl beside him. He can see the scenes and people passing by as the train travels ahead. The journey doesn't end; nor is it any meaningful.

The poem is the sum totality of the ruminations of the speaker about anything that occurs to his mind, when it is provoked (consciously and unconsciously) to think about them. He 'happens to' think about many different types of things, some of which are important and the others are all nonsense. But why should one be selective? The speaker thinks about so many and all unrelated things, but he seems to be (perhaps not very conscious) mainly preoccupied with the ideas about the nature of reality, the human mind, life and anxiety, time and change.

In the first stanza, the random thoughts and ruminations of the man give us an almost clear idea about the occasion. Sitting in a train, he notices a little girl wearing nail polish, when she asks what time it is. He also notices that the child is also wearing a watch, but it is a toy watch, that tells the accurate time twice a day! This kind of description immediately tells us the nature of this special kind of poetic meditation. But, he compares himself with the girl when he says that it is fun for him to wear the kind of clothes he is wearing, as it is fun for the girl to put on a toy watch. But as he looks carelessly at his clothes, his mind indulges in another 'useless' thought; he feels that the stripes on his shirt are submerging into the valleys of the background color and coming out down there again! He links even that fantastic thought with his childhood memory of making a train out of a pencil and letting it run along the edge of a scale (perhaps with an imitative noise!)

In the middle of the third stanza, the subject abruptly changes. He begins to think about 'distance'. This kind of sudden changes of subject matter is typical of the free thought that goes on in the mind all day long. There is no logic, structure, grammar, rules or anything of the sort in the mind. The thought about time merges into a wonder about time. The speaker links time with the stopped watch again; the logic is however inverted. Then he somehow begins to think about 'wait'; "only the wait in stations is dimensionless, like oneself". After some time – it seems that the train has reached another stop – he talks about the sad faces of (homeless?) children. In the typical 'surrealistic' manner, he links (without any logical connection) taxis to the ruminations. Within this seemingly very serious, indeed philosophical concern about chance and the final stop (death) in life, however, there is something that cannot be sanely related to the ongoing strain of thoughts: "…..circle of uncertainty is what gives these leaning tower of Pisa figures their aspect of dogged impatience, banking forward into the wind"!

After these many shifts in the subject of the poem, within stanzas and within the lines, and after many insignificant and unrelated issues coming and going randomly in and out of the poet's mind, he happens to think about one thing that is serious, starting at about line 32, but even that is told in an inverted manner: "why is there so 'little' panic and disorder in the world." He then thinks of how he can convey the many concerns and worries of his mind to others. As we move ahead, it becomes more and more difficult to untangle the threads of thoughts. "They become more and more jumbled, unrelated to each other in any way. What the reader needs to do is to go on guessing what the worry may be in the speaker's mind; and that is possible if we understand that he is a modern man vexed with many problems and a poetic sort of personality who meditates over them in an emotive manner. The poem develops to become more surrealistic; there are more fantastic ideas like "furniture of the air", as we read on.

The title of the poem suggests that it is about a train journey, and it really is in the literal sense. But with the rhythm of the train, there are also the rhythm of the thought process, and the rhythm of some kind of music. The poem is made of a set of unrelated ruminations, somehow anchored on a tentative situation of a train journey and somehow associatively related by the concerns of a man thinking over life, time, and chances and so on. The digressive "train" of thoughts is sometimes childish and sometimes philosophical, as the mind actually is.

The persona compares human gatherings of platforms with chorus singing about various stages of the journey of life. Here he is not concerned about the distinct faces of people standing on stops bout blurring faces lost in the landscape. Both people and scene become one and united. It is an implication of how human life is unified with nature, both being inseparably knitted together. One does not know his position because he is not aware of where he is while the train is moving. The poet now comes down to earth and pictures the atmosphere which surrounds him after he gets off the train; warm colossal welcomes from mayors and citizens and their choric song. He calls it the 'furniture of the air' which is a philosophical remark about human life; it is a dream too short lived.

Major themes in Ashbery's Poetry

Poet and critic, who has deeply influenced American poetry from the 1970s. Ashbery is the best-known poet of the "New York School." His work is characterized by originality, impressionistic elegance, and dark themes of death and terror as evidenced by his lines, 'The locking into place is death'. In the 1950s Ashbery adopted to his poetry techniques used by such abstract painters as Willem Kooning and Jackson Pollock.

In 'The Painter', we see surrealistic techniques employed. He also was interested in the music of John Cage and his poem, 'Melodic Trains' has been written in a musical-musing style. Charles Altieri, in 'Self and Sensibility in Contemporary American Poetry', labels Ashbery "the major poet of our minor age". Ashbery himself commented in 'The Invisible Avant-Garde', that "Artists are no fun once they have been discovered" and it seems that his poetry is an attempt to elude what Eliot called "the lemon squeezing school of criticism". The main purpose of Ashbery's poetry as Ashbery himself asserted is:

"to record a kind of generalized transcript of what's really going on in our minds all day "

The best example is 'Melodic Trains' which is innovative and based on stream of consciousness technique recording a real transcript of our minds. Elusiveness perhaps best describes Ashbery's poetry. His poems are difficult reading for those weaned in the early 20th century poetry. Landscapes dominate Ashbery's poems. His pictures are always laid against the backdrops of vast landscapes, as the train is against the photomural of the Alps in Melodic Trains. Ashbery often writes by assuming a persona i.e. a character who narrates the story but who is distinctly not the poet. As a result we have many different personalities talking to us in his poetry and none of them can be confidently attributed to the poet himself. We have a good example of this in the traveler in a tweed coat and holding a briar pipe in Melodic Trains who may be Ashbery but he is soon lost in a multitude. By assuming this persona, Ashbery is able to bring in all the social voices he needs to paint the landscape of experience in American society. Ashbery substantiated this when he said. "Poetry includes anything and everything". It is very difficult to categorize either Ashbery himself or his poems. Though Ashbery is a 20th Century Post-modernist yet we find so much diversity in respect of his technique and subject-matter that at one end, he seems classic like Elizabethans and at another, he seems much like romanticists such as Wordsworth and Coleridge. But I think he is best reserved for his avant-garde approach as asserted in the following lines from 'The Painter':

> "How could he explain to them his prayer
> That nature, not art, might usurp the canvas?"

Another technique used by Ashbery is to echo other poets, to borrow their style, phrases or images to establish a link or to draw an ironical relation between their and his point of view. He has been known to echo Stevens, Eliot, Pound, and the Romantics. As David Perkins points out in On Ashbery's Predecessors "for both Stevens and Ashbery the imagination creates, destroys and immediately creates another vision of reality". We see this in 'The Painter' where the version of reality of the sea cannot be conveyed in paints and the artist needs a different medium to do that while his concern is that nature and not art might usurp the canvas. Sometimes Ashbery uses voices of other poets. David Perkins points out "he adopts or alludes to a style in order to invoke the tone of feeling associated with it….he exhibits the modern colloquial voices of different types of people". 'The Painter' thus seems to be a direct echo from Browning's many poems on the subject of art. We have echoes here of 'Fra Lippo Lippi' when the protagonist was criticized for finding his subjects in real life and was asked to make his portraits reflect the soul and not the body. Ashbery's subjects are "not doings in the world but in the mind". In Melodic Trains the journey exists in the poet's mind and he mingles humour with pathos, resignation with hope, and maintains his relaxed, and wonderfully imaginative, speech despite premises that might have led to despair. The anguish of the passengers of the train is shared by the poet but their anxiety and "dogged impatience lead the poet to say:

> "These figures leaving
> The platform or waiting to board the train are my brothers…."

Ashbery's poetry brings us to strange metaphors and shifts in descriptions. The clouds of smoke in Melodic Trains are 'wearying and world weary' and look like 'great white apples'. The tweed coat with its pattern is likened to 'date-coloured Sierras' while the lines of seams plunge into 'unfathomable Valleys'. The figures may not always be this difficult as the anxiety-laden passengers on the platform look like Tower of Pisa figures though their 'dogged impatience' makes them look like determined birds 'banking forward into the wind'. In The Painter, the artist chooses his wife as a subject and makes her "vast like ruined buildings". Music is another quality of Ashbery's poetry. The optimistic tone of his poetry makes even trains to be melodic. Melodic Trains describes the anguish and anxiety of the journey in musical notes which end at a fanfare of celebration with music of human voices and clapping and all that.

Finally, John Ashbery is a modern poet who addresses the sensibility of the modern 201st century contemporary man. Themes like music, rebellion, art, consciousness and the habit of wrapping lines into paragraph-like stanza (which penetrate layer after layer deeper into anxieties, doubts, and false beliefs) is a recent invention. He is a craftsman like classicists and imaginative like romanticists and renowned for his simple colloquial diction. His metaphors are sometimes highly metaphysical and his poetry has a natural flow, varying in sound and effect according to the theme. All these make Ashbery a post-modern poet and establish him as a poet on sure foundations of contemporary American poetry.

Richard Wilbur's Selected Poems

Richard Wilbur; 1921-Till Date

Richard Purdy Wilbur (born March 1, 1921) is an American poet and literary translator. He was appointed the second Poet Laureate Consultant in Poetry to the Library of Congress in 1987, and twice received the Pulitzer Prize for Poetry, in 1957 and again in 1989.

Wilbur was born in New York City and grew up in North Caldwell, New Jersey. He graduated from Montclair High School in 1938, having worked on the school newspaper as a student there. He graduated from Amherst College in 1942 and then served in the United States Army from 1943 to 1945 during World War II. After the Army and graduate school at Harvard University, Wilbur taught at Wesleyan University for two decades and at Smith College for another decade. At Wesleyan, he was instrumental in founding the award-winning poetry series of the University Press. He received two Pulitzer Prizes for Poetry and, as of 2009, teaches at Amherst College. He is also on the editorial board of the literary magazine The Common, based at Amherst College.

When only 8 years old, Wilbur published his first poem in John Martin's Magazine. His first book, The Beautiful Changes and Other Poems, appeared in 1947. Since then he has published several volumes of poetry, including New and Collected Poems (Faber, 1989). Wilbur is also a translator, specializing in the 17th century French comedies of Molière and the dramas of Jean Racine. His translation of Tartuffe has become the Standard English version of the play, and has been presented on television twice. In addition to publishing poetry and translations, he has also published several children's books including Opposites, More Opposites, and The Disappearing Alphabet.

Continuing the tradition of Robert Frost and W. H. Auden, Wilbur's poetry finds illumination in everyday experiences. Less well-known is Wilbur's foray into lyric writing. He provided lyrics to several songs in Leonard Bernstein's 1956 musical, Candide, including the famous "Glitter and Be Gay" and "Make Our Garden Grow." He has also produced several unpublished works including as "The Wing" and "To Beatrice".

His honors include the 1983 Drama Desk Special Award and the PEN Translation Prize for his translation of The Misanthrope, both the Pulitzer Prize for Poetry and the National Book Award for Things of This World (1956), the Edna St Vincent Millay award, the Bollingen Prize, and the Chevalier, Ordre des Palmes Académiques. He was elected a Fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences in 1959. In 1987 Wilbur became the second poet, after Robert Penn Warren, to be named U.S. Poet Laureate after the position's title was changed from Poetry Consultant. In 1988, he won the Aiken Taylor Award for Modern American Poetry and then in 1989 he won a second Pulitzer, this one for his New and Collected Poems. On October 14, 1994, he received the National Medal of Arts from President Bill Clinton. He also received the PEN/Ralph Manheim Medal for Translation in 1994. In 2003, Wilbur was inducted into the American Theater Hall of Fame. In 2006, Wilbur won the Ruth Lilly Poetry Prize. In 2010 he won the National Translation Award for the translation of The Theatre of Illusion by Pierre Corneille. In 2012, Yale conferred an honorary degree, Doctor of Letters, on Wilbur.

After the Last Bulletins

Introduction and Theme: - Wilbur is best known for his poetic intelligence and philosophy of life and this is well explicit in all his poems at large and in After the Last Bulletins in particular. Wilbur points to a very important fact of life of what is significant today may become insignificant tomorrow. He takes the newspapers for example and says that the newspapers which are fresh today and most welcome for and accepted for reading, become stale and useless the other day.

The poem is pictorial in nature, an example of imagery, which is a typical quality of Wilbur. He tells us what happens to the newspapers after they have been read thrown at different places. The editors publish the papers and fall into a delicious slumber, but their printed newspapers toss and tumble all over the city, get splashed by mud and torn by the spikes of railings. They are carried away by wind where it flows. They travel through streets, gutters and deserted places and faded insignificantly into nothingness. The papers, which are read enthusiastically in front of the eyes and placed securely on the shelves, are trampled down by feet after they have become outdated.

This is not the whole story. They are again printed and held important like the other day and this cycle keeps repeating all the times. The poet says that life is not motionless or stagnant. The old order is replaced by the new order. The old generation must give way for the new one. What is important today will fall into nothingness tomorrow. That is the way of the world. Things have worked the same way and will continue to be the same till the end. Things will keep like this forever. What is important in life is to keep pace with it.

A Critique of After The Last Bulletins

Introduction: - Richard Wilbur is a modern poet and chooses modern themes and topics. He lives in the scientific age, but he doesn’t speak about the scientific discoveries. He discusses facts of life. After the Last Bulletins is about various facts of life. The most importance aspect is of waste. Human efforts are geared towards collecting tons of information and provide it for the common mind. The people receive information and study it casually, throw it heartlessly. They don’t enjoy reading the newspapers.

This printing of newspapers is cycled every day and it is taken to be routine matter rather than a serious one. Even this producing of newspaper is not done for a noble cause, perhaps only for the sake of routine or business itself. There seems to be a waste everywhere: in information technology, scientific knowledge and economic productivity. After The Last Bulletins criticizes man's preoccupation with modern media. Media has become very important in the 20th century and today its importance cannot be denied.

Though the poem is about Last Bulletins and the subsequent results yet it raises certain issues about the facts of life ranging from ignorance to knowledge, the blessing of sleep, waste in human life, degrading of human society and complexity of human nature. Some of these themes are obvious and are not easy to find out, but the rest of them difficult to understand thought the poem because of its ambiguity as is the case with most American poems because they are too intellectually designed for a common mind.

Development of Thought

Abundance of knowledge and ignorance: - The poet speaks about the abundance of knowledge in the modern age. The production of newspapers and their presence everywhere actually symbolizes the abundance of knowledge scattered around and easily accessible to human mind. We do utilize this information and keep ourselves in touch with day-to-day happenings, but it is the irony of our life that despite this craze for gathering and collecting information, man's knowledge of truth has really not improved. Man is as ignorant as he was before this abundance. Even if he has acquired this knowledge through various sources, he uses it in counter attitudes and opposites. We do collect facts, but we ignore the spiritual reality behind them. So we can say that man has advanced in the field of information technology, but he is spiritually declined. The more information he has, the more ignorant he has come to be. Despite this abundance of information which is flying all around, human nature is not understood and real peace is sought in the everyday activities.

Emergence of a New World:-

> After the last bulletins the windows darken
> And the whole city founders readily and deep,
> Sliding on all its pillows
> To the thronged Atlantis of personal sleep,

The ocean of sleep is very calm like the Atlantis. In sleep, a new world of ideas open up in which the poem addresses some issues. The concept of new world and a new power is furthered through the imagery of winds, which rise as soon as we sleep and turn off our lights. In sleep, a new word emerges. This is the world of agitations and questions, which arise from our inner self in sleep, which challenge the people who are proud of their knowledge. Perhaps it is due to these that we drown ourselves in daily activities to avoid the prick of our conscience. In the world of nature, a new power is awakened and begins to act. The furious activities of the wind defy all the false achievements, vanities and superfluities of daily life. The wind shows absolute disregard for the newspapers and magazines of which we are proud. The wind ruthlessly tears them into shreds, flinging them. This new world in sleep questions our knowledge and challenges our achievements and shows powerless we are in nature.

Wilbur's naturalism is fully explicit here when mocks at the collective knowledge of human existence and renders it a waste in front of the mystical and religious consciousness, which should be the ultimate aim of our life.

Corruption of Media:-

> And the wind rises. The wind rises and bowls
> The day's litter of news in the alleys. Trash
> Tears itself on the railings,
> Soars and falls with a soft crash,

The winds rise and hurl the newspapers into the streets. Newspapers become insignificant and before the power of nature. Nature is truth and media is corruption and falsehood. When falsehood strikes against truth, it perishes. The same is the case with the newspapers, they are torn apart by the winds and battered against the surfaces and the newspapers are unable to defend themselves, because they are corrupt and strengthless. Thus the winds reject all the media. They fly like uncontrolled flight.

Vanities and Real Character: - The flying newspapers reach the park where we find plenty of human beings who have been symbolized here as the statue and the winds slap the newspapers on the face of the statue, as the poet says,

> Unruly flights
> Scamper the park, and taking a statue for dead
> Strike at the positive eyes,
> Batter and flap the stolid head
> And scratch the noble name. In empty lots
> Our journals spiral in a fierce noyade

Statues are motionless symbols of human vanity. The wind attacks the statue and slaps their faces. Here lies a lesson for man that decline is our ultimate fate. Greatness is too sought in character, not in status otherwise they will be attacked by nature. Characters, good behavior, attitude and action will keep us alive even after death. Weather and winds demolish constantly. They don't accept our standard of greatness and reputation. Greatness lies in character and morality rather than in actual appearances and motionless outlook.

Immortality of Human Existence: - In empty spaces, newspapers gather our ideas, notions and general facts into the blank spaces. All the things in columns are meaningless. All the natural elements are cursing human beings. The law of nature is that we are mortals. Immortality is not for publicity. To whom are we propagating that we are immortal and after all why? We are violating the laws of nature. Night is always heavy on mortals if there is no good in us. We fear darkness as suggested in the following line:

After the last bulletins the windows darken

We are mortal. That is truth and reality. We must accept reality and modern world is the world of appearances. We even try to present realities as appearances.

Insignificance of Newspapers: - Newspapers are important in our life, but the poet challenges their importance. The poet discusses that there is no point of printing the papers because a lot of energy is consumed and wasted in their production, as their ultimate goal is destruction. The newspapers go waste. They lack the universality of literary taste. Works of literature abide even today after many centuries. Shakespeare's Dramas, Milton's poetry and Jane Austen or Dickens' novels are afresh even after centuries. The only reason being they were mostly written for public awareness or societal change and development. They are universal, but the newspapers are insignificant because their basic aim is propagation, instigation, plot mongering and rigging. They are insignificant; therefore, they are tossed about in the dirty places of town.

Conclusion: - 'Wilbur is a rebel'. This is an apt and just assessment of Tony Heywood. Wilbur's subjective bent is that he challenges the established norms. Here again, he satirizes the newspapers. But he also discusses that change is the spice of life otherwise, something significant today will become insignificant tomorrow. If a proper charm is not maintained in the quality of a commodity, its value diminishes. This is what we can say about After The Last Bulletins in economic terms. However, the poem is a good example of modern poetry and perfect representative of Wilbur's subject matter and technique. His imagery is unique and striking. The mundane topic of newspapers, exploited for serious purpose is the ample proof of Wilbur's genius in this poem.

Marginalia

Introduction and Theme: - The poem is philosopising an important reality of life and puts forward his statement which is scientifically true that all forces of life are centrifugal (i.e. tending away from centralisation, as of authority). The force of life is pressurised to the borders or poetically speaking, to the margins of life. Because our energies and qualities lie in the center of life, we cannot utilize then in the best possible manner. Our dreams, visions, desires do lie in the center, but it is a reality of life that their achievements are centrifugal. The reality of life is developing or progressing from the center outwards.

We have our dreams, desires, myths and visions of a standard life, but we cannot materialize our dreams because the force of life is centrifugal and all our dreams lie in the center of our mind.

The basic idea of the poem is that things concentrate at the edges … all other details seem to present of a cinematic presentation of the idea. The poet gives an example of pond, then of sleep and finally concludes that our sleep takes us away from the world of reality to the world of imagination which is replete with all sorts of desires, but we cannot perform during sleep to get our desires. The end of our journey is death and our energies are expanding towards this goal.

A Critique of Marginalia

Introduction

> Things concentrate at the edges; the pond-surface
> Is bourne to fish and man

Things concentrate at the edges is the basic message of the poem. The poet brings round this point to his readers in a graphic manner using the example of water pond and sleep both of which are examples common enough for an average mind to understand. But the philosophical point, which the poet makes, is unique and seldom touched upon by the poets. This is a typical quality of modern poets especially Americans who tend always tend to choose striking topics for their poems. Marginalia tends to present the reality that things exert their pressures to the edges and this is amply proven by the men and fish along with other botanical life in the water which are driven by the centrifugal force to the edges rather than staying in the center (centripetal). Sleep also takes us from the conscious world to the unconscious world, which is an example of centrifugal force in life.

The poem has imaginative quality along with realistic touches. There seems to be a clash between imagination and reality. It is a fact that center is important for the generation of products and results, but all its energies are pressured to the edges, so for the existence of life, life must pace along with time and naturally progress ahead for better and standard life.

The progress and advancement of life lie in the coping with the rim of whirlpool rather than enjoying its center.

Development of Thought

An Attack on the traditional concept of Nucleus: - Wilbur is not simply a poet, but a philosopher who attacks the traditional concept of central significance of nucleus. Traditionally people have upheld the importance of center and nucleus. That is why Theodore Roethke hails Wilbur in the followings words, "Not a graceful mind - that's a mistake - but a mind of grace, an altogether different and higher thing."

Scientifics have discovered that the death of nucleus is the death of whole cell. They have believed in the centripetal forces rather than the centrifugal ones, but Wilbur challenges and says:

Things concentrate at the edges;

What he means is that complexity, richness, beauty and ugliness of the world exists not at its center but at its boundaries. It is the boundaries, which have held the center tight. Though the center is an emissary of light, knowledge and development yet our riches are centrifugal in the words of Wilbur. So the most important area for progress is not the center but the edges, which are ever expanding, evolutionary and revolutionary.

The Limits of Man and Animal: - He uses a number of images to drive home his idea. He uses zoological and botanical imagery very common in modern American poetry introduced by the advancement of science. Wilbur says,

The pond-surface
Is bourne to fish and man

He uses the image of pond, its surface and edges. Edges serve as the ultimate boundaries separating the world of the fish from that of human beings – the world of land differed from the waterly world. It is not the centeral water of the pond which defines the limits of man and the fish. Their limits are symbolised by the borders – the edge of the pond.

Not only this zoological, but also the botanical life such as slime, moss, impure vegetation or décor, music or pattered light, in other words all the beauties and ugliness all concentrate at the edges as ascertained by Wilbur in the following lines:

In textile scum and damask light, on which The lily-pads are set; and there are also Inlaid ruddy twigs, becalmed pine-leaves,
Air-baubles, and the chain mail of froth

Dreams vs Reality: - The poem nicely presents the theme of dream and reality, knowledge and ignorance, sleep and everyday life, fact and imagination and the opposite forces:

Descending into sleep (as when the night-lift Falls past a brilliant floor), we glimpse a sublime

Décor and hear, perhaps, a complete music,
But this evades us, as in the night meadows
The crickets' million round song dies away

The poet supports a state of mind which is conscious and unconscious at the same time, half-way between sleep and awake, imagination and reality. Again these points ascertain that the deeper we go in sleep, or higher we ascent to imagination we will find the reality at the edges not in the center. Music heard becomes appealing, the more we head towards the farthest boundaries of the song and hear that a chorus is singing for us.

Complexity and High End of Life: - As Marginalia is a thought-provoking poem, the poet marginalizes and philosophizes life. According to the poet, life is an ocean, which ends in a whirlpool. All our qualities are centrifugal and cannot stay in the center; they must have an outlet towards the borders for sustenance.

Our riches are centrifugal; men compose
Daily, unwittingly, their final dreams,
And those are our own voices whose remote
Consummate chorus rides on the whirlpool's rim,
Past which we flog our sails, toward which we drift,
Plying our trades, in hopes of a good drowning.

Whatever do, whatever our professional skills, interests and hobbies are, life finally moves towards the whirlpool of death. Each human being in life has a tiny boat, which is set on sail on the ocean of life. E very one is using his particular skills plies his boat. He weaves a web of his future dreams and desires. These visions and dreams are out human experiences. The goals and targets are set for us and they call us for a deceptive center. We drown while moving towards the unknown region of death.

Style, Imagery and Technique: - Wilbur's style is modern and perfect. The sentences are short, the poem runs like an essay giving an introduction, presenting and developing an argument and concluding the presented material with a final message. Wilbur has touched upon a scientific topic and reinforced it with natural imagery. The scenic imagery of water pond and the things grown upon them has been fully exploited not only for the aesthetic pleasure for a romantic mind, but also supporting the main argument presented. The image of sleep is superbly presented to give the poem a dream-like quality and further enhance the point discussed earlier. Doubtlessly, Wilbur technically proves himself a perfect craftsman in this poem. Technically, the poem is a masterpiece of English literature.

Conclusion: - Marginalia is a state of mind catalysed the social changes and hybrid cultures. Though we are awake and asleep which are the two contrary states of human mind, but the best ends can be achieves in hypnotic states. Life is going on and its force which is centrifugal will continue drawing things at its edges, but until and unless exploited properly, our riches will only remain dreams and visions and we cannot materialize them. In society, everything is in motion and the best resources lie at the edges. The glory of man is to lift himself up to the standard and achieve that Sublime and Décor that Wilbur speaks of. Though the margins are at the highest point, yet diligent and constant state of mind can achieve that unattainable target.

Still Citizen Sparrow

Introduction and Theme: - Still Citizen Sparrow is a direct shot to the modern civilized people who uphold the views that vulture is an ugly and evil animal. The poet counters the argument and believes that although vulture is believed to be a filthy and dirty animal, yet she is endowed with the rarest qualities ever gifted to any other bird.

It is vulture, which hovers the whole sky and watches natural environment and keeps it clean. Vulture was also present at the time of Prophet Noah when he preached his people and was rejected by them. Ordered by Allah, he built a boat, his people jeered at him, but he put all samples of living organism in his boat. The Great Deluge appeared and destroyed every non-believer. The same vulture was with him when Noah's boat landed at the mountain and initiated a new age of enlightenment. People never come to terms with vulture, but the poet gives a long speech containing good words on the qualities of this animal. The poet avers that some animals though look ugly outside, yet are beautiful for their traits. The real beauty is of good action, not of outer physical charm.

Because vulture builds a new world by cleaning the environment, it is associated with the prophet Noah who also built a new world. In this way, vulture becomes symbolic of the beginning of a new world of faith and gives us message that we must also be builder of a new world in which we should contribute as much as we can.

A CRITIQUE OF STILL CITIZEN SPARROW

Introduction: - The poet supports the creature, which is thought to be the ugliest creature. The poet attacks the common perception of people about this bird and presents his arguments in favour of this animal. He gives the bird masculine qualities and addresses him as 'He' rather than 'It', which shows the importance of vulture in the poet's mind and in the human kingdom. Though vulture looks ugly, bald-headed and always living on dead rotten flesh of various stinking animals, yet it has a beauty which no animal, bird or human being can match. That virtuous or beautiful quality is cleanliness, which according to Islam is half completion of faith.

The Sparrow is still citizen only outwardly beautiful, but performing no practical function in society. On the other hand, the great responsibility of disposing of the city waste is left on the vulture. The also criticizes the modern man who whose angle of vision needs to corrected and who may welcome clean and beautiful guests at his home, but shun the trash collectors, as a result of whose efforts, the environment is made clean and beautiful.

The bravery of vulture is also evident when the whole earth was submerged in water and this vulture flew and flew over the surface of water, this venture could have killed the sparrow, but it was vulture who sacrificed for them all (other animals, bird and humans beings) and made the earth once again a living abode by cleaning the rotten stinking flesh. This is the real inward virtue of vulgar for which he should be remembered rather than for his physical appearance.

Development of Thought

The physical description of the vulture: - If we see the vulture cruising in the sky, its movement is so attractive, its wings so wide, it looks almost regal. It doesn't have to move its wings. None among the birds is so powerful and fine vulture. The poet says,

> And at the tall
> Tip of the sky lie cruising. Then you'll see
> That no more beautiful bird is in heaven's height,
> No wider more placid wings, no watch fuller flight;
> He shoulders nature there, the frightfully free,

It seems so free and bearing the burden of the world upon his shoulders because its wings and shoulders are so strong. The ordinary world of birds cannot imagine the way it flies up in the air. The poet's description of the vulture develops a soft corner among the human beings for the vulture and we begin to love this bird for his not only physical qualities, but also moral virtues.

Double Standards of People: - Still Citizen Sparrow is an animal poet is highly symbolic and satirical of modern man's angle of perception, which he is habitual to adopt. The poet says,

> Pardon him, you
> Who dart in the orchard aisles, for it is he > Devours death, mocks mutability,
> Has heart to make an end, keeps nature new.

The poet attacks the sparrow angrily and tells the sparrow to mind his language about the vulture and be respectful to him. The sparrow lives in orchards, wide and open furrows. How can you judge the real worth of vulture? Ordinary people and birds are afraid of the rotten dead meat of animals; vulture is courageous and takes up steps to perform the last rituals of the dead beings. But we are timid; we stay back and simply mock the people who perform such great duties. We are selfish and cowardly and they are brave and responsible. It is a tribute to vulture because he cleans what we have made dirty and evil by our own actions and actually the dirt have expelled from our existence and so we are dirty, not those who are also forward to clean. This is their highness and dignity and they deserve our respect. These people include: gutter cleaners, dusters, trash collectors and sweepers who don't find respectable status in our society while they are more respectable than us. We only dandy our beauty and boast of our physical appearance and don't even imagine how filthy dirty nature will become without their existence.

The poem exposes the double standards of people. We respect those who spread rubbish, but hate those who clean it. Actually, dirty are the people who spread dirt and respectable are those who clean it. The whole society is in disorder.

Religious Symbolism: - The poet uses religious symbolism to bring round the same theme and point. He says,

Thinking of Noah, child heart, try to forget
How for so many bedlam hours his saw Soured the song of birds with its wheezy gnaw,
And the slam of his hammer all the day beset

Noah was regarded mad by people, but the hero's intelligence and understanding is far more superior to that of an ordinary man. The other birds kept on chirping, but the hero was not deflected from his mission. People called him crazy, but he didn't stop. So man should be committed to his mission. Self-restrain is important. Noah's journey was not pleasant when he looked down he saw destruction and death everywhere. It was only a heroic mind that could feel this pain. The poet through this religious symbol wants to bring before us an important point. The world is divided into two kinds of people: those who observe and those who perform, those who talk and those of act, those of sleep and those who wake and those of think and those who act. It is unto us what line of race we want to choose.

Talk and Action: - Sparrow symbolizes talk and vulture symbolizes action. Throughout the poem, the poet uses various words to keep the sparrow shut, which is at all times babbling and chirping aimlessly. The poet satirically attacks the sparrow,

Pardon him, you
Who dart in the orchard aisles, for it is he Devours death, mocks mutability
And he further says,
4–.Forgive the hero, you who would have died
000070p-
To Ararat

Action speaks louder than words could be taken as the message of the poem. The sparrow's repeated chirpings produce no healthy effect on the environment; rather it may distract the attention of those who are busy with their studies or engaged in a serious task. Merely talks bring no results; action in human life is important which brings development and welfare. Our nature is constantly in change, this change causes pollution, filth and stench, which can only be resolved with proper action. Vulture shoulders responsibilities effectively and puts humanity to shame for its passivity and lethargic state.

Style, Technique and Imagery: - Wilbur's approach in this poem is fresh and fine. He uses animal imagery like Ted Hughes, but his treatment is different. The symbol of Noah bracketed with the Vulture is superb and reinforces the concept. The poem has been divided into four line stanzas each one bringing up a new aspect of vulture, his qualities and function. The rhyme scheme is striking and classical. The four-line stanza rhymes as a b b a. The diction is forceful and proves the poet's point of view effectively. The diction and use of such words as: lumber, cruise, rotten office, frightfully free, the slam of his hammer and rocked give a cinematic vision of the overall story of the vulture's world.

Conclusion: - Still Citizen Sparrow is a thought-provoking poem and proves intellectual genius of Wilbur who is famous for writing, which we may call intellectual poems. The poet believes that we must give the devil his due. Though vulture is physical ugly and is found on trash eating dirty items, but there are also two sides to everything and we must take up the good side. We must look at the bright side of the picture rather than the black one.

Adrienne Rich's Selected Poems

Adrienne Rich; 1929-2012

Poet and essayist Adrienne Rich was one of America's foremost public intellectuals. Widely read and hugely influential, Rich's career spanned seven decades and has hewed closely to the story of post-war American poetry itself. She has progressed in life (and in her poems) from young widow and disenchanted formalist, to spiritual and rhetorical convalescent, to feminist leader and leader of a newly-defined female literature."

Beginning with Snapshots of a Daughter-in-Law: Poems 1954-1962 (1963), Rich's work has explored issues of identity, sexuality and politics; her formally ambitious poetics have reflected her continued search for social justice, her role in the anti-war movement, and her radical feminism. Utilizing speech cadences, enjambment and irregular line and stanza lengths, Rich's open forms have sought to include ostensibly "non-poetic language into poetry."

Adrienne Rich was born in 1929 in Baltimore, Maryland. Her father was a renowned pathologist and professor at Johns Hopkins; her mother was a former concert pianist. Rich's upbringing was dominated by the intellectual ambitions her father had for her, and Rich excelled at academics, gaining her degree from Radcliffe University. In 1953 she married Alfred Conrad, an economics professor at Harvard. She had three children with him, but their relationship began to fray in the 1960s as Rich became politically aware—she later stated that "the experience of motherhood was eventually to radicalize me." Rich's work of the 1960s and '70s begins to show the signs of that radicalization. Moving her family to New York in 1966, Rich's collections from this period include Necessities of Life (1966), Leaflets (1969), and The Will to Change (1971), all of which feature looser lines and radical political content. David Zuger, inPoet and Critic, described the changes in Rich's work: "The twenty-year-old author of painstaking, decorous poems that are eager to 'maturely' accept the world they are given becomes a ... poet of prophetic intensity and 'visionary anger' bitterly unable to feel at home in a world 'that gives no room / to be what we dreamt of being.'"

Conrad died in 1970 and six years later Rich moved in with her long-term partner Michelle Cliff. That same year she published her controversial, influential collection of essays Of Woman Born: Motherhood as Institution and Experience (1976). The volume, following on the heels of her masterpiece Diving Into the Wreck, ensured Rich's place in the feminist pantheon. Rich was criticized by some for her harsh depictions of men; however, the work she produced during this period is often seen as her finest. In Ms. Erica Jong noted that "Rich is one of the few poets who can deal with political issues in her poems without letting them degenerate into social realism." Focusing on the title poem, Jong also denies that Rich is anti-male. A portion of the poem reads: "And I am here, the mermaid whose dark hair / streams black, the merman in his armored body. / We circle silently / about the wreck. / We dive into the hold. / I am she: I am he." Jong commented, "This stranger-poet-survivor carries 'a book of myths' in which her/his 'names do not appear.' These are the old myths ... that perpetuate the battle between the sexes. Implicit in Rich's image of the androgyne is the idea that we must write new myths, create new definitions of humanity which will not glorify this angry chasm but heal it."

Through over sixty years of public introspection and examination of society and self, Adrienne Rich has chronicled her journey in poetry and prose. "I began as an American optimist," she commented in Credo of a Passionate Skeptic, "albeit a critical one, formed by our racial legacy and by the Vietnam War...I became an American Skeptic, not as to the long search for justice and dignity, which is part of all human history, but in the light of my nation's leading role in demoralizing and destabilizing that search, here at home and around the world. Perhaps just such a passionate skepticism, neither cynical nor nihilistic, is the ground for continuing."

Diving into the Wreck

Introduction and Main Theme: -Diving into the Wreck is Adrienne Rich's most celebrated poem. It is unanimously called epic of our modern times. The poet gives a description of the sea and her dive into the sea, the various things observed and particular experiences underwent are all beautifully narrated and described. The poem is also adventurous because it I based on the search for a wreck.

Here Diving into the Wreck is not a simple adventure story, but Rich has a very serious account to relate. On the onset, it is a story of a diver going into the water to observe a wreck, but as the seawater is deep and mysterious so are the meanings of the poem. Basically the poem is the struggle for women rights in the male-dominated society. The poem is representative of not only Rich's ideals, but also the changing conditions of American at the time when the poem was written.

Rich becomes androgyny [1] and wants to observe the damage that was done to the female race and the treasures that prevail in their rights. Her struggle for the voice of rights is single-handed.

[1]. Androgyny: medical term that shows characteristics of both sexes – male and female. Rich becomes Androgynous: again a medical term relating to or exhibiting both female and male sex organs but with a predominantly female appearance.

A Critique of Diving into the Wreck

Introduction: - Wrecked ship. Ruins of a wrecked ship at the bottom of the sea are explored in "Diving into the Wreck," the title poem of the collection. Although it is not named, the Atlantic Ocean is probably the sea that houses the wreck that the speaker of the poem explores. The wreck and the sea are not named because they must be inclusive, not exclusive. The primary symbol of the poem, representing unrecovered female history, seeks to identify with all its readers, as the final stanza reinforces:

> We are, I am, you are > a book of myths in which > our names do not appear

The image of the sea is a metaphor of life as sea is full of wreckages; the world too is full of ruins. One glance around will bring back countless pictures of destruction. Diving into the Wreck provides the angle of perception about the wreck from both the male and the female side. It is androgyny that investigates the wreck, not female or male alone. The poem is hailed as an epic of the modern times. It statement is fully justified by the technical merits of the poem and the subject matter.

Development of Thought

Quest for Fact or Myth: - According to Margaret Atwood, the wreck she is diving into, in the very strong title poem, is the wreck of obsolete myths, particularly myths about men and women. She is journeying to something that is already in the past, in order to discover for herself the reality behind the myth,

> the wreck and not the story of the wreck
> the thing itself and not the myth."

What she finds is part treasure and part corpse, and she also finds that she herself is part of it, a "half-destroyed instrument." As explorer she is detached; she carries a knife to cut her way in, cut structures apart; a camera to record; and the book of myths itself, a book which has hitherto had no place for explorers like herself.

This quest-the quest for something beyond myths, for the truths about men and women, about the "I" and the "You," the He and the She, or more generally (in the references to wars and persecutions of various kinds) about the powerless and the powerful--is presented throughout the book through a sharp, clear style and through metaphors which become their own myths. At their most successful the poems move like dreams, simultaneously revealing and alluding, disguising and concealing. The truth, it seems, is not just what you find when you open a door: it is itself a door, which the poet is always on the verge of going through.

Depth of the Poem: - According to Nancy Milford, In Diving into the Wreck she enters more deeply than ever before into female fantasy; and these are primal waters, life-giving and secretive in the special sense of not being wholly revealed. The female element and a diver may dive to plunder or to explore.

> First having read the book of myths,

and checked the edge of the knife-blade,
I put on the body-armor of black rubber the absurd flippers
the grave and awkward mask.
Alone and crippled by her equipment, she is descending, she is having to do this, and there is no one to tell me when the ocean will begin

And even though the mask of the diver is powerful the point of the dive is not the exercise of power in self-defense.

the sea is not a question of power
I have to learn alone to turn my body without force in the deep element

She came "to explore the wreck." And what is the wreckage; is it of marriage, or of sex, or of the selfhood within each? Is it the female body, her own? This is the place.

And I am here, the mermaid whose dark hair streams black, the merman in his armored body
We circle silently about the wreck
we dive into the hold.
I am she: I am he

Moving in deeply private images, circling darkly and richly into the very sources of her poetry, she is, as she says, "coming-home to. . .sex, sexuality, sexual wounds, sexual identity, sexual politics":

we are the half-destroyed instruments that once held to a course
the water-eaten log the fouled compass
We are, I am, you are
by cowardice or courage
the one who find our way back to this scene
carrying a knife, a camera
a book of myths

our names do not appear.

Dreaming of the person within the poem: she walking toward me, naked, swaying, bending down, her dark long hair falling forward of its own weight like heavy cloth shielding my face and her own, her full breasts brushing my cheek, moving toward my mouth. The dream is the invention of the dreamer, and the content of the dream moves in symbols of sustenance and of comfort. The hands of that diving woman become our own hands, reaching out, touching, holding; not in sex but in deliverance. That is the potency of her poetry: it infuses dreams, it makes possible connections between people in the face of what seems to be irrevocable separateness, it forges an alliance between the poet and the reader. The power of her woman's voice crying out, I am: surviving, sustaining, continuing, and making whole

we move together like underwater plants

The meaning of Wreck: - Deborah Pope in finding the meaning of the wreck states, the wreck represents the battered hulk of the sexual definitions of the past, which Rich, as an underwater explorer, must search for evidence of what can be salvaged. Only those who have managed to survive the wreck--women isolated from any meaningful participation or voice in forces that led to the disaster--are in a position to write its epitaph and their own names in new books.

Rich's Approach to the Wreck: - "Diving into the Wreck" presents a less privatized, more mythologized version of the theme in "Waking in the Dark." Rich again creates a setting that merges the ruinous state of modern civilization with the damaged sexuality of the self. The poet begins the exploration alone, but she suggests that others have risked such journeys toward clarification. In a passage that Rich and most readers now find problematic, the solitary explorer modulates into an androgyne as she approaches the wreck:

the mermaid whose dark hair
streams black, the merman in his armored body
... I am she: I am he....

Speaking, feeling, and seeing for both sexes, the poet wants to witness

"the wreck and not the story of the wreck
the thing itself and not the myth."

Margaret Atwood notes that the wreck is "beyond salvation though not beyond understanding" (239), but the poem actually offers very little analysis of the wreck and quite a bit of explanation of how the wreck is approached, how the inquiry is carried out, and how the explorer understands the mission and her/himself. Other than describing the wreck of the self and of culture as the drowned face" and the half-destroyed instruments

that once held to a course
the water-eaten log / the fouled compass,

The poem focuses on the process and attitude of the explorer. Even the motive is vague and not necessarily pure:

We are, I am, you are
by cowardice or courage
the one who find our way back to this scene
carrying a knife, a camera
a book of myths
our names do not appear.

Diving into the Wreck offers a metaphor for the crisis and necessity that could only be called a detached "it" in "Trying to Talk with a Man": "Coming out here we are up against it" (my emphasis). Yet as Cary Nelson has noted, "Diving into the Wreck" is hardly a concrete or thoroughly grounded poem since the androgyny it supplies oversimplifies sexuality and is itself a myth (156).

For Nelson, the poem "demonstrates that one can suppress difficult feelings by mythologizing them" in "stylized and abstract" ways (156); however, the poem's attention to the process of exploring the wreck and not to the analysis of the wreck is significant for both Rich's feminist theory and her poetic practice. The poem has cleared ground, and unlike "When We Dead Awaken," it stops before it reconstructs anything, satisfied with creating a new signifying space rather than overly desperate to fill it. In fact, the ending returns us to the beginning of the poem and prepares for another exploration by again mentioning the knife, the camera, and the book. As Werner says, the poem continually makes ready "for the descent which we are, then and now and perpetually, just beginning" (175). In its mythologized, abstract way, "Diving into the Wreck" conveys the dialectic between the epic feminist vision and the lyric feminist vision, as the diver and the wreck of culture coincide in the image of the "drowned face." While the modulation of the lyric "I" into the androgynous "we" presents problems, the strategy allows Rich to avoid the potential egotism of realistic self-dramatization and to expose the myth that the absence of "our names" signifies we are somehow unafflicted by the reductive sexual ideologies that prevail. Like many others in the volume, this poem raises the question of origin, of "where the split began" ("Waking in the Dark"): the poem privileges neither an external nor an internal site as the source of bifurcation, and it avoids hypostatizing a lost unity. Even the androgyny of the diver suggests not an original unity but the common bond of incompleteness, loss, and disrepair shared by all selves.

Past and Present: -The better poems of Adrienne Rich always exact a certain price from anyone willing to participate in their vision. This is also true in the case of Diving into the Wreck. The kind of political awareness she advocates may cost a loss of personal freedom. The voyage into new territory may require us to adopt a generalized, mythic identity. The reader who accepts her vision uncritically has probably repressed the real anxieties accompanying self- recognition and personal change. The enthusiasm for her efforts to create a myth of androgynous sexuality is a typical case. To applaud the androgynous psyche or to announce this as its historical moment is easier than actually living out its consequences: "I am here, the mermaid whose dark hair / streams back, the merman in his armored body ... I am she: I am he." We all have more varied sexual impulses than we can act on, but will Rich's romanticized androgynous figure, "whose drowned face sleeps with open eyes," help bring them any closer to realization? While that is not a criterion one would ordinarily apply to all poetry, it is relevant in Rich's case. Unlike Roethke, she cannot take pleasure in the powerlessness of poetic solutions to social and historical conflicts. Her poetry continually testifies to her need to work out possible modes of human existence verbally, to achieve imaginatively what cannot yet be achieved in actual relationships. Moreover, she hopes that poetry can transform human interaction. Yet perhaps that is not, after all, the point, at least in poems like "Diving into the Wreck," despite its call for "the thing itself and not the myth." For what we have here is the myth, as Rich herself has now implicitly acknowledged: "There are words I cannot choose again: humanism androgyny". "Such words," she goes on to say, "have no shame in them." They do not embody the history of anguish, repression, and self-control that precedes them. "Their glint is too shallow"; they do not describe either the past or the life of the present. As Rich has recently written of bisexuality, "Such a notion blurs and sentimentalizes the actualities within which women have experienced sexuality; it is the old liberal leap across the tasks and struggles of here and now." Indeed "Diving into the Wreck" demonstrates that one can suppress difficult feelings by mythologizing them. It may be that both Rich and her readers are relieved to have their fear and their desire conjoined in symbols so stylized and abstract.

Conclusion: - Words are purposes and maps. They are intentions we have toward each other, whether we are aware of those intentions or not; they are ways toward and away from each other. This is such a brilliant and beautiful poem, one of Rich's best. (The other great one for me is "Splitting.") There is deep sadness here, and a sense of being broken by a life that is much more powerful and vaster than our intentions had led us to believe when we thought we could set goals and reach them. So what can we do? Throw away the myths and seek what treasure remains in the devastation of our dreams. And the treasure is there, obscured, but there. The fact that the book of myths will remain, but our names will not appear in it is very hopeful. Further, I believe that the poem is one of the great poems of our time. It is a poem of disaster, with a willingness to look into it deeply and steadily, to learn whatever dreadful information it contains, to accept it, to be part of it, not as victim, but as survivor. The wreck represents the battered hulk of the sexual definitions of the past, which Rich, as an underwater explorer, must search for evidence of what can be salvaged. Only those who have managed to survive the wreck--women isolated from any meaningful participation or voice in forces that led to the disaster--are in a position to write its epitaph and their own names in new books.

Aunt Jennifer's Tigers

Introduction and theme: - Aunt Jennifer's Tigers is a poem fully representing Adrienne Rich's feminist ideas as well as her concept of art. This is also an autobiographical poem that reflects the deep recesses of Adrienne Rich's mind and also the social mould in which she was thrown as a result of which she gives full vent to her feminist feelings in Aunt Jennifer's Tigers.

First, important theme to be running in the poem is the male-dominated society which leaves women with no choice but marry and be resigned to her fate whatever it is and wants woman to be hush regarding her rights. Women are taken as nothing but commodity to be possessed by others. They are projected to be having no emotions of their own and so they must be dominated by the supreme authority of man. The poem also shows the urge of woman to break away the above shackles laid down by society for her and fulfil her desires of freedom. The tigers also represent art, which has permanent value as compared to the short-lived life of the artist who dies but whose art remains in the world. Aunt Jennifer's Tigers is a fine example of feminist poetry, which holds a banner of protest against the patriarchal society.

A Critique of Aunt Jennifer's Tigers

Introduction: - Aunt Jennifer's Tigers is a fine example of feminist poetry with imperialistic and psychological tensions of the 20th century in which especially women find themselves as insecure and afraid of the Patriarchal social authorities. This is also a visionary poem, which dreams of a happy and fearless life free of male domination, which may give equal and parallel opportunities to the womankind so that they can progress without being hampered by the social male constraints. Aunt Jennifer appears as a symbol of the oppressed women and also the nations dominated by imperialistic powers.

Poem also shows the routine life of a woman anywhere in the world. Jennifer like any woman is sitting embroidering her screen may be for her marriage is thinking about her future and the household duties followed by it. Her end of life is also similar and reminiscent of a woman's common lot.

The poem is packed with a number of themes, images symbols and various stylistic merits, which we may discuss as under:

Development of Thought

Fight for the Rights:-

They do not fear the men beneath the tree;
They pace in sleek chivalric certainty

Aunt Jennifer's Tigers is also ironical because most of the women issues emerge not mainly because of male domination, but because of their own urge to get themselves free. Though male domination over women is a factor yet it is their desire to forget their feministic features and behave like men or become like men. Aunt Jennifer's Tigers is a fight for the equal rights. Aunt Jennifer wishes for a tiger's life free of jungle law where she may define the law and lay restrictions and scope for the womankind. She breaks away from the 20th century traditions in which woman is nothing but a sex symbol. Her prancing tigers exhibit her desire to let loose her ambitions and materialise them.

Women, be they American or Pakistani, are propagating against men and want to break away from the (secure) circles they have laid about them, but I fail to understand what equal rights these women are striving to find because they already possess the rights they must have. I personally believe that most of the tensions for women are not created by men but by themselves. It is the woman who wants to play the role of man, they have forgotten their sense of womanhood, they don't know it means to be a woman, they think they can replace men, but they don't try to understand that God didn't create man and woman equal. They are physically, emotionally, domestically and socially as different as two poles of the world. God created women equal in terms of their reverence, status and importance, but the problem is that women don't want to excel in second priority of divine creation rather they want to improve in the former aspect that is where they are mistaken and this is what destroys them in society and it is unnatural desire. It is actually that women themselves are responsible for their sense of inferiority and male domination.

Dark Aspect of Married Life:-

The massive weight of Uncle's wedding band
Sits heavily upon Aunt Jennifer' hand
When Aunt is dead, her terrified hands will lie
Still ringed with ordeals she was mastered by.

Aunt Jennifer's Tigers paints a decidedly dark portrait of a married woman's life in the domestic sphere. Patriarchal society, oppression and female helplessness are all delicately chided in this powerful poem. By examining the way Rich uses metaphor to further her purpose, we will unearth the deeper and multi-layered implications of this well-known piece.

In the first stanza, we are introduced to the sympathetic protagonist of the poem, Aunt Jennifer. Instead of describing her, however, Rich chooses to establish Aunt Jennifer's ownership of Tigers and continues to describe them. The tigers are vivacious and vividly portrayed. The tigers are colorfully described as "bright" and seeming full of energy; they happily "prance across the screen.

Aunt Jennifer is described as conducting needle work with a piece of wool. ” We then realize that this menial, domestic task is made difficult by the “massive weight” of the wedding ring that Aunt Jennifer is wearing.” This is a particularly daunting notion as usually we thing of death as although tragic in many senses, ultimately a liberator. “Completely free and fearless of the men below them, the tigers "pace in sleek chivalric certainty. Where the first stanza serves as a medium to explain what the tigers represent, the second stanza tells us who Aunt Jennifer is, and what she represents. So in order to create something to stand up against the patriarchal society in which she lived, Aunt Jennifer decided on masculine creatures. Aunt Jennifer and her tigers are in fact polar opposites, her tigers are everything that she isn’t and wishes to be. ”

In a possibly subconscious attempt to live vicariously through free and happy beings, Rich’s protagonist, Aunt Jennifer, has created tigers. However, under the oppressive world that she lives in, even this relatively symbol embroidery seems somewhat of a daunting task, for “even the ivory needle is hard to pull. However, Aunt Jennifer’s oppression is so extreme that not even death will grant her freedom. ” As the poem unravels, we realize these tigers serve as a sharp contrast to the psyche of Aunt Jennifer. In a very bittersweet closing couplet, the tigers are described as eternal beings, having the freedom to forever “go on prancing, proud, and unafraid. In short, she says that even in death, she will be oppressed by patriarchal society, or “ringed with the ordeals she was mastered by. Here, we begin to really appreciate the juxtaposition between Aunt Jennifer and her tigers. Sedentary and listless, Aunt Jennifer represents an oppressed housewife lacking the ability to stand up for herself.

Aunt Jennifer – a symbolic character: - Who is Aunt Jennifer? Does she even exist? I had to ask myself these questions before even going further into the poem. The answers opened the door to a deeper meaning behind Aunt Jennifer's Tigers. Based on Adrienne Rich's background I believe Aunt Jennifer did exist. However, Aunt Jennifer was not Rich's aunt. Aunt Jennifer represented women all over the world, particularly women in American, who were caught under the oppressive hand of a patriarchal society. Adrienne Rich was perhaps one of those women. Rich, one of the most influential poets of her time, dealt with controversial issues such as sexuality, race, language, power, and women's culture. Her passion in this area forced her to look and challenge the standard and the norm. The popular cliché that refers to marriage as that old "ball and chain" takes on a more serious meaning with Rich as she reveals, through the simple lines of Aunt Jennifer's Tigers, a woman's struggles with expression, rebellion, and a society where power is defined as masculine. This poem tells of "Aunt Jennifer", who is the symbol of feminism in this particular poem. This poem offers an image of power revealed and restrained by domestic arts. This is shown in the case that she is restrained by her husband's wedding band, thus revealing that she Aunt Jennifer was expected to be a devoted and domesticated wife. Aunt Jennifer living her part in a man's world is forcing her into a role that she does not fit naturally. Aunt Jennifer symbolises oppressed women, imperialistically dominated nations and weakness.

Feminist conflict: - According to Deborah Pope, the poem shows a conflict in the feminist mind. The fearful, gloomy woman waiting inside her darkening room for the emotional and meteorological devastation to hit could be Aunt Jennifer, who is similarly passive and terrified, overwhelmed by events that eclipsed her small strength. "Aunt Jennifer's Tigers" is, however, an even clearer statement of conflict in women, specifically between the impulse to freedom and imagination (her tapestry of prancing tigers) and the "massive weight" of gender roles and expectations, signified by "Uncle's wedding band." Although separated through the use of the third person and a different generation, neither Aunt Jennifer in her ignorance nor Rich as a poet recognizes the fundamental implications of the division between imagination and duty, power and passivity.

Oppression, Rebellion and Immortality:-

> When Aunt is dead, her terrified hands will lie
> Still ringed with ordeals she was mastered by.
> The tigers in the panel that she made
> Will go on prancing, proud and unafraid.

According to Thomas B. Byars, Rich's own remarks on this poem, in "When We Dead Awaken: Writing as Re-Vision" , are an important starting place; she discusses how even in a formal and consciously distanced poem of her early period, she can discover clear (if latent) feminist concerns.

Perhaps most interesting, however, is the fact that the needlework tigers, like Rich's poem itself, are ineffectual as rebellion, because the very means of their rebellion are inscribed in the oppressor's language, and thus reveal an unhealed split in the psyche of the oppressed.

The tigers display in art the values that Aunt Jennifer must repress or displace in life: strength, assertion, fearlessness, fluidity of motion. And the poem's conclusion celebrates the animal images as a kind of triumph, transcending the limited conditions of their maker's life. Accepting the doctrine of "ars longa, vita brevis," Rich finds in her character's art both persistence and compensation; she sees the creations as immortalizing the hand that made them, despite the contrary force of the oppressive structure of Aunt Jennifer's conventional marriage, as signified by the ring that binds her to her husband. This doctrine is utterly consonant with what was, according to Rich, "a recurrent theme in much poetry I read [in those days]. . . the indestructibility of poetry, the poem as vehicle for personal immortality" (Blood 168). And this more or less explicit connection helps show how deeply implicated Rich herself was in Aunt Jennifer's situation and her achievement, despite the "asbestos gloves" of a distancing formalism that "allowed me to handle materials I couldn't pick up barehanded" (Lies 40-41).

The problem, however, is that the tigers are clearly masculine figures--and not only masculine, but heroic figures of one of the most role-bound of all the substructures of patriarchy: chivalry. Their "chivalric certainty" is a representation by Aunt Jennifer of her own envisioned power, but it is essentially a suturing image, at once stitching up and reasserting the rift between her actual social status an her vision. Aunt's name, after all, echoes with the sound of Queen Guinevere's; her place in chivalry is clear. Her tigers are only Lancelots, attractive because illicit, but finally seducing her to another submission to the male. So long as power can be envisioned only in terms that are culturally determined as masculine, the revolutionary content of the vision, which was all confined to a highly mediated and symbolic plane in any case, will remain insufficient. Indeed, the fact that assertion against the patriarchy is here imagined only in terms set by the patriarchs may be seen as this poem's version of the tigers' "fearful symmetry." And the "Immortal hand or eye" that framed their symmetry is not Aunt Jennifer's framing her needlework, but patriarchy's, framing Aunt Jennifer.

Symbolism in Aunt Jennifer's Tigers: -The poem is packed with symbolism from the first to the last. Introduction of the tigers, how they are prancing across a screen symbolizes Aunt Jennifer, roaming in a world freely; although it is telling of a screen she crafted. The tigers are bright topaz denizens because they are different in the world, and are not just plain, (green), like everyone else. This symbolizes Aunt Jennifer's individual thinking, and how she is different. The tigers don't fear the men beneath the tree because Aunt Jennifer did not fear men at first and was living as an independent individual with her own mind.

The tigers are slowly walking elegantly, showing that they are confident and 'chivalric' (gentlemanly)---this may show that Aunt Jennifer knows she is fine without having to be married. This line is telling of Aunt Jen's fingers 'fluttering' through her wool--this is just an allusion using an activity she likes to do, to tell of how she was roaming freely and happily before marriage. The ivory needle is a symbol for how hard it is to keep yourself independent and essentially a free-thinker when you are married. Uncle's wedding band on her finger is massive because he is strict towards how she should be a domesticated wife and not a free soul. It "sits heavily upon her hand" because her marriage has taken a toll on her, and she can feel it heavily on her heart and soul. When Aunt Jen dies, she will die as a lonely and depressed woman, and her hands are terrified because they never got to be free again.

Jen's hands stand as a symbol of her body, in that she was tired and sick from the ordeals (being a housewife) that she was mastered by [her husband--making her act this way] The tigers are a symbol of what will be left of Aunt Jen's existence after her death, in that she never got to "prance" as proud and unafraid when she was married and was constrained by what women were expected.

Style and Imagery: - Visual imagery predominates in the first stanza. We learn that the speaker is a niece or nephew from the title and the first line, but we actually learn very little about Aunt Jennifer herself. Instead we see the tapestry that she is weaving and the tigers that "prance" across it. The two action verbs "pace" and "prance emphasize the strength of these animals, while the vividness of their "topaz" color draws attention to their striking presence. The aabb rhyme scheme mimics the rhythm of their movement. The word "denizens" has a negative connotation that links with the dark picture of "Uncle" in the second stanza.

In the second picture we shift to a visual picture of Aunt Jennifer. The alliteration "fingers fluttering" suggests her physical weakness; she is so feeble that she has trouble manipulating the needle "through her wool." In the last part of the stanza we find out that her troubled marriage has had something to do with her condition. The words "massive weight suggest oppression, as do the words "Sits heavily." The end rhymes "band" and "hand" also indicate that being married has kept this woman down. The point of view here would seem to be that of a woman, indicating that the speaker is the niece rather than Aunt Jennifer's nephew.

In the third stanza, the speaker projects into the future, and suggests that once she is dead, Aunt Jennifer will continue to be encumbered by her earthly marriage. Her hands will still be "terrified," suggesting that "Uncle has been so abusive that his reach will exceed human limitations. The word "ringed "has a double connotation—indicating not only the ring that "sits heavily" on her hand, but the difficulties in her life that will continue to surround her. The "tigers in the panel" will also go on forever, but by contrast they will continue into infinity as fierce, arrogant beings. The alliteration in the last line of "prancing" and "proud" heightens our sense of the irony in this poem, because they are so much stronger than the woman who created them.

Technique: - It is difficult to depict a primary poetic technique within this poem. The reason being that, many devices are used to bring forth the message that Rich has embedded within it. However, symbolism is the most prominent. The poem is set in a traditional format, using simple rhyme and meter to give the reader a sense of formality. Adrienne Rich's "Aunt Jennifer's Tigers", depicts an audacious woman trapped within a timid and suppressed life. Marriage and the culture that supports it have effected the character in this poem greatly. Reality seems inescapable because of the ring that "sits heavily upon Aunt Jennifer's hand". The tapestry that Aunt Jennifer is creating in the poem, is very symbolic of her potential. When you picture a tiger, the words power, fluidity, nobility, and strength may accompany that image. Those same words accompany the hidden life of Aunt Jennifer.

The first stanza opens the poem with a truly bold image of tigers as "They pace in sleek chivalric certainty". The tigers obviously have a very significant symbolic purpose in this poem. They portray the fearlessness, assertion and power, that Aunt Jennifer displaces in order to lead her conventional life

Conclusion:- Aunt Jennifer's Tigers is a fabulous poem may also be serving a wife of a colonial officer (Uncle) and being repressed because of his hard attitude. Though Jennifer is unable to change the patriarchal system, she, to some extent, contributes to the rebellion against this system which leaves women but no options to perform in society. The poem is remarkable for its style technique, imagery, symbolism and theme – a typical quality of Adrienne Rich as a modern poet. Aunt Jennifer's Tigers being a rebellious in nature is an autobiographical poem at the same time because the repressed and dominated personality of Jennifer parallels Adrienne Rich's. In short, the poem is to be understood at so many different levels that its single interpretation is not possible.

Final Notation

Introduction and Theme: - Final Notations is thematically an ambiguous poem. The poem is not understood because of the flowing imagery or stylistically presented issues, but because of the reader's individual perception of the poem. We can say that unlike Aunt Jennifer's Tigers, which has a few fixed themes and issues, Final Notations is infinite in its interpretations.

Final Notation is a cultural, political and personally emotional poem which has been written in a simple and neat style with careful economy of words. The poet is experiencing new lifestyles, sexual issues, motherhood tensions, friendship or even doctor patient relationship. Final notations shows the last message of the poet or the New World Order of a colonial power when it has controlled a territory or is coming to control it.

In short, we can say that Final Notation shows us things which are difficult at first become easy, things which are strange at one time, become familiar at another, things which may seem painful, but become joyful and pleasant which encountered and things which people apparently looking disgusting in the first impressions, later become our heart and soul with the passage of time.

A Critique of Final Notations

Introduction: - This is a fine, simple and little piece of poetry. The speaker is taken to be a lover and the addressee is the beloved. The lover is telling the beloved how to make love. The relationship between man and woman is very complex and this is the point to which the poem alludes.

The poem also shows a pregnant woman who is going to be operated on by her doctor and the doctor is giving instructions to the patients on how to react in this operation or is trying to reassuring the patient so that the seemingly difficult operation for the patient should be completed without any complication.

The poem has layers of meanings and open to various interpretations and the reader should be feel at large to interpret the poem at whatever level he wants. However, the approach suggested for the reader is three-fold. The first is male-female relationship, doctor-patient relationship and the policy of the colonial powers with the poor nations. Though some people might not agree, the poem does have imperialistic allusions in it structure and the American dominating attitude towards the world at large.

The poem is structurally simple, but thematically complex. The language is neat and no difficult word used, but the use of structure is ambiguous.

Development of Thought

Doctor-Patient relationship: - The only complete analogy and supposition found in the poem is that a pregnant woman is lying before the doctor, may be to be delivered or her first visit to the doctor regarding her pregnancy. When the doctor is giving her instructions about the new experience. Though it looks difficult, yet

> It will touch through your ribs, it will take all your heart
> It will not be long, it will occupy your thought

The procedure is not long. Normally, it takes a few minutes unless complications arise. The child seemingly so disturbing and troubling in the belly of the mother after a short time and struggle on part of the woman will be delivered. As she says,

> It will be short, it will take all your breath

The procedure may be difficult for some women who are taking this first experience, but it is very simple if it taken to be so. The few months of pregnancy are touching and delicate, special care needs to be taken, the overall trouble becomes a reward for the mother. As the doctor is says,

> It will be simple; it will become your will.

The disturbing child in the belly ironically becomes the passion, will and the centre of full attention for the mother. The wants to get rid of the child during the delivery, but after the child is born, it becomes the most important thing of the world for her.

Lover and beloved relationship:-

> It will not be simple, it will not be long
> It will take little time, it will take all your thought
> It will take all your heart, it will take all your breath.
> It will be short, it will not be simple.

A young girl, running towards teens, feels a number of strange romantic and ideal desires, looks for partners and once finding a partner becomes terrified at the idea of physical relationship. As the woman, however bold or open-hearted, is naturally shy and repressed, is unable to understand the nature of the first physical union. Ultimately the responsibility is left to the lover who in a small and brief style tries to explain the importance and process of this newfound physical relationship. The nature of this relationship is not simple, but once experienced, it will bring abundance of joys in the life the partner. This physical relationship may be the first one in the life of unmarried woman or may be the first on the first marriage night in which the lover is trying to make physical contacts. Thus things seemingly looking dangerous or troubling are sometimes sweet in actual experience.

Sexual Harassment in the Final Notations:-

> It will touch through your ribs, it will take all your heart
> It will not be long, it will occupy your thought
> It a city occupied, as a bed is occupied
> It will take all your flesh, it will not be simple

The modern world is the age of harassment especially for women. The young girls let loose for various experiences in the name of freedom and modernity or broadmindedness fall a prey to such harassment where studs try to encourage these young modern girls into such physical activities. These studs gradually make women slave to their own appetites; they occupy their bed like a ruler occupies a city. They leave them no options but be ruled and controlled by their passions. The studs use various tactics to convince their new prey of the physical contact. The newborn and uncontrolled desires in women ultimately lead them astray without proper management or responsibility of their parents.

Theme of Eagerness and Oneness in Love

> It will be short, it will take all your breath
> It will be simple, it will become your will

Final Notations can also be taken to be a pure love poem in which the poet wants to achieve pure love regardless of the metaphysical speculations of Donne or casualness of Surrey-Wyatt in a concise and simple language. The most important point in lovemaking is eagerness and wilfulness. It is not difficult to achieve this state if sure determination and seriousness is show. This seriousness leads to oneness of the lovers when love becomes a passion or will of the two.

Unfaithfulness of the lover

> You are coming into us who cannot withstand you
> You are coming into us who never wanted to withstand you
> You are taking parts of us into places never planned
> You are going far away with pieces of our lives

The lover has left her beloved and went on to establish relations with some other woman and as a result he leaves a note behind giving her instructions that she should forget him. The above lines are an ample proof of this interpretation. The beloved outbursts into the above lines. The repetition of 'coming into' reinforces the idea of establishing relation with the beloved first and the phrase 'pieces of life' symbolises faithlessness and quit love on part of the lover. The love once developed in the beloved by the lover is disintegrating and those pieces are being shared by the lover with somebody else.

Style, Imagery, Symbolism and Technique: - The style of the poem is simple. There is no stylistic ambiguity. The only ambiguity lies in the nature of theme or the message of the speaker and also the identity of the speaker and the addressee needs to be resolved by different speculations from the reader. The themes of the poem range from personal to social, medical, psychological, political and emotional.

The repetition of different lines and words show intensity and importance of the theme (though theme is not directly addressed by the poet, it is to be explicated by the reader on the strength of his speculation. The lines are erratic which symbolise the complexity of the theme, again whatever it may be.

The title has been made ambitious. Does it related to music, dictation or what? In short, the poem is not rich in great images or symbols. The only thing important about the poem is complexity and that is what it is rich in.

Conclusion: - Cutting the long story short, we can say that the poem depends on the experience of the reader for various interpretations. The complexity of the poem is also caused by the extreme subjectivity in the poem. The poem is too personal to understand in its true perspective. This complexity is the typical characteristic of modern American poetry which is based on confessional and experimental nature of their artists.

Gabriel

Introduction and Theme: - The poem tells us about the meeting of two strangers who share many things with each other. There are certain reasons or perhaps things remain unsaid on part of the lovers for which they are separated. The nature of the person is gentle and dangerous at the same time.

The poem also shows the hollowness of modern age, which has become materialistic and has quite the religious ways and manners in the 20th century. All the things have come to be questioned including religion in the 20th century. The angel is bright and dark at the same time. The people are kind and poisonous. These contradictions are the results of the 20th century.

The poem shows a turn of events in the life of people. Those happy at one times become different or sad at the other. Things favourable today become unfavourable tomorrow and people take to new possessions. Adrienne Rich is a product of the 20-century that is fraught with tensions and confusions. Man in this century is suffering and undergoing various battles. He is enslaved by the materialistic system of the contemporary powers and he is in chains as W.B. Yeats says,

Things fall apart, the centre cannot hold

Mere anarchy is loosed upon the earth

And the remedy is the Second Coming of Christ to rid man of the contemporary chains of materialism, faithlessness and bondage. Gabriel is the messenger thought whom Christ sends a message to the poet.

A Critique of Gabriel

Introduction:-The poem in its simplicity tells us that the world is devastated and the people have become corrupt so the inspiration of Christ is important for the salvation of humanity. A new faith is necessitated for the survival of the world.

Adrienne Rich, being a poet, spends most of her time reading poetry and when she reads poetry this time, new ideas emerge in her mind those, which never emerged before. The angle appears which shows sympathy towards her. She experiences various troubles of the 20th century and finally finds their solutions in the divine inspiration through the message of Gabriel sent by Christ according to their faith as salvation for humanity in the confused times.

Though the poem has religious significance, the poem is also taken to be purely on love foundations. Gabriel is the poet's previous lover which for reasons left her, but has come back to join her.

Development of Thought

Gabriel as a symbol of Revelation and Salvation: - Gabriel is traditional known as the Angel of Revelation who brought revelation to all the prophets in the world. In this poem, Gabriel does stand for revelation, but he also symbolises Christ who sends Gabriel to the poet for salvation, the poet who in turn stands for humanity. Humanity in the form of poet has taken many turns. The Two Great World Wars have shattered the values cherished by the 19th century and even the previous centuries. These wars devastated the structure of the world. There is anarchy ruling the world. It seems that no goodness is left in the world as the poet cries in the beginning,

There are no angels yet
Here comes an angel one
With a man's face

The exploitive nature in the world surprises the poet that no angels are left in the 20th century of science and materialism and she is amazed to an angel in her room. The angel bears a young man's face. It is Gabriel who awaited by the poet for revelation. The poet has faith in the power of Christ that he could never have left the world in its inertia because he is a benevolent prophet. So he sends Gabriel as a symbol of himself so that he may give the poet a message to renew the world once again in its former shape. But the poet is not used to angels in this materialistic age, so she is terrified when she sees the angel,

But he doesn't say that His message
Drenches his body
He'd want to kill me
For using words to name him

This shows that the poetess has no touch of spirituality. She is occupied with all the knowledge of the world, but she is spiritually hollow. Even the poet's attitude towards Gabriel is casual as she says,

I get your message Gabriel
Just will you stay looking
Straight at me

This is not usually the behaviour of man before an angel if one becomes visible. The angel, Gabriel being a symbol of truth and revelation, comes with a definite message to convey to humanity but humanity is not even ready to listen or act upon what he might say. Poet symbolising humanity is even doubtful of the identity of the angel.

Lost and Found Love: - The poem has another strand apart from its religious connotations. The second strand of the poem is lost and found love. Gabriel also symbolises lost love, which is ultimately found. The meeting between the poet and her previous lover starts in the following manner,

Here comes an angel one
With a man's face young Shut-off the dark
Side of the moon turning to me
And saying: I am the plumed
Serpent the beast
With fangs of fire and a gentle
Heart

She recognises that he is her past lover who left her and now he has come in the shape of an angel, though the inner reality of the lover is perceived by the poet and she does understand how poisonous he was and could be. The Gabriel symbolising a handsome man who comes to meet his beloved (with inner bad intentions or a bad past) whom he left. The poet is so terrified may be at her past experience with the lover when she says that

He'd want to kill me

For using words to name him

The poet wants to remain busy in her studies and contemplation of the world affairs and political and social tensions rather than get involved into his love affair again because he previously deceived her. As she says,

I sit in the bare apartment
Reading
Words stream past me poetry
Twentieth-century rivers

Apart from his newborn love for the poet, the so-called angel is not behaving in a manner that a lover should. Importance of communication cannot be denied in love but this lover is silent.

The angel is barely
Speaking to me

Certainly, because of the 20th confused times and lack of assurance on part of the lover, the poet cannot be blamed and especially she has been previously deceived by him or some one like him. As she has lost faith in love, she finds all men equal. She says,

He stood or someone like him
Salutations in gold-leaf
Ribboning from his lips
Today again the hair streams
To his shoulders

His physical appearance is as charming as it was before. The word Gabriel appears satirical and ironical because he has come with a motive perhaps (of sexual nature) rather than true love. The poet also feels mixed feelings of joy and terror. Rather than speaking or communicating love,

We glance miserably
Across the room at each other

It's true there are moments
Closer and closer together
When words stick in my throat
'the art of love'
'the art of words'

I get your message Gabriel
Just will you stay looking
Straight at me
Awhile longer

At such times, the art of love is important because mere facial expressions perhaps don't work. But in the present situation, the Gabriel's attitude seems based on a sexual motive rather than real love. He has come back with the motive of establishing physical relationship, but the poet understands his games and satirically says,

I get your message Gabriel
Just will you stay looking
Straight at me
Awhile longer

The poet understands the motives of men and she rejects seemingly beautiful and inwardly serpent like Gabriel. He is a fake lover and not a true Gabriel who believes in revelations and truth.

Conclusion: - Gabriel is a thought-provoking poem which highlights current tensions in the 20th century and the importance of truth and revelation for the salvation of this downtrodden humanity. Gabriel becomes before us a symbol of divinity as well as a secular symbol of a young man with a fantastic expression on the face wrapped with inward lust.

Technically, Gabriel is a superior poem which has used the image of Gabriel beautifully and its relevant to the changing conditions of the world. The poem is based on a socio-political background. Though the atmosphere is that of a love poetry, the poem is remarkable for its ironical images. Taken in view the feminism of those days the poem seems fit to be studied in the light of Rich's passion for the liberation of women.

All About Linguistics.

The Nature of Language and Linguistics

Introduction

Language is Almighty Allah's special gift to mankind. Without language human civilization would have remained an impossibility. Language is ubiquitous (ever present). It is present everywhere–in our thoughts and dreams, prayers and meditations, relations and communication. Besides being a means of communication, and storehouse of knowledge, it is an instrument of thinking as well as a source of delight (e.g. singing).

It transfers knowledge from one person to another and from one generation to another. Language is also the maker or unmaker of human relationships. It is the use of language that 'Italics a life bitter or sweet. Without language man would have remained only a dumb animal. It is our ability to communicate through words that makes us different from animals. Because of its omnipresence, language is often taken for granted.

Definition of Language

Since linguistics is the study of language, it is imperative for linguist to know what language is. Language is a very complex human phenomenon; all attempts to define it have proved inadequate. In a nut-shell, language is an 'organised noise' used in actual social situations. That is why it has also been defined as 'contextualised systematic sound'.

In order to understand a term like life, one has to talk of the properties or characteristics of living beings (e.g. motion, reproduction, respiration, growth, power of self-healing, excretion, nutrition, mortality, etc. etc.). Similarly, the term language can be understood better in terms of its properties or characteristics. Some linguists, however, have been trying to define language in their own ways even though all these definitions have been far from satisfactory. Here are some of these definitions:

According to Robins: "Language is a symbol system based on pure or arbitrary conventions… infinitely extendable and modifiable according to the changing needs and conditions of the speakers."

According to this definition, language is a symbol system. Every language selects some symbols for its selected sounds. The English sound /k/ for example has the symbol k for it. These symbols form the alphabet of the language and join in different combinations to form meaningful words.

The system talked of here is purely arbitrary (random) in the sense that there is no one to one correspondence between the structure of a word and the thing it stands for. The combination p.e.n., for example stands, in English, for an instrument used for writing. Why could it not be e.p.n. or n.e.p.? Well, it could also be e.p.n. or n.e.p. and there is nothing sacrosanct (sacred) about the combination p.e.n. except that it has now become a convention—a convention that cannot be easily changed.

As stated here, language conventions are not easily changed, yet it is not impossible to do so. Language is infinitely modifiable and extendable. Words go on changing meanings and new words continue to be added to language with the changing needs of the community using it.

According to Sapir: "Language is a purely human and non-instinctive method of communicating ideas, emotions and desires by means of a system of voluntarily produced symbols."

There are two terms in this definition that call for discussion: human and non-instinctive. Language, as Sapir rightly said, is human. Only humans possess language and all normal humans uniformly possess it. Animals do have a communication system but it is not a developed system. That is why language is said to be species-specific and species-uniform.

Also, language does not pass from a parent to a child. In this sense it is non-instinctive. A child has to learn language and he/she learns the language of the society he/she is placed in.

According to Hall: "Language is the institution whereby humans communicate and interact with each other by means of habitually used oral-auditory arbitrary symbols."

This definition rightly gives more prominence to the fact that language is primarily speech produced by oral-auditory symbols. A speaker produces some string of oral sounds that get conveyed through the air to the speaker who, through his hearing organs, receives the sound waves and conveys these to the brain that interprets these symbols to arrive at a meaning.

According to Noam Chomsky: "A language is a set (finite or infinite) of sentences, each finite in length and constructed out of a finite set of elements."

Chomsky meant to convey that each sentence has a structure. Human brain is competent enough to construct different sentences from out of the limited set of sounds/symbols belonging to a particular language. Human brain is so productive that a child can at any time produce a sentence that has never been said or heard earlier.

According to Wardaugh: "A language is a system of arbitrary vocal symbols used for human communication."

According to Bloch and Trager: "A language is a system of arbitrary vocal symbols by means of which a social group cooperates."

Both these definitions prominently point out that language is a system. Sounds join to form words according to a system. The letters k, n, i, t join to form a meaningful 'word knit, whereas combinations like n-k-i-t, t.k.n.i. or i.n.k.t. do not form any meaningful or sensible combinations. Although initially the formation of words, as said earlier, is only arbitrary, convention makes them parts of a system. Words too join to form sentences according to some system. A sentence like: Cricket is a game of glorious uncertainties is acceptable but one cannot accept a string of words like: a game is of cricket uncertainties glorious. It is in this sense that language is said to be a system of systems.

According to Derbyshire: "Language is undoubtedly a kind of means of communication among human beings. It consists primarily of vocal sounds. It is articulatory, systematic, symbolic and arbitrary."

Derbyshire, while accepting that language is the property of human beings and that it is primarily speech, brings out the point that it is an important means of communication amongst humans. Before the start of civilization, man might have used the language of signs but it must have had a very limited scope. Language is a fully developed means of communication with the civilized man who can convey and receive millions of messages across the universe. An entire civilization depends on language only. Think of a world without language—man would only continue to be a denizen of the forest and the caves. Language has changed the entire gamut of human relations and made it possible for human beings to grow into a human community on this planet.

Characteristics of Language

Language is a Means of Communication

Language is a very important means of communication between humans. One can communicate his or her ideas, emotions, beliefs or feelings to the other as they share a common code that makes up the language. No doubt, there are many other means of communication used by humans e.g. gestures, nods, winks, flags, smiles, horns, short-hand, Braille alphabet, mathematical symbols, Morse code, sirens, sketches, maps, acting, miming, dancing etc. But all these systems of communication are extremely limited or they too, in turn, depend upon language only. They are not as flexible, comprehensive, perfect and extensive as language is. Language is so important a form of communication between humans that it is difficult to think of a society without language. It gives shape to people’s thoughts and guides and controls their entire activity. It is a carrier of civilization and culture as human thoughts and philosophy are conveyed from one generation to the other through the medium of language. Language is ubiquitous in the sense that it is present everywhere in all activities. It is as important as the air we breathe and is the most valuable possession of man.

Animals too have their system of communication but their communication is limited to a very small number of messages, e.g. hunger, fear, and anger. In the case of humans, the situation is entirely different. Human beings can send an infinite number of messages to their fellow beings. It is through language that they store knowledge, transfer it to the next generation and yoke the present, past and the future together.

Language is Arbitrary

Language is arbitrary in the sense that there is no inherent relation between the words of a language and their meanings or the ideas conveyed by them (except in the case of hieroglyphics where a picture of an object may represent the object). There is no reason why a female adult human being be called a “woman” in English, “aurat” in Urdu, “zen” in Persian and “femine” in French. Selection of these words in the languages mentioned here is purely arbitrary, an accident of history. It is just like christening a new born baby who may be christened John or James. But once a child is given some name in a purely arbitrary manner; this name gets associated with the child for his entire life and it becomes an important, established convention. The situation in the case of the language is a similar one. The choice of a word selected to mean a particular thing or idea is purely arbitrary but once a word is selected for a particular referent, it comes to stay as such. It may be noted that had language not been arbitrary, there would have been only one language in the world.

Language is a System of Systems

Language is not an amorphous, a disorganised or a chaotic combination of sounds. Any brick may be used anywhere in a building, but it is not so with sounds or graphic symbols standing for the sounds of a language. Sounds are arranged in certain fixed or established, systematic order to form meaningful units or words. Similarly, words are also arranged in a particular system to frame acceptable meaningful sentences. These systems operate at two levels: phonological and syntactical.

At the phonological level, for example, sounds of a language appear only in some fixed combinations. There is no word, for example, that starts with bz–, lr– or zl– combination. There is no word that begins with a /ŋ/ sound or ends in a /h/ sound. Similarly words too combine to form sentences according to certain conventions (i.e. grammatical or structural rules) of the language. The sentence "The hunter shot the tiger with a gun" is acceptable but the sentence "the tiger shot a gun with hunter the" is not acceptable as the word order in the latter sentence does not conform to the established language conventions.

Language is thus called a system of systems as it operates at the two levels discussed above. This property of language is also termed duality by some linguists. This makes language a very complex phenomenon. Every human child has to master the conventions of the language he or she learns before being able to successfully communicate with other members of the social group in which he or she is placed.

Language is Primarily Vocal

Language is primarily made up of vocal sounds only produced by a physiological articulatory mechanism in the human body. In the beginning, it must have appeared as vocal sounds only. Writing must have come much later, as an intelligent attempt to represent vocal sounds. Writing is only the graphic representation of the sounds of the language. There are a number of languages which continue to exist, even today, in the spoken form only. They do not have a written form. A child learns to speak first; writing comes much later. Also, during his life time, a man speaks much more than he writes. The total quantum of speech is much larger than the total quantum of written materials.

It is because of these reasons that some linguists say that speech is primary, writing is secondary. Writing did have one advantage over speech—it could be preserved in books or records. But, with the invention of magnetic tapes or audio-cassettes, it has lost that advantage too. The age-old proverb 'pen is mightier than the sword' does not hold much ground when one finds that the spoken words, at the beck and call of a really good orator, can do much more than a pen. Just think of Mark Antony's speech in 'Julius Caesar' that inspired the whole mob into action and spurred them on to a mood of frenzy to burn and kill the enemies of Julius Caesar. A number of modern gadgets like the telephone, the tape recorder, the Dictaphone, etc. only go to prove the primacy of speech over writing.

Language is a Social Phenomenon

Language is a set of conventional communicative signals used by humans for communication in a community. Language in this sense is a possession of a social group, comprising an indispensable set of rules which permits its members to relate to each other, to interact with each other, to co-operate with each other; it is a social institution. Language exists in society; it is a means of nourishing and developing culture and establishing human relations. It is as a member of society that a human being acquires a language. We are not born with an instinct to learn a particular language––English, Russian, Chinese or French. We learn a language as member of the society using that language, or because we want to understand that society, or to be understood by that speech-community. If a language is not used in any society, it dies out.

Language is thus a social event. It can fully be described only if we know all about the people who are involved in it, their personalities, their beliefs, attitudes, knowledge of the world, relationship to each other, their social status, what activity they are engaged in, what they are talking about, what has gone before linguistically and non-linguistically, what happens after, what they are and a host of other facts about them and the situation they are placed in.

Language is Non-instinctive and Conventional

No language was created in a day out of a mutually agreed upon formula by a group of humans. Language is the outcome of evolution and convention. Each generation transmits this convention on to the next. Like all human institutions languages also change and die, grow and expand. Every language then is a convention in a community. It is non-instinctive because it is acquired by human beings. Nobody gets a language in heritage; he acquires it, and everybody has been provided with an innate ability to acquire language. Animals inherit their system of communication by heredity, humans do not.

Language is Systematic

Although language is symbolic, yet its symbols are arranged in a particular system. All languages have their system of arrangements. Though symbols in each human language are finite, they can be arranged infinitely; that is to say, we can produce an infinite set of sentence by a finite set of symbols.

Every language is a system of systems. All languages have phonological and grammatical systems, and within a system there are several sub-systems. For example, within the grammatical system we have morphological and syntactic systems, and within these two sub-systems we have several other systems such as those of plural, of mood, of aspect, of tense, etc.

Language is Unique, Creative, Complex & Modifiable

Language is a unique phenomenon of the earth. Other planets do not seem to have any language, although this fact may be invalidated if we happen to discover a talking generation on any other planet. But so far there is no evidence of the presence of language on the moon. Each language is unique in its own sense. By this we do not mean that languages do not have any similarities or universals. Despite their common features and language, universals, each language has its peculiarities and distinct features.

Language has creativity and productivity. The structural elements of human language can be combined to produce new utterances, which neither the speaker nor his hearers may ever have made or heard before any, listener, yet which both sides understand without difficulty. Language changes according to the needs of society. Old English is different from modern English; so is old Urdu different form modern Urdu.

Language has a Duality

The language that human beings use consists of two sub-systems - sound and meaning. A finite set of sound units can be grouped and re-grouped into units of meaning. These can be grouped and re-grouped to generate further functional constituents of the higher hierarchical order. We can produce sentences through this process of combining units of a different order. Animal calls do not show such duality, they are unitary.

Language has a Productivity

A speaker may say something that he has never said before and be understood without difficulty. Man uses the limited linguistic, resources in order to produce completely novel ideas and utterances. Fairy tales, animal fables, narratives about alien unheard of happenings in distant galaxies or nonexistent worlds are perfectly understood by the listeners.

Language has a Displacement

One can talk about situations, places and objects far removed from one's present surroundings and time. We often talk about events that happened long time ago and at a distant place; bombing incident in Ireland's Londonderry twelve years' back, for instance; or the sinking of the Spanish Armada in the sixteenth century. Bees, of course, perform dances about the source of nectar that is also removed from the place of dance (beehive). But they cannot convey what happened in the previous season through their dance features. Human beings, however, can narrate events in which they were not involved.

Language is Both Linguistic & Communicative Competence

A language is an abstract set of psychological principles and sociological consideration that constitute a person's competence as a speaker in a given situation. "These psychological principles make available to him an unlimited number of sentences he can draw upon in concrete; situations and provide him with the ability to understand and create entirely new sentences. Hence language is not just a verbal behaviour; it is a system of rules establishing correlations between meanings and sound sequences. It is a set of principles that a speaker masters; it is not anything that he does. In brief, a language is a code which is different from the act of encoding; it is a speaker's linguistic competence rather than his linguistic performance. But mere linguistic or communicative competence is not enough for communication; it has to be coupled with communicative competence. This is the view of the sociolinguists who stress the use of language according to the occasion and context, the speaker and the listener, the profession and the social status of the speaker and the listener. That language is the result of social interaction established truth.

Language is Human & Structurally Complex

No species other than humans has been endowed with language. Animals cannot acquire human language because of its complex structure and their physical inadequacies. Animals do not have the type of brain which the human beings possess and their articulatory organs are also very much different from those of the human beings. Furthermore any system of animals' communication does not make use of the quality of features, that is, of concurrent systems of sound and meaning. Human language is open-ended, extendable and modifiable whereas the animal language is not.

Definition, Nature and Scope of Linguistics

Introduction

Linguistics is a growing and interesting area of study, having a direct hearing on fields as diverse as education, anthropology, sociology, language teaching, cognitive psychology and philosophy. What is linguistics? Fundamentally, it is concerned with the nature of language and communication.

Definitions of Linguistics

According to G. Duffy: "Linguistics observes language in action as a means for determining how language has developed, how it functions today, and how it is currently evolving."
According to S. Pit Corder: "Linguistics is concerned with the nature of human language, how it is learned and what part it plays in the life of the individual and the community."
According to Jean Aitchison: "Linguistics tries to answer two basic questions: What is language and How does language work."
According to Victoria A. Fromkin: "The scientific study of human language is called linguistics".

Linguistics is the scientific study of language. By this we mean language in general, not a particular language. If we were concerned with studying an individual language, we would say 'I'm studying French... or English,' or whichever language we happen to be studying. But linguistics does not study an individual language; it studies 'language' in general.

According to Robins (1985): "Linguistics is concerned with human language as a universal and recognizable part of the human behaviour and of the human faculties, perhaps one of the most essential to human life as we know it, and one of the most far-reaching of human capabilities in relation to the whole span of mankind's achievements."

Does this not sound a little abstract? It is, because there is no way of studying 'language' without referring to and taking examples from particular languages. However, even while doing so, the emphasis of linguistics is different. Linguistics does not emphasise practical knowledge or mastery of a particular language. Linguists may know only one language, or may know several, or may even study a language they do not know at all. What they are trying to study are the ways in which language is organised to fulfill human needs, as a system of communication. There is a difference between a person who knows many languages (called a polyglot), and a linguist, who studies general principles of language organisation and language behaviour, often with reference to some actual language or languages. Any language can be taken up to illustrate the principles of language organisation, because all languages reveal something of the nature of language in general.

We can say that linguistics is learning about language rather than learning a language. This distinction is often explained as the difference between learning how a car works and learning how to drive a car. When we learn how to drive a car, we learn a set of habits and do some practice—this is similar to learning how to speak a language. When we learn how the car works, we open up its mechanism, study it and investigate the relationship of its parts to one another. This is similar to what we do in a scientific study of language, or linguistics: we investigate the mechanism of language, its parts and how all these parts fit together to perform particular functions, and why they are arranged or organised in a certain manner. Just as while driving a car, we are using its various components, while speaking a language we are using the sounds, words, etc. of that language; behind these uses is the mechanism which enables us to do so. We study language because it is important for us to understand this mechanism.

Linguistics as a Science

Linguistics can he understood as a science in both general and specific terms. Generally, we use the term 'science' for any knowledge that is based on clear, systematic and rational understanding. Thus we often speak of the 'science of politics' or statecraft, or 'the science of cooking'. However, we also use the term 'science' for the systematic study of phenomena enabling us to state some principles or theories regarding the phenomena; this study proceeds by examination of publicly verifiable data obtained through observation of phenomena, and experimentation; in other words, it is empirical and objective. Science must also provide explanation after adequate observation of data, which should be consistent, i.e. there should be no contradictions between different parts of the explanation or statement; and economical, i.e. a precise and non-redundant manner of statement is to be preferred.

Let us apply these criteria of science to linguistics. Linguistics studies language: language is a phenomenon which is both objective and variable. Like natural phenomena in the physical world, it has a concrete shape and occurrence. In the same way as a physicist or chemist takes materials and measures their weights, densities etc. to determine their nature, the linguist studies the components of language, e.g.

'Science' is defined as a knowledge that is based on clear, systematic and rational understanding

Systematic study of phenomena enabling us to state some principles or theories regarding the phenomena,

Study proceeds by examination of publicly verifiable data obtained through observation of phenomena, and experimentation. (Empirical and Objective)

Each observable phenomenon is to be given a precise explanation. Its nature has to be described completely.

observing the occurrence of speech-sounds, or the way in which words begin or end. Language, like other phenomena, is objective because it is observable with the senses, i.e., it can be heard with the ear, it can be seen when the vocal organs are in movement, or when reading words on a page.

Observation leads to processes of classification and definition. In science, each observable phenomenon is to be given a precise explanation. Its nature has to be described completely. Thus, for example, the chemist classifies elements into metals and non-metals; a biologist classifies living things into plants and animals. In the same way, linguistics observes the features of language, classifies these features as being sound features of particular types, or words belonging to particular classes on the basis of similarity or difference with other sounds and words.

But while linguistics shares some of characteristics of empirical (experimental) science*, it is also a* social science because it studies language which is a form of social behaviour and exists in interaction between human beings in society*. Language is also linked to* human mental processes*. For these reasons, it cannot be treated always as objective phenomena.*

In empirical sciences, the methods of observation and experimentation are known as inductive procedures that phenomena are observed and data is collected without any preconceived idea or theory, and after the data is studied, some theory is formulated. This has been the main tradition in the history of western science. But there is an opposing tradition the tradition of rationalism, which holds that the mind forms certain concepts or ideas beforehand in terms of which it interprets the data of observation and experience. According to this tradition, the deductive procedure is employed in which we have a preliminary hypothesis or theory in our minds which we then try to prove by applying it to the data. This procedure was considered to be unscientific according to the empirical scientists because they felt that pre-existent ideas can influence the kind of data we obtain i.e. we search only for those pieces of data that fit our theory and disregard others and therefore it is not an objective method.

We can, however, reconcile these two procedures. There are aspects of language which we can observe quite easily and which offer concrete instances of objective and verifiable data. At the same time, we need to create hypothesis to explain this data, so we may create tentative or working hypothesis to explain this data, which we may accept, reject or modify as we proceed further. With such an open attitude, we may collect more data. This alternation of inductive and deductive procedures may help us to arrive at explanations which meet all the requirements of science, i.e. they are exhaustive, consistent and concise.

Thus, linguistics is both an empirical science and a social science. In fact, it is a human discipline since it is concerned with human language; so it is part of the study of humanities as well. This includes the study of literature, and appreciation of the beauty and music of poetry. In understanding language, humankind can understand itself. Moreover, since every branch of knowledge uses language, linguistics is central to all areas of knowledge. In regard to linguistics, the traditional distinctions of science, art and humanities are not relevant. As Lyons puts it, linguistics has natural links with a wide range of academic disciplines. To say that linguistics is a science is not to deny that, by virtue of its subject matter, it is closely related to such eminently human disciplines as philosophy and literary criticism.

Scope of Linguistics

Linguistics today is a subject of study, independent of other disciplines. Before the twentieth century, the study of language was not regarded as a separate area of study in its own right. It was considered to be a part of studying the history of language or the philosophy of language, and this was known not as linguistics but as philosophy. So 'Linguistics' is a modern name which defines a specific discipline, in which we study language not in relation to some other area such as history or philosophy, but language as itself, as a self-enclosed and autonomous system, worthy of study in its own right. It was necessary at the beginning of the growth of modern linguistics to define this autonomy of the subject; otherwise it would not have been possible to study the language system with the depth and exhaustiveness which it requires. However, now we acknowledge that while linguistics is a distinct area of study, it is also linked to other disciplines and there are overlapping areas of concern.

The main concern of modern linguistics is to describe language, to study its nature and to establish a theory of language. That is, it aims at studying the components of the language system and to ultimately arrive at an explanatory statement on how the system works. In modern linguistics, the activity of describing the language system is the most important and so modern linguistics is generally known as descriptive. But linguistics has other concerns as well, which fall within its scope and these include historical and comparative study of language. These differ from the descriptive approach in their emphasis; otherwise, these approaches also involve description of language.

Levels of Linguistic Analysis

In studying language which is the subject-matter of linguistics, we mark or sub-divide the area in order to study it in an analytical and systematic way. Language has a hierarchical structure. This means that it is made up of units which are themselves made up of smaller units which are made of still smaller units till we have the smallest indivisible unit, i.e. a single distinguishable sound, called a phoneme. Or we can put it the other way round, and say that single sounds or phonemes combine together to make larger units of sounds, these combine into a larger meaningful unit called a morpheme; morphemes combine to form larger units of words, and words combine to form a large unit or sentence and several sentences combine or interconnect to make a unified piece of speech or writing, which we call a text or discourse. At each stage (or level), there are certain rules that operate which permit the occurrence and combination of smaller units. So we can say that rule of phonology determine the occurrence and combination of particular phoneme, rules of word-formation cover the behaviour of particular morphemes; rules of sentence-formation determine the combination and positioning of words in a sentence. Each level is a system in its own right. It is important to remember that, because of the existence of rules at each level, we can analyse each level independently of the other. This means that if we study one level, e.g. phonology or the sound-system, we need not necessarily study another level, say that of sentence-formation. We can study phonology on its own, and syntax on its own. Although these levels are linked in that one is lower in the hierarchy and another is higher in the hierarchy, and the higher level includes the lower, still each level is independent because it has its own rules of operation that can be described, analysed and understood.

We can represent these levels in the following manner, with each level of analysis corresponding to each level of the structure of the language:

Levels of Analysis	Levels of Structure
Phonetics and Phonology	Sound Letters (Graphology)
Morphology	Word Formation
Syntax	Sentence-Formation
Semantics	Meanings
Discourse	Connected Sentences

A careful look at the above diagram will show that the levels of language structure are not completely separate from one another. In fact, there are important and vital linkages between the levels. In earlier studies, it was supposed that phonology, the level of sound structure, had no link whatsoever with semantics or the level of meaning structure. Now we know that links between these levels are far more complex than we had earlier accepted. With regard to discourse, we can see that it is made up of all the levels of language working together, while semantics incorporates analysis of meaning at the level of both words (word-meaning) and of sentence-meaning.

However, we can study these links only after we describe and analyse structure at each level separately. Thus Phonetics studies language at the level of sounds*:*

How sounds are articulated by the human speech mechanism and received by the auditory mechanism, how sounds can be distinguished and characterised by the manner in which they are produced.

Phonology studies the combination of sounds into organised units of speech, the formation of syllables and larger units.

It describes the sound system of a particular language and the combination and distribution of sounds which occur in that language. Classification is made on the basis of the concept of the phoneme, i.e. a distinctive, contrasted sound unit, e.g. /m/, //, /p/. These distinct sounds enter into combination with others. The rules of combination are different for different languages.

Though phonology is considered to be the surface or superficial level of language (as it is concrete and not abstract like meaning), there are some aspects of it such as tone which contribute to the meaning of an utterance.

Morphology studies the patterns of formation of words by the combination of sounds into minimal distinctive units of meaning called morphemes.

A morpheme cannot be broken up because if it is, it will no longer make sense, e.g. a morpheme 'bat' is made up of three sounds: /b/ /æ/ and /t/. This combination makes up the single morpheme 'bat' and if broken up, it will no longer carry the meaning of 'bat'. Words can be made up of single morphemes such as 'bat' or combinations of morphemes, e.g. 'bats' is made up of two morphemes: 'bat' + 's'. Morphology deals with the rules of combination of morphemes to form words, as suffixes or prefixes are attached to single morphemes to form words. It studies the changes that take place in the structure of words, e.g. the morpheme 'take' changes to 'took' and 'taken'––these changes signify a change in tense.

The level of morphology is linked to phonology on the one hand and to semantics on the other. It is clear in the above example of 'take' that the change to 'took' involves a change in one of the sounds in this morpheme. It also involves a change in meaning: 'take' means the action 'take' + time present and 'took' means the action 'take' + time past. Thus morphological changes often involve changes at the levels of both sound and meaning.

Syntax is the level at which we study how words combine to form phrases, phrases combine to form clauses and clauses join to make sentences. The study of syntax also involves the description of the rules of positioning of elements in the sentence such as the nouns/noun syntax phrases, verbs/verb phrases, adverbial phrases, etc. A sentence must be composed of these elements arranged in a particular order. Syntax also attempts to describe how these elements function in the sentence, i.e. what is their role in the sentence. For example, the word 'boy' is a noun. However, in each of the following sentences, it functions in different roles:

(a) The boy likes cricket

(b) The old man loved the boy.

In sentence (a), it functions as the subject of the sentence

In sentence (b), it functions as the object.

A sentence should be both grammatical and meaningful. For example, a sentence like 'Colourless green ideas sleep furiously' is grammatically correct but it is not meaningful. Thus, rules of syntax should be comprehensive enough to explain how sentences are constructed which are both grammatical and meaningful.

Semantics deals with the level of meaning in language. It attempts to analyse the structure of meaning in a language, e.g. how words similar or different are related; it attempts to show these inter-relationships through forming 'categories'. Semantics tries to give an account of both word and sentence meaning, and attempts to analyse and define that which is considered to be abstract. It may be easy to define the meanings of words such as 'tree' but not so easy to define the meanings of words such as 'love' or similar abstract things. This is why semantics is one of the less clearly definable areas of language study.

An extension of the study of meaning or semantics is pragmatics. Pragmatics deals with the contextual aspects of meaning in particular situations. As distinct from the study of sentences, pragmatics considers utterances, i.e. those sentences which are actually uttered by speakers of a language.

Discourse is the study of chunks of language which are bigger than a single sentence. At this level, we analyse inter-sentential links that form a connected or cohesive text. Cohesion is the relation established in a sentence between it and the sentences preceding and following it, by the use of connectives such as 'and', 'though', 'also', 'but' etc. and by the manner in which reference is made to other parts of the text by devices such as repetition or by use of pronouns, definite articles, etc. By studying the elements of cohesion we can understand how a piece of connected language can have greater meaning that is more than the sum of the individual sentences it contains.

In addition to these levels of linguistic analysis, we also study Graphology which is the study of the writing system of a language and the conventions used in representing speech in writing, e.g. the formation of letters Lexicology studies the manner in which lexical items (words) are grouped together as in the compilation of dictionaries.

Linguists differ according to what they consider as included in the scope of linguistic studies. Some consider the proper area of linguistics to be confined to the levels of phonology, morphology and syntax. This can be called a Micro-linguistic perspective. However, some take a broader or macro-linguistic view which includes the other levels of analysis mentioned above, as well as other aspects of language and its relationship with many areas of human activity.

Branches of Linguistics

The core of linguistic studies is the study of language structure at different levels as discussed above. In the growth of modern linguistics as an autonomous field of knowledge, it has been necessary to emphasize this aspect of linguistics, since no other field of study describes language structure systematically and completely.

However, there are many areas of human activity and knowledge in which language plays a part and linguistics is useful in these areas. The study of language in relation to the many areas of knowledge where it is relevant, has led to the growth of many branches of linguistics. Thus the scope of linguistics has grown to include these branches. Linguistics can be classified into two major branches according to language scholars:

Theoretical linguistics is the branch of linguistics that is most concerned with developing models of linguistic knowledge. The fields that are generally considered the core of theoretical linguistics are syntax, phonology, morphology, and semantics. Although phonetics often informs phonology, it is often excluded from the purview of theoretical linguistics, along with psycholinguistics and sociolinguistics. Theoretical linguistics also involves the search for an explanation of linguistic universals, that is, properties all languages have in common.
Applied Linguistics the study of language-related issues applied in everyday life, notably language policies, planning, and education. It is the application of linguistics theories to evaluate the language problems arisen from other professions like sociology, psychology, ethnology, geography, neurology, biology, and history etc.

Various branches of linguistics have grown because language is intimately related both to the inner, world of man's mind and to the outer world of society and social relationships. Each of these aspects has led to the study of psycho-linguistics and sociolinguistics respectively.

Since language is a mental phenomenon, it is mental processes which are articulated in language behaviour. Psycholinguistics studies these mental processes, processes of thought and concept formation and their articulation in language, which reveal a great deal about the structures of human psychology as well as of language. 'Cognitive' psychology is the area which explores how meanings are understood by the human brain, how syntax and memory are linked, how messages are 'decoded' and stored. Psycholinguistics also studies the influence of psychological factors such as intelligence, motivation, anxiety etc. on the kind of language that is understood and produced. For instance, in the case of errors made by a speaker, there may be psychological reasons which influence comprehension or production that are responsible for the occurrence of an error. Our perception of speech sounds or graphic symbols (in writing) is influenced by the state of our mind. One kind of mental disability, for example, results in the mistakes made by children in reading when they mistake one letter for another (Dyslexia). Psycholinguistics can offer some insights and corrective measures for this condition.

Psycholinguistics is concerned with the learning of language at various stages: the early acquisition of a first language by children and later stages in acquisition of first and other languages. Psycholinguists attempt to answer questions such as whether the human brain has an inborn language ability structured in such a way that certain grammatical and semantic patterns are embedded in it, which can explain how all human beings are capable of learning a language. This exploration may lead us to determining whether all the languages in the world have some 'universal' grammar that lies in the mind of every human being and is transformed in particular situations to produce different languages. Psycholinguistic studies in language acquisition are very useful in the area of language teaching because they help teachers to understand error production and individual differences among learners and thus devise appropriate syllabi and materials for them.

One specialized area within psycholinguistics is Neurolinguistics that studies the physiological basis of language and language disorders such as aphasia, loss of memory, etc.

Another relation of language with mind is that of logic. It was held by some ancient philosophers that the human mind is rational and capable of thinking logically and, therefore, language too is logically ordered and rational. Others held that, just as irrationality is present in the mind, irregularity or anomaly is present in human language. Since then there has been a debate about the nature of language and the relation between language and logic. One of the problems discussed by philosophers of language is whether language can be an adequate medium for philosophical inquiry. Since all our thoughts are known to us through language, we must examine the kind of language we use when we approach philosophical issues and analysis.

The branch of linguistics that deals with the exploration of the relation between language and society is known as sociolinguistics, and the sociology of language. Sociolinguistics is based on the fact that language is not a single homogeneous entity, but has different forms in different situations. The changes in language occur because of changes in social conditions, for example, social class, gender, regional and cultural groups. A particular social group may speak a different variety of a language from the rest of the community. This group becomes a speech community.

Variation in language may occur because the speakers belong to a different geographical region. Taking the example of English, we find that it is not a single language but exists in the form of several varieties. One kind of English is called R.P. (or Received Pronunciation). This kind of English is used in the south west of England and particularly associated with the universities of Oxford and Cambridge and the BBC. It is an educated and formal kind of English. But there are other varieties of English, such as the English that is spoken in the north of England, in Yorkshire and Lancashire; in Scotland(Scottish English); Wales (Welsh English), etc. A less educated variety of English is that spoken by working class people in London often called Cockney English. Then there are the varieties of English spoken by people of different countries around the world, e.g. American English, and Australian English.

Sociolinguistics is the study of language variation and change–how varieties of language are formed when the speakers belong to a geographical region, social class, social situation and occupation, etc. Varieties of a language that are formed in various geographical regions involve a change in the pronunciation as well as vocabulary. Such changes result in the formation of a distinctly different variety of the language or a dialect. Sometimes these changes may be present within the same geographical region due to the social differences between different economic sections, e.g. working class and aristocracy. These changes result in class-dialects.

In sociolinguistic studies, we consider the linguistic features of these dialects, e.g. syntax variations such as 'I've gotten it' or 'I ain't seen nothing' and lexical variations such as 'lift' (British English) to 'elevator' (American English). The study of the demarcation of dialect boundaries across a region and of specific features of each dialect is called dialectology. One dialect may be demarcated from another by listing a bundle of features which occur in a particular region. The point at which a certain feature (of pronunciation or vocabulary) ceases to be prevalent and gives way to another feature is a dialect boundary or 'isogloss'. Dialects may acquire some importance and prestige and evolve into distinct languages. This usually happens when they are codified, e.g. in written and literary forms, and their grammar and lexicon is standardized. Usually this happens when the dialect is given political and social importance. That is why it is said 'A language is a dialect with an army, and navy'. Sociolinguists chart the evolution of such changes.

Variation in language may also be due to the specific area of human activity in which language is used. Again taking the example of English, this language is used in different fields—of law, religion, science, sports etc. In each of these areas there is a specific vocabulary and manner of use of English, which defines the legal language, the scientific language etc. This variety of language according to its use, is called register. Sociolinguists examine the particular characteristics of different registers, i.e. legal register, scientific register, etc., to see how these differ. This kind of study is useful because it enables us to understand how language-use is tied to a social context. The notion of register is important in showing that language use in communication is not arbitrary or uncontrolled, but is governed by rules of situational and contextual appropriateness.

The sociology of language includes the study of attitudes to language held by social groups, for instance, they may consider some languages or dialects as more (or less) important. It includes the planning of language education, e.g. which languages should he the medium of instruction, which language should be taught as second language; and language policy, i.e. which languages are legally and constitutionally recognised and what status they are given. The sociology of language is thus linked with other aspects of our social world, the political, economic, educational, etc.

(c) Anthropological Linguistics

The evolution of language in human society and its role in the formation of culture; is another aspect of language society and culture, this is studied in anthropological linguistics. The structure of language has a social and cultural basis in the same way as other customs, conventions and codes such as those related to dress, food, etc. Each culture organises its world its own way, giving names to objects, identifying areas of significance or value and suppressing other areas. Language becomes a way of embodying the world view and beliefs of a culture, and the things that culture holds sacred; for example, a culture in which family relationships occupy the most significant position will have many kinship terms in their language, with each relationship specified by a particular term. If you compare the kinship terms in English such as grandfather, grandmother, uncle, aunt, etc. with kinship terms in Urdu, you will find that there are many more such terms in Urdu specifying particular relationships such as a paternal / maternal grand-father.

Similarly, terms specifying colours, emotions, natural phenomena, and so on are differently organised in every culture, and reveal a great deal about that culture. The study of these specific cultural elements is called the ethnography of a culture. A specific way of communication in a culture is thus studied as the ethnography of communication.

Anthropological studies have explored the relation between language and culture. Language is invented to communicate and express a culture. It also happens that this language then begins to determine the way we think and see the world. Since this language is the means by which we understand and think about the world, we cannot go beyond it and understand the world in any other way. This is the view expressed by the linguist Whorf whose hypothesis is that we dissect nature along the lines laid by our native language. There is still a debate about this, but it is true that to some extent we are hound to see the world according to the terms specified by our own language. These aspects of language and culture are still being discussed by anthropological linguists, philosophers of language and ethnographers.

The study of variation in language and the use of language in communication has also led to new ways of studying literary texts and the nature of literary communication. If you consider again the notion of register discussed above, you may realise that register is in fact a kind of language that is considered appropriate for a particular subject matter, e.g. the style of a religious sermon, the style of sports commentary. Similarly we may use this notion to describe the style of a literary work. That is, we may describe its features at the levels of phonology, syntax, lexis, etc. to distinguish it from other texts and to appreciate how it achieves some unique effects through the use of language. This kind of study is called literary stylistics.

Literary writers use the system of language in their own way, i.e. they create a style. This is done by deliberate choice (e.g. out of a whole range of words available, they choose one which would be particularly effective), sometimes by deviation from or violation of the rules of grammar (e.g. 'he danced his did' in Cummings' poem). Poets and even prose writers may invert the normal order of items in a sentence (e.g. 'Home is the sailor…') or create a pattern by repetition of some items (e.g. the sound /f/ in 'the furrow followed free'). By these and other devices, they are able to manipulate language so that it conveys some theme or meaning with great force and effectiveness.

In literary stylistics, we read the text closely with attention to the features of language used in it, identifying and listing the particular features under the heading of 'lexis', 'grammar', 'phonology' or 'sound patterns'. When we have obtained a detailed account of all these features, we co-relate them or bring them together in an interpretation of the text. That is, we try to link 'what is being said' with 'how it is being said,' since it is through the latter that writers can fully express the many complex ideas and feelings that they want to convey. Stylistic analysis also helps in a better understanding of how metaphor, irony, paradox, ambiguity etc. operate in a literary text as these are all effects achieved through language and through the building up of a coherent linguistic structure.

LINGUISTICS
Scientific study of Language
Theoretical Linguistics
Concerned with developing models of linguistic knowledge
Applied Linguistics
Concerned with the application of linguistics theories to evaluate the language problems arisen from other professions
Phonetics
Study of the physical properties of speech (or signed) production and perception.
Phonology
Study of sounds (or signs) as discrete, abstract elements in the speaker's mind that distinguish meaning.
Morphology
Study of internal structures of words and how they can be modified.
Syntax
Study of how words combine to form grammatical sentences.
Semantics
Study of the meaning of words and fixed word combinations and how these combine to form the meanings of sentences.
Pragmatics
Study of how utterances are used in communicative acts, and the role played by context and nonlinguistic knowledge in the transmission of meaning.
Discourse analysis
Analysis of language use in texts (spoken, written, or signed).
Sociolinguistics
Study of variation in language and its relationship with social factors.
Psycholinguistics
Study of the cognitive processes and representations underlying language use
Ethnolinguistics
Studies the relationship between language and culture, and the way different ethnic groups perceive the world.
Geolinguistics
Study of the geographical distribution of languages and linguistic features.
Neurolinguistics
Study of the structures in the human brain that underlie grammar and communication
Biolinguistics
Study of natural as well as human-taught communication systems in animals, compared to human language.
Historical linguistics
(diachronic linguistics) Study of language change over time.

Human-Animal Communication

Language is primarily human. It is humans alone that possess language and use it for communication. Language is, in that sense, species-specific–it is specific only to one set of species. Also, all human beings uniformly possess language. It is only a few deaf and dumb persons who cannot speak. Thus language is species-uniform to that extent. Animals also have their own system of communication but communication between them is extremely limited.

It is limited to a very small number of messages. The first principle is that language relates to communication between human beings, not between animals. Language shows certain inherent features of design. These features set it apart from other forms of communication; particularly animal communication. The famous American linguist, Charles Hackett has found key properties of language or design features which as a whole don't appear among animals: these are the design features of language. These are seven: duality, productivity, arbitrariness, interchangeability, displacement, specialization and cultural transmission. Animal communication can never encompass all the properties of human communication. In this regard, Bertrand Russell's dictum is appropriate*: "No matter how eloquently a dog may bark, he cannot tell you that his parents were poor but honest".*

Human Language	Animal Communication
Unlimited	Limited and finite
Open system	Closed system
Extendible	Inextendible
Flexible and varied	Non-inflexible
Non-intrinsic	Instinctive
Acquired	Inherent
Creativity	Non-creativity
Recurrent	Repetitive
Has grammaticality	No grammaticality
Cognitively behavioral	Only behavioral
Descriptive & narrative	No-descriptive

Firstly, language has phonological and grammatical duality. We have small meaningless sounds and turn them into a number of sequences to produce millions of meaningful utterances. This is the most economical feature of language.

Secondly, productivity refers to the creative capacity of language users to produce an endless number of new sentences, in contrast to the communication systems of individuals which are limited to set formulas and are thus

'unproductive'. Chomsky calls it Creativity. It means that we can create sentences which we have never spoken or heard of. Animals don't possess this quality.

Thirdly, in language, the role of the speaker and hearer can be exchanged without any problem. Any user of the language is both a listener and a speaker. In the animal world, some are endowed with the ability while others are not.

Fourthly, Human Speech is a specialized activity. We can talk about an exciting experience while at the same time doing something else like peeling potatoes.

Fifthly, a human being, for example, can talk about the past, the present or the future, of an event that happened nearby or thousands of miles away. An animal cannot do that. When a dog produces a certain sound, it generally refers to the present.

Man is said to be intimately disposed to learn a language. His innate competence helps him master the unique features of a specific language. Thus language is transmitted from generation to generation. Animals don't learn their call systems from elders. Their knowledge is inherent.

Language is both species-specific and species-uniform. We acquire our native tongue by cultural transmission. It is by means of our native tongue that we receive cultural transmissions that we learn and adapt. This is the spiral that has driven human development. Animal communication differs from human communication in many ways as illustrated in the chart.

Furthermore, language makes use of discrete symbols while animal communication systems are often continuous or non-discrete. One can clearly distinguish between /k/, /æ/ and /t/ in the word cat but one cannot identify different discrete symbols in the long humming sound that a bee produces. A bee's dance or a cock's crow is today the same that it was two hundred years ago. It is not so in the case of language. Language is changing, growing every day and new words are coming up. Human language is far more structurally complex than animal communication. Human language is complex while there is no complexity in Lamb's cry.

In short, there is a great difference between the two species yet in many ways, humans interpret the behaviour of domestic animals, or can command them. Humans have behaviors that resemble animal's interspecific communication. Some of our bodily features - eyebrows, beards and moustaches - strongly resemble adaptations to producing signals. Humans also often seek to mimic animals' communicative signals in order to interact with the animals. For example, humans often close their eyes towards a pet cat to establish a tolerant relationship. Stroking, petting and rubbing pet animals are all actions that probably work through their natural patterns of interspecific communication.

Principles and Major Concepts of Linguistics

Saussure and His Main Contributions

Ferdinand de Saussure (1857-1913) was a Swiss linguist who occupies an important place in the history of linguistics and is generally considered the founder of modern linguistics. It was he who first of all emphasized the importance of viewing language as a living phenomenon. He was the founder of a "theoretic foundation to the newer trend in linguistics study," and European scholars have seldom failed to consider his views when dealing with any theoretical problem. Jonathan Culler (1976) says, "Ferdinand de Saussure is the father of modern linguistics, the man who reorganized the systematic study of language and language in such a way as to make possible the achievements of twentieth-century linguists. This alone would make him a Modern Master: master of a discipline which he made modern."

De Saussure's contribution to modern linguistics was responsible for three key directions in the study of language. He distinguished between Synchrony and Diachrony, between langue and parole, between signified and signifier and between syntagmatic and paradigmatic. He also contributed by describing the distinction bet6ween syntagmatic and paradigmatic, the theory of associative value. Saussure's contributions to linguistics are given below:

Synchrony and Diachrony

Synchrony: - Saussure proposed that language as a system of signs be studied as a complete system at any given point in time. Like chess, the important part of language is how pieces move and the positions of all pieces relative to one another. The shape of each piece is only important in that its potential can be recognized.

A synchronic relationship is one where two similar things exist at the same time. Modern American English and British English have a synchronic relationship.

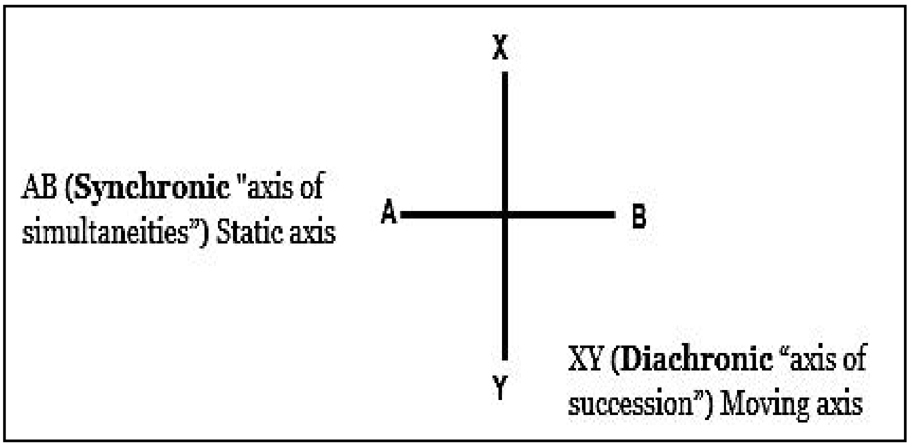
Diachrony: - Diachrony is the change in the meaning of words over time. For example in the way that 'magic' meant 'good' in youth culture for a period during the 1980s (and, to a lesser extent, beyond). It is thus the study of language in terms of how it visibly changes in usage. It is based in the dictionary meaning of words.

A diachronic relationship is where related things exist separated by time. 12th century English and 21st century English have a diachronic relationship.

Synchrony and Diachrony in Linguistics

According to the method, range or scope of its study, or the focus of interest of the linguist, Linguistics can be classified into different kinds, the chief of which are Diachronic Linguistics and Synchronic Linguistics.

Diachronic linguistics is the kind in which we study the historical development of language through different periods of time. For example, we study how French and Italian have grown out of Latin. The changes that have occurred in language with the passage of time, are also studied under this kind of linguistics; therefore, it is called historical linguistics.



Synchronic linguistics is not concerned with the historical development of language. It confines itself to the study of how a language is spoken by a specified speech community at a particular point of time. It is also called 'descriptive' linguistics. Diachronic linguistics studies language change, and synchronic linguistics studies language states without their history.

According to C.F. Hockett: "The study of how a language works at a given time, regardless of its past history or future destiny, is called descriptive or synchronic linguistics. The study of how speech habits change as time goes by is called historical or diachronic linguistics"

The distinction synchrony and diachrony refers to the difference in treating language from different points of view. Though the historical character of a language cannot be ignored, its present form being the result of definite historical processes, changes and transformations, it is necessary for a complete understanding of it to concentrate on the units of its structure at the present moment. Some scholars do not see the two approaches apart. They assert that it is a mistake to think of descriptive and historical linguistics as two separate compartments. However, on the whole the two areas are kept apart and one is studied to the exclusion of the other. Synchronic statements make no reference to the previous stages in the language. Linguistic studies in the nineteenth century were historical in character; they originated as part of the general historical investigations into the origins and development of cultures and communities, especially West Asia, Egypt, etc. Such philological researches viewed language at different stages of its progress and attempted to understand relations among different languages. Language families were discovered and genetic affinities identified. For Zhirmunsky, Diachronic linguistics was a great discovery of the 19th century:

"Which developed so powerfully and fruitfully from the 1820s to the 1880s. This discovery enabled linguists to explain modern languages as a result of law-governed historical development".

On a closer look one realizes that without a good synchronic (descriptive) work, valid historical (diachronic) postulations are not possible; in other words, a good historical linguist needs to be thorough descriptive scholar too.

The figure above shows the distinction. Diachronic axis (x-y) has been considered moving and the synchronic axis static. It was Swiss linguist Ferdinand de Sassure who first coined these terms and established the distinctions. As the Russian linguist V.M. Zhirmunsky observes, 'In de Saussure's conception, synchrony is language considered as a system of static oppositions resting on a single temporal plane, a static two dimensional cross-section". The principles that introduce this dichotomy enable us to obtain, according to Wilkins, 'particularly accurate information about a language in its current usage'. For Saussure, Historical considerations are irrelevant to the investigation of particular temporal states of a language. But Saussure's analogy of chess breaks at the point that players determine the course of any particular game that is being played in opposition to one another and with reference to a recognized goal. As far as we know, there is no directionality in the diachronic development of languages.

Signifier and Signified

Description: - Saussure's 'theory of the sign' defined a sign as being made up of the matched pair of signifier and signified.

Signifier: - The signifier is the pointing finger, the word, the sound-image. A word is simply a jumble of letters. The pointing finger is not the star. It is in the interpretation of the signifier that meaning is created.

Signified: - The signified is the concept, the meaning, the thing indicated by the signifier. It need not be a 'real object' but is some referent to which the signifier refers. The thing signified is created in the perceiver and is internal to them. Whilst we share concepts, we do so via signifiers. Whilst the signifier is more stable, the signified varies between people and contexts. The signified does stabilize with habit, as the signifier cues thoughts and images. The signifier and signified, whilst superficially simple, form a core element of semiotics.

Saussure's ideas are contrary to Plato's notion of ideas being eternally stable. Plato saw ideas as the root concept that was implemented in individual instances. A signifier without signified has no meaning, and the signified changes with person and context. For Saussure, even the root concept is malleable.

The relationship between the signifier and the signified is arbitrary (Saussure called this 'unmotivated'). A real object need not actually exist 'out there'. Whilst the letters 'c-a-t' spell cat, they do not embody 'catness'. The French 'chat' is not identical to the English 'cat' in the signified that it creates (to the French, 'chat' has differences of meaning). In French, 'mouton' means both 'mutton' and a living 'sheep', whilst the English does not differentiate.

Saussure inverts the usual reflectionist view that the signifier reflects the signified: the signifier creates the signified in terms of the meaning it triggers for us. The meaning of a sign needs both the signifier and the signified as created by an interpreter. A signifier without a signified is noise. A signified without a signifier is impossible.

Syntagmatic and Paradigmatic

Introduction: - Ferdinand de Saussure saw the linguistic sign at once as static and dynamic or developing. The pairing of terms, synchrony-diachrony; form-substance; langue-parole as sets of contrasting relations amply demonstrates this concept. The idea is to highlight and demonstrate two dominant properties of a linguistic sign, one linear and the other arbitrary. La langue is thus more stable and predictably organised than la parole which displays freedom and dynamism which is not rule-governed, therefore unpredictable. Similarly, de Saussure put forward the concepts of syntagmatic and what he at that time called 'associative relations'.

Syntagmatic: - In Syntagmatic relations the syntagme is seen as any 'combination of discrete successive units of which there are at least two, with no limit on the possible number'. These segments range from the smallest construction units, i.e. phonemes, to phrases, and so on. Thus the word read is a succession of phonemes /r/, /i:/, /d/; re-read a succession of bound morpheme and a free morphemes.

For Saussure sentence is the most obvious example of a syntagme. It is a combination of other linguistic units. They demonstrate chain relationship. The unit acquires its significance by its position of occurrence vis-a-vis other elements preceding and following it. We shall take an example to e see elements occurring in a linear order in the following sentence:

She will come tomorrow.
The pronoun+ auxiliary+ main verb + adverb.

This ordering of the words cannot be changed. Syntagmatic relations function on the horizontal emphasizing the relational criteria identifying or defining linguistic categories or units. The concept of syntagmatic relations underlines the structural potential of any item, under examination.

Paradigmatic: - The paradigmatic relationships are contrastive or choice relationships. Words that have something in common, are; associated in the memory, resulting in groups marked by diverse relations. For example, the English word learning will unconsciously call to mind a host of other words–study, knowledge, discipline, etc. All these words are related in some way. This kind of relationship is called associative or paradigmatic relationship. Here the co-ordinations are outside discourse and are not supported by linearity. They are relations in absentia, and are vertical type relations. Their seat is in the brain; they are a part of the inner storehouse that makes up language of each speaker." (Saussure)

We can visualize a word as the centre of a constellation around which spring other words. These relations are unpredictable. Associations that are called up in one person may not occur in the mind of another. Since it is psychological, it is also subject to individual vagaries and governed by the specific factors governing the individual's speech behaviour, Paradigmatic relations are unpredictable, free, dynamic and idiosyncratic, comparable to la parole. It was the Danish linguist Lois Hjelmslev who suggested the term 'paradigmatic' for de Saussure's' 'associative relations'.

Langue and Parole

Introduction: - The major contribution of Ferdinand de Saussure to linguistics can be summed up as providing the basic groundwork of fundamental concepts; his definition of the 'linguistic sign'; his explanation of the distinction between concrete and abstract linguistic units; distinction between descriptive (synchronic) and historical (diachronic), study of language, and so on. He was under the influence of the new scientific temperament and followed the principles of Durkheim who said that 'we have social facts that can be studied scientifically when we consider them from an aspect that is independent of their individual manifestations'. This attitude helped the shaping of the structuralist approach.

De Saussure put forward the concepts of La langue, La Parole and Le Language.

Le langage denotes a host of heterogeneous traits that a speaker possesses, such as his ability to produce speech acquired through heredity, his inherent ability to speak and the external factors that trigger and stimulate speech. It encompasses such factors as physical, physiological and psychological. Most significantly, it belongs to both the individual and society. Speech occupies a less important place in Le Langage. The latter' is, therefore, of greater interest to the anthropologist and the biologist.

La langue is more directly indicative of ability to produce speech, a kind of 'institutionalized element' of the community's collective consciousness. Every member of the community shares it, and because of this they are in a position to understand each other. Through langue they share the common properties of speech. 'If one took away what was idiosyncratic or innovational, langue would remain. Langue, by definition, is stable and systematic, society conveys the regularities of langue to the child so that he becomes able to function as a member of the speech community (Wilkins).

La langue is a collective pattern which exists as 'a sum of impressions deposited in the brain of each individual.., like a dictionary of which identical copies have been distributed to each individual... it exists in each individual, yet it is common to all'.

La langue is a repository of signs which each speaker has received from the other speakers of the community. It is passive. It is a set of conventions received by us all, ready-made from the community.

La Parole: By contrast la parole is active and denotes the actual speech act of the individual. We can better understand it by considering each act of speaking as a unique event. It is unique because it reflects the unstable, changeable relationship between the languages, the precise contextual elements triggering particular utterances, and personal factors. Thus each particular speech act is characterised by the personality, nature and several other external forces governing both the production and reception of a speech act. There is a great deal that is particular, individual, personal and idiosyncratic about la parole as opposed to la langue which emphasizes speech as the common act of behaviour, 'given that there is a good deal that is idiosyncratic or not fully institutionalised, parole cannot be stable and systematic' (Wilkins). Parole gives the data from which statements about langue are made; parole is not collective but individual, momentary and heterogeneous.

As Francis P. Dinneen points out "when we hear la parole of another community, we perceive the noises made, but not the social fact of language. We cannot connect the sounds produced and the social facts with which the other speech associates the sounds. When we hear la parole within our own community we perceive the sounds as associated with social facts, according to a set of rules. These rules, which can be called the convention, or grammar, of the language are habits that education has imposed on us. They have the property of being general throughout the community. That is why all the speakers can understand each other.

The main points of distinction between La Langue and La Parole can be summed up as follows.

La Langue	La Parole
It is stable and institutionalized	It is mobile and personal.
It is passive	It is active.
It is a social fact and general for the community.	It is individual and idiosyncratic.
It contains the negative limits on what a speaker must say.	It does not put any such limits.
It is sum of properties shared by all speakers of a community.	It contains infinite number of individual properties.
A scientific study can only be based on La langue	It is not amenable to scientific study.
It is an abstraction.	It is concrete manifestation.
It is a collective instrument.	It is not a collective instrument.
It is a set of conventions and habits handed down to next generation readymade.	It is diverse and variegated.
It is language as a speaker is expected to use.	It is language in actual use.
It is not subject to social and individual pressure.	It is susceptible to social and other pressure.
It is fixed.	It is free.
It is a potential form of language.	It is an actualized form of language.

The contribution Saussure had on language was revolutionary. His work had a profound influence on many aspects of linguistics. Lastly the following statement from Benevensite will reflect his contribution: "a forerunner in doctrines which in the post fifty years have transformed the theory of language, he has opened us unforgettable vistas on the highest and mysterious faculty of man… he has contributed to the advent of formal thought in the sciences of society and culture and to the founding of a general semiology". There is not a single general theory which doesn't mention him name.

Chomsky's Concept of Competence & Performance

A distinction developed by Noam Chomsky beginning in his 1965 book Aspects of the Theory of Syntax in which he outlines what he believes the goals of Linguistics should be.

A quote from the book:

Linguistic theory is concerned primarily with an ideal speaker-listener, in a completely homogeneous speech community, who know its (the speech community's) language perfectly and is unaffected by such grammatically irrelevant conditions as memory limitations, distractions, shifts of attention and interest, and errors (random or characteristic) in applying his knowledge of this language in actual performance. (Chomsky, 1965, p. 3)

Chomsky argued that linguists should study only the underlying representations of language, and specifically of their own language (he believed that until linguists understand their own language, they cannot understand language in general; this is why he devoted so much of his career to the analysis of English syntax.) In order to illustrate that this is not a flawed knowledge (in native speakers) the way that he believed naturally occurring data to be, he created a distinction between what speakers know and what they might say.

Competence is the knowledge you (subconsciously) possess about how to speak a language.

Performance is your real world linguistic output. Performance may accurately reflect competence, but it also may include speech errors due to slips of the tongue or, as Chomsky points out in the quote above, external factors such as memory problems, etc.

To understand this distinction, it is helpful to to think about a time when you've made some sort of error in your speech. For example, let's say you are a native speaker of English and utter the following:

We swimmed in the ocean this weekend.

As a proficient speaker, it isn't that you don't know that the past tense of swim is swam, you've just mistakenly applied the regular rule to an irregular verb. You're unlikely to make this kind of error more than a small portion of the time, and may never say "swimmed" again. Your competence is fine - you know how to conjugate irregular English verbs, it is your performance that has let you down.

Though linguists have since realized that competence is not the only thing worth studying in Linguistics (thanks to contributions of linguists like William Labov, who popularized sociolinguistics), but the distinction remains useful, primarily because it allows those studying language to differentiate between a speech error and not knowing something about a language. Linguists use this distinction to illustrate the intuitive difference between accidentally saying swimmed and the fact that a child or non-proficient speaker of English may not know that the past tense of swim is swam and say swimmed consistently.

Descriptive and Prescriptive Linguistics

Descriptive Linguistics: - In the study of language, description, or descriptive linguistics, is the work of objectively analyzing and describing how language is spoken (or how it was spoken in the past) by a group of people in a speech community. All scholarly research in linguistics is descriptive; like all other sciences, its aim is to observe the linguistic world as it is, without the bias of preconceived ideas about how it ought to be. Modern descriptive linguistics is based on a structural approach to language, as exemplified in the work of Leonard Bloomfield and others. Linguistic description is often contrasted with linguistic prescription, which is found especially in education and in publishing. Prescription seeks to define standard language forms and give advice on effective language use, and can be thought of as a presentation of the fruits of descriptive research in a learnable form, though it also draws on more subjective aspects of language aesthetics. Prescription and description are complementary, but have different priorities and sometimes are seen to be in conflict. Descriptivism is the belief that description is more significant or important to teach, study, and practice than prescription.

Accurate description of real speech is a difficult problem, and linguists have often been reduced to approximations. Almost all linguistic theory has its origin in practical problems of descriptive linguistics. Phonology (and its theoretical developments, such as the phoneme) deals with the function and interpretation of sound in language. Syntax has developed to describe the rules concerning how words relate to each other in order to form sentences. Lexicology collects "words" and their derivations and transformations: it has not given rise to much generalized theory.

An extreme "mentalist" viewpoint denies that the linguistic description of a language can be done by anyone but a competent speaker. Such speakers have internalized something called "linguistic competence", which gives them the ability to extrapolate correctly from their experience new but correct expressions, and to reject unacceptable expressions.

A linguistic description is considered descriptively adequate if it achieves one or more of the following goals of descriptive linguistics:

1. A description of the phonology of the language in question.
2. A description of the morphology of words belonging to that language.
3. A description of the syntax of well-formed sentences of that language.
4. A description of lexical derivations.
5. A documentation of the vocabulary, including at least one thousand entries.
6. A reproduction of a few genuine texts.

Prescriptive Linguistics: - Prescriptive linguistics denotes normative practices on such aspects of language use as spelling, grammar, pronunciation, and syntax. It includes judgments on what usages are socially proper and politically correct. Its aims may be to establish a standard language, to teach what is perceived within a particular society to be correct forms of language, or to advise on effective communication. If usage preferences are conservative, prescription might (appear to) be resistant to language change; if the usage preferences are radical, prescription may produce neologisms.

Prescriptive approaches to language, concerned with how the prescriptivist recommends language should be used, are often contrasted with the alternative approach of descriptive linguistics, which observes and records how language actually is used. The basis of linguistic research is text (corpus) analysis and field studies, both of which are descriptive activities; but description includes each researcher's observations of his or her own language usage. Despite apparent opposition, prescription and description can inform each other, since comprehensive descriptive accounts must take into account speaker attitudes, while some understanding of how language is actually used is necessary for prescription to be effective.

Phonetics - The Study of Speech Sounds

Introduction

Phonetics has been defined as the science of speech sounds. It is scientific study of the production, transmission, and reception of speech sound produced by human beings. In speaking trial listening a complex of activities is involved: there is the production of speech which is the result of simultaneous activities of several body organs.

These activities are aimed at creating disturbances in the air. The inhaled air acts as source of energy setting the outside air vibrating so that the sound thus generated is carried along to the ears of the listener. The auditory process is set in motion which is again a complicated process involving auditory organs; perception of speech segments which involves discarding the non-significant features from the significant or distinctive features and perceiving only those that are meaningful. It is like retrieving a small visual image from a crowd of intricate details. But the brain can quickly decode the incoming signals that have been encoded by the speakers. 'Physical energy in the form of sensory nerve impulses reaches the brain', the brain circuitry is understood to organise them into percepts which are the basis of recognition. Obviously, a complex of multiple factors in the form of the listeners' interest, his social background, intellectual level, past experience and other parameters play an active and significant role in the perception level, and the interpretation is made accordingly.

We thus observe that speech act encompasses intricate movements and activities that occur on different planes, some of them simultaneously and at incredible speed. We are so used to speaking in a natural effortless manner, that we hardly give attention to the complex nature of speech production and speech perception.

Major branches of Phonetics

Acoustic Phonetics

Acoustic phonetics is the study of the physical properties of speech sounds such as frequency and amplitude in their transmission. Acoustic phoneticians analyse the speech waves with the help of instruments, attempt to describe the physical properties of the stream of sound issues forth from the mouth of a speaker.

It is in the field of acoustic phonetics that the most sulking developments have taken place since the Second World War. Complex sound waves produced in speech can be analysed into their component frequencies and relative amplitudes. Considerable progress has also been made in speech-synthesis. Acoustic analysis has confirmed (if confirmation was needed) that speech is not made up of a sequence of discrete sounds. The articulatory features of rounding of voice, of nasality, of obstruction and of friction can also be identified acoustically. Acoustic phonetics achieved a good deal of success in matters of the study of the n vowels, but regarding consonants it has not reached final conclusions.

Auditory Phonetics

Auditory Phonetics studies how speech sounds are heard and perceived. This requires a close study of the psychology of perception on the one hand, and the mechanism of the neuro-muscular circuitry on the other.

Hearing is a very intricate process; it implies 'interpreting the physical description of actual or proposed signals in terms of the auditory sensations which the signals would create if impressed upon the ear'. Acoustic signals generate a 'complex chain of physical disturbances within the auditory system'. The brain receives signal about these physical disturbances; in the brain are caused other disturbances - physical counterparts of the sensations. It is necessary to establish correlation between the auditory signals and their interpretation in terms of the disturbances in the brain.

Articulatory Phonetics

This branch of phonetics recognises that there is speech producing mechanism in human beings. 'The 'apparatus' that produces speech sounds is situated within the human body. Man uses various organs for speaking which already serve other biological needs. Lips, teeth, tongue, hard palate, soft palate, trachea, lungs - all these organs used in speech production have different basic biological functions. In the process of cultural evolution, man devised ways of utilizing these organs and parts thereof (such as the tip, blade, front, and centre, back of the tongue along with the corresponding areas or points in the roof of mouth or hard palate) for verbal communication.

Besides these the airstream that goes in and out of the lungs forms the basis of speech; that is, speech is based on the outgoing air stream. Articulatory phonetics studies how the outgoing airstream is regulated along the vocal tract to form various speech sounds.

Articulators

Articulator is a vocal organ that takes part in the production of a speech sound. Such organs are of two types: those that can move, such as the tongue, lips, etc. (active articulators), and those that remain fixed, such as the teeth, the hard palate, etc. (passive articulators)

(a) Active Articulators

The main role of the active articulators is to actively interfere with the outgoing airstream and modify it to produce various types of speech sounds. This is done either by approximating (forming a constriction) or coming into full contact with the passive articulators (forming complete stoppage). We have seen the functioning of the larynx, glottis and vocal cords in earlier sections.

Tongue: - The most active of articulators is the tongue. It shows an amazing range of adjustments and movements mainly because it is made of two groups of muscles, intrinsic ones are fibers of the longitudinal, transverse and vertical lingual muscles. These muscles are within the tongue and mainly responsible for changes in its shape.

The tongue has been divided into the parts on the surface along its length i-e tip of the tongue, blade of the tongue, front of the tongue, back of the tongue and root of the tongue.

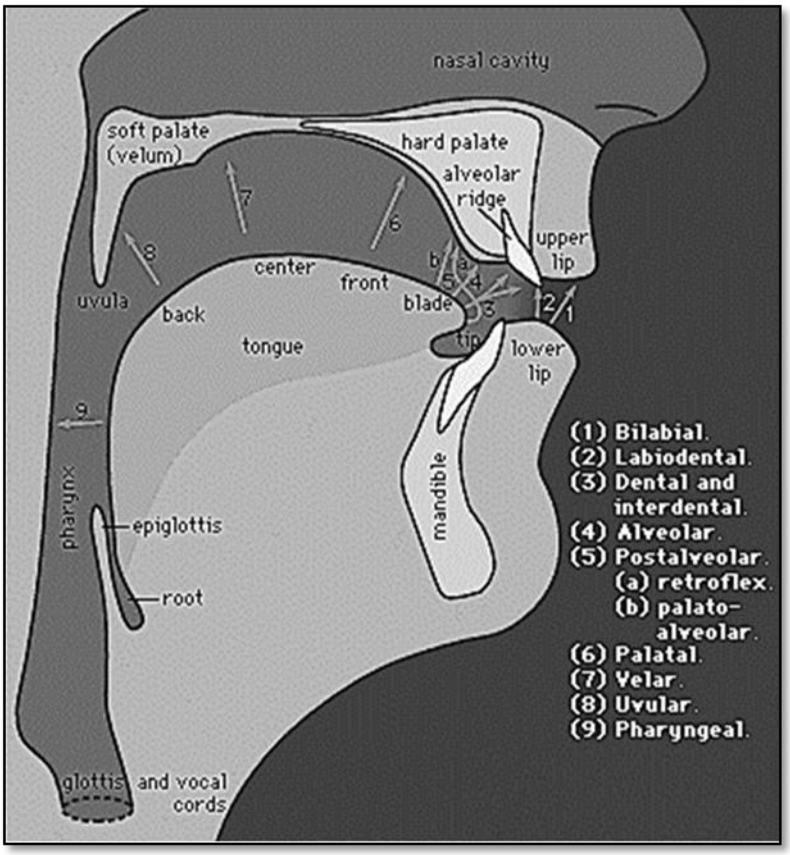
The sides of the tongue can also be used in speech, these are known as margin. For lateral sounds the sides are raised enough for the airstream to create turbulence and escape continuously. The tip can be raised and curled backwards letting the passing airstream to vibrate it. This produces retroflex sounds of various types.

Lower lip: - The lower lip is a mobile articulator which can be used for many oral configurations. With the upper lip it can form various degrees of rounding that produce different vowels. It can bring about complete oral occlusion with the upper lip which produces bilabial sounds, plosives and in many languages fricatives also. When the lower lip comes into contact with upper teeth, we hear fricative sounds (labio-dental).

(b) Passive Articulators

Passive articulators cannot be moved about, but perform a very crucial role in speech production. The active organs approximate them, i.e. come close enough to affect the shape of the outgoing column of air, or form a complete closure by coming into full contact with them.

These organs are mostly located in the upper part of the mouth, beginning in front with the upper lip, upper teeth, the alveolar ridge, hard palate, the soft palate, just behind the hard palate and the back wall of the throat (pharynx).



Upper lip: - Though upper lip is not a rigid organ and can be moved, in speech production it is not used as a mobile articulator; rather the lower lip reaches up to create various constrictions with it. Therefore, it has been classified as a passive articulator.

Upper teeth: - The row of upper teeth functions as the passive articulator. Tongue-tip and blade as well as the lower lip form constriction with them. The active organs can do so either with the edges of the teeth or the back of them. Dental class of sounds is produced in this manner. Upper teeth are also involved in the production of the fricative sounds, called labio-dentals in which the lower lip approximates them to form a slit through which the air escapes creating friction noise.

Alveolar ridge: - Just behind the upper teeth is located alveolar ridge. The mobile speech organs - various parts of the tongue reach it to form either a narrow stricture or a complete closure. English /o/ in thin and /ð/ in this are fricatives.

Hard Palate: - Behind the alveolar ridge begins the hard palate which forms the major part of the roof of the mouth. It is made of the horizontal plates of bone which terminate in the soft palate. 'Some part of both the hard and the soft palates serves as a point of contact or near-contact for the tongue in the production of a number of speech sounds'. It can be divided into parts or areas where the tongue makes contact. Phonetic quality is changed according to the point at which the hard palate is approximated by the tongue. These sounds are recognised as palatal. These are further classified according to which part of the tongue comes into contact with the precise palatal area. For example, we can produce palato-alveolar sounds by bringing the tip of the tongue to touch the extreme front of the hard palate or the place lying between the gum-ridge and the palate. Alveo-palatal area lies further back of the region just mentioned; palatal the slope of the hard palate and domal is the dome of it.

Soft Palate: - This is recognised as the fixed articulator though it can he moved, being a soft and flexible organ. The principal action of soft place consists of opening the naso-pharyngeal cavity by lowering itself. When it is lowered, the oral passage is closed off and the outgoing airstream passes through the nose, sounds produced in this manner are identified as nasals. /m/, /n/, /h/ and the nasalised vowels are of this type. For opening the oral passage and allowing the air a free passage through it, the soft palate is raised. Soft palate thus acts as a valve. The back of the tongue makes contact with the velum to produce either frictional sounds or stops. These stops are known as velar stops /k/, /g/. Retroflex sounds can also be produced by bringing the underside of the tongue tip to touch the velum.

Uvula: - The soft palate terminates into a piece of flesh which dangles over the pharyngeal passage. This is called uvula. It is a 'small flexible appendage hanging down from the posterior edge of the velum. It can be vibrated by the outgoing breath-stream, to produce uvular sound, particularly uvular trills. Some languages use these sounds as phonemes.

Pharynx: - The posterior wall of the pharynx is used for producing speech. In the front are the base of the tongue, the palate, and the two openings leading to the nasal and oral passages. The pharynx serves as a resonator for the voice. Widening of the pharynx promotes resonance and makes the tones full, dark, strong and resonant; narrowing tends to make them thin, sharp, dampened, and throaty' . Besides, the root of the tongue can also be made to come into contact with the pharyngeal wall and produce certain types of fricatives and stops.

Processes of Speech Production

Labialization: - This is a process in which the lips play an active part in various ways. They come together to form various stages or degrees of rounding which is a crucial factor in producing back vowels /u/, /o/, as in shoe, shore, and .a. The two lips are joined together for the pronunciation of the plosive sounds /p/, /b/; and the voiced nasal continuant /m/. The lower lip is raised approximate the edge of the upper teeth for the fricatives /f/, /v/. For the semi-vowel /w/ again there is a noticeable lip-rounding.

Palatalization: - In palatalization the tongue approximates the hard palate leaving only a narrow space through which the airstream passes producing friction noise; or the tongue may form complete occlusion and then gradually withdraw, creating a turbulence of air due to the breath-stream escaping through the space slowly being allowed to form. This is how the sound in jar /dʒɑ::/ and chair /tʃeə/ is pronounced.

Velarization: - Velar sounds are produced by this process. The back of the tongue either approximates or forms total occlusion for articulating certain types of stop and fricative sounds. The velar sounds are /k/ and /g/ in English. /h/ is a velar nasal heard in such words as king, sing and conquer.

Glottalization: - The space between the vocal cords is called glottis. If the vocal cords are brought together and released with a 'popping' action, the resultant sound will be heard as a 'glottal stop'.

Nasalization: - This is a process whereby we produce nasal sounds or nasalised vowels. In articulating these sounds, the soft palate is lowered to close off the oral passage and direct the airstream through nasal cavity. In another case, the air is allowed to go into both the oral and the nasal cavities, but the active articulators check it in the mouth. For /m/ two lips come together to form a closure, and channelise the air flow, through the nose. Similarly, for /n/ the tip of the tongue comes into contact with the back of the upper teeth and forms a closure. 'Although the vocal tract is blocked at one point, the breath-stream flows outward through what has been called a secondary aperture consisting of the nasal airway Nasals are also classed as resonants or continuants.

Voicing: - It is an articulatory process in which the vocal flaps are set in vibration by the outgoing column of air. During voicing, the vocal cords are brought close enough to hold them taut and the airstream vibrates them in rapid succession. There is as a result, quick opening and closing of these vocal cords several times a second. Sounds can be produced without the vibration of the vocal cords. Such sounds are called unvoiced or voiceless sounds; sounds produced with the cords in vibration are called voiced sounds. See consonant chart for voiced and voiceless consonants.

Manner of Articulation

The manner or way in which the outgoing air-stream is interfered with determines the manner of articulation. The airstream may completely be stopped and released with force producing a plosive or stop sound. The occlusion may occur anywhere between larynx and the two lips; or the passage of air may be constricted enough for it to produce audible friction. The sound thus produced is called fricative. According to the manner of articulation sounds are classified into smaller classes as stops, fricatives, affricates, nasals, laterals, trills or flaps and semivowels. These constitute the larger class of consonants. For the complete description both the point/place and manner of articulation are taken into consideration.

Description of Speech Sounds

Speech Sounds are divided into two main groups: (1) consonants, and (2) vowels.

Consonant:

A sound that results from the passage of air through restrictions of the oral cavity is called consonant. The description of a consonant will include five kinds of information.

Nature of the Air-stream

Most speech sounds and all normal English sounds are made with an aggressive pulmonic air-stream, e.g., the air pushed out of the lungs.

The State of Glottis

A consonant may be voiced or voice-less, depending upon whether the vocal cords remain wide apart (voice-less) or in a state of vibration (voiced).

The Position of the Soft Palate

While describing consonants we have to mention whether they are oral sounds (produced with soft palate raised, thus blocking the nasal passage of air) or nasal sounds (produced with the soft palate lowered).

The Articulators Involved

In the description of consonants, we have also to discuss the various articulators involved. In the production of a consonant the active articulator is moved towards the passive articulator. The chief points of articulation are bilabial, labio-dental, dental, alveolar, post-alveolar, palato-alveolar, retroflex, palatal, velar, uvular, and glottal. In the case of some consonantal sounds, there can be a secondary place of articulation in addition to the primary. Thus, in the so-called dark /l/, in addition to the partial alveolar contact, there is an essential raising of the back of the tongue towards the velum (Velarization); or, again some post-alveolar articulator of ‘r’ (r) as in red are accompanied by slight lip-rounding (labialization). We can classify consonants according to the place of articulation.

The Nature of Stricture

By the nature of stricture we mean the manner of articulation. This stricture of obstruction made by the organs may be total, intermittent, partial, or may merely constitute a narrowing sufficient to cause friction.

When the stricture is that of a complete closure, the active and passive articulators make a firm contact with each other, and prevent the passage of air between them. For instance, in the production of /p/ as in pin and /b/ as in bin, the lips make a total closure.

The stricture may be such that air passes between the active and passive articulators intermittently. Such a stricture is called intermittent closure, and involves the vibration of the active articulator against the passive. The Scottish /r/ as in rat is an example. The intermittent closure may be of such a short duration that the active articulator strikes against the passive articulator once only. The English /r/ in the word very is an example; the tip of the tongue (active articulator) makes one tap against the teeth-ridge (passive articulator).

In the partial stricture, the air passes between the active and passive articulators continuously, but with some difficulty. The sounds thus produced are clear /1/ and dark /1/ in late, and hill, the clear and the dark '1' respectively.

And lastly, the stricture may be such that the air, while passing between the active and passive articulators, produces audible friction. /f, v, q, ð, s, z, f, ʒ, h/ in English are examples of this kind of stricture. Or the air may pass without friction. Examples are /w/ in wet, /j/ in yes and flap /r/ as in butter. A stricture which involves audible friction, can be called a stricture of close approximation, whereas one which involves no such friction can be called a stricture of open approximation.

Classification of Consonants

Consonantal sounds are classified on the basis of (i) voicing, (ii) place of articulation, and (iii) manner of articulation.

Voicing: - At the articulatory level, a voiced sound is one in which the vocal cords vibrate, and a voiceless sound is one in which they do not. The voiced sounds in English are /b, d, g, v. p, z, dʒ, m, n, ŋ, l, r, w, j/. All the vowels and semi-vowels are voiced sounds, whereas among the consonants some are voiced and some voiceless. See consonant chart.

Place of Articulation

The place of articulation (also point of articulation) of a consonant is the point of contact where an obstruction occurs in the vocal tract between an articulatory gesture, an active articulator (typically some part of the tongue), and a passive location (typically some part of the roof of the mouth). Consonants are divided as given in the above table on the basis of the articulatory points at which the articulators actually touch, or are at their closest.

The Manner of Articulation

According to the manner of articulation, which describes the type of obstruction caused by the narrowing or closure of the articulators, the consonants can be divided into Plosives, Nasals, Fricatives, Laterals, Affricates and semi-vowels or frictionless continuants.

Plosives

In the production of a plosive, the oral and nasal passages arc closed simultaneously. The active and passive articulators come in contact with each other forming a stricture of complete closure and preventing the air from escaping through the mouth. The soft palate is raised and thus the nasal passage is also blocked. The air behind the oral closure is compressed, and when the active articulator is removed from contact with passive one, the air escapes with an explosion. Plosives are also known as Stops. See consonant chart for elaboration and examples.

Nasals

In a nasal consonant, the breath stream is interrupted at some point in the oral cavity or at the lips, while being allowed to enter the nose and create resonance there. Thus a nasal is produced by a stricture of complete oral closure. The soft palate is lowered and the air passes through the nose. All nasal sounds are voiced. See consonant chart for elaboration and examples.

Fricatives

In the production of a fricative consonant the stricture is one of close approximation. The active articulator and the passive articulator are so close to each other that passage between them is very narrow and the air passes through it with audible friction. See consonant chart for elaboration and examples.

Laterals

Laterals are produced by a stricture of complete closure in the center of the vocal tract, but the air passes out every one or both side of the tongue. See consonant chart for elaboration and examples.

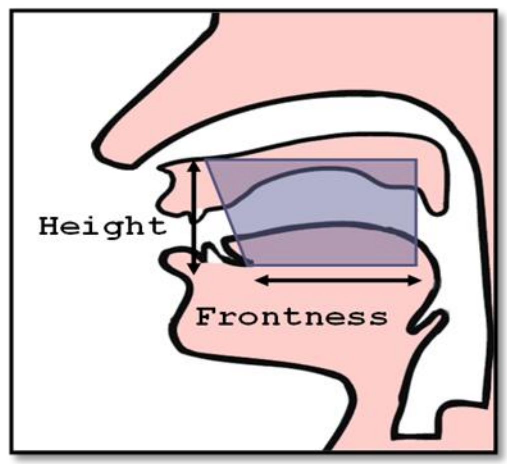
Laterals



If the stop is not held for any appreciable time and released slowly, we get an affricate rather than a plosive. See consonant chart for elaboration and examples.

Semi-vowels

A semi-vowel is a vowel glide functioning as a consonant i.e., as the C element in syllable structure. In terms of articulation semi-vowels are like vowels, but they don't behave like vowels. Semi-vowels are never stable; they can never be pronounced by themselves. They are sounds in transition. These are also called semi-consonants too. See consonant chart for elaboration and examples.

Vowels

Vowel is a sound in spoken language, pronounced with an open vocal tract so that there is no build-up of air pressure at any point above the glottis. .Vowels may be defined with an open approximation without any obstruction, partial or complete, in the air passage. They are referred to as voiced in phonetics. They can be described in terms of three variables:

(1) Height of tongue

(2) Part of the tongue which is raised or lowered

(3) Lip-rounding.

In order to describe the vowels, we usually draw three points in the horizontal-axes: front, central and back, referring to the part of the tongue which is the highest. So we have

(i) Front vowels: During the production of which the front of the tongue is raised towards the hard palate. For example, /i, i:, e, æ/ in English as in sit, seat, set, and sat respectively.

(ii) Back vowels: During the production of which the back of the tongue is raised towards the soft palate. For example /a: u: / in English as in cart, cot, caught, book and tool respectively.

(iii) Central vowels: During the production of which the central part of the tongue (the part between the front and the back) is raised. For example, /ə, ɜ:, Λ/ in English as in about, earth and but respectively.

To describe the vowel sound we mention whether it is open or close, half-close or half-open, front or back or central, long or short, whether the tongue is tense or lax while the vowel is being pronounced, and whether lips are spread, neutral, open rounded, or close rounded. All English vowels are voiced. So, for every vowel, we must state that it is voiced.

Diphthongs

From the point of view of their quality, vowel sounds are of two types: monophthong and diphthong. Monophthongs are pure vowels and diphthongs are gliding vowels. 'A vowel that does not change in quality' may be called a monophthong; and a vowel sound with a continually changing quality may be called a diphthong.

A pure vowel is one for which the organs of speech remain in a given position for an appreciable period of time.

A diphthong is a vowel sound consisting of a deliberate, i.e. intentional glide, the organs of speech starting in the position of one vowel and immediately moving in the direction of another vowel.

A diphthong, moreover, consists of a single syllabic––that is, the vowel-glide must be performed with a single impulse of the breath; if there is more than one impulse of breath, the ear perceives two separate syllables.

A diphthong, thus, always occupies one syllabic. If two adjacent vowels form the nuclei of two successive syllables, they are not a diphthong. For example the vowels in bay, boy, and buy are diphthongs, but the vowels in doing are two different vowels since they belong to two different syllables.

One end of the diphthong is generally more prominent than the other. Diphthongs are termed 'decrescendo' of FALLING if the first element is louder or more prominent than the second, and 'crescendo' or RISING if the second element is louder or more prominent than the first. All the English diphthongs are falling diphthongs, because in them the first clement is louder or more prominent than the second clement.

Diphthongs are represented in phonetic transcription by a sequence of two letters, the first showing the position of the organs of speech at the beginning of the glide, the second their position at the end. In the case of the 'closing' diphthongs the second letter indicates the point toward which glide (movement) is made.

Phonetic Transcription

Phonetic transcription is a device in which we use several symbols in such a way that one symbol always represents one sound. It is also known as phonetic notation; it is an 'attempt on paper, a record of the sounds that speakers make.' By looking at an English word in its written form one cannot be sure of its pronunciation, whereas by looking at it in phonetic transcription one can be. Most of our phonetic transcriptions are phonemic transcriptions, that is, each symbol represents a phoneme, a distinct sound unit in language. A pair of square brackets [ ] indicates a phonetic transcription: Phonemic transcriptions are enclosed within slant bars / /.

The Usefulness of the International Phonetic Alphabet (IPA)

The IPA gives us a uniform international medium of studying and transcribing the sounds of all the languages of the world. Many languages in the world have no orthographic (written) form at all. It has been made possible to study such languages with this alphabet. In other words, the IPA is 'a precise and universal' means (i.e. valid for all languages) of writing down the spoken forms of utterances as they are spoken without reference to their orthographic representation, grammatical status, or meaning.

As regards English, the IPA helps us in establishing and maintaining international intelligibility and uniformity in the pronunciation of English. With the help of the IPA we can easily teach the pronunciation of English or of any other language. The IPA has contributed a lot in the teaching and description of language. The teachers and learners of English can improve, and standardize their pronunciation and can overcome the confusion created by the spellings with the help of the International Phonetic Alphabet.

Received Pronunciation (RP)

A pronunciation of British English, originally based on the speech of the upper class of southeastern England and characteristic of the English spoken at the public schools and at Oxford and Cambridge Universities. Until recently it was the standard form of English used in British broadcasting.

RP as a Social Accent of English

Received Pronunciation, or RP for short, is the instantly recognisable accent often described as 'typically British'. Popular terms for this accent, such as 'The Queen's English', 'Oxford English' or 'BBC English' are all a little misleading. The Queen, for instance, speaks an almost unique form of English, while the English we hear at Oxford University or on the BBC is no longer restricted to one type of accent.

RP is an accent, not a dialect, since all RP speakers speak Standard English. In other words, they avoid non-standard grammatical constructions and localised vocabulary characteristic of regional dialects. RP is also regionally non-specific, that is it does not contain any clues about a speaker's geographic background. But it does reveal a great deal about their social and/or educational background.

Well-known but not widely used

RP is probably the most widely studied and most frequently described variety of spoken English in the world, yet recent estimates suggest only 2% of the UK population speak it. It has a negligible presence in Scotland and Northern Ireland and is arguably losing its prestige status in Wales. It should properly, therefore, be described as an English, rather than a British accent. As well as being a living accent, RP is also a theoretical linguistic concept. It is the accent on which phonemic transcriptions in dictionaries are based, and it is widely used (in competition with General American) for teaching English as a foreign language. RP is included here as a case study, not to imply it has greater merit than any other English accent, but because it provides us with an extremely familiar model against which comparisons with other accents may be made.

What's in the name?

RP is a young accent in linguistic terms. It was not around, for example, when Dr Johnson wrote A Dictionary of the English Language in 1757. He chose not to include pronunciation suggestions as he felt there was little agreement even within educated society regarding 'recommended' forms. The phrase Received Pronunciation was coined in 1869 by the linguist, A J Ellis, but it only became a widely used term used to describe the accent of the social elite after the phonetician, Daniel Jones, adopted it for the second edition of the English Pronouncing Dictionary (1924). The definition of 'received' conveys its original meaning of 'accepted' or 'approved' — as in 'received wisdom'. We can trace the origins of RP back to the public schools and universities of nineteenth-century Britain — indeed Daniel Jones initially used the term Public School Pronunciation to describe this emerging, socially exclusive accent. Over the course of that century, members of the ruling and privileged classes increasingly attended boarding schools such as Winchester, Eton, Harrow and Rugby and graduated from the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. Their speech patterns - based loosely on the local accent of the south-east Midlands (roughly London, Oxford and Cambridge) — soon came to be associated with 'The Establishment' and therefore gained a unique status, particularly within the middle classes in London.

Broadcaster's choice

RP probably received its greatest impetus, however, when Lord Reith, the first General Manager of the BBC, adopted it in 1922 as a broadcasting standard - hence the origins of the term BBC English. Reith believed Standard English, spoken with an RP accent, would be the most widely understood variety of English, both here in the UK and overseas. He was also conscious that choosing a regional accent might run the risk of alienating some listeners. To a certain extent Reith's decision was understandable, and his attitude only reflected the social climate at the time. But since RP was the preserve of the aristocracy and expensive public schools, it represented only a very small social minority. This policy prevailed at the BBC for a considerable time and probably contributed to the sometimes negative perception of regional varieties of English.

There's more than one RP

A speaker who uses numerous very localised pronunciations is often described as having a ‘broad’ or ‘strong’ regional accent, while terms such as ‘mild’ or ‘soft’ are applied to speakers whose speech patterns are only subtly different from RP speakers. So, we might describe one speaker as having a broad Glaswegian accent and another as having a mild Scottish accent. Such terms are inadequate when applied to Received Pronunciation, although as with any variety of English, RP encompasses a wide variety of speakers and should not be confused with the notion of ‘posh’ speech. The various forms of RP can be roughly divided into three categories. Conservative RP refers to a very traditional variety particularly associated with older speakers and the aristocracy. Mainstream RP describes an accent that we might consider extremely neutral in terms of signals regarding age, occupation or lifestyle of the speaker. Contemporary RP refers to speakers using features typical of younger RP speakers. All, however, are united by the fact they do not use any pronunciation patterns that allow us to make assumptions about where they are from in the UK.

RP today

Like any other accent, RP has also changed over the course of time. The voices we associate with early BBC broadcasts, for instance, now sound extremely old-fashioned to most. Just as RP is constantly evolving, so our attitudes towards the accent are changing. For much of the twentieth century, RP represented the voice of education, authority, social status and economic power. The period immediately after the Second World War was a time when educational and social advancement suddenly became a possibility for many more people. Those who were able to take advantage of these opportunities — be it in terms of education or career — often felt under considerable pressure to conform linguistically and thus adopt the accent of the establishment or at least modify their speech towards RP norms. In recent years, however, as a result of continued social change, virtually every accent is represented in all walks of life to which people aspire — sport, the arts, the media, business, even former strongholds of RP England, such as the City, Civil Service and academia. As a result, fewer younger speakers with regional accents consider it necessary to adapt their speech to the same extent. Indeed many commentators even suggest that younger RP speakers often go to great lengths to disguise their middle-class accent by incorporating regional features into their speech.

Phonology - The Pronunciation of English

"Phonology is essentially the description of the systems and patterns of speech sounds in a language". (George Yule) Phonology is the subfield of linguistics that studies the structure and systematic patterning of sounds in human language.

What is sound? How and where is it produced from? How is it received by the ears? How and why is one sound different from the other? ––questions like these are the subject-matter of Phonology

Difference between Phonetics and Phonology

Phonetics and phonology are the two fields dedicated to the study of human speech sounds and sound structures. Both are concerned with the same subject matter or aspect of language, speech sounds, as the audible result of articulation. We'll discuss each one individually and then compare them side by side, which should clear things up.

Phonetics is about the physical aspect of sounds, it studies the production and the perception of sounds, called phones. Phonetics has some subcategories, but if not specified, we usually mean the "articulatory phonetics" that is "the study of the production of speech sounds by the articulatory and vocal tract by the speaker". Phonetic transcriptions are done using the square brackets, [ ].

(a) Phonetics is the basis for phonological analysis

(b) Phonology analyses the production of all human speech sounds, regardless of language.

(c) Phonetics is the study of human speech sounds

(d) Phonetics studies which sounds are present in a language

(e) Phonetics simply describes the articulatory and acoustic properties of phones (speech sounds)

Phonology is about the abstract aspect of sounds and it studies the phonemes (phonemic transcriptions adopt the slash / /). Phonology is about establishing what are the phonemes in a given language, i.e. those sounds that can bring a difference in meaning between two words. A phoneme is a phonic segment with a meaning value, for example in minimal pairs: bat – pat, had – hat

Phonology is just one of several aspects of language. It is related to other aspects such as phonetics, morphology, syntax.

(a) Phonology is the basis for further work in morphology, syntax, and discourse and orthography design.

(b) Phonology analyses the sound patterns of a particular language by determining which phonetic sounds are significant, and explaining how these sounds are interpreted by the native speaker.

(c) Phonology is the study of how sounds are organised and used in natural languages.

(d) The phonological system of a language includes an inventory of sounds and their features, and pragmatic rules which specify how sounds interact with each other.

(e) Phonology studies how these sounds combine and how they change in combination, as well as which sounds can contrast to produce differences in meaning (phonology describes the phones as allophones of phonemes).

Phoneme

A phoneme is a basic element of a spoken language or dialect, from which words in that language or dialect are analyzed as being built up. The phoneme is defined by the International Phonetic Association as "the smallest segmental unit of sound employed to form meaningful contrasts between utterances".

Within linguistics there are differing views as to exactly what phonemes are and how a given language should be analyzed in phonemic terms. However a phoneme is generally regarded as an abstraction of a set (or equivalence class) of speech sounds (phones) which are perceived as equivalent to each other in a given language. For example, in English, the "k" sounds in the words kit and skill are not identical but they are perceived as the same sound by speakers of the language, and are therefore both considered to represent a single phoneme, /k/. Different speech sounds representing the same phoneme are known as allophones. Thus phonemes are often considered to provide an underlying representation for words, while speech sounds make up the corresponding surface form.

Notation of Phoneme: - Phonemes are conventionally placed between slashes in transcription, whereas speech sounds (phones) are placed between square brackets. Thus /pʊʃ/ represents a sequence of three phonemes /p/, /ʊ/, /ʃ/ (the word push in Standard English), while [p^hʊʃ] represents the phonetic sequence of sounds [p^h] (aspirated "p"), [ʊ], [ʃ] (the usual pronunciation of push). The symbols used for particular phonemes are often taken from the International Phonetic Alphabet (IPA), the same set of symbols that are most commonly used for phones. A phoneme is a sound or a group of different sounds perceived to have the same function by speakers of the language or dialect in question. An example is the English phoneme /k/, which occurs in words such as cat, kit, school, skill. Although most native speakers do not notice this, in most English dialects the "c/k" sounds in these words are not identical: in cat and kit the sound is aspirated, while in school and skill it is unaspirated. The words, therefore, contain different speech sounds, or phones, transcribed [k^h] for the aspirated form, [k] for the unaspirated one. These different sounds are nonetheless considered to belong to the same phoneme, because if a speaker used one instead of the other, the meaning of the word would not change: using the aspirated form [k^h] in skill might sound odd, but the word would still be recognized. By contrast, some other sounds would cause a change in meaning if substituted: for example, substitution of the sound [t] would produce the different word still, and that sound must therefore be considered to represent a different phoneme (the phoneme /t/). This shows that in English, [k] and [k^h] are allophones of a single phoneme /k/.

Phone: - It is a speech sound or gesture considered a physical event without regard to its place in the phonology of a language. It is a speech segment that possesses distinct physical or perceptual properties. It is the basic unit revealed via phonetic speech analysis

Allophone: - It is one of a set of multiple possible spoken sounds (or phones) used to pronounce a single phoneme. For example, [p^h] (as in pin) and [p] (as in spin) are allophones for the phoneme /p/ in the English language. Although a phoneme's allophones are all alternative pronunciations for a phoneme, the specific allophone selected in a given situation is often predictable. Changing the allophone used by native speakers for a given phoneme in a specific context usually will not change the meaning of a word but the result may sound non-native or unintelligible. Native speakers of a given language usually perceive one phoneme in their language as a single distinctive sound in that language and are "both unaware of and even shocked by" the allophone variations used to pronounce single phonemes.

Assimilation: - It is a common phonological process by which one sound becomes more like a nearby sound. This can occur either within a word or between words. In rapid speech, for example, "handbag" is often pronounced [hæmbæɡ]. As in this example, sound segments typically assimilate to a following sound (this is called regressive or anticipatory assimilation), but they may also assimilate to a preceding one (progressive assimilation). While assimilation most commonly occurs between immediately adjacent sounds, it may occur between sounds separated by others ("assimilation at a distance").

Elision: - Elision is the omission of one or more sounds (such as a vowel, a consonant, or a whole syllable) in a word or phrase, producing a result that is easier for the speaker to pronounce. Sometimes, sounds may be elided for euphonic effect.

In English, elision is often unintentional, giving a result that may in some cases be impressionistically described as "slurred" or "muted." Often, however, the elision is deliberate, as in the use of contractions. Elided elements are often weak syllables or voiceless consonants. The finest examples of what happens in elision are presented by such expressions as Jack and Jill, black and white, high and low, wind and rain and bread and butter. These sound like

Theories of Phonological Analysis

The analysis of an utterance into segmental and suprasegmental features is known as phonemic or phonological analysis. There are several different theories of phonological analysis. Some of these major theories are discussed below,

(a) Structure and System:

One approach is in terms of what are called structure and system. The phonological units (Phonemes or sounds) of a language are grouped together to form the various systems and the arrangements of these units in larger units such as syllables, feet, tone-group, sentence that form the structure of that language. The units that form a system can be replaced by other units to produce different utterances, while the relations between the different units present in an utterance constitute a structure. For instance, the English word sack has one syllable, which is made up of sequence of three phonemes /s/, /ae/ and /k/. The phoneme /s/ can be replaced by other phonemes /b/,/p/, /t/dʒ/. /h/, /l/ to give us different words back, pack, tack, jack, hack, lack. All these items that can be replaced by another at a particular place in a structure are in paradigmatic relationship and form a system. Similarly, /ae/ forms a system with other phonemes /i/, /i:/, /e/, /ei/ that can be used as substitutes to give us other words sick, seek, seek, sake, /k/ also forms a system with the /t/, /d/, /p/, /m/ /ŋ/ that give us the words sat, sad, sap, sam, sang.

The units of phonological analysis have a hierarchy, so that a unit of higher ranks consists of a sequence of one or more occurrences of the next lower rank. For example, in English one or more phonemes make up a syllable; one or more syllables make up a foot (which is the unit of rhythm); one or more feet make up a tone group (which is the unit of intonation); one or more tone groups make up a sentence. Examples of these phonological units are given here:

Phoneme	/k/, /b/, /t/, /d/, /i/, /e/, etc
Syllable	back/bæk/ ago /əigou/ button /b^-tn,/ etc
Foot	The cur/few tolls/the knell/of part/ing day/. Here we have five feet. (/A slanting bar/ represents a foot boundary)
Tone group	// If the 'bride a, grees // the 'marriage is in' January.//. (// represents tone group boundary; 'represents rising tone, and 'falling tone,' accent (strong or stressed syllable.)
Sentence	For example, the sentence given above has two tone groups

(b) Prosodic Analysis:

Prosodic analysis is another aspect of phonology. It is concerned with phonological features like aspiration, nasalization, labialization, retroflexion and palatalization. The study of supra-segmental features like stress, rhythm, intonation, etc. also forms a part of prosodic analysis. Examples of a few prosodic features are given below:

Aspiration

The English word clay /klei/ has an aspirated /k/ in the form of [kh], but the aspiration affects the following /l/ also and devoices it to [1o]. It can therefore be described as /h/ prosody.

Nasalization

The English word sing /siŋ/ has incidental nasalization of the vowel /i/under the influence of the nasal consonant after it. Nasalization can therefore be described as prosody in this kind of syllable.

Lip-rounding

The English word quiet /kwait/ has lip-rounding for /k/ also under the influence of the following /w/. We have here an example of /w/–– prosody.

Palatalization

The English word key /ki:/ has a palatal instead of a velar /k/ under the influence of the following /i:/. This can be described as /i/–prosody.

Accent

Accent on a particular syllable in a word can be taken as prosody. For example, the English word ago/ə ' gou/ has the accent on the second syllable.

Sentence stress, rhythm and intonation are also prosodic features.

(c) Phonemics

Another approach to phonology is based on phonemics, according to which the discovery of the phonemes (the minimal distinctive sound-units) of a language is done by forming minimal pairs (by replacement of one phoneme by another which can bring about a change of meaning). Each phoneme, however, may have slightly different phonetic realizations, called allophones, in different environments. Most phonological theories are based on phonemics.

Some linguists restrict the use of the term 'phoneme' to segments of human sounds only, and analyse what are called suprasegmental or prosodic features separately. The most important of the suprasegmental features are: length (syllables and feet), stress, and pitch. Other linguists extend the use of the term 'phoneme' to cover all distinctive sound features including levels of stress, levels of pitch, and types of juncture.

(d) Distinctive Features Theory

In the phoneme theory, the phoneme (segment) is the smallest unit of phonology, but in the Distinct Features Theory the phonetic feature is the smallest unit of phonology. Segment theory is linguistically inconvenient. There are no rules in any language which apply to all the sounds. There are a fixed number of features or components which form a basic stockpile from which every language selects phonetic features and combines them in different ways. It is these features which keep a segment distinct or separate from others. That is why they are called the distinctive features.

In distinctive features theory (as different from the notation transcription), the phonetic transcription is simplified and systematized by regarding each sound a set of components, exactly parallel to semantic component. As proposed by Chomsky acoustics and / or articulatory variables can be reduced to a small number of parameters or phonetic features (twenty-seven with multi-values). A distinctive features component, for example for the sounds /t/ and /k/ as in the English word take according to this theory.

In English, for example, the following phonetic features are distinct:

State of Glottis	Voiceless/voiced.
Position of Soft Palate:	Oral/nasal.
Place of Articulation	(a) bilabial/alveolar/velar (b) labiodental/ dental/ alveolar / palato-alveolar
Manner of Articulation	(a) plosive / fricative/ nasal (b) nasal/lateral (c) affricate/fricative
Part of Tongue Raised	front/back
Height of Tongue	Close/between half-close and half-open/between half-open and open/open lip-position	unrounded/rounded
Stress	stressed/unstressed
Reduction	Reduced vowel/unreduced vowel.
Tone	Falling/rising; low fall/high fall/low rise/high rise/fall rise: or primary/ secondary/ tertiary/ fall-rise.

Morphology and Linguistics

Morphology is the study of morphemes, which are the smallest significant units of grammar. It is a level of structure between the phonological and the syntactic. It is complementary to syntax. Morphology is the grammar of words; syntax is the grammar of sentences. One accounts for the internal structure or form of words; the other describes how these words are put together in sentences.

The English word unkind is made up of two smaller units: “un” and “kind”. These are minimal units that cannot be further sub-divided into meaningful units. Such minimal, meaningful units of grammatical description are generally referred to as morphemes. A morpheme is a short segment of language that meets three criteria:

1. It is a word or a part of a word that has meaning.
2. It cannot be divided into smaller meaningful parts without violation of its meaning or without meaningless remainders.
3. It recurs in differing verbal environments with a relatively stable meaning.

The word unlikely has 3 morphemes while the word carpet is a single morpheme. The words car and pet are independent morphemes in themselves. The word carpet has nothing to do with the meaning of car and pet. Carpet is a minimal meaningful unit by itself. Again, the word garbage is a single morpheme while the words garb and age are independent morphemes by themselves. A systematic study of morphemes or how morphemes join to form words is known as morphology.

The definition of the morpheme may not be completely unassailable as will be evident from the discussion that follows, but it is certainly a very satisfying definition applicable to a majority of words in any language. The English word unassailable is made up of three morphemes, un, assail, able, each one of which has a particular meaning distribution and a particular phonological form or shape.

Some Basic Concepts of Morphology

Morpheme

The word is the basic unit which relates the grammar of a language to its vocabulary. Words have internal structure which indicates their grammatical identity (e.g. that the word is plural, or past tense) and their lexical identity (e.g. that the word unhappiness is a noun with negative meaning referring to emotions). Words are composed of morphemes. A morpheme is the smallest unit of meaning. Some words consist of just one morpheme; some consist of several.

We can easily recognise such constructions as mats, artists, artistic. national, childishness, unmoved, denationalization, highway, footpath as words. Difficulty arises when we try to define these constructions - but all the same they can be recognised.

They have meaning which is independent of the meaning of other words. They convey the meaning in the same way as the following words: Sky, water, hill, cousin, mango, walk, sew, autumn and tap.

But the crucial difference between the first set of examples and the next is that while we can break the items of the first set and still obtain smaller meaningful units we cannot break the items occurring in the second set. If we do so we would be destroying their meaning. Let us see how the items in the first group of examples can be split.

(a)	mat + s	(b)	art + ist	(c)	art + ist + ic
(d)	nation + al	(e)	child + ish + ness	(f)	un + move +d
(f)	de + nation + al + ize + ation	(g)	high + way	(h)	foot + path

After having broken these words we are left with more particles with different meanings. Attempts to break these nine words have not destroyed their meaning. We rather discover that the words are composed of smaller particles. We also see that two types of meaning in such constructions can be identified:

(i) Some particles refer to the external reality. (sky, dog, table, nation, child)

(ii) Others do not do so, but are to be understood in terms of their function within the language.

Words of the former type are known as content words and their meaning as lexical meaning; while words that are meaningful in terms of their structural significance are called form words having structural, formal or grammatical meaning. Thus we can see that the word child is content word whose meaning is referable to the external world and is bound to be destroyed if we try to split it further: ch - ild, chi-Id, chil-d

But after breaking childishness into childish and ness we get two segments whose meanings are independently contained in them. We cannot break -ness; but childish can be split into child and -ish. Again we obtain such particles each one of which possesses meaning. Further attempts to break them will, however, destroy their meaning. We will not get more particles that can either be referred to the external reality or can be construed as having any grammatical function. They are the minimal meaningful units. Such a particle is called a morpheme. In the above examples, the particles that we have been able to obtain after breaking the various sequences, are all minimal meaningful parts of the English language. They are minimal since they cannot be broken down further on the basis of meaning. They are meaningful because we can specify the kind of connection they have with the nonlinguistic circumstances in which they are used.

Morpheme is, therefore, the minimal recurring unit of grammatical structure, possessing a distinctive phonemic form, having a grammatical function and may differ in its phonological manifestations.

Morpheme and Syllable: - A single morpheme may be made up of one syllable, more than one syllable, or no syllable at all. Monosyllabic morphemes (those consisting of one syllable) are tin, train, gold, pen, man, cat, dog. But words like station and teacher are composed of two syllables - sta-tion, tea-cher, Hyperion and introduction contain four syllables; and chloromycetin contain five syllables. These are all single morphemes, though their syllabic composition varies. On the other hand, there are morphemes that can be marked to contain no syllable at all - the plural morpheme /-s/, the past tense morpheme /-d/ are examples of this type. Though they are not syllabic, they are morphemes. In this context, the case of zero allomorph is still more interesting.

Morph: - The concept of morph recognises that a morpheme has a phonetic shape. This phonetic representation is called its morph. The word writer has two morphemes, write and -er. These are realizable in the phonetic shapes as /rait/ and/-∂:/. These are two morphs of the morpheme (or word in this case).

Allomorph: - In our discussion of morpheme we have noted that it sometimes manifests itself in various phonetic shapes or forms. The plural morpheme can be realized as /-s/ or /-z/ or /-iz/ and so on. Similarly, the past tense morpheme can appear as /-d/, /-t/, /-id/, and /-q/. Each of these morphs belongs to the same morpheme. These are called allomorphs.

The plural morpheme in English (which combines with a noun morpheme to form a plural) is represented by three allomorphs /s/, /z/ and /iz/ in different environments (which are phonologically conditioned).

Plural Morpheme

Allomorphs

{e(s)}:

/iz/ in the case of words ending in /s/, /z/, /ò/, / ʒ /, / ʧ/, / ʤ /

e.g. buses / bʌs ɪz /,rouges / ru:ʒ ɪz /

/s/ in the case of words ending in a voiceless consonant (other than ò, s, ʧ)

e.g cats /kæts/, caps /kæps/

/z/ in the case of words ending in voiced sounds (other than /z, ʒ, ʤ /)

e.g boys/ bɔɪz /, bags /bægz/

Similarly, the present tense morpheme {-e(s)} has three allomorphs /s/, /z/ &. /iz/, e.g. packs /pæks/, digs /digz/, washes / wɒʃ ɪz /. The past tense morpheme of English, {-e(d} has also three different (phonologically conditioned) allomorphs /t/, /d/ and /id/. The rule that governs these allomorphs is as follows:

Past Morpheme

/t/ after morphs ending in voiceless sounds (except /t/) booked / bʊkt /, pushed / pʊʃt /

/d/ after morphs ending in voiced sounds (except /d/).

loved / lʌvd /, bagged /bægd/

/id/ after morphs ending in /t/ and /d/ wanted /wantid/ wedded /wedid/

The relationship between the terms morph, allomorph and morpheme is similar to that between phone, allophone and phoneme. The term ‘morph’ means shape.

Any minimal phonetic form that has meaning is a morph. Thus /bʌs/, /ɪz/, /kæp/, /s/, / bæg/, /z/ are all morphs.

Those morphs which belong to the same morpheme are called allomorphs of that morpheme. Thus /s/, /z/ and /iz/ are allomorphs of the plural morpheme {e(s)}. Similarly, a phoneme is a minimal, distinctive unit in the sound system of a language.

A phoneme may sometimes occur in more than one phonetic form called allophones. These phonetic forms have considerable phonetic similarity between them and their phonological function is the same. They, however, never occur in the same phonetic environment and are said to be in complimentary distribution.

Allomorphs, like allophones, are also in complimentary distribution. The phonemes /p/, /t/ and /k/ for example, have two phonetic forms each i.e. [p] and [ph], [t] and [th], [k] and [kh]. Here [p] and [ph] are the allophones of the phoneme /p/.

All the speech sounds (phonemes as well as allophones) are called phones.

It may be noted that in some languages words can generally he segmented into parts (morphs) while it is not so in others. Similarly there are languages in which the morph tends to represent a single minimal grammatical unit (a morpheme) while

Allomorphs of a morpheme may change their phonemic shapes due to two types of conditioning:

(a) Phonological or phonemic conditioning

(b) Morphological conditioning

Phonological Conditioning {Plural Morpheme}

We shall first examine the following sets of words:

Set A		Set B		Set C
set	/sets/	beds	/bedz/	roses	/rəuziz/clips	/klips/	lads	/lædz/	poses	/pəuziz/;
bits	/bits/	cabs	/kæbz/	horses	/ hɔːs ɪz/
bats	/bæts/	clubs	/kl^bz/	advises	/ədvaɪsɪz/
caps	/kæps/	beads	/bi:dz/	judges	/ dʒʌdʒ ɪz/

The pluralizing suffix in set A appears as /s/; in set B, it appears as /z/. This can be explained as due to the occurrence of final sound of the stem which is voiced, or voiceless. In set A words end in the voiceless sounds /t/ and /p/ affecting the plural morpheme which also appears as a voiceless phoneme /-s/. But in set B the stems end in voiced sound and affect the plural morpheme, which becomes /-z/. The phonetic quality of one sound affects the phonetic quality of another occurring in close proximity. The affected sound is phonetically conditioned. Both /-s/ and /-z/ are the allomorphs of the plural morpheme. Their positions cannot be interchanged, i.e., we cannot have /z/ placed in set A and /s/ in set B. These sounds are thus in complementary distribution. In the same way words in set C take the plural morpheme which is phonemically realized as /iz/. These words also show phonological conditioning.

We thus obtain three phonologically conditioned allomorphs of the plural morpheme /s/ ~ /z/ ~ /iz/. Phonological conditioning is predictable.

{Past Tense Morpheme} Morphological Conditioning

The regularity of phonological conditioning is restricted. There are several irregular forms that do not show the predictable direction of morphophonemic changes. We can always explain reasonably why such variant forms as the /t/~/d/~/id/ occur for past tense and /s/~/z/~/iz/ for plural morpheme.

But such explanation is not possible in the case of the plural form of child - children, and sheep - sheep. These forms are not phonologically conditioned, i.e. the proximity of a sound does not affect these forms. "en" is peculiar to children, oxen and brethren. Such changes are said to be due to morphological conditioning.

We shall consider below some major types of morphological conditioning.

Zero Suffix: - Certain words in English do not show any change of form when inflected either for pluralizing or making into past tense form. These singular - plural and present and past tense forms are alike.

Set A (Singular)	Set B (Plural)
Sheep	sheep
deer	deer

cattle	cattle

Set A (Present Tense)	Set B (Past Tense)
cut	cut cut	put
hit	hit
beat	beat

But we know that set A words are in present tense and that set B words are in the past tense. With this understanding we use the words.

There is a sheep	There are sheep
He cuts	He has cut

We can say that a zero suffix of plural and a zero suffix of the past tense has been added to these forms. The change is not one of overt alteration in the phonemic shape of the morpheme (allomorph). They are said to undergo a zero modification. This is shown by {q} symbol which is called zero allomorph.

Thus, sheep is written as / ʃi:p + q/ and cut is written as / kʌt + q/

Vowel Mutation: - Let us take another example; the plural form of man is men that of woman is women, and louse is lice. In making them plural we see that nothing has been added, but a change in the vowel and diphthong has been made.

/a/ > /e/ /au/ > /ai/

Similarly, for making past tense, we can change the vowels as shown below:

find - found /ai/ > /au/	swim - swam /i/ > /æ/
bring - brought /i/ > /]/	seek - sought /i:/ > / ɔ:/
catch - caught /æ/ > / ɔ:/	feed - fed /i:/ > /e/

These changes too cannot be explained by the process of phonetic change. These are irregular changes and are known as vowel-mutation. Vowel mutation can also be seen in verb-making, adjectivising, noun-making, and so on.

Consonant Change: - Apart from vowel changes, pluralizing is effected by changes in consonants also. Some English words ending in /f/ - leaf life, wife, knife, shelf loaf make their plural by converting /f/ into /v/ and adding /z/. Examples are given below:-

knife /naif/ > knives /naivz/	wolf /wulf/ > wolves /wulvz/

But here too we observe irregularity. Not all words ending in /f/ undergo such changes - proof, roof and reef, to name only three, take /s/ for changing to plural form; while hoof is pluralized both by simply adding /s/ - hoofs and through the process of consonant change - hooves.

In the case of past tense formation also we observe consonant replacement – send - sent	bend - bent /d/ > /t/

lend - lent	spend - spent

The list of different kinds of changes signalling pluralization and past tense formation is fairly long. What is important here is to understand the mechanism of different types of vowel and consonant mutation that operates in such processes.

Suppletion: - In suppletion instead of a partial change in the root (either vowel change or consonant change or addition of s), we see the whole form of the root being replaced by a new -form. So, we see the past tense of "go" is "went", and the comparative of "bad" is "worse", "good" has "better" as comparative, the adjective of "moon" is "lunar", and "sea" ,has "marine" as its adjective; "tooth" is adjectivised as "dental" and "mouth" as oral. What we see in these examples is the complete change in the phonemic shape of the stem, for changing their form classes.

Free Morphemes and Bound Morphemes

Two types of morphemes have been identified on the basis of their occurrence in larger constructions: free form and bound form. A morpheme that occurs alone, or can stand alone is a free form. It does not require the presence of another morpheme; in other words, such a morpheme does not need the support of any other element. All content words are free forms: house, church, girl, cat, walk, see, red, short, book, water. Some form words are also free forms, always, though, but, never, and, or, if. The meaning of such words is 'contained in their ability to refer to some point in the world outside'.

A second class of morphemes called bound form; contain elements that must always be attached to some other elements. They cannot occur or stand alone. In words like watery, invisible, reader, possibility, madness, cats, and manly we can identify such morphemic particles as –y, in- , -er, - -ty, -ness, -s, and -ly. Their meaning is in their grammatical functions such as noun-making, verb-forming, pluralizing, adjectivising, and so on. They can be attached to any other free forms of the same form class to construct similar segments. Isolated they do not stand by themselves.

Two types of bound form that are widely used are prefix and suffix. As a class they are known as affixes.

A prefix precedes a free form, a stem or a root. We see these in the following words: uncommon, decentralise, disappoint, and recycle. Un-, de-, dis-, re- are all prefixes. There are many other prefixes. All these are word-formative elements.

A suffix is also a word-formative element - it follows a free form. Examples are sleeveless, temptation, government, activate, darkness, reader. By adding a suffix we can either negativise a word, i.e. hat less, merciless, or change its form class; dark is an adjective, by adding -ness we can change it into noun. -ate and -ide are verb-making particles. They are, therefore, known as grammatical morphemes.

Inflectional and Derivation: - Suffixes are classified on the basis of their function into two categories - derivation and inflection. An affix that cannot take another affix is generally identified as inflectional affix. If we add -s or -ed to present we will get derivative words presents and presented. We cannot add another suffix to it. Inflectional suffixes of this type may create a set of forms of a morpheme within the same form class, usually known as paradigm. Such words are said to be ‘inflected’. We can in this way pluralise a noun, speeches, judges and tops, etc.

These words are said to be inflected for pluralising. Similarly nouns can be inflected for making them genitive - teacher’s, doctor’s, men’s, etc. Verbs are inflected for third person singular. Generally, in English, inflectional affixes are suffixes. They define a part of speech, but do not change it - ugly, uglier, ugliest - all the three forms belong to the adjective form class.

Both prefixes and suffixes can be derivational. The form-class of the morphemes may be changed by adding a derivational affix. Globe (N) may become global (Adj), globalize (vb), globalization (N); and so also child (N), childish (Adj), childishly (Adv), childishness (N). Each time a derivational affix is added in the above examples, we see the form-class changing.

A significant feature of the derivational affix is that other suffixes can be added to it. One of the functions of derivational affixes has been recognised as that of ‘formation of new words’ . This is one of its functions. Another function is that they maintain the form-class, that is, the grammatical category is not changed, as is seen as : If we add the prefix un-to certain (Adj.), we do not find the prefix changing the root to another form-class. Uncertain remains as much an adjective as certain is. Similarly, possess (vb) can take a negativising prefix dis- to make an antonym dispossess while retaining its form-class association.

Bound Bases: - Bound bases are those morphemes which serve as roots for derivational forms but which never appear as free forms. In words like conclude and perceive, -clude and –ceive are bound bases.

Structure of Words: - Considered from the point of view of their morpheme constituents, there are mainly three types of words:

Simple Words	They consist of a single free morpheme followed, or not, by an inflectional suffix, e.g. play, plays, stronger.
Complex words:	They consist of a base and a derivational affix, e.g. goodness, enable, boyhood, determination.
Compound words	They consist of two (or more) free stems which are independent words by themselves, e.g. over-ripe, happy-go-lucky, elevator-operator

Categories of Derivational suffixes: - The Derivational suffixes may be broadly divided into two categories: class-maintaining and class -changing.

(a) Class-maintaining: - These suffixes produce a derived form of the same class as the underlying form. They do not change the class of a part of speech. Here are a few examples:

Maintaining Suffi-	Suffix	Word	Class	New word	Class
	-ship	friend	noun	friendship	Noun

	ess-	tiger	noun	tigress	Noun
	ite	Hindu	adjective	Hinduite	adjective

(b) Class-changing Suffixes: - These suffixes produce a derived form of another class. Here are a few examples:

Class-Changing Suffixes	Class Change	Suffix	Word	Class	New word	Class
	Noun to adjective	-ian	India	noun	Indian	Adjective
	Adjectives to Noun	) -ity	able	adjective	ability	Noun
	Nouns to Verbs	-ify	fort	noun	fortify	Verb
	Verbs to Nouns	-er	drive	verb	driver	Noun
	Verbs to Adverb	-fly	sleep	verb	sleepily	Adverb
	Adjectives to Adverbs	-ly	nice	adjective	nicely	adverb

Conversions: - Some words can be used as nouns, verbs, adverbs or adjectives without any change in the form of the word, without the addition of an affix or prefix. This process of derivation is called conversion. Here are some examples:

Light	Switch on the light	Noun
	Light the lamp	Verb
	The luggage is light	Adjective
	Travel light if you must	Adverb
Round	The earth is round like a ball	Adjective
	The principal went on a round	Noun
	You must round all the sharp corners	verb

Miscellaneous conversions

Sentence	Conversion
Please give me two coffees	An uncountable noun used as a countable noun
This instrument is a must for you	A closed system word being used as a noun
I do not like this touch-me-not policy	A phrase being used as an adjective.
I do not believe in any ism bothering the society today	A suffix being used as a noun

In some words of two syllables, change of accent from the first to the second syllable changes a noun/adjective to a verb:

Noun/Adjective	Verb

‘conduct	con’duct
‘subject	sub’ject
‘object	ob’ject
‘present	pre’sent
‘contrast	con’trast

There are some words, in which there is a change in the meanings of words if the final consonant is voiced (either by a change in spellings or without it); for example:

Word	Final sound	Word	Final sound advice (n.)	/s/	advise (v.)	/z/
thief (n.)	/f/	thieve (v.)	/v/
house (n.)	/s/	house (v.)	/z/

Compound Formation: - Compounds are formed by joining two or more bases. These bases are, in some cases, separated by a hyphen, while in other cases, the hyphen appears to have disappeared with the passage of time. There is no rule governing the presence or absence of the hyphen. Here are some examples of compound words:

Noun + Noun	Motor cycle, hair breadth, goldfish
Noun + Adjective	trustworthy, beauty conscious, duty free
Adjective + Noun	paleface, yellow press, red light
Compounds with verbs/adverbials/verbal nouns	sight-seeing, man-eating, heart-breaking

Blends: - Two words are sometimes clipped and the clippings joined to form a new word e.g. brunch from breakfast and lunch, smog from smoke and fog, telecast from television and broadcast and motel from motorists and hotel

Borrowings: -English (or any other language) generally borrows words from other languages with which it comes into contact. English continues to enrich its store of words by such borrowings e.g. Guru (from Hindi), bazaar (from Persian), Sheikh (from Arabic), tycoon (from Japanese) and Dame (from French)

Inventions: -New words have to be given to new inventions. Such words (as other words of the language) are arbitrary but in course of time, they come to stay as a part of the language. e.g. X-rays, laser, sputnik, astronaut

Echoism: - Some words are formed by the sounds that suggest their meaning. e.g. clang, whisper, thunder, click, tick, lisp, murmur.

Language, as everybody knows, is dynamic. It continues to acquire new words with the passage of time. Some words also go on disappearing, as the time passes, due to several reasons. Language is open-ended and modifiable.

Syntax and Modern Linguistics

The word syntax has been derived from Ancient Greek meaning ordering together. Syntax is "the study of the principles and processes by which sentences are ordered together in particular language". Thus "Syntax is the study of the principles and processes by which sentences are constructed in particular languages. Syntactic investigation of a given language has as its goal the construction of a grammar that can be viewed as a device of some sort for producing the sentences of the language under analysis." Grammar and grammatical analysis include both morphology and syntax. 'Grammar may be divided into two portions: morphology and syntax.

Syntactic Processes

Syntax is the core of the grammar. It is necessary to understand the patterns that underlie the sentences, and the ways and means of linking the constituents and the rules of transforming one kind of structure into another. We shall discuss here some of the major syntactic processes whereby we obtain various syntactic patterns.

Conjoining:- Conjoining is also identified by other terms like 'co-ordination' and 'conjunction'. In this process certain parts of two or more sentences are similar in structure. The coordinators join the sentences. 'This process is possible only when there is a similar relation of constituency' between the segments thus conjoined and the sentences.

Syntactic Structures give us this example:

1. The scene – of the movie – was in Karachi.
2. The scene – of the play – was in Karachi.

Conjoining process seeks 'to obtain the proper relation of constituency', to produce this new sentence.

The scene of the movie and the play was in Karachi

Embedding: - One sentence is included within the other sentence is called embedding. Embedding transformation process embeds the constituent sentence into the matrix (or basic) sentence.

{S1 [S2] S1}

Instead of joining the two sequences of equal status, one sentence becomes part of the larger sentence.

(1) The news	surprised his friends. (2) (that) he had got married

Sentence (2) is embedded in sentence (1) and is, therefore, an embedded sentence.

Let us consider another example:

S1	The man was arrested.
S2	The man murdered three persons.

This diagram shows that S2 is subordinate to S1 and, therefore, embedded in it.

There are two major types of embedding:

(a) Nesting (b) self-embedding

In a nesting construction the nested segment is totally enclosed within a matrix. We take another example.

The girl who bought the cosmetics gave money which was borrowed.

In the above example who bought the cosmetics is nested. Which was borrowed is not nested as no part of the matrix occurs to right of it. A self-embedded construction is totally enclosed within a construction of the same type (Fowler).

Recursion:- Through this process the same rules may be re-applied 'indefinitely many times within a single derivation'. As has been pointed out earlier, transformationalist believe that a language user has at his disposal an infinite number of sentences. This is chiefly because he can use the 'recursive' process, using the same linguistic device over and over again. This enables us to add any constituent (adjective, for example) repeatedly,

The old man, the little old man, the little poor old man, the clever little poor old man, and so on. 'To prove to anyone who does not believe in the infinity of the number of sentences in a language, we have merely to ask him to give us the largest sentence he can produce and then add another adjective or relative clause to it' (Palmer).

The example cited above is the realization of the NP NP + (S) rule.

The example cited earlier, 'the old man'... can be also be accounted for by a set of rewrite rules.

NP +De + Adj + N

Adj + Adj + N

Adj + Adj + Adj + N

Adj + Adj + Adj + Adj + N

This type of sentence can be expanded without apparent limit, and thus rules can go on being multiplied. As Roger Fowler says, 'we do not need a new rule to extend the sentence each time, just one complex sentence forming rule can be applied over and over again. Recursiveness is a property of complex sentences', and 'a transformational grammar with recursive rules represents a substantial gain in economy over other alternatives'.

Discontinuous Constituent:- Scholars of structural linguistics usually worked with cutting, classifying and labeling elements of language which is the process of IC analysis. Among the difficulties they encountered in following this method was that it was simply not possible to cut into neat segments certain sequences, as the elements that belong together are separated by some other element/s. There is thus a discontinuity in the sequence. Such constituents are known as 'discontinuous constituents'.

A very simple example is the sequence, the finest orator in the world. He sequence the finest naturally goes with in the world. Orator forms the other IC, but it interferes with the former to create 'discontinuity'.

Phrasal verbs produce the most familiar types of discontinuous constructions. We can use in sentences such phrasal verbs as put down, push away, brush off, make up, look up, etc to see how discontinuous constructions are created by them.

He brushed her explanation off
He brushed the dust off his coat.
The mob pushed him away.
The general soon put the uprising down.
She made the whole story up.

In such constructions the adverbs often follow the object, though they belong with the verb. In interrogative sentences the 'discontinuity' process is quite obvious:

Is she coming?
This can be shown by using 'boxes'.

Form-classes

The constituents of a sentence have the inherent lexical meaning as well as the class meaning. An important type of class meaning assigns a particular component occurring in the sentence structure a function meaning. These places or spots are structurally meaningful places in the sentence. What kinds of form can be filled in these places depends on their position.

Ducks	swim
Noun Phrase	Verb Phrase

The most basic dichotomy is between a Noun Phrase and a Verb Phrase. An utterance or a sentence must have these two components. These are also known at another place as the topic and the comment. These are the most common form classes. Any other sequence or sequences that can replace Ducks will play the same structural role as that single word. For example, we can use Two ducks. The two ducks; The two old ducks; or birds; the migratory bird; boys, the boys; the young boys, etc. Similarly, sequences that can replace swim, keeping the same structural relationship to the Noun phrase, are called Verb phrase. Thus we can replace swim with such possible sequences as eat, eat slowly, walk fast, speak, speak loudly, and so on.

Such structural positions are called form classes, and are also referred to as primary grammatical categories. In traditional grammar 'the major parts of speech were associated with certain typical syntactic function. The basic primary grammatical categories we have just identified in the sentence Ducks Swim can be shown diagrammatically as follows.

Ducks Swim
NP VP

A constituent in English has two types of meaning - a lexical meaning; that can be known by its ability to refer to things outside the language. A dictionary gives us the lexical meaning of words; and a structural or form class-meaning, whose meaning derives from their membership of a form class. Certain words clearly show lexical meaning, chair, table, man, girl, hair, eyes, so on. In certain words form-class meanings are more dominant, the, of, from, by, since, etc. But there is no word which does not possess form class meaning.

We have already noted that an utterance or sentence can be divided into a Noun Phrase (NP) and a Verb Phrase (VP) by virtue of their having different basic syntactic functions.

Noun Phrase: - What we see in a Noun Phrase is that sequences occurring in this slot are all centered on the same category of word noun. However complex a sequence may be that occurs in this position, if it can be replaced by a single noun, or pronoun, it is called an NP. 'Any Phrase that can function as subject is a noun phrase' (Noel Burton-Roberts). These identifiable actual words that can be isolated by gradually peeling off other words without damaging the sentence structure is a noun in NP. Such words are called Head words. They may be a noun of any type or a pronoun.

S.No	A (Noun Phrase-Subject)	B (Verb Phrase-Predicate)
1	She	resumed her seat
2	My friend	wasted his time
3	The new car	runs smoothly
4	The car that	created problems
5	You	bought yesterday

The sequences occurring in section A are all NP. In the first sentence ''She'' is a pronoun, Head of NP which is a single word constituent (NP). In the second sentence ''my friend'', friend can be identified as noun, ''my'' a possessive pronoun modifies it. Similarly, the ''new car'' shows ''car'' a noun, which is the head. So also in the last sentence. In sentences 2, 3 and 4 if we remove the determiners and modifiers, we will be finally left with a noun that will still be functioning as syntactically relevant function word.

But if we remove the noun ''car'', or ''friend'', the structure of the sentence will suffer and we shall be creating impossible sentences like, my wasted his time, the new runs smoothly. As Noel Burton-Roberts defines it, 'In a phrase containing a modified form the essential centre of the phrase is said to be the Head of the phrase'.

Head words are recognized as constituting an open class. This is a place, or spot, or slot where any word that can function as noun can become the Head word. We may have a sentence like "There are too many ifs and buts in your argument". Ifs and buts function here as nouns, therefore as head words. Head words can function as subject and can occur as complement.

They follow determiners which are closed class words. They show morphological changes for form and class. A single noun can be the Head as well as the NP in a sentence. In Ali reserved his seat, Ali is a noun, a headword and an NP.

Determiners

Noun head words pattern with a wide range of adjuncts. These adjuncts are labelled determiners and modifiers. The class of determiners is fairly large with many sub-classes. However, we shall here take into account three major sub-classes.

(i) Regular determiners:- Within this class we can identify articles, demonstratives and possessives (also called genitives). The basic determiner is the, the definite article. It precedes a noun or NP1 and demonstrates the nounness of it. It has a particularising role, I know the man; the tree has grown tall; The boys are rowdy, where its meaning is 'before mentioned' and 'already known'. Articles and demonstratives are divided according to the number of the nominal.

Article	Demonstrative	Possessive
a, an	this	my
q	that	our
the	these	Your
any	those	Her every		Its each		Their
some		nom + z3

(Z3 is the symbol for the genitive form N + 's)

Two regular determiners do not occur before a noun. Only one determiner precedes it, showing a relation of mutual exclusiveness. This principle distinguishes determiner from an adjective.

(ii) Pre-determiners:- Pre-determiners co-occur with determiners, normally preceding them:

All the boys
Both these umbrellas
Half Rita's time

If we say all boys the position is occupied by the zero article. Many of the determiners and pre-determiners function like pronouns. In the above example, both predetermines the determiner these which in turn determines umbrellas

(iii) Post-determiners:-Post-determiners follow the determiners and precede the adjectives. While adjectives can 'occur in any order, post-determiners have fixed positions. The following three classes of post-determiners can be recognized.

Ordinals	Cardinals	Superlative/comparative first	one	more
second	two	most third	three	fewer
next	many	fewest
lost	few	less
final	several	least

In the examples, the last few days; the first four girls we find that first and last which are pre-determiners occur with few and far. But their order cannot be changed.

Finer distinctions are made and sub-classes recognized within the large group. Absence of an article is marked by q symbol. Such an absence cannot totally be ignored. Its absence gives information of the kind that can be compared to the information given by the determiners. The information could be about indefiniteness. We can thus have

q + tables, the table

q + chair, the chair

Determiners, then, give information about definiteness and indefiniteness, quantity and proportion. Their function is not to modify but to determine a nominal.

(iv) Modification

The term modification suggests the syntactic relation between a headword and the element that is dependent on it. This dependent element may occur either before or after it. When it precedes the H (head) it pre-modifies; when it follows the H, it is said to post-modify. It is a one-way dependency/function.

Let us look at the following construction, his rather curious look , phrase a

The Head word is preceded by curious, rather and his. We see here the following relationships.

his + phrase b phrase c + looks rather + curious

Such structure is called the structure of modification. 'It has the same distributional characteristics as the head constituent (H)'. The boy ran, the young boy ran, He stood tall and straight.

In (A) example the headword (N) is modified by young (Adj.). In (B) the VP has a VS -ran which is the head word of the VP modified by slowly.

In the earlier example curious is modified by rather, a word which shows the extent of curiousness; rather is dependent on curious - it cannot occur all by itself. At the next higher level rather curious specifies look and are, therefore, dependent upon the latter. We can omit the whole phrase rather curious and still have a meaningful sequence his looks as it is the headword and the whole sequence preceding it is dependent upon it.

Most adjectives act as pre-modifiers of nouns.

1. A pretty girl met me.
2. Good people are honest.
3. A tall chimney came down.

Adjectives can be modified by other adjective - a good tall chimney, a small pretty girl.

They can also be modified by degree adverbs like very, rather, quite, too, much.

Nouns as Modifiers: - In a sequence in which two nouns occur, one of them can act as attributive or pre-modifier:

Football match;	Cricket commentary;	film industry;	munitions factory.
(Mod) (N)	(Mod) (N)	(Mod) (N)	(Mod) (N)

The modifier noun can also be proper noun -Delhi conference, Geneva convention, cardinal numerals (one, two, three), the ordinal numerals, (first, second, third...) and general ordinals (next, last, other) can also function as pre-modifiers.

Let us now look at the following examples.

A	B
the faded scene	the crumbling cake
a forgotten valley	the flying bird remembered moments	the moving train

The phrases in set A have perfect participle forms faded, forgotten, remembered, they appeal to meaning by referring to valley that has been forgotten, the scene that faded and the moments that are remembered. They modify the noun-head. Similarly, the examples in set B show progressive participle as modifying element for cake, bird, and train. Obviously these in turn can be pre-modified in different ways.

Post-modification:- In this type of modification the modifiers follow the item they modify.

The men injured were flown to Karachi.
The houses built recently have shown cracks.

The words injured and built are post-modifiers following the noun heads men and houses. In fact, we can see that these modifiers can be regarded as 'reduced relative clauses' so we can expand them in the manner shown below.

The men (Who were) injured were flown to Karachi.
The houses (that were) built recently have shown cracks.

There are some phrases that show adjectives with special meaning - Secretary General, president elect, court martial, attorney general, heir apparent, etc.

Verb Phrase

In the example cited earlier, Ducks swim, we have labelled swim as verb phrase. It is the second of the two immediate constituents. These are called predicates and embody 'comment' on the 'topic'. Predicates contain a verb which optionally may be modified or complemented. These verbs are the Headword of the VP. Look at the following sentence:

The boys are moving away.

In the above example 'the boys' is a noun phrase with a noun as its centre (Head) and 'are moving away' is a verb phrase with moving as its centre.

A verb phrase contains a verb group (Vgp) which consists of a main verb that may be optionally modified by other verbs known as auxiliary verbs. The simplest kind of VP is one-word construction with only a Head which is also a verb group (Vgp).

In the sentence

He is walking.

'He' is NP and 'is waking is VP' which consists of Vgp made up of an auxiliary verb and the main verb walking.

Main verbs show morphological possibilities - they can be inflected in the following manner.

Walks Walking Walked
Swims Swimming Swam

Complementation: - A verb phrase may or may not contain a noun phrase. The occurrence of an NP is one of complementation. A relation of mutual dependency exists between a Vgp and an NP in which Vgp acts as governor. Thus we can see in this example,

We cannot omit the NP from the VP. Similarly, we cannot do without caught. Both

* He caught and

and * He those flies are unacceptable

Such verbs are called monotransitive or simply transitive. We shall discuss this process later on. It is not necessary that all verb groups should be followed by an NP. In our example above, if we replace caught with slept, we must drop the NP to have such a grammatically acceptable construction as

He slept

We cannot construct a sentence in this case which has a Vgp followed by an NP. We shall have an incorrect sentence if we do so such as

* He slept those flies or or

* He looked those flies

Verbs that are followed by an NP are called transitive verbs; without such an NP they are known as intransitive verbs. Appear, disappear, look, feel, go, come, etc. are some examples of intransitive verbs. However, these verbs can be followed by adverbs of various types. He appeared suddenly, He appeared on the scene; or they may occur without them.

But this is not part of the complementation as the sense of the sentence is complete without it. Rather, it is a modifier in VP. VPs can include PP (on the scene, for instance) as optional modification.

Verb Group Classified

Verb group can be sub-classified into six types according to what occurs after it.

(i) Monotransitive verb group (or Vgp):- As we have already seen, a monotransitive Vgp needs one NP as its complement. This NP functions as its direct object, for example : deer is the NP in the VP which complements the transitive verb saw. Pronouns functioning in this place assume specific forms which are called objective case (accusative). The NP complementing a Vgp is called the, direct object.

(ii) Ditransitive:- This type of Vgp takes two NP complementations. Example,

a. She sent me a message
1 2
b. John gave Jill a car
1 2
c. Jill bought John a candy

Words marked I are indirect object and those marked 2 are direct object. Both the NPs are governed by the Vgp sent, gave and bought in. We can also write these sentences in the following manner.

a. She sent a message to me.
b. John gave a car to Jill.
c. Jill bought a candy for John.

The indirect object, in these examples appears as prepositional phrase following a direct object. Such PPs are introduced by to or for. PPs of this type are part of the complementation of the intransitive verb.

(iii) Intensive:- Either a single Adj. Phrase or an NP or a PP can complement an intensive verb group.

She became a doctor (NP)
John is being rather generous (AP)
Jill must be in the class room (AP)

We must note here that in the above examples no second person is mentioned. It is different from monotransitive Vgp. complementation where something apart from the subject is mentioned (i.e. she saw me). The NP, AP and the PP can be said to be 'predicative', and also 'complement' which' distinguish it from 'object'. The following examples make it clear.

(a) Ramzan turned pale.
(b) Ramzan turned the doorknobs.
(c) She felt sad.
(d) She felt spider on her hand.

Examples (a) and (b) show intensifying Vgp taking a subject predication, an AP, since they characterize the subject. In (b) and (d) VP has a complementation which gives information about something other than subject.

Complex Transitive

Here we see a combination of the monotransitive with intensive complementation: complex transitives are followed by an NP (Dir. obj.) and an NP, an AP, or a PP (predicative).

(a) They will make me their representative (NP)
(b) I found his joke extremely unpleasant (AP)
(c) Jill is putting the basket under the table (PP)

While in an intensive Vgp construction; the predicative characterises the subject (i.e. he became a doctor), in the complex transitive constructions the predicative refers to the direct object: She will be his wife. Such complementation is called object predicate.

Prepositional

He glanced at the elephant
Jack referred to the old book.

In the above sentences a VP contains a PP which complements the Vgp. Such complements are known as prepositional complements.

Adverbials

Also known as adjunct adverbials, this is a large class expressing a wide range of ideas like manner, means, purpose, reason, place, time.

Adverb, or Adverb Phrase denotes a category; Adverbial denotes function.

a. So apart from functioning as adverbial, adverb has other functions too like modifying an adjective as in this example.

She is extremely beautiful

b. It is not just adverbs that function as adverbials, other categories can also function as adverbials, i.e., PPs and NPs. Adverbial Adverbs

Function Prepositional Phrases Noun Phrases

Adjuncts appearing in the VP modify the segment Vgp + NP, not just the Vgp alone. Let us look at the following examples :

The PP adjunct in the garage characterises the verb group (Vgp) put hi car as a whole not just the NP (his car).

Pre-verbs

It is a sub-class of adverbs, which occurs after 'the first auxiliary Vb almost, ever, always, seldom, hardly, rarely, etc.

Ramzan is always in a hurry
Rina has never read a novel
I can hardly understand it

Time adverbs: We can note various notions of time expressed by these adverbials, in the following examples:

i. He came to see me again
ii. We saw him in Karachi last year

iii. Ramzan will leave at 8 o'clock

The adverbials in these examples indicate a point or period of time. So also now, then, etc. Other adverbials indicate the point of time from which the period can be measured.

Recently I saw an old film.
Once I saw an old film

Time duration is indicated in the following manner :

He studied all night long
We had been moving since last Sunday

Frequency is suggested by adverbials like regularly, everyday, often, seldom, usually, twice, never, soon.

He regularly visits the library
Take the tablet twice a day
I sometimes feel giddy

The following examples show PP functioning as adverbials.

She has spoken about it on several occasions
He has not seen me in recent times

Degree Adverbs: Effect can be underscored by putting a degree adverbial in the VP of a sentence. The result is lowering or hightening of effect.

He will certainly agree
We nearly fell off the ladder
I much prefer to stay alone

Among others we can note definitely, thoroughly, all but, rather, really, entirely, scarcely, hardly, simply as degree adverbs.

Place adverbs: As is obvious, these adverbs indicate the place.

He stood on the hill
Roberts fell in the bathroom
He studies in the college

Mobility of the Adverbials

A high level of mobility is observed in the adverbials. They can be moved around somewhat freely, and do not necessarily occur only in a position after the Vgp and its complement. In fact we can shift a PP around in a sentence to see if it functions as an adverbial or as a complement.

He arranged everything cleverly
He cleverly arranged everything
Cleverly he arranged everything
He arranged cleverly everything

We can experiment with other adverbs in this manner.

Phrasal verbs :

Phrasal verbs consist of the elements that also comprise some PPs. Apparently they look alike.

1. a. He took down the dictation.
   b. He took me down the stairs.
2. a. I called up the man.
   b. I called up the balcony.

In the set 1, and 2, a. shows a phrasal verb, while b. shows a verb plus an adverb.

In a. down the dictation does not make sense; took down form a unit, a phrasal verb. In b. down the stairs makes sense. Similarly, in set 2 up the man fails to carry sense, but up the balcony does. Though these segments, call up and take down look alike, they belong to different categories and have different functions. We can distinguish them from call off put down, hand over, give up, give in and a whole multitude of other phrasal verbs.

Phrasal verbs may consist of more than one element, but all the units function together as one-word verb group. It consists of Vb + particle.

An important feature of it is that it can appear as discontinous form -

NP as adverbial

Certain noun phrases function as adverbials.

He arrived last week
We had seen it three years ago

Non-finite clause as adverbial

All the three types of non-finite clauses.

1. an infinitive
2. a progressive participle (-ing type)
3. a perfect participle (-ed type)

can function as adverbials

1. An infinitive functioning as adverbial is shown below :

He works to earn his bread
Ramzan came to meet his friend

We went there to spend the vacation

2. A progressive participle functioning as adverbial is shown below :

He felt satisfied, having talked to us

Entering the room, he collapsed

3. We can see the perfect participle functioning as adverbials in the following examples.

The work done, he left the place.
Not satisfied, we quit the office.
Forgotten, the book lay there for years.

Sentence Adverbials:- This is a class of adverbial formation that is not strictly integrated in the structure of the sentence. Also known as Disjuncts, these constituents represent some sort of comment from the speaker and so are peripheral to the structure of the sentence. Let us look at these examples:

a. (i) She upsets everything between you and me
(ii) She upsets everything, between you and me
b. (i) He admitted everything frankly
(ii) He admitted everything, frankly

In the (i) sentence of both the sets the sequence between you and me and frankly are adjuncts. In (ii) sentences, on the other hand, these same sequences function as disjuncts, denoting what the speaker has to say, and not how she upsets or he admitted, or the manner of these actions. These are expressed in sentence i. of both the sets.

Disjuncts are loosely attached to the sentence structure and can also be placed in the initial, middle or final positions. In writing disjuncts are shown by a comma, while in speaking a distinct intonation movement marks them. Structurally, like other adjuncts, disjuncts or sentence adverbials can appear as

(i)	A prepositional phrase	in all honesty
(ii)	An infinite clause	to be honest
(iii)	A progressive participle	honestly speaking
(iv)	A perfect participle	put honestly
(v)	A finite verb clause	if I can speak honestly

Auxiliary Verb Group:- We must keep in mind that the verb group (Vgp) which is a constituent of the VP has main verb (lexical verb) as its head. This optionally takes the verb modifier auxiliary verb. The function of the auxiliary verb is to modify the lexical (maim) verb, while the number of the lexical verbs is very large, infinitely large; the auxiliary verbs are a restricted set of morphemes forming a closed system. These are placed before the main verb, when an auxiliary verb combines with the main verb to form a verb group, we get a complex verb group. But when a single verb forms the verb group, we have simple verb group. Such simple Vgps consist of main verbs only.

He talks rapidly
I met some guests
She went there
They cracked soon enough

Finite Verbs are those that are tensed. A sentence must contain a finite Vgp.

Work	Worked	Working
leave	left	leaving
eat	ate	eating

Non-finite verbs are not tensed; participles, gerunds,-infinitives are types of non-finite Vgps.

Finite verb also changes its forms according to the number and person of the subject NP.

She	goes
They	go
It	cracks
These	crack

This kind of relationship is known as subject-verb agreement or concord. Auxiliary verbs are classified into Primary auxiliary and the modal auxiliary. In the former we find the verbs do, have, be, with their variant forms - have, has, had, having, do, doing, done, be, been, being, is, are, was, were, etc.

In modal auxiliaries we find can, could, may, might, must, shall, should, will, would, need, dare, used to, ought to. Auxiliary verbs also function as main verbs, i.e. they constitute the single-verb Vgp. Modals are not tensed, nor do they show subject-verb agreement; their form is always that of the present tense.

I can go; She must read; They will win, and so on.
Even the verb that follows the modal shows the basic stem form.

An auxiliary verb having the perfect aspect modifies the main verb following it.

have had MV + perfect

The changed form of the MVb is called perfect participle. For progressive aspect we require auxiliary verb be, followed by a main verb that takes -ing.

He is running; They were eating; He was writing.

Passivisation:- Auxiliary verbs play a very important role in a kind of transformation process known as passivisation. This affects the whole sentence. For this we must switch the positions of subject and object. Subject becomes a PP and passive Vgp is introduced.

The Vgp that creates passive voice sentences must contain be verb or their different forms.

Active	Passive
build/built	is/was built is/was building	is/was being built has built	has been built will build	will be built

The forms taken by the main verb after the passive auxiliary verb is the passive participle form. Its form and that of the perfect participle is the same (built).

The Difference between Syntax and Morphology

The difference between syntax and morphology is that syntax deals with the structure of sentences and morphology deals with the structure of words. In any language, rules exist that guide the way that words are put together. These are the rules of syntax. Morphology is the study of how words are formed and understood within a language. Both syntax and morphology are related to how meaning is produced with language.

Syntax is a concept that governs the structure of sentences. The order in which words are put together has a bearing on the meaning of a sentence as a whole. Syntax rules must be followed in order for a sentence to be grammatically correct and to make sense to speakers of a language. It is what dictates things such as the order of the subject and verb, and how adjectives and adverbs are used.

Morphology is the study of morphemes, which are the smallest unit of meaning in a language. A morpheme can be one whole word or a prefix or suffix that is understood to change the meaning of the word and therefore takes on meaning itself. Morphology includes the concepts of inflection and derivation, which allow words to be made plural or for the tense of a word to be changed. The study of morphology attempts to understand how people use and understand the way that words work, in an attempt to understand the difference that one morpheme makes to many words and how words relate to each other.

Syntax and morphology are both important to the way that people derive meaning from language, but they are different in that syntax refers to the order and use of words, and morphology refers to the parts of words that create meaning. For example, it is possible to create a sentence that is grammatically correct, but that makes no sense to a speaker of the language. This is possible because syntax only governs the order of a sentence and not what the words in it mean. On the other hand, a combination of words may make sense when used together, but lose their meaning when rearranged in a way that violates the rules of syntax. Syntax and morphology are different but are dependent on each other.

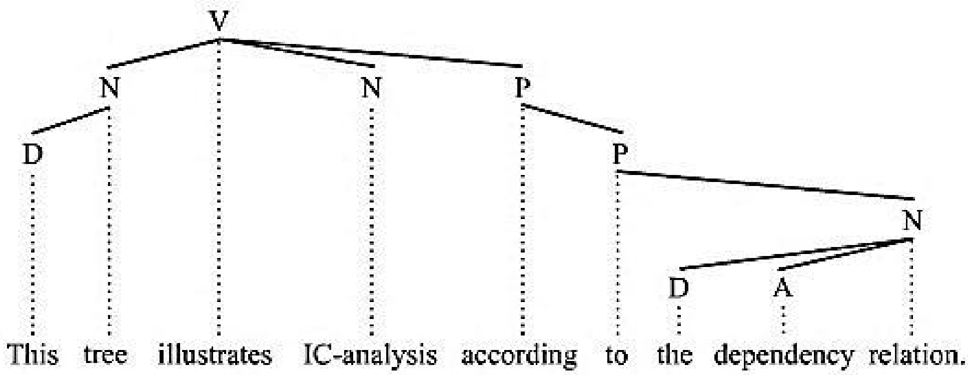
Systems of Syntactic Analysis

Immediate Constituent Analysis

Immediate constituent analysis or IC analysis is a method of sentence analysis that was first mentioned by Leonard Bloomfield and developed further by Rulon Wells. The process reached a full blown strategy for analyzing sentence structure in the early works of Noam Chomsky. The practice is now widespread. Most tree structures employed to represent the syntactic structure of sentences are products of some form of IC-analysis. The process and result of IC-analysis can, however, vary greatly based upon whether one chooses the constituency relation of phrase structure grammars (= constituency grammars) or the dependency relation of dependency grammars as the underlying principle that organizes constituents into hierarchical structures.

IC-analysis in phrase structure grammars

Given a phrase structure grammar (= constituency grammar), IC-analysis divides up a sentence into major parts or immediate constituents, and these constituents are in turn divided into further immediate constituents. The process continues until irreducible constituents are reached, i.e., until each constituent consists of only a word or a meaningful part of a word. The end result of IC-analysis is often presented in a visual diagrammatic form that reveals the hierarchical immediate constituent structure of the sentence at hand. These diagrams are usually trees. For example:



This tree illustrates the manner in which the entire sentence is divided first into the two immediate constituents this tree and illustrates IC-analysis according to the constituency relation; these two constituents are further divided into the immediate constituents this and tree, and illustrates IC-analysis and according to the constituency relation; and so on.

An important aspect of IC-analysis in phrase structure grammars is that each individual word is a constituent by definition. The process of IC-analysis always ends when the smallest constituents are reached, which are often words (although the analysis can also be extended into the words to acknowledge the manner in which words are structured). The process is, however, much different in dependency grammars, since many individual words do not end up as constituents in dependency grammars.

IC-Analysis in Dependency Grammars

IC-analysis is much different in dependency grammars. Since dependency grammars view the finite verb as the root of all sentence structure, they cannot and do not acknowledge the initial binary subject-predicate division of the clause associated with phrase structure grammars. What this means for the general understanding of constituent structure is that dependency grammars do not acknowledge a finite verb phrase (VP) constituent and many individual words also do not qualify as constituents, which means in turn that they will not show up as constituents in the IC-analysis. Thus in the example sentence "This tree illustrates IC-analysis according to the dependency relation", many of the phrase structure grammar constituents do not qualify as dependency grammar constituents:

This IC-analysis does not view the finite verb phrase illustrates IC-analysis according to the dependency relation nor the individual words tree, illustrates, according, to, and relation as constituents.

While the structures that IC-analysis identifies for dependency and constituency grammars differ in significant ways, as the two trees just produced illustrate, both views of sentence structure are acknowledging constituents. The constituent is defined in a theory-neutral manner: A given word/node plus all the words/nodes that that word/node dominates. This definition is neutral with respect to the dependency vs. constituency distinction. It allows one to compare the IC-analyses across the two types of structure. A constituent is always a complete tree or a complete sub-tree of a tree, regardless of whether the tree at hand is a constituency or a dependency tree.

Phrase Structure Grammar

There are three distinctive periods of development in the theory of constituent structure. Bloomfield only introduced notion and explained it by means of example. His followers notably Eugene, Nida, Rulon Wells, Zells Harris, formulated the principles of constituent analysis in greater detail and replaced Bloomfield's somewhat vague reference to `taking account of the meanings, with explicitly distributional criteria'. Finally, in the last few years, the theory of constituent structure has been formalized and subjected to rigor by Chomsky and other linguists and has been called `Phrase Structure Grammar'.

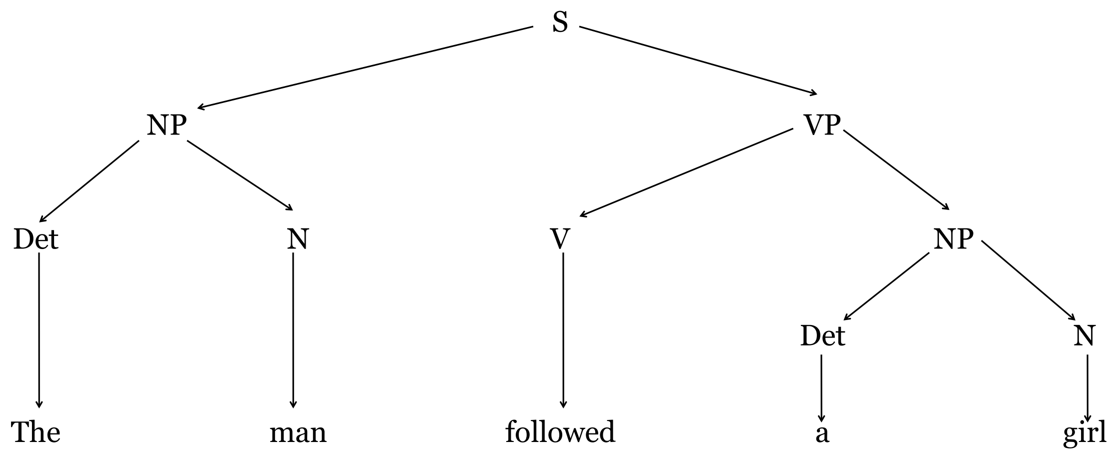
Once we start to use labels, we have clearly departed from simple analysis and are undertaking analysis somewhat similar to traditional phrasing, the division of sentences into already established grammatical elements. This kind of analysis is today usually called `phrase structure grammar'. It shows some of the weaknesses of the simple IC analysis. There are sophisticated versions of phrase structure grammars. The three best known are `Scale and Category grammar' associated with the name of Michael Halliday in London University, `Tagmemics' associated with the name of Kenneth Pike of Michigan, and `Stratificational grammar' associated with Sidney Lamb of Yale.

Thus, phrase structure grammar is an alternative way of expressing the information found in a tree diagram by means of `re-write' rules. In this model the linguist formalizes the grammar by means of generative rules which explicitly assign the correct constituent structure to sentences. Such systems are called simple `phrase structure grammars'. This model of grammar shows not only the terminal elements or constituents of a linear structure but also specifies the subunits and the level at which these units form natural groups. So the linguist is her interested in

1. The pattern underlying the sentence and the constituents; and in

2. The syntactic devices used to link the constituents together, and the ways in which various parts relate to one another.

Without the axiom, there are bound to be an unlimited number of rules. This implies that we can neither formulate nor write down such rules in one lift time which rules out the possibility of someone using this grammar to master a language. The fact that we learn a language by the time we are three or four years old refutes such an implication and compels us to believe that the rules of a grammar have got to be finite and not infinite.



Phrase structure rules of the generative grammar are an amalgamation of the subject-predicate and parsing systems of the traditional grammars and the IC analysis of the structural grammar. They are framed to derive a `kernel' sentence (in the Syntactic Structures, Chomsky 1957), or `underlying (deep) strings (in the Aspects, Chomsky 1965). These rules define basic grammatical relations that function in the deep structure.

They also make explicit the domination of constituent over the other. In short, they make explicit the universal conditions that define `human language'.

The phrase structure of a sentence is generally represented by a tree diagram. This representation of the phrase structure of a sentence is known as its `phrase marker' or `P marker' for short. The points that are joined by the lines or branches are called `Nodes'. Each of the nodes, except those on the bottom line (which are the terminal nodes) is given a label that represents a grammatically definable constituent - N, V, NP, VP, etc. where one mode is higher than another and joined to it by branches, it is said to `Dominate' it, if it is placed immediately above it and joined by a single line, it `Immediately' dominates it.

`Dominance' then shows how a larger constituent may consist of one or more constituents of a smaller kind. It is also important to note that the tree structure preserves the linear order of the constituents, just as plain IC analysis does. The first noun phrase precedes the verb phrase, the verb precedes the second noun phrase. The determiner precedes the noun. `Precedence' thus like `Dominance' is clearly shown in the tree diagram.

The sentence "the man followed a girl" will be represented by a tree diagram as Labeled bracketing and phrase structure trees provide much more information than IC analysis, but they still do not state, except by implication, how new sentences can be generated. This can be done with the use of `phrase structure rules' (PS rules). The tree structure of the sentence given in the example can be generated by six rules.

1. S-----NP------VP

2. VP----V--------NP

3. NP----DET-----N

4. V---------Followed

5. DET-------the, a

6. N----------man, girl

These rules will not generate only the one sentence handled in the tree diagram - `The man followed a girl'. Since both `the' and `a' are shown as determiners and both `man' and `girl' as nouns, the rules permit us to permute the determiners in each determiner position and the two nouns in each noun position and in fact, to generate no less than sixteen different sentences including, for instance:

A girl followed the man.
The girl followed a man.
A girl followed a man.

The phrase structure rule can generate longer sentences also.

Limitations of Phrase Structure Grammar

A phrase structure grammar is essentially a grammar of segmentation and categorization; it is a taxonomic model - a grammar of lists, an inventory of elements, and of class of sequences of elements. Although it is very strong in giving structural description of the language, yet it is deficient in generative capacity. It is incapable of accounting for all the intentions of native speakers. It fails to disambiguate all the ambiguities and understand all the synonymies.

The processes that pose problems to PS grammar are:

1. Ambiguities
2. Synonymies
3. Permutations
4. Discontinuous constituents (e.g. particles)
5. Remote relationship (e.g. those of cases)
6. Concord phenomena
7. Co-ordination.

Despite its rules of inference, binarity and irreflexibility, etc. a PS grammar runs into difficulties in describing syntactic structures of questions, negatives, passives, relatives, etc. easily. It fails to capture the deep meaning. It cannot discover the crucial notions, nor can it prevent the assignment of false, ungrammatical structure.

PS rules are incapable of - except by having recourse to very arbitrary solutions - of accounting for the multiplicity of relations existing either between elements in the same sentence, or between different sentences. For example:

1. The police diverted the traffic.
2. The traffic was diverted by the police.
3. The traffic was diverted by a country road.

PS rules fail to show the relationship that connects 1 to 2. In sentence 2 `by the police' will be shown as a prepositional phrase consisting of a preposition, a determiner and a noun, and in sentence 3 `by a country road' too will be shown as a prepositional phrase (prep + NP). Thus, it would ignore semantic considerations and case relations.

PS grammar does not have the precision, simplicity, elegance, power, insight, and competence of the TG grammar. It would be very complex and cumbersome and clumsy with so many constraints.

Transformational Grammar

Transformational grammar is a form of language analysis that establishes a relationship with the different elements in the sentence of a language and makes use of rules or transformations to recognize these relationships.

Basic concepts of Transformational Grammar

Transformational grammar which is usually generative grammar describes a language with the help of transformational rules. It involves logical reasoning to understand fully the meaning of the selected words. As such transformational grammar goes a step ahead of structural grammar which focuses more on the sentence structures used for communication. Apart from the use of correct sentence structure, transformational grammar analyses the words with reference to its underlying thoughts. Transformational grammar employs most of the linguistic tools such as syntax and context to explore the possible meanings of words.

Architect of Transformational Grammar

Transformational Grammar also known as Transformational Generative Grammar (TGG) refers to the theory of generative grammar of a natural language, developed by Chomsky. Transformational grammar is basically a theory to understand the processing of grammatical knowledge in the human brain. Noam Chomsky, the U.S. linguist, was the main propagator of transformational grammar in the 1960's.His theory opposed the earlier theories of structuralism by rejecting the idea that each language is different fro the other. In fact transformational grammar analyses language on the basis of certain universal tenets in languages.

Deep Structure and Surface Structure of Transformational Grammar

According to Chomskyan theory, transformational grammar involves two levels to represent the structure of sentences known as the "deep structure" and the "surface structure". The "deep structure" implies a more abstract form underlying the structure of a sentence. It is represented by a "phrase structure tree" in which the abstract relations between words and phrases of a sentence are depicted in a "hierarchical tree diagram". The "surface structure" refers to the actual form of the structure of a sentence used. Besides the two levels of sentence structure, transformational grammar consists of a body of formal rules to enable transforming deep structures to surface structures.

Phrase Structure Tree in Transformational Grammar

A phrase structure tree in transformational grammar is a diagrammatic representation of sentences distinguished by their syntactic characteristics. Thus we have verb phrases (VP), noun phrases (NP), prepositional phrases (PP) and so on. Most of the sentence structures in a language are governed by phrase structure rules. For example, sentences in English are governed by the rule that they should contain a Noun Phrase (NP) and a Verb Phrase (VP)

Transformational Grammar

Transformational grammar is used routinely to understand the grouping of words in a particular context. For example look at the sentences, "John wrote a poem on the spring season" and "A poem on the spring season was written by John". According to Chomsky these sentences originate from a deeper and more abstract grammatical structure. Transformational grammar explains how actual sentences evolve by manipulating the common form of sentence structures. A number of different theories have since evolved but they are all based on the Chomsky's original theory of transformational grammar.

Generative Grammar

Generative Grammar is a linguistic theory which describes a set of rules to use sequence of words properly to form grammatical sentences. The Generative grammar thus includes the studying particular rules in relation to the syntax and morphology of sentences in a language. Generative grammar is the basis of the study of different grammars such as transformational grammar, tree-adjoining grammar, relational grammar, categorical grammar among others.

Chomsky's ideas on Generative Grammar

Generative grammar exists in different forms and includes transformational grammar basically developed by Noam Chomsky, the U.S. linguist in the mid-1950s. His theory opposed the earlier theories of structuralism by rejecting the idea that each language is different from the other. In fact transformational grammar analyses language on the basis of certain universal tenets in languages. Further the Chomskyan tradition has resulted in specific transformational grammar, influenced greatly by his Minimalist Program. There is no agreement by Linguists on the kind of generative grammar that could be used as the best model to describe natural languages.

Basic concepts of Generative Grammar

Generative grammar sets forth the rules to recognize grammatical sentences in a language and differentiate them from improper sequence of words or ungrammatical sentences in the same language. Besides, Generative grammar outlines the syntactic analysis or structural description for the grammatical sentences of the language which are more precise than the analysis of traditional grammar in terms of parts of speech.

The rules of generative grammar focus on the different components of the language such as syntax, semantics, phonology and morphology. The sentence is represented as a tree having branches denoting the subordinate and superordinate elements rather than just a sequence of words. For example, the sentence, "The cat ate the mouse" would have the branches of a noun phrase (The cat) and verb phrase(ate the mouse) with the branch of noun phrase further being divided into the branches of a determiner(the) and noun(cat) and the verb phrase consisting of the verb(ate) and the noun phrase[determiner(the) and noun (mouse)].

Relation between Transformational and Generative Grammar

Transformational Grammar is looked upon as one of the approach to generative grammar which describes a language with the help of transformational rules. It involves logical reasoning to understand fully the meaning of the selected words. As such transformational grammar goes a step ahead of structural grammar which focuses more on the sentence structures used for communication. Apart from the use of correct sentence structure, transformational grammar analyses the words with reference to its underlying thoughts. Transformational grammar employs most of the linguistic tools such as syntax and context to explore the possible meanings of words.

Use of Generative Grammar

Generative grammar is more of an attempt to formalize the implicit rules that a person uses while speaking his native language. It is due to this inate language rules present I human beings that enables them to learn their native language with minimum effort and time. The rules of generative grammar may appear to be useful only in language studies but the truth is that they have been successfully applied even in the studies on music. Notable musicians such Schenkerian, Fred Lerdahl and Mark Steedman have used the ideas of generative grammar to analyze studies in music theory.

Semantics and Theories of Semantics

Semantics is the study of meaning in language. We know that language is used to express meanings which can be understood by others. But meanings exist in our minds and we can express what is in our minds through the spoken and written forms of language (as well as through gestures, action etc.).

The sound patterns of language are studied at the level of phonology and the organisation of words and sentences is studied at the level of morphology and syntax. These are in turn organised in such a way that we can convey meaningful messages or receive and understand messages. 'How is language organised in order to be meaningful?' This is the question we ask and attempt to answer at the level of semantics. Semantics is that level of linguistic analysis where meaning is analysed. It is the most abstract level of linguistic analysis, since we cannot see or observe meaning as we can observe and record sounds. Meaning is related very closely to the human capacity to think logically and to understand. So when we try to analyse meaning, we are trying to analyse our own capacity to think and understand, our own ability to create meaning. Semantics concerns itself with 'giving a systematic account of the nature of meaning' (Leech).

What is Meaning?

Philosophers have puzzled over this question for over 2000 years. Their thinking begins from the question of the relationship between words and the objects which words represent. For example, we may ask: What is the meaning of the word 'cow'? One answer would be that it refers to an animal who has certain properties that distinguish it from other animals, who are called by other names. Where do these names come from and why does the word 'cow' mean only that particular animal and none other? Some thinkers say that there is no essential connection between the word 'cow' and the animal indicated by the word, but we have established this connection by convention and thus it continues to be so. Others would say that there are some essential attributes of that animal which we perceive in our minds and our concept of that animal is created for which we create a corresponding word. According to this idea, there is an essential correspondence between the sounds of words and their meanings, e.g., the word 'buzz' reproduces 'the sound made by a bee'. It is easy to understand this, but not so easy to understand how 'cow' can mean' a four-legged bovine'—there is nothing in the sound of the word 'cow' to indicate that, (Children often invent words that illustrate the correspondence between sound and meaning: they may call a cow 'moo-moo' because they hear it making that kind of sound.)

Different aspects of meaning of a word

The Logical or Denotative Meaning

This is the literal meaning of a word indicating the idea or concept to which it refers. Concept is a minimal unit of meaning which could be called a 'sememe' in the same way as the unit of sound is called a 'phoneme'. Just as the phoneme /b/ may be defined as a bilabial + voiced + plosive, the word

'man' may be defined as a concept consisting of a structure of meaning 'human + male + adult' expressed through the basic morphological unit 'm + æ + n'. All the three qualities are logical attributes of which the concept 'man' is made. They are the minimal qualities that the concept must possess in order to be a distinguishable concept, e.g. if any of these changes, the concept too changes. So 'human + female + adult' would not be the concept referred to by the word 'man', since it is a different concept.

The Connotative Meaning

This is the additional meaning that a concept carries. It is defined as 'the communicative value an expression has by virtue of what it refers to over and above its purely conceptual content' (Leech, 1981). That is, apart from its logical or essential attributes, there is a further meaning attached to a word, which comes from its reference to other things in the real world. In the real world, such a word may be associated with some other features or attributes. For example, the logical or denotative meaning of the word 'woman' is the concept, 'human + female + adult'. To it may be added the concept of 'weaker sex' or 'frailty'. These were the connotations or values associated with the concept of 'woman'. Thus connotative meaning consists of the attributes associated with a concept. As we know, these associations come into use over a period of time in a particular culture and can change with change in time. While denotative meaning remains stable since it defines the essential attributes of a concept, connotative meaning changes as it is based on associations made to the concept; these associations may change.

The Social Meaning

This is the meaning that a word or a phrase conveys about the circumstances of its use. That is, the meaning of a word is understood according to the different style and situation in which the word is used, e.g. though the words 'domicile', 'residence', 'abode', 'home' all refer to the same thing (i.e. their denotative meaning is the same), each word belongs to a particular situation of use—'domicile' is used in an official context, 'residence' in a formal context, 'abode' is a poetic use and 'home' is an ordinary use. Where one is used, the other is not seen as appropriate. Social meaning derives from the awareness of the style in which something is written and spoken and of the relationship between speaker and hearer—whether that relationship is formal, official, casual, polite, or friendly.

The Thematic Meaning

This is the meaning which is communicated by the way in which a speaker or writer organises the message in terms of ordering, focus and emphasis. It is often felt, for example, that an active sentence has a different meaning from its passive equivalent although its conceptual meaning seems to be the same. In the sentences:

Mrs. Smith donated the first prize
The first prize was donated by Mrs. Smith

The thematic meaning of both the sentences is different. In the first sentence it appears that we know who Mrs. Smith is, so the new information on which the emphasis is laid is 'the first prize'. In the second sentence, however, the emphasis is laid on 'Mrs. Smith'.

It is sometimes difficult to demarcate all these categories of meaning. For example, it may be difficult to distinguish between conceptual meaning and social meaning in the following sentences:

He stuck the key in his pocket.
He put the key in his pocket.

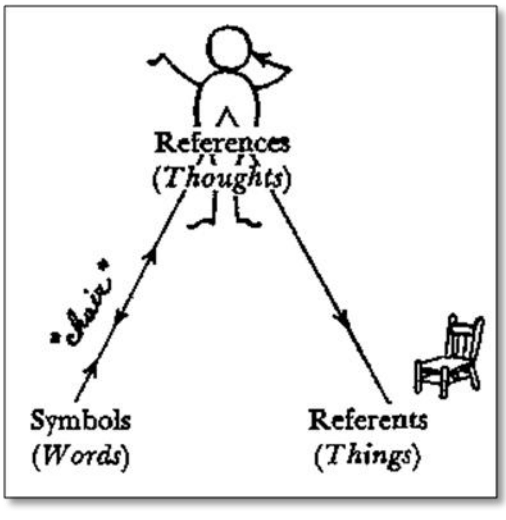
We could argue that these two sentences are conceptually alike, but different in social meaning––the first one adopts a casual or informal style, the second adopts a neutral style. However, we could also say that the two verbs are conceptually different: 'stuck' meaning 'put carelessly and quickly', which is a more precise meaning than simply 'put'. Of course, it is a matter of choice which word the speaker wishes to use, a more precise one or a neutral one.

Some Terms and Distinctions in Semantics

Lexical and Grammatical Meaning

Words grouped together randomly have little meaning on their own, unless it occurs accidentally. For example, each of the following words has lexical meaning at the word level, as is shown in a dictionary, but they convey no grammatical meaning as a group:

Lights the leap him before the downhill purple. [Without grammatical meaning]

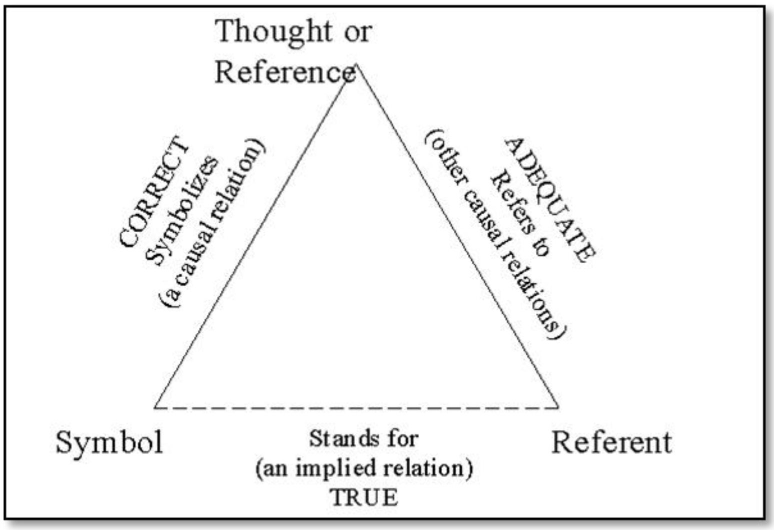


However when a special order is given to these words, grammatical meaning is created because of the relationships they have to one another.

"The purple lights leap down the hill before him." [With grammatical meaning]

"Different forms of the same lexeme will generally, though not necessarily, differ in meaning: they will share the same lexical meaning (or meanings) but differ in respect of their grammatical meaning, in that one is the singular form (of a noun of a particular subclass) and the other is the plural form (of a noun of a particular subclass); and the difference between singular and plural forms, or--to take another example--the difference between the past, present and future forms of verbs, is semantically relevant: it affects sentence-meaning. The meaning of a sentence . . . is determined partly by the meaning of the words (i.e., lexemes) of which it is composed and partly by its grammatical meaning." (John Lyons, Linguistic Semantics: An Introduction. Cambridge University Press, 1996)

Sense and Reference



The relationship between linguistic items (e.g. words, sentences) and the non-linguistic world of experience is a relationship of reference. It can be understood by the following diagram given by Ogden and Richards:

"The objects in the real world are referents the concept which we have of them in our minds is the reference and the symbol we use to refer to them is the word, or linguistic item."

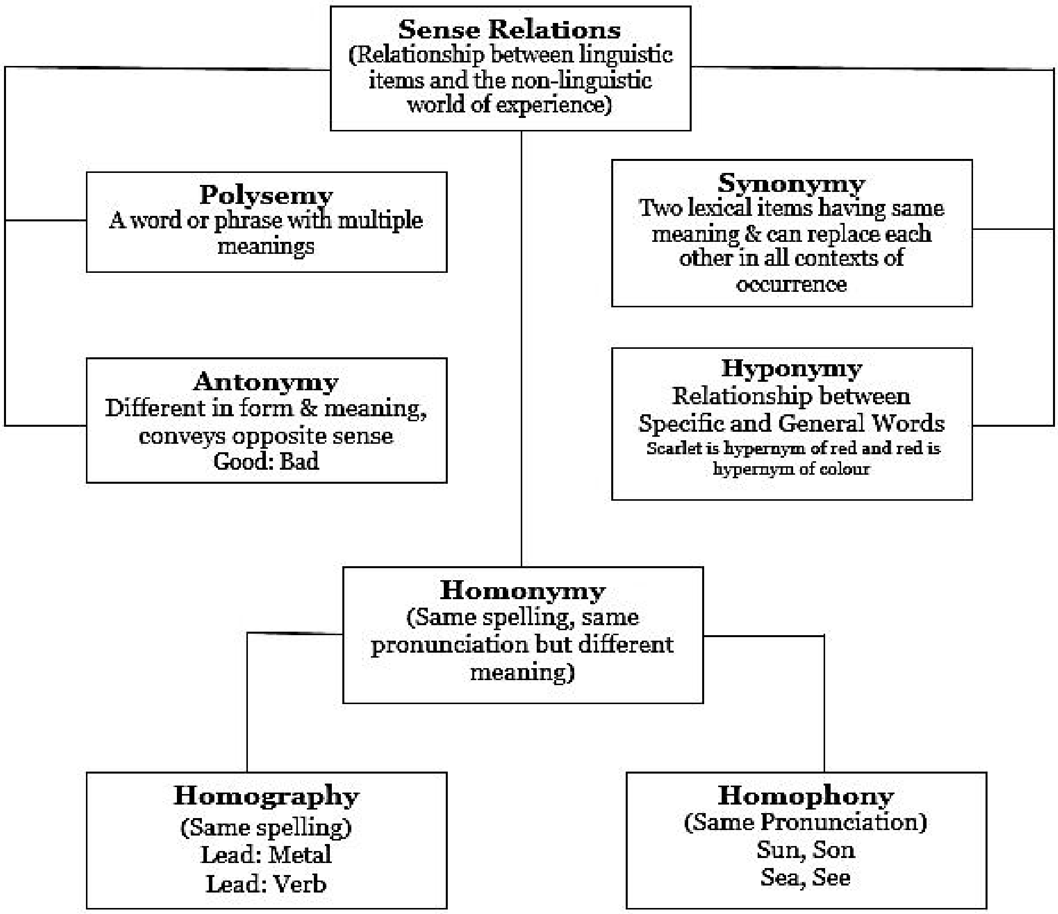
Reference is what a linguistic form refers to in the real, physical world; it deals with the relationship between the linguistic elements and the non-linguistic world of experience.

Sense is the inherent meaning of the linguistic form independent of situational context. It's the aspect of meaning dictionary compilers are interested in. It is concerned with the intra-linguistic relations. It's abstract and de-contextualized. As we have seen, we can explain the meaning of a linguistic item by using other words. The relation of a word with another word is a sense-relation. Therefore, sense is the complex system of relationships that holds between the linguistic items themselves. Sense is concerned with the intra-linguistic relations, i.e. relations within the system of the language itself, such as similarity between words, opposition, inclusion, and pre-supposition. Sense relations include homonymy, polysemy, synonymy, antonymy and hyponymy.

Sentence-meaning and Utterance-Meaning

A distinction may be drawn between, sentence-meaning and utterance-meaning. This is because a speaker may use a sentence to mean something other than what is normally stated in the sentence itself. Sentence meaning is a combination of lexical and grammatical meaning. In addition to this, intonation may also affect sentence meaning. For example, 'I don't like COFFEE' means that the speaker does not like coffee, but may like some other drink; 'I don't like coffee' means that the speaker doesn't like coffee but someone else does. Speakers /*-*can use intonation to change the emphasis and thus the meaning of the sentence.

Further, a sentence may be used by a speaker to perform some act, such as the act of questioning, warning, promising, threatening, etc. Thus, a sentence such as 'Its cold in here' could be used as an order or request to someone to shut the window, even though it is a declarative sentence. Similarly, an interrogative sentence such as 'Could you shut the door?' can be used to perform the act of requesting or commanding rather than that of questioning (The speaker is not asking whether the hearer is able to shut the door, but is requesting the hearer to actually do the action). Usually such use of sentences is so conventional that we do not stop to think of the literal sentence meaning, we respond to the speaker's act of requesting, etc., which is the utterance meaning. This is the meaning that a sentence has when a speaker utters it to perform some act, in particular appropriate circumstances.



Entailment and Presupposition

One sentence may entail other sentence—that is, include the meaning of other sentence in its meaning, just as hyponymy includes the meaning of other word. For example, the sentence 'The earth goes round the sun' entails (includes) the meaning 'The earth moves'.

A sentence may presuppose other sentences, e.g. the sentence 'Shamim's son is named Rahat' presupposes the sentence 'Shamim has a son'. Presupposition is the previously known meaning which is implied in the sentence. While entailment is a logical meaning inherent in the sentence, presupposition may depend on the knowledge of the facts, shared by the speaker and the hearer.

Semantic Structure

Words form certain kinds of relations. These are called sense relations that are paradigmatic and syntagmatic. Below we discuss five such major sense-relationships.

Synonym

This refers to similarity or 'sameness of meaning'. This is a handy concept for the dictionary makers, who need words for one word which have greater degree of similarity. To an extent this is acceptable, it is a working concept. However, one cannot disagree with Dr. Johnson's statement that 'words are seldom exactly synonymous'. In actual use where contextual nuances and situational subtleties influence meanings the degree of similarity among words reduces considerably to signify much, each word acts as a potential token of sense. Form the great literary scholars to the semanticists all agree that it is almost a truism that total synonymy is an extremely tale occurrence'.

It is clear that in considering synonymy 'emotive or cognitive import' has critical role. In the words of Ullmann, to qualify as synonyms they must be capable of replacing' 'catch other in any given context without the slightest change either in cognitive or emotive import'. John Lyon also stresses equivalence of cognitive and emotive sense.

Except for highly technical and scientific items, words used in everyday language have strongly emotional or associative significance. Liberty-freedom; Jude-conceal; attempt-effort, cut-slash; round-circular; have different evocative or emotive values; in a particular context where freedom is used liberty definitely cannot be used: it is always freedom struggle and not liberty struggle; or freedom movement not liberty movement. Clear in this instance freedom acts as modifier while liberty does not.

Hyponymy

This refers to the way language classifies its words on the principle of inclusiveness, forming a class members of which are then called co-hyponyms. For example, the classical Greek has a 'super ordinate' term to cover professions of various kinds, shoemaker, helmsman, flute player, carpenter, etc. but such a term doesn't exist in English. In English the word 'animal' is used to include all living in contrast to the vegetable world.

Synonymous sets can also be seen in such combinations denoting male-female-baby in dog-bitch-puppy; ram-ewe-lamb; when such terms do not exist, they are formed: female giraffe, male giraffe, baby giraffe. Thus the meaning of male giraffe is included in the meaning of giraffe as is the meaning of baby giraffe and female giraffe. The relationship of inclusiveness rests on the concept of reference. This gives us the idea of how a language classifies words. Words that are members of a class are called hyponyms.

Polysemy

When a word is identified as possessing two or more meanings, it is; said to be polysemous or polysemic. These different meanings are derived from one basic idea or concept. Dictionaries enter different meanings of a word. Head, for example, has the following different meanings : the upper or anterior division of the body, scat of intellect, mind, poise, the obverse of a coin, person, individual, the source of a stream, leader, director, crisis, culminating point of action, etc (Webster's Dictionary). All these meanings derive from the same word. From this have been coined as many as seventy, compound structures, each in the right of a different word such as headsman, headstand, headshop, headpiece, headgear, headlamp, headline, headlong, head-dress, etc. In the latter examples, one can see that the noun acts as adjectives which show contextual shifts of application.

Problems arise when it becomes difficult to determine whether a word with several meanings must he called polysemic or homonomous.

Collocation

An important concept in semantics is that of collocation, which recognises 'the association of a lexical item with other lexical items'. J.R. Firth says, 'you shall know a word by the company it keeps'. What he calls keeping company is what we know by collocation. It is part of the meaning of a word. Thus the word red is related to blood, rose, tomato, ink, cherry, etc. or to put it differently, red collocates with these words. Different linguistic contexts enable us to identity different meanings. Thus, for the word table we can identify these meanings front the contexts presented below.

(i) Writing table

(ii) Reading table

(iii) Have tabled the motion

(iv) Talk across the table

Most associations are loose with a freedom of movement that is not predictable. We can say white milk, but we can also say ‘while clouds and ‘white paint’. We can contrast this with such predictable collocations as blond hair, buxom woman and pretty girl or child. Blond cannot be collocated with door or dress. Buxom always goes with female individual - a buxom friend would mean a buxom woman friend and cannot mean a man. Similarly, a pretty boy is not heard. A more permanent collocation is seen in ‘bark’ always being associated with ‘dog’, ‘roar’ with ‘lion’ ‘chirp’ with ‘birds’, ‘school’ with ‘fishes’, ‘flock’ with birds etc.

In collocation words get special meaning. Exceptional conditions and exceptional boy do not really mean the same thing. So, the meaning of the collocated terms depends on the collocation.

“A word will often collocate with a number of other words that have something in common semantically. More strikingly we find that individual words or sequences of words will NOT collocate with certain groups of words”. (Palmer).

To ‘die’ and to ‘pass away’ refer to the same happening, but to say that daffodil passes away, is absurd, more acceptable is to say ‘daffodil dies’.

F.R. Palmer has identified three types of collocational restrictions.

1. Meaning in this type is completely based on die word. Green horse is an unlikely collocational combination.

2. Here meaning is based on the range, which makes, a pretty boy unacceptable.

3. This kind of restriction involves neither range nor meaning: rancid butter, addled brains are a couple of examples.

Antonymy

The concept of antonymy implies ‘oppositeness of meaning’ where the ‘recognition and assertion of one implies the denial of the other’. This is illustrated in pairs of words such as, big-small; old-young; wide-narrow, etc. These words can be handled in terms of the degree of quality involved. The comparative forms of the adjectives are graded: wide-wider; happy-happier; old-older. They are also made by adding more. To use Sapir's term, these are explicitly graded.

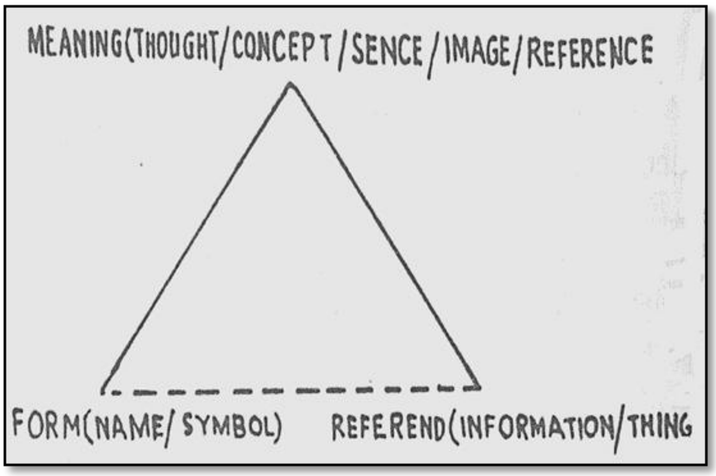
Homonymy



Homonomous words are defined as sounding alike hut possessing different meanings. For example, the words lie-lie, by-bye, I-eye. They are spoken and sometimes, written alike, but mean totally different things, as can be seen in their uses in these sentences - Don't lie, tell the truth. I have to lie down now. Normally, in dictionaries, separate entries are made for homonymous words recognizing them as separate Words rather than different meanings of the same words.

Homophonous words may be spelled and written identically or in different ways. The example cited above elucidates the point. For the words that are spelled alike the name homography is used. For the words that sound alike but may be spelled differently, the term homophony is used. Examples of the former are grave-grave; pupil-pupil; light-light; examples of the latter are cite-site; write-right-rite-might. Some homophones are also, interestingly, antonyms - raise-raze; cleave in the sense of severing asunder and cleave in the sense of 'uniting'. The problem of identifying which is a homonym and which a polyseme is a practical one and often it is difficult to determine exactly what is what. However, it is useful to know that homonymous words have generally different origins, while polysemic words, even when their meanings arc markedly divergent, have one source. We may use such metaphorical expressions as the foot of a bed, or the mountain; the hands and face of a clock, but we know that these are the meanings that ultimately trace to the original meanings of these words. They are, therefore, polysemes. Tracing the lexical etymologies is fraught with difficulties. One must have a vast knowledge of the histories of the words. Confusion between polysemy and homonymy is natural.

Semantic Theories

Traditional Approach

We have noted earlier that meaning was always a central concern with thinkers. This has been the root of much divergent opinion and definition of meaning. However, there was little doubt that there are two sides of the issue: symbolic realization, whether in utterance or in writing, and the thing symbolised.

Plato's Cratylus clearly lays down that word is the signifier (in the language) and the signified is the object (in the world). Words are, therefore, names, labels that denote or stand for. Initially, a child learns to know his world, and his language in this manner. He is pointed out the objects and people; names are given to them, and in his mind link or association between the names and the external world is established. Children have always been taught their language in this manner. This is also perhaps the way the earliest thinkers tried to understand the world through linguistic medium. That could be the reason why William Labov was prompted to say, 'In many ways, the child is a perfect historian of the language'.

However, this is an extremely simplistic theory and it would be wrong to say the child simply learns the names of things. Gradually, and simultaneously, he learns to 'handle the complexities of experience along with the complexities of language'.

Analytical/Referential Approach

Between the symbol and the object/thing there is an intervening phenomenon which is recognized as 'the mediation of concepts of the mind'. De Saussure and I.A. Richards and C.K. Ogden are the best-known scholars to hold this view. The Swiss linguist de Saussure postulated the link a psychological associative bond, between the sound image and the concept. Ogden and Richards viewed this in the shape of a triangle. The linguistic symbol or images, realized as a word or sentence and the referent, the external entities are mediated by thought or reference. There is no direct relation between the sign and the object but 'our interpretation of any sign is our psychological reaction to it' (Ogden).

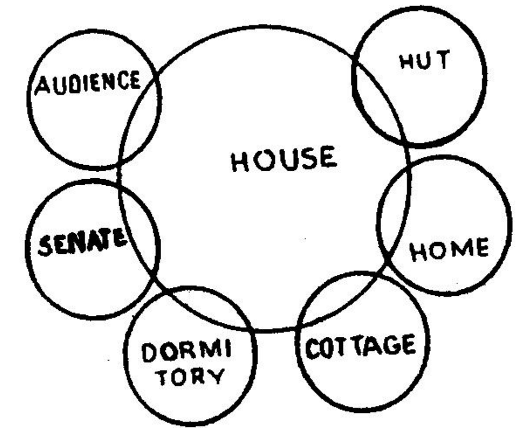
The meaning of a word in the most important sense of the word is that part of a total reaction to the word which constitutes the thought about what the word is intended for and what it symbolizes. Thus thought (the reference) constitutes the symbolic or referential meaning of a word. Linguistics, in the opinion of de Saussure, operates on the borderland where the elements of sound and thought combine: their combination produces a form, not a substance.

When we see an object, a bird, for example, we call it referent; its recollection is its image. It is through this image that the sign is linked to the referent.



The symbol is manifested in the phonetic form and the reference is the information the hearer is conveyed. This process thus established, makes meaning a 'reciprocal' and reversible relation between name and sense. One can start with the name and arrive at the meaning or one can start with the meaning and arrive at the name/s. The referential or 'analytical' approach, as it is also known, tries to avoid the functional domain of language, and seeks rather to understand meaning by identifying its primary components.

This approach is the descendant of the ancient philosophical world-view, and carries its limitations. It ignores the relatively different positions at which the speaker and the hearer are situated. Their positions make a reciprocal and reversible relationship between name and sense (Ullmann). This approach also overlooks other psychological, non-physical processes which do not depend upon the linguistic symbol, the reception of the sound waves for recognising the meaning of the object/thing. A word usually has multiple meaning and is also associated with other words. Which of the meanings will be received depends upon the situations.

Operational (Contextual or Functional) Approach

In the year 1953 L. Wittgenstein's work Philosophical Investigation was published. Around this time Malinowski and J.R. Firth were working to formulate the 'operational character of scientific concepts like 'length', 'time' or 'energy'; they tried to grasp the meaning of a word by observing the uses to which it is put instead of what is said about it. They approached the problem by including all that is relevant in establishing the meaning – the hearers, their commonly shared knowledge and information, external objects, and events, the contexts of earlier exchange and so on, and not by excluding them. This approach can directly be linked to the concept of the Context of situation being developed by the London group which viewed social processes as significant factor in explaining a speech event.

While the referential approach took an idealist position, dealing, as someone said, with 'meaning in language', the functional theory or the operational theory took a realistic stand, taking 'speech' as it actually occurred. Words are considered tools and whole utterances are considered. Meaning is thus seen to involve a 'set of multiple and various relations between the utterances' and its segments and the relevant components of environment' (Robins). In placing special emphasis on language as a form of behaviour – as something that we perform, the functional approach shares a lot with systemic linguistics. Language is a form a behaviour which is functional, 'something that we do with a purpose, or more often, in fact, with more than one purpose. It is viewed as a form of functional behaviour which is related to the social situation in which it occurs as something that we do purposefully in a particular social setting' (Margaret Berry). The systemic organization of a language is sought to be understood through its relations with the social situations of language.

According to this theory, meaning is classified into two broad categories: Contextual Meaning and Formal Meaning.

Contextual meaning relates a formal item or pattern to an element of situation. There is a regular association between a linguistic item and something which is extra-linguistic, 'something which is part of the situation of language rather than part of the language itself' (Berry). Contextual meaning is further divided into thesis, immediate situation and wider situation.

In Formal meaning the relationship between a linguistic item, pattern or term form a system and other linguistic items, patterns or terms from system belonging to the same level of language'. Formal meaning can be understood by collocating and contrasting a lexical item with other lexical items. The lexical item cat, for instance, has the potentiality for collocating with mew, purr, lap, milk, fur, tail, etc. It also contrasts with dog, mouse, kitten, etc. Thus, the complete description of the formal meaning of a lexical item would involve the statement of all the items with which it collocates and contrasts. Such items which fall into a context or set of contexts are referred to as an association field.

Field Theory of Meaning

Basic to this theory is the concept that each word in a language is surrounded by a network of associations that connect it with other terms. See the diagram below.

The field theory visualizes the vocabulary as a mosaic on a gigantic scale, which is built up of fields and higher units in the same way as fields are built up by words. The associative field of a word is formed by an intricate network of associations, some based on similarity, others on continuity, some arising between senses, others between names, others again between both. The field is by definition open, and some of the associations are bound to be subjective though the more central ones will be largely the same for most speakers. Attempts have been made to identify some of these central associations by psychological experiments, but they can also be established by purely linguistic methods. The identification of these associations by linguistic methods is done by collecting the most obvious synonyms and antonyms of a word, as well as terms similar in sound or in sense, and those which enter into the same habitual associations. Many of these associations are embodied in figurative language: metaphors, similes, proverbs, idioms, and the link. The number of associations centred in one word will of course be extremely variable and for some very common terms it may be very high.

As one of Saussure's pupils expressed it, 'the associative field is a halo which surrounds the sign and whose exterior fringes become merged'. This field is formed by an intricate network of associations: similarity, contiguity, sensation, and name. The associative field is by any definition open, that is, no finite limits can be assigned to any given field. Hence the aptness of the concept 'field', which serves an analogous purpose in physics.

The Distributional Approach

The structural treatment of linguistic meaning has been dealt in the Distributional Approach. Some linguists recommend studying meaning as a phenomenon isolated from outside world of human experience. The meaning of a word is to be understood as the range of its occurrences in sentences consisting of other words. Just as there are probably no words exactly like in meaning in all contexts, so there will be no two words in any language sharing exactly the same lexical distribution. This approach studies meaning as syntagmatic relations (collocation) and paradigmatic relations (sets).

It uses statistical methods and computer techniques for the study of semantics. But this approach to meaning fails to save the phenomena as meaning is understood everywhere by involving the relation of language to the rest of the world, and such meaningfulness is an essential part of any definition of language. Thus this approach incompletely treats the meaning.

Meaning of words in dictionary entries is derived on the basis of their relation to the whole human experience, on the basis of extra linguistic criterion and unsystemized commonsense. For this reason some linguists have tried to redefine or reconsider meaning in so far as in concerns the linguist within the range of its occurrence in sentences consisting of other words. Just as there are probably no words exactly alike in meaning in all contexts, so there will probably no words exactly alike in meaning in all contexts, so there will probably no two words in any language sharing exactly the same lexical environment.

Componential Analysis Approach

Componential Analysis Approach underlies the linguistic theories developed by developed by Katz and Foder (1963), Weinreich (1966), Beirwisch (1969) and others. It is a technique for the economical statement of certain semantic relations between lexical items and between sentences containing them. It is attempt to describe the structure of vocabulary in terms of relatively small set of very general elements of meaning called "component markers" or "sememes", and their various possible combinations in different languages. It tries to discover the ultimate meaning units out of which a particular set of words appears to be composed in composed in some systematic way. Some segments of vocabulary can be better analysed by this method. Through componential analysis, we can seek to find out how speakers use the vocabulary of a language in order to classify reality by referring to certain parameters of meaning.

The term componential analysis in semantics is best explained by means of simple example by linguists:

(1)	Man	Woman	Child
(2)	Bull	Cow	Calf
(3)	Ram	Ewe	Lamb
(4)	Drake	Duck	Duckling

When we consider these set of English words we can, on the basis of our intuitive appreciation of the sense of these words, set up such proportional equations as the following:

"Man : Woman : Child : : Bull : Cow : Calf"

This equation bears proof to the fact that, from the semantic point of view, the word "Man, Woman and Child" on the one hand, and "Bull, Cow and Calf on the other hand, all have something in common. What "man and bull" have in common is not shared by "woman and cow", and what "calf and child" have in common is not shared either "man and bull" or "woman and cow". What these groups of words have in common is called "semantic component" (other terms used for that are plereme/ sememe/ semantic marker/ semantic category). Thus the sense of man, according to componential analysis is the product of the component (male), (adult) and (human); that the sense of cow is the product of (female,) (adult) and (equine); and so on.

In order to understand the meaning of a sentence and its semantic relations to other expressions, one must know the meaning of its lexical items as well as how they are interrelated.

Basic Assumptions of theory: - Componential theories of semantics are based upon following assumptions:-

(a) Semantic components are language independent, or universal. The semantic components may be combined in various in different languages, yet they would be identifiable as the same components in the analysis of the vocabularies of all languages.

Hence, in the matter of kinship, colour, artifices, needs and functions of physical qualities semantic components may be universal, but they are not universal in many other areas.

(b) Propositional equations should be established with respect to the sense of lexical items. These propositions are cognitively valid, and can be set up on the basis of introspection.

"All the semantic structure might finally be reduced to components representing the basic dispositions of the cognitive and perceptual structure of human organism."

Componential Analysis Approach defines the meaning of a lexical element explicitly in terms of semantic components. These components or categories are not part of the vocabulary of the language itself, but rather theoretical elements postulated in order to describe he semantic relation between the lexical elements of a given language. These components are then connected by logical constants. For example Bierwisch's analysis:-

(a)	Boy	ANIMATE	HUMAN	MALE	NOT ADULT
(b)	Girl	ANIAMTE	HUMAN	FEMALE	NOT ADULT
(c)	Man	ANIAMTE	HUMAN	MALE	ADULT
(d)	Woman	ANIAMTE	HUMAN	FEMALE	ADULT

These implicational rules automatically complete a redundancy free entry like (1) to its fully specified (2) in the following:-

(1) Boy: HUMAN and MALE and NOT ADULT.

(2) Boy: ANIMATE and HUMAN and MALE and NOT FEMALE and NOT ADULT.

Rules of this type not only simplify the necessary dictionary specifications; they also express relevant generalization about the semantic structure of the vocabulary described.

Psycholinguistics

Psycholinguistics is the study of the psychological and neurobiological factors that enable humans to acquire, use, comprehend and produce language. It deals with planning, production, perception and comprehension of speech. The aim of modern linguistics has been to arrive at understanding of the way in which our minds work, and in this respect it could be argued that psycholinguistics, with its unique of blend of psychology and linguistics, is most significant of all the linguistic branches.

Psycholinguistics is a recent branch of linguistics developed in the sixties. It studies interrelationship of psychological and linguistic behaviour. It uses linguistic concepts to describe psychological processes connected with the acquisition and use of language. Thus language acquisition has become the most important area of investigation. It has raised and has partly answered questions such as how do children acquire their mother tongue? How do they grow up linguistically and learn to handle the registral and stylistic varieties of their mother tongue effectively? How much of the linguistic system that they ultimately command, are they born with and how much do they discover on the basis of their exposure to that system?

Now-a-days, certain areas of language and linguistic theory tend to be concentrated on by the psycholinguist. Much of psycholinguistics has been influenced by generative theory and the so-called mentalists. The most important area is the investigation of the acquisition of language by children. In this respect there have been many studies of both a theoretical and a descriptive kind. The need for descriptive study arises due to the fact that until recently hardly anything was known about the actual facts of language acquisition in children, in particular about the order in which grammatical structures were acquired. Even elementary questions as to when and how the child develops its ability to ask question syntactically, or when it learn the inflectional system of its language, remained unanswered. However, a great deal of work has been done recently on the methodological and descriptive problems related to the obtaining and analyzing information of this kind.

The theoretical questions have focused on the issue of how we can account for the phenomenon of language development in children at all. Normal children have mastered most of the structures of their language by the age of five or six. The generative approach argued against the earlier behaviorist assumptions that it was possible to explain language development largely in terms of imitation and selective reinforcement. It asserted that it was impossible to explain the rapidity or the complexity of language used by the people around them.

Psycholinguistics, therefore, argue that imitation is not enough; it is not merely by mechanical repetition that children acquire language. They also acquire it by natural exposure. Both nature and nurture influence the acquisition of language in children. Children learn first not items but systems. Every normal child comes to develop this abstract knowledge of his mother tongue, even of a foreign language, to some extent for himself; and the generative approach argues that such a process is only explicable if one postulates that certain features of this competence are present in the brain of the child right from the beginning. 'In other words, what is being claimed is that the child's brain contains certain innate characteristics which 'pre-structure' it in the direction of language learning. To enable these innate features to develop into adult competence, the child must be exposed to human language, i.e. it must be stimulated in proper to respond. But the basis on which it develops its linguistic abilities is not describable in behaviourist terms'. (David Crystal, Linguistics, p. 256)

The boundary between psycholinguistics and linguistics is becoming increasingly blurred as the result of recent developments in linguistics which aim at giving psychological reality to the description of language. Chomsky regards linguistics as a subfield of psychology more specially the cognitive psychology. His view of linguistics, as outlined for instance, in his book Language and Mind, is that the most important contribution linguistics can make, is to the study of the human mind. The bonds between psychology and linguistics become stronger by the extent to which language is influenced by and itself influences such things as memory, motivation, attention, recall and perception.

Similarly psycholinguistics and sociolinguistics are coming closer because of the realization that merely grammatical competence is not enough; we have to aim at communicative competence too. Whereas psycholinguistics is language and the mind, sociolinguistics is language and community. In other words, psycholinguistics can be said to deal with language and the individual, and sociolinguistics with language and society.

Language Acquisition

By the study of language acquisition is meant the process whereby children achieve a fluent control of their native language. Few people in the 1950s asked about the processes by which language was acquired. It was assumed that children imitated the adults around them and their speech gradually became more accurate as they grow up. There seemed to be some mystery attached to this apparently straight-forward process. Psycholinguistics has therefore attempted general theories of language acquisition and language use. Some have argued that learning is entirely the product of experience and that our environment affects all of us in the same way. Others have suggested that everybody has an innate language learning mechanism which determines learning or acquisition of language identically for each of us. These two schools are known as 'empiricists' (Behaviourists) and 'rationalists' (mentalists).

The empiricists say that all knowledge is derived from experience. They are of the opinion that children start out as clean slates. Learning a language is a process of getting linguistic habits printed on these slates. Language acquisition is the result of stimulus-response activities. Imitation, repetition, memorization, reward, and reinforcement facilitate this process of language acquisition. The behaviourists argue that learning is controlled by the conditions under which it takes place and that, as long as individuals are subjected on the same condition, they will learn in the same way. Variations in learning are caused because of the difference in learning experience, difference in the past experience of learning, difference in aptitudes, motivation, memory and age. So, for them there is not a theory of language learning as such but merely the application to language of general principles of learning.

From this follows that in general there is no difference between the way one learns a language and the way one learns to do anything else. So, according to the empiricists, language is a result of stimulus and response. A child should, therefore, learn to make a response in the first place, and then the response should be reinforced in a variety of ways. Indeed strength of learning is measured in terms of the number of times that a response has been made and reinforced. A word that has been uttered thirty times is better learned than one which has been said twenty times. So language learning process is basically a mechanical process of a habit formation. Habits are strengthened by reinforcement. Language is behaviour, a conditioned behaviour which can be learned only by inducing the child to behave. Repetition plays a vital role in learning a language. Hence there is necessity of mechanical drills and exercises, imitation and repetition.

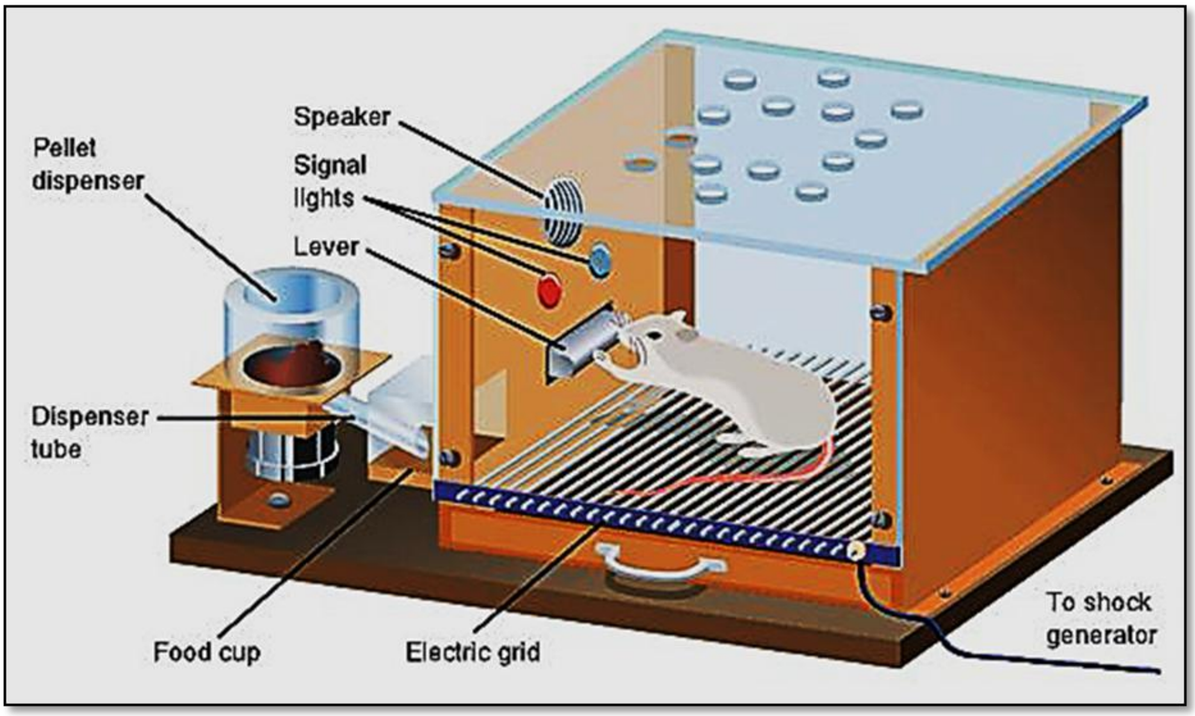
The rationalists contradict the empiricists at almost every point. Children learn a language, not because they are subjected to a similar conditioning process, but because they possess an inborn capacity which permits them to acquire a language as a normal maturational process. This capacity is universal. The child has an innate language acquiring device. He learns a language by exposure to it in society and by unconsciously forming certain hypotheses about language, which he goes on modifying till he comes to the adult model to which he is for the most part exposed. So the child goes on constructing an innate grammar, operating over generalized rules.

Language acquisition is species-specific and species-uniform. The ability to take up an understand language is inherited genetically but the particular language that children speak, is culturally and environmentally transmitted to them. Children all over the world acquire their native tongue without tutoring. Whereas a child exposed to an English speaking community begins to speak English fluently, the other one exposed to a community of Urdu speakers, begins to use Urdu fluently. Only human beings can acquire language. Language acquisition thus appears to be different in kind from acquisition of other skills such as swimming, dancing, or gymnastics.

Native language acquisition is much less likely to be affected by mental retardation than the acquisition of other intellectual activities. Every normal human child learns one or more language unless he is brought up in linguistic isolation, and learns the essentials of his language by a fairly little age, say by six. To acquire fluency in a language a child has to be exposed to people who speak that language. A language is not something we know by instinct or inherit from our parents. It is the result of our exposure to a certain linguistic community. It is part of that whole complex of learned and shared behaviour that anthropologists call ‘culture’. By this we do not mean that language is acquired ready-made. It is created anew by each child by putting together bits and pieces of environmental raw material. The human child does play an active role in this process, he actively strains, filters, recognizes what he is exposed to. His imitations are not photographic reproductions but artistic recreations. A child is a linguist in cradle. He acquires a language more easily than adults. He discovers the structure of his native language to use that language; no one hands it to him in a ready-to-use form.

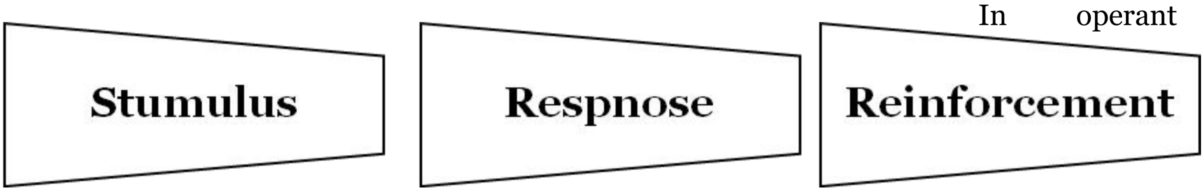
Both schools have said significant things, yet neither is perfect. The mentalists' emphasis on the rule-learning is over-enthusiastic, and the behaviourists' rejection of meaning entirely is unjust. We can easily understand the point of view of both schools of thoughts by studying language learning theories.

Language Acquisition Theories



Introduction

Language is Almighty Allah's special and unique gift to mankind without which human civilization would have remained an impossibility. As a distinct area of interest psycholinguistics developed in the early sixties, and in its early form covered acoustic phonology and language pathology. But now-a-days it has been influenced deeply by the development of generative theory, and its most important area of investigation has been language acquisition. It has raised and has partly answered questions such as how do children acquire their mother tongue? How do they grow up linguistically and learn to handle the registral and stylistic varieties of their mother tongue effectively? How much of the linguistic system that they ultimately command are they born with and how much do they discover on the basis of their exposure to language? In order to account for the phenomenon of language learning by children, during the past forty years, there have been two main theories known as "Behaviourism" and "Mentalism". The Behaviourists School of thought has argued that learning is entirely the product of experience and that our environment affects all of us in the same way. On the other hand the Mentalists school of thought has suggested that everybody has an innate language learning mechanism. Let us discover with the help of these two schools of thought that how do children acquire their mother tongue.



(1) The Behaviourist School

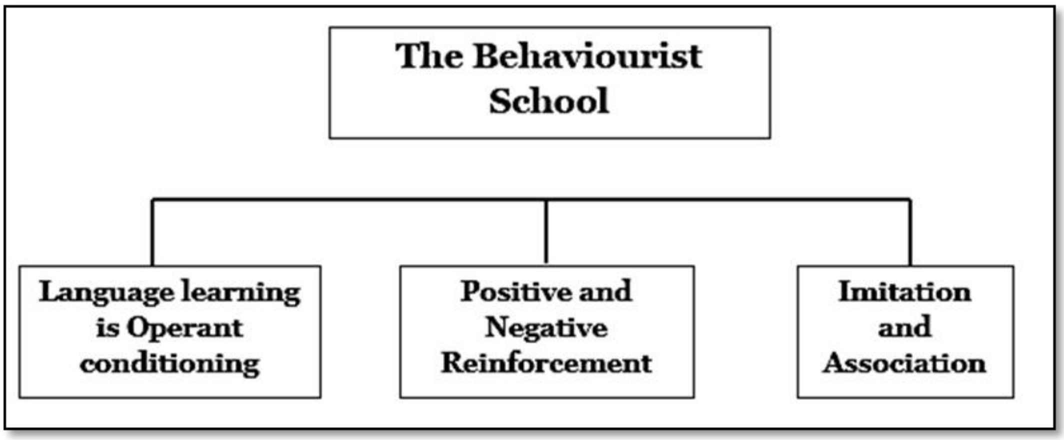
According to B.F Skinner and his colleagues, the behaviourists, learning, or a change of behaviour on the part of the learner, is brought about by a process known as operant conditioning which is the result of repeated training. Operant means 'voluntary behaviour' which is the result of learner's own free-will and is not forced by any outside person or thing. The learner demonstrates the new behavior first as a response to a system of reward or punishment, and finally as an automatic response. In order to prove their theory they conducted an experiment.

In a typical experiment, a rat is put in a box containing a bar. If it presses the bar, it is rewarded with a pellet of food. Nothing forces it to press the bar. The first time it probably does so accidentally. When the rat finds that the food arrives, it presses the bar again. Eventually it finds that if it is hungry it can obtain food by pressing the bar. Then task is made more difficult. The rat only gets rewarded if it presses the bar while a light is flashing. At first rat is puzzled. Eventually it learns the trick. Then the task is made more difficult again. This time the rat only receives food if it presses the bar a certain number of times. After initial confusion it learns to do this also. And so on, and so on.

Operant condition can be summarized thus

In operant conditioned, reinforcement plays a vital role. There are two kinds of reinforcement:

(a) Positive Reinforcement



Positive reinforcement comprises of praises and rewards. It has been shown by the experiments that positive reinforcement works much better in bringing about good learning.

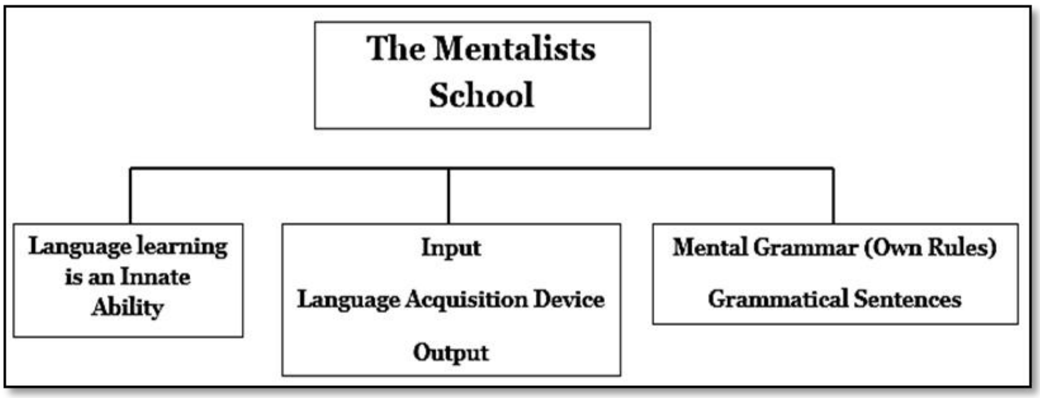
(b) Negative Reinforcement

Rebukes and punishments fall into the negative reinforcement category. Skinner eventually applies his theory of learning through operant conditioning to the study of how humans learn language.

Behaviourists believe that learning a language is no different from learning anything else; it becomes a habit by the stimulus-response-reinforcement-repetition process. The behaviourists also claim that we learn by imitation and by association. For instance, a young child hears a word 'apple' every time he is given one. He soon associates the word 'apple' with the actual thing. He then makes this sound himself, imitating what he has heard. His parents are pleased that he has learnt another word and so his response is reinforced. The thoughts of behaviorist school can well be understood according to following tree diagram:

Psycholinguists argue that imitation is not enough; it is not merely by mechanical repetition that children acquire language. They also acquire it by natural exposure.

(2) The Mentalist School



Another school of thought arguing on the crucial matter of first language acquisition in children is the mentalist school of thought which is led by Noam Chomsky. He and his mentalist followers claim that a child learns his first language through cognitive learning. He also acquires it by natural exposure. Both 'nature' and 'nurture' influence the acquisition of language in children. Chomsky regards linguistics as a subfield of psychology, more especially the cognitive psychology.

The Language Acquisition Device:

Chomsky argues that language is so complex that it is almost incredible that it can be acquired by a child in so short a time. He further says that a child is born with some innate mental capacity which helps the child to process all the language which he hears. This is called the "Language Acquisition Device" (LAD).

Chomsky and his followers claim that language is governed by rules, and is not a haphazard thing, as Skinner and his followers would claim. We must remember that when Chomsky talks about rules, he means the unconscious rules in a child's mind. A child constructs his own mental grammar which is a part of his cognitive framework. These rules enable him to produce grammatical sentences in his own language. Chomsky does not mean that child can describe these rules explicitly. For instance, a four or five year old child can produce a sentence like, I have taken meal, he can do that because he has a 'mental grammar' which enables him to form correct present perfect structures and also to use such structures in the right or appropriate situation.

The thoughts of Mentalists can well be understood with the help of the following tree diagram.

Chomsky suggests that the learner of any language has an inbuilt learning capacity for language that enables each learner to construct a kind of personal theory or set of rules about the language based on very limited exposure to language.

Difference between Mentalistic Approach and Behaviourist Approach:

Language acquisition seems to be a process both of analogy and application, both nature and nurture. The differences between the empiricists approach and that of the rationalist can be summarized in the following manner:

Mentalist Approach	Behaviourist Approach
(1) Language is an innate, in-born process.	(1) Language acquisition is a stimulus-response process.
(2) Children learn language by application.	(2) Children learn language by imitation and analogy.
(3) Language is not a behavior like other behaviors, but a specific mental process.	(3) Language is a conditioned behavior.
(4) The role of exposure to language is quite vital.	(4) The role of imitation, repetition, reinforcement and motivation is very significant in language learning.
(5) Language learning is analytical, generative and creation	(5) Language learning is based on practice.
(6) Language acquisition is the result of nurture.	(6) Language acquisition is the result of nature.

Conclusion:

Finally, after analyzing both the theories about first language acquisition by the child, such as Behaviourism and Mentalism, it can be concluded that Chomsky subscribes to an entirely different view of learning from that of behaviourists. He follows a mentalist approach which means something which involves the mind and the thought processes. Most psychologists of language agree with this theory. Behaviourism may not tell us much about the way in which we learn our mother tongue, but it can point to successful strategies in the learning of a foreign language when we are older. This comparative study makes one thing clear: nature and nurture, analogy and application, practice and exposure are important. Innate potentialities lay down the framework. Having been exposed to a small number of utterances, the child begins to extract the principles underlying the utterances and compose new utterances of his own. In a period of about four years, he is able to master and internalize all the essential rules of language.

First Language Acquisition

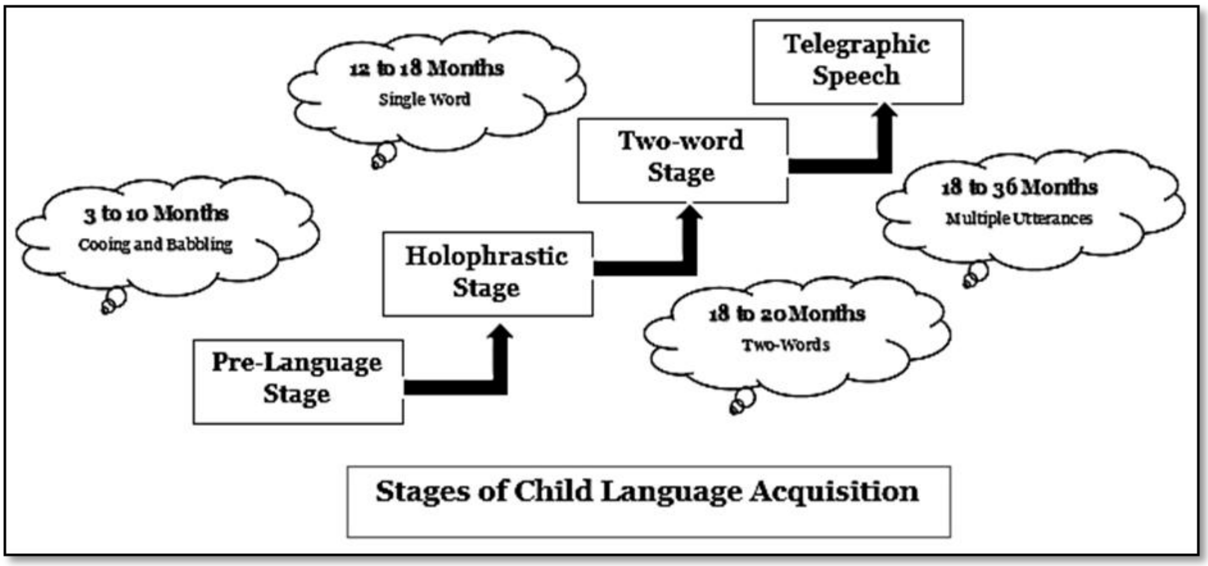
The acquisition of first language "is doubtless the greatest intellectual feat any one of us is ever required to perform." Leonard Bloomfield

In nearly all cases, children's language development follows a predictable sequence. However, there is a great deal of variation in the age at which children reach a given milestone. Furthermore, each child's development is usually characterized by gradual acquisition of particular abilities.

Children acquire their first language when they are exposed to a real environment. Acquiring the first language is like completing a puzzle. Some parts of the puzzle are set up, they are ready to be used-those set of pieces are born with everybody, we inherit them from our parents and forefathers. They are called innate learning mechanisms or as Noam Chomsky described as universal grammar. They are active until a specific age then it seems to be impossible to acquire the language again 'There is strong evidence that children may never acquire a language if they have not been exposed to before they reach the age of 6 or 7.

Children between the ages of 2 and 6 learn language so rapidly that by 6 they are competent language users. By the time children are of school-age, they have amazing language ability; it is a seemingly effortless acquisition (Cole & Cole, 1993; Curtiss, 1977; Goldin-Meadow, 1982; Lindfors, 1991; McLaughlin, 1984; Newport, 1991).' The other part of the puzzle is acquired from the interaction between the child and the surroundings, the environment, parents, caretakers, etc. The puzzle is not finished until we interact with the surroundings. As a result of this kind of interaction we acquire the language or we complete the puzzle. The sort of interaction determines the language we speak. I go with those who proposed that children are born with some syntactic categories like 'noun' and 'verb' wired in along with certain structural arrays for combining them. Through this interaction, children acquire the language. But what are the basic requirements for this process? Who are caretakers and how do they affect language acquisition process? and what stages do children go through for the sake of language acquisition?

Basic requirements for first language acquisition



A child growing up in the first two or three years requires interaction with other language-users in order to bring the 'language-faculty' or 'universal grammar' into operation with a particular language, such as English. The child who doesn't hear, or not allowed to use, language will learn no language. The case of Genie, the thirteen-year-old girl from Los Angles who spent her whole life in a state of physical, sensory, social and emotional deprivation that resulted in language disability, is an example. The language is acquired in a particular language-using environment.

The child must also be physically capable of sending and receiving sound signals in a language. All infants make 'cooing' and 'babbling' noises during the first few months, but congenitally deaf infants stop after six months. Therefore, in order to speak a language, a child must be able to hear that language being used. Hearing language sounds by itself, however, is not enough. One reported case has demonstrated that, with deaf parents who gave their mal-hearing son ample exposure to TV and radio programs, the child did not acquire an ability to speak or understand English. What he did learn very effectively, by the age of three, was the use of American Sign Language- the language he used to interact with parents. The crucial requirement appears to be the opportunity to interact with others via language.

Caretaker speech

Under normal circumstances, in Western cultures, the human infant is certainly helped in his or her language acquisition by typical behaviour of the adults in home environment. Adults such as mom, dad, granny and grandpa tend not to address the little creature before them as if they are involved in normal adult-to-adult conversation. The characteristically simplified speech style adopted by someone who spends a lot of time interacting with young child is called caretaker speech or motherese. This type of speech often uses exaggerating intonation and incorporates a lot of forms associated with 'baby-talk'. These are simplified words or alternative forms, with repeated simple sounds, for objects in the child's environment. Built into a lot of caretakers speech is a type of conversational structure which seems to assign an interactive role to the young child even before he or she becomes a speaking participant. Caretaker speech is also characterized by simple sentence structures and a lot of repetition. If the child indeed in the process of working out a system of putting sounds and words together, then these simplified models produced by the interacting adult may serve as good clues to the basic structural organization involved. Moreover, it has generally been observed that the speech of those regularly interacting with children changes and becomes more elaborate as the child begins using more and more language.

Language Acquisition Stages

Here are the stages of child language development. As we look at the stages we have to remember that children develop at different rates.

Pre-Language Stages

The pre-linguistic sounds of the very early stages of child language acquisition are simply called 'cooing' and babbling'. The period from about three months to ten months is usually characterized by three stages of sound production in the infant's developing repertoire. The first recognizable sounds are described as cooing with velar consonants like /k/ and /g/, as well as high vowels like /i/ and /u/. By six months, the child is usually able to sit up and can produce a number of different vowels and consonants such as fricatives and nasals. The sound production at this stage is described as babbling and may contain syllable type sounds such as mu and da. In the later babbling stage, around nine months, there are recognizable intonation patterns to the consonant and vowel combinations being produced. It is worthy saying that some psychologists have suggested that this 'pre-language' vocalization gives children some experience of the social role of speech because parents tend to react to the babbling, however incoherent, as if it is, in fact, their child's contribution to social interaction.

The one-word or Holophrastic Stage

Between twelve and eighteen months, children begin to produce a variety of recognizable single unit utterances. This period, traditionally called the 'one-word stage', is characterized by speech in which single terms are uttered for everyday objects such as ‘cat and cup' other forms such as /ʌ / may occur in circumstances which suggest that the child is producing a version of what is that, so the label 'one-word' may be misleading. Some terms like holophrastic or 'single-unit' or 'single-form' may be more accurate.

The two-word Stage

This stage begins around eighteen to twenty months, as the child's vocabulary moves beyond fifty distinct words. By the time the child is two years old, a variety of combinations will have appeared. The adult interpretations is, of course, very much tied to the context of their utterance. Whatever it is that the child actually intends to communicate via such expressions, the significant functional consequences are that the adult behaves as if communication is taking place.

Telegraphic Speech

Between two and three years old, the child will begin producing a large number of utterances which could be classified as multiple-word utterances. The salient feature of these utterances ceases to be the number of words, but that variation in word-forms which begins to appear. The telegraphic speech is a stage which is characterized by strings of lexical morphemes in phrases such as cat drink milk . The child has clearly developed some sentence-building capacity by this stage and can order the forms correctly. By the age of two and a half, the child's vocabulary is expanding rapidly and the child is actually initiating more talks. By the age of three, the vocabulary has grown to hundreds of words and pronunciation has become closer to the form of the adult language, so that even visitors have to admit that the little creature can talk.

In conclusion, babies are not born talking however, they acquire the language. Language acquisition is a part of the overall development of children physically, socially, and cognitively. They start to acquire the language even before they are born 'silent stage' and they develop their abilities and skills immediately after birth. In addition, they go through different stages to develop an ability for uttering sounds, making words, recognizing the meaning and forming constructions.

The Universal Language Timeline of Speech-Perception and Speech-Production Development

Sociolinguistics

Language is a social-cultural-geographical phenomenon. There is a deep relationship between language and society. It is in society that man acquires and uses language. When we study a language which is an abstraction of abstractions, a system of systems, we have to study its further abstractions such as dialects, sociolects, idiolects, etc. That is why we have to keep in mind the geographical area in which this language is spoken, the culture and the society in which it is used, the speakers who use it, the listeners for whom it is used, and the purpose for which it is used, besides the linguistic components that compose it. Only then can our study of a language be complete and comprehensive.

So we must look at language not only from within but also from without; we should study language from the points of view of both form and functions. Sociolinguistics is the study of speech functions according to the speaker, the hearer, their relationship and contact, the context and the situation, the topic of discourse, the purpose of discourse, and the form of discourse. An informal definition of sociolinguistics suggested by a linguist is that it is the study of: "Who can say what how, using what means, to whom and why." It studies the causes and consequences of linguistic behaviour in human societies; it is concerned with the function of language, and studies language from without.

Sociolinguistics is a fascinating and challenging field of linguistics. It studies the ways in which language interacts with society. It is the study of the way in which the structure of a language changes in response to its different social functions, and the definition of what these functions are. 'Society, here is to cover a spectrum of phenomena to do with race, nationality, more restricted regional, social and political groups, and the interactions of individuals within groups. Different labels have sometimes been suggested to cover various parts of this spectrum. Ethnolinguistics is sometimes distinguished from the rest, referring to the linguistic correlates and problems of ethnic groups—illustrated at a practical level by the linguistic consequences of immigration; there is a language side to race relations. The term Anthropological Linguistics is sometimes distinguished from 'sociological linguistics', depending on one's particular views as to the validity or otherwise of a distinction between anthropology and sociology in the first place (for example, the former studying primitive cultures, the latter studying more 'advanced' political units; but this distinction is not maintained by many others). 'Stylistics' is another label which is sometimes distinguished, referring to the study of the distinctive linguistic characteristics of smaller social groupings. But more usually, stylistics refers to the study of the literary expression of a community using language. Sociolinguistics gradually merges into ethno-linguistics, anthropological linguistics, stylistics and the subject-matter of psychology.

Broadly speaking, however, the study of language as part of culture and society has now commonly been accepted as Sociolinguistics. But there are also some other expressions which have been used at one time or another, including 'the sociology of language', 'social linguistics', 'institutional linguistics', 'anthropological linguistics', 'linguistic anthropology', 'Ethnolinguistics', the 'ethnography of communication', etc.

The kinds of problems which are faced by the sociolinguist are:

(a) The problems of communities which develop a standard language, and the reactions of minority groups to this (as in Belgium, India, Pakistan or Wales).

(b) The problems of people who have to be educated to linguistic level where they can cope with the demands of a variety of social situations.

(c) The problems of communication which exist between nations or groups using a different language, which affects their 'world-view' (for example the problem of popularizing Russian among the nations which are friendly to Russia).

(d) The problems caused by linguistic change in response to social factors; the problems caused or solved by bilingualism or multilingualism.

By this however, we do not mean that socio-linguistics can or does solve all such problems as stated above. Yet it can identify precisely what the problems are and provide information about the particular manifestation of a problem in a given area, so that possible solutions can thereby be found out or expedited. Furthermore, problems related to interference, code-switching or dialect-switching can be successfully handled by socio-linguistics. But the success of socio-linguistics ultimately depends upon 'pure linguistics'.

The scope of sociolinguistics, therefore, is the interaction of language and various sociologically definable variables such as social class, specific social situation, status and roles of speakers/hearers, etc. As J.B. Pride says, sociolinguistics is not simply 'amalgam of linguistics and sociology (or indeed of linguistics and any other of the social sciences)'. It incorporates, in principle at least, every aspect of the structure and use of language that relates to its social and cultural functions. Hence there seems no real conflict between the sociolinguistic and the psycholinguistic approach to language. Both these views should be reconciled ultimately. Linguists like John Lyons and cognitive psychologists like Campbell and Wales advocate the necessity of widening the notion of competence to take account of a great deal of what might be called the 'social context' of speech.

Language Variation

Language with its different varieties is the subject matter of sociolinguistics. Sociolinguistics studies the varied linguistic realizations of socio-cultural meanings which in a sense are both familiar and unfamiliar and the occurrence of everyday social interactions which are nevertheless relative to particular cultures, societies, social groups, speech communities, languages, dialects, varieties, styles. That is why language variation generally forms a part of socio-linguistic study.

Language can vary, not only from one individual to the next, but also from one sub-section of speech-community (family, village, town, and region) to another. People of different age, sex, social classes, occupations, or cultural groups in the same community will show variations in their speech. Thus language varies in geographical and social space. Variability in a social dimension is called sociolectical. According to sociolinguists, a language is code. There exist varieties within the code and the factors that cause language variation can be summarized in the following manner:

Nature of participants and their relationship	Socio-economic, Sexual, Occupational
Number of participants	Two Face-to-Face, One addressing a large audience, etc

Language Varieties: - Language varies from region to region, class to class, profession to profession, person to person, and even situation to situation. Sociolinguistics tends to describe these variations in language with reference to their relationship with society. It shows that the relationship between language variation and society is rather a systematic relationship. It manifests that there are four major social factors involve in this variation: socio-economic status, age, gender, and ethnic background of the user or users of language. Due to all these four factors language differs on four levels chiefly:

(1) Phonological Level

(2) Lexical Level

(3) Syntax Level

(4) Discourse Level

In other words, variation within a language with reference to its use or user can be defined in terms of 'difference of linguistic items'.

R. A. Hudson in his Sociolinguistics manifests: "What makes a language variety different from another is linguistic items that it includes, so we may define a variety of language as a set of linguistic items with similar social distribution".

So, to describe language varieties, on one side there are linguistic items and on the other there is 'social distribution'. Let's take two different social classes for example: Middle Class and Working Class. Language of Working Class is different from that of Middle Class. The choice of vocabulary of one class is quite different from the other. Middle class uses more adjective, adverbs and impersonal pronouns. Whereas Working class uses active and simple words and here is lesser use of adjective, adverbs and impersonal pronouns. Lower class speech (restricted code) is more direct with simple grammatical construction in contrast with middle class speech (elaborated code).

In the following, five major language verities will be discussed, namely: Idiolect, Register, Diglossia, Pidgin and Lingua Franca. Besides this, it will also be observed that how a language variety differs from another closely related variety. For instance, what is difference between Idiolect and sociolect? How register differs from dialect? What makes distinguish pidgin from other varieties?

Idiolect: - Every person has some differences with people around him. From eating habits to dressing, everyone has some quite unique feature. The same is the case with individual language use. Every individual have some idiosyncratic linguistic features in his or her use of language. These personal linguistic features are known as Idiolect. David crystal in his Dictionary of Linguistics and phonetics defines Idiolect as: "Linguistic system of an individual—one's personal dialect".

This 'linguistic system' can be described in terms of personal choice of vocabulary, grammatical structures, and individual style of pronunciation. In other words idiolect refers to a person's individual phonology, syntax and lexicon.

For instance some individuals use lower pitch and some other speak with higher pitch. Some are in habit of speaking with harder tone and it feels as if they are speaking with anger, even though they are speaking 'sweetly' on their side. Similarly, some individual's use their nasal cavity, more than their vocal cord, in their production of sound and listener feels as some sharp whistle is blowing.

The best example of particular choice of vocabulary is individual use of 'catch phrases'. Most frequent among these are "I say", "I mean", "do you understand?" and "what do you think?" Some catch phrases are rather interesting and their use becomes cause of amusement. For example one of my classmate in M.A Linguistics was in habit of using:

> "Bhai" with every third or fourth sentence. Once his audience was a girl instead of boy. When he said "Bhai, main explain kar raha thaa…" The girl corrected him and said "bhai nahi bhan!" and he promptly replied, "Oh bhai, I mean…"

In this way a person's speech is distinguished from other individuals and form any speech community. Idiolect is a minor speech variety than sociolect, which is used by any social class. Idiolect varies with individual whereas sociolect varies with class defined on socio-economic bases. Idiolect, sociolect and dialect are the varieties which depend on their user. However, there is another scheme of language varieties distinguishing from one and another in term of their use rather than user. Register is one of them.

Register: - Human beings are not static. Their thinking, choice, and behavior vary according to need and situation. As they adapt their behavior according to the situation, they adapt their language. This adaptation of language according to situation, context and purpose forms a language variety that is called 'Register'. David Crystal defines Register as: "A variety of language defined according to its use in a social situation".

Language of individual varies from situation to situation. At some occasions people talk very formally, on some other occasions they talk technically as well as formally. At some other occasion they become informal yet technical and sometimes informal and non-technical. Following is the example of all these 'levels of formalities':

Formal technical: "We obtained some sodium chloride."

Formal non-technical: "We obtained some salt."

Informal technical: "We got some sodium chloride."

Informal non-technical: "We got some salt."

There are two other levels: Slang, and vulgar. Question is that why a person adopts these different levels of formalities? Michael Halliday in his "Language as Social Semiotic" defines register as "A complex scheme of communicative behaviour". He observes that this scheme of behaviour has three dimensions: Field, Tenor, and Mode. These three dimensions determine speaker's choice of 'linguistic items'.

Field implies why and about what the communication is? In simple, what is the purpose and subject matter of communication? For example, a doctor's communication with other doctors will be containing more medical terminology i.e., he will be using medical register.

The same doctor will communicate with his patient in as simple language as possible. So the patient is 'Tenor' that means to whom the communication is being done. Other example of determination of speech by 'Tenor' is the difference of a person's communication with a teacher than with a friend.

Mode is the means of communication. If the mode of communication is letter, its language will be different from direct conversation. If it is an essay, its language will be differing from that of letter even though written about the same topic.

'Register' as a language variety differs from dialect, sociolect and idiolect. These differences are:

Register	Dialect
Register is a language variety according to use.	Dialect is language variety according to user.
It may be related to any particular profession or situation.	It may be related to any region or social class
It shows what the user of language is doing	It shows who the user is.
Register is a set of particular linguistic items to be used in a particular situation.	Dialect is a set of linguistic items to be used by people of particular area or class.

Up till now the different variations within a language were being dealt but there are certain situations where two or more languages are used which causes such variations that are beyond the range of one language. One of these variations is known as pidgin. There is a situation in which two or more languages are used with in a society. That is known as 'Diglossia'. Let's discuss the situation.

Diglossia: - Diglossia is not a language variety but a 'linguistic situation' where more than one languages are used. In English language, term Diglossia was introduced by Charles Ferguson. He used this term to refer to those societies where two very different varieties of the same language were being used. He said: "Diglossia is a relatively stable language situation in which, in addition to the primary dialect of the language (which may include standard or regional standards), there is very highly codified (often grammatically complex) superposed variety."

In Ferguson's theory that society is 'diglossic' where two 'divergent' varieties of the same language are used, out of which one is 'highly codified'. Arabic speaking countries are the best examples of 'Diglossia'. Throughout the Arabic peninsula there are two varieties of Arabic language in use: Classical Arabic, and Vernaculars. Classical Arabic, which is based on the Qur'anic language, is highly codified and complex and has stable grammatical structure since The Holy Qur'an is revealed. This language is 'Lingua Franca' of Arabic Peninsula and is being taught in schools and also the language of media. Everyone has to learn this variety especially and not acquired "by being born in right kind of family". Everywhere in diglossic society, vernaculars are used for daily routine conversation.

It is obvious from Ferguson's definition that only that society was considered diglossic where two varieties, one high and another low, of the same language were used. However, later on, Joshua Fishman, extend the term to that society where two different languages are used. According to this extension almost all societies become diglossic society.

Ferguson also purposed that there is a strong tendency to give one language higher status or prestige and reserve it for specific occasion and purposes. According to this notion, Pakistani society is strongly a diglossic society where there are not two but three languages exist with different status. In Punjab for example, Punjabi is used at personal level, Urdu is used on social level and English is 'reserved' for high formal occasions. The existence of different languages in a society provides them to emerge into each other and sometimes results into a new mixture of languages that is called Pidgin.

Pidgin: - Pidgin is an 'odd mixture' of two languages which cannot be said a divergent variety of 'a language' but of two or more languages. Here languages mixed up oddly that from morphemes to sentence structure everything reduces and mingles strangely. David crystal defines pidgin as a language with a markedly reduced grammatical structure, lexicon, and stylistic range, compared with other languages, and which is native language of none and are formed by two mutually unintelligible speech communities attempting to communicate.

The vocabulary of a pidgin comes mainly from one particular language called the "lexifier". An early "pre-pidgin" is quite restricted in use and variable in structure. But the later "stable pidgin" develops its own grammatical rules which are quite different from those of the lexifier. These names of pidgins themselves reflect how the vocabulary emerges: chinglish "Chinese English" or engrish "English Chinese". However it becomes more complex with the passage of time.

Since pidgin emerges out of practical need of communication between two different language communities having no greater language to interact, it is also called 'contact language'. R. A. Hudson in his Sociolinguistics states: "Pidgin is a variety especially created for the purpose of communication with some other group, and not used by any community for communication among themselves." So pidgin is outcome of interaction between two entirely different 'speech communities'. It develops because neither of the communities 'learns' the language of others due to different reasons.

Sometimes practically it is impossible to learn either of the languages so quickly and there is strong need of interaction, as for business purposes or immediate political needs. Most of the present pidgins have developed in European colonies. A few examples are: Hawaii Creole English, AAVE, Papiamentu "Geordie Cameroon Pidgin Krio "Singlish" Tok Pisin, Bislama. Out of these, many have developed as Creoles.

Major difference between pidgin and Creole is that former has no native speakers but later has. In fact, when any pidgin is acquired by children of any community it becomes Creole. At that time it develops its new structures and vocabulary. In other words when a pidgin becomes 'lingua franca' it is called Creole.

An old example of pidgin, that later developed into creole, was "lingua franca". It referred to a mix of mostly Italian with a broad vocabulary drawn from Turkish, Persian, French, Greek and Arabic. This mixed language was used for communication throughout the medieval and early modern Middle East as a diplomatic language. Term "lingua franca" has since become common for any language used by speakers of different languages to communicate with one another.

Lingua Franca: - Lingua franca is any inter-language used beyond its native speakers for the sake of communication between the speech communities having different languages. David Crystal defines it as: "An auxiliary language used to enable routine communication to take place between groups of people who speak different native languages".

Term 'lingua franca' is an old one and its origin is Italian means "Frankish language". It was derived from the medieval Arab Muslim use of "Franks" mean ancient Germanic people. The Muslims used it as a generic term for Europeans during the period of the Crusades. Formerly, the term referred to an old pidgin, mixture of Italian, Turkish, Arabic, Persian, Greek and French. This pidgin was widely used in the Mediterranean area from the 14th century or earlier and still in use in the 20th century. This language served as diplomatic and trade language. However, now this term refers to any language that serves to communicate between different larger speech communities.

There are many languages which have served as 'Lingua Franca' during the course of history. For instance, during the domination of Roman Empire, lingua franca was Latin in the East and Greek in the west. With the rise of the Arab Muslims, Arabic became lingua franca in the East from South Asia to North Africa and even western part of southern Europe. Persian also have enjoyed this status around 15th century till 19th century in Indian-subcontinent and Central Asia. Until the late-19th and early-20th centuries, Classical Chinese served as both a lingua franca and diplomatic language for Far East Asia, used by China, Korea, Japan and Vietnam in interstate communications. In Europe, from 18th century till World War II, French worked as Interlingua among European nations and now English has occupied this place and is serving as diplomatic and commerce language around the globe.

Conclusion

We have studied different varieties of language and have compared their different aspect. We have observed that language varies from larger communities, down to an individual. Even language of an individual varies from occasion to occasion. We find that there are different levels of formalities with in a language and their use depends of speaker's purpose, mode and audience. Moreover it also varies due to socio-economic position of individual or group. This variation of language with social difference, makes this notion more clear that language is a social phenomenon and inextricably tied with social and cultural traditions.

Bilingualism

Bilingualism has been derived from Latin word bi means "two" and lingualism means "tongue". Monolingualism refers to the ability to use a single language. Bilingualism is the ability to use two languages effectively. The ability to use multiple languages is known as multilingualism.

Individual & Societal Bilingualism

Bilingualism exists as a possession of an individual. It is also possible to talk about bilingualism as a characteristic of a group or community of people [societal bilingualism]. Bilinguals and multilinguals are most often located in groups, communities or in a particular region (e.g. Catalans in Spain). Co-existing languages may be in a process of rapid change, living in harmony or one rapidly advancing at the cost of the other, or sometimes in conflict. Where many language minorities exist, there is often language shift.

Bilingualism as a Norm

Bilingualism-more generally, multilingualism-is a major fact of life in the world today. To begin with, the world's estimated 5,000 languages are spoken in the world's 200 sovereign states (or 25 languages per state), so that communication among the citizens of many of the world's countries clearly requires extensive bi- (if not multi-)lingualism. In fact, David Crystal (1997) estimates that two-thirds of the world's children grow up in a bilingual environment. Considering only bilingualism involving English, the statistics that Crystal has gathered indicate that, of the approximately 570 million people world-wide who speak English, over 41 percent or 235 million are bilingual in English and some other language. One must conclude that, far from being exceptional, as many lay people believe, bilingualism/multilingualism--which, of course, goes hand in hand with multiculturalism in many cases--is currently the rule throughout the world and will become increasingly so in the future.

Global Multilingualism

The political history of the 19th and 20th centuries and the ideology of 'one state--one nation--one language' have given rise to the idea that monolingualism has always been the default or normal case in Europe and more or less a precondition for political loyalty. Facing this situation, it has been overlooked that the vast majority of the world's population--in whatever form or conditions--is multilingual. This is quite obvious when we look at the linguistic maps of Africa, Asia or Southern America at any given time.

When we talk of the knowledge of languages, we come across terms like Monolingualism, Bilingualism and Multilingualism. Simply speaking, they mean one, two or more languages. It is evident that the distinction is of degree only. Different people use term "Bilingualism" in different ways. For some Bilingualism means an equal ability to communicate in two languages. For others, it means the ability to communicate in two languages but with the possibility of greater skill in one language.

The traditional definition of Bilingualism is something like "the ability to use two languages freely and fluently with native speaker like proficiency". This approach to bilingualism appears to rule out a great many people, especially learners, who have a good working knowledge of a second language and a fair ability to express themselves, but who cannot claim to have the accuracy and fluency of a native speaker. This type of perfect bilingualism is extremely rare. However, it is not uncommon for people to approximate to perfect bilingualism by being equally competent in both languages over a fairly wide range of situations. So we should prefer to view Bilingualism as "language ability which can be placed on a line from monolingualism to ambilingualism". It means this ability can occur anywhere on a scale from speaking only one's native language to speaking two or more languages with equal skill.

Bilingualism in its broad definition is very common indeed all over the world. Monolingualism speech communities are extremely rare. People are required to attempt to learn at least one other language. Over 70% of the earth;s population are thought to be bilingual or multilingual, and there is good reason to believe that bilingualism or multilingualism has been the norm for most human beings at least for the last few millennia. In countries like Switzerland, Canada and the United States, people speak more than one language. Two wellknown examples of officially bilingual countries are Canada and Belgium. An equally well-known example of an officially multilingual country, which has not experienced any comparable language-problems, is Switzerland. Other countries, though not officially bilingual or multilingual, have two or more different languages spoken within their borders. Most countries of the world fall into this latter category. Furthermore, although it does not follow from what has been said so far, in most countries whether they are officially bilingual or multilingual or not, there are whole communities that are bilingual or multilingual in the sense that their members commonly use two or more languages in their daily lives. It is not the case, of course, that all the citizens of an officially bilingual or multilingual country use, or even know, more than one language.

In New Guinea, in southeast Asia, in India, in the Caucasus, in the Amazon rain forest, people routinely learn two or three neighbouring languages as well as their own, and the same was true of Australia before the European settlement. Even today, many millions of European are at least bilingual, speaking both their own mother tongue and the national lenguage of the country they live in, and many of them can additionally speak a global language or world language like English or French.

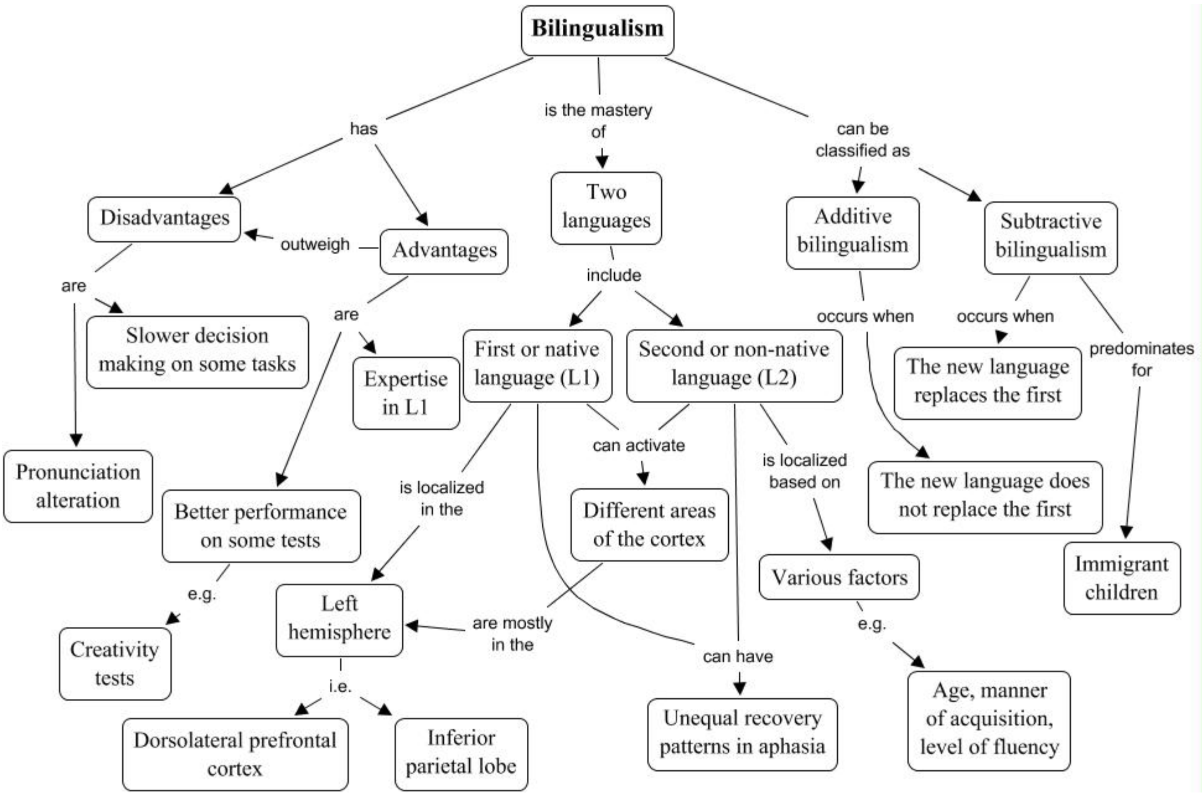
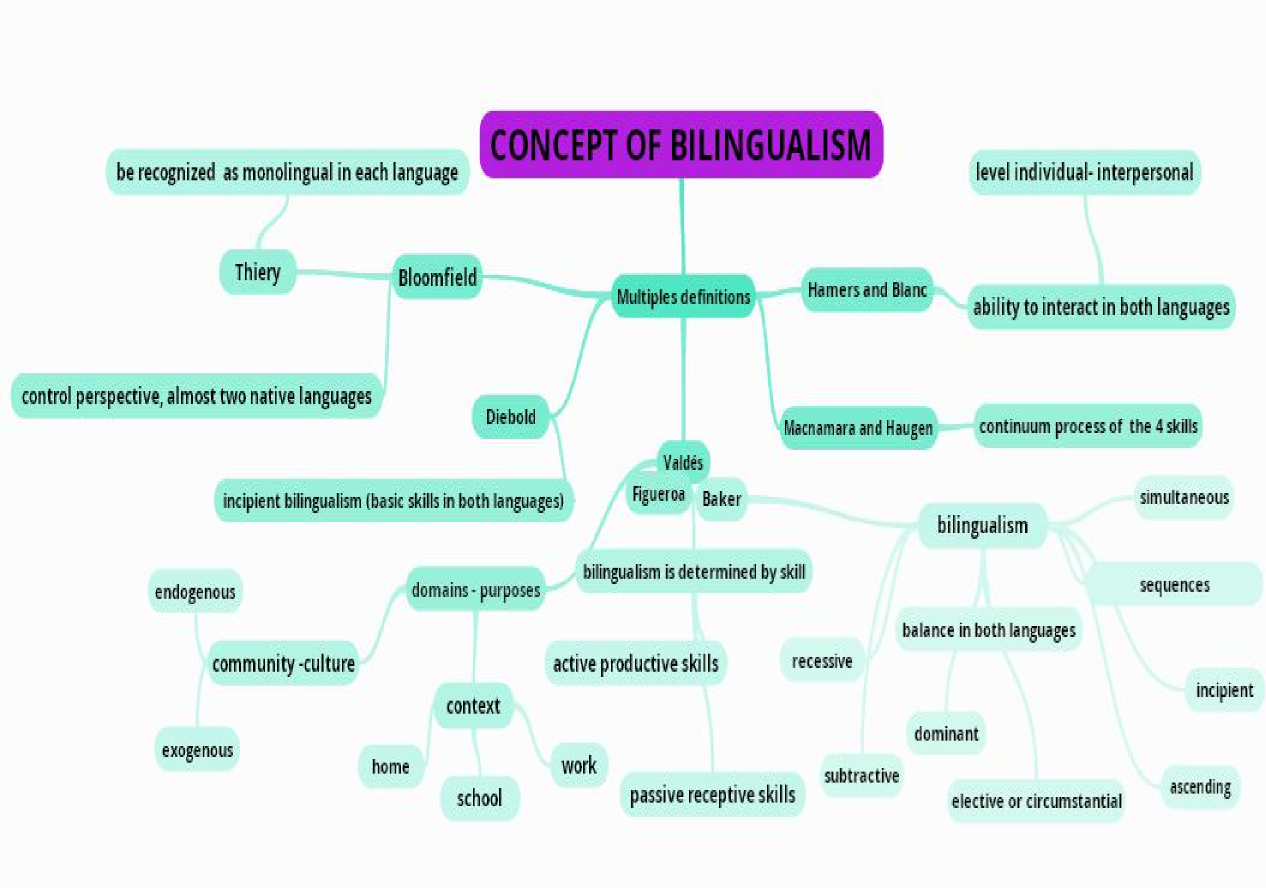
People of a country may feel obliged to study a foreign language under political pressure, or adopt it of their own free will to join the main stream of human relationship.Individual bilingualism, however, doesn't have to be the result of political dominance by a group using different language. It can simply be the result of having two parents who speak different languages. If a child simultaneously acquires the French spoken by her mother and the English spoken by her father, then the distinction between the two languages may not even be noticed. There will simply be two ways of talking according to the person being talked to. However, even in this type of bilingualism, one language tends eventually to become the dominent one, with the others in subordinate role.
Sociolinguists have identified two main types of bilingualism: Co-ordinate and Compound.

Co-ordinate bilinguals tend to keep the two languages separate, and have language choice governed by language domains(area of language activity). They may think in their dominant language but have the ability to switch from one language to another when the need arises.

Compound bilinguals have their two languages as a merged system. They have a single semantic base or competence and can use it to produce other language. They move from one language to another with much less hesitation. The compound bilinguals use both language at the same time interchangeably. Compound bilingualism results in code-switching which means change from one language to another. This change of switch may take place from one language to another in the same situation, or from one sentence to another sentence in the discourse, or with in the same sentence.



The classification of bilinguals just given may or may not be well founded from a psychological, and neurophysiological, point of view. But it is one that has guided a good deal of recent research. At the very least, it serves to emphasize the fact that there are many different kinds of bilingual individuals.



Similarly, there are many different kinds of bilingual communities: different in respect of whether one language is clearly dominant or not for most members; whether one language is dominent for some, but not for others; whether some members approximate to perfect bilingualism or not; whether both languages are acquired simultaneously or not; and so on. However regardless of of all these differences, there is one thing that most, if not all, bilingual communities have in common: a fairly clear functional differentiation of the two languages in respect of what many sociolinguiats refer to as domains. For example, one such domain might the home, this being defined in terms, not simply of the actual place where the conversation occurs, but also of the participants, the topic of conversation, and other relevant variables.

Thus one language might be the language of the home, in the sense that it would always be used in talking informally with other members of the family at home about domestic matters. However, another language might be used outside the home, or inside the home when strangers are present (even though they might well be bilingual too) or when the topic of conversation is other than domestic. This notion of domain is intuitively attractive.

Bilingualism or multilingualism can be the property of an individual, but equally it can be the property of an entire speech community in which two or more languages are routinely used. The existence of bilingual and multilingual societies raises a number of important social, political and educational issues. In what languages should education be delivered, and at what levels? What languages should be accepted for publication and broadcasting? In what languages should laws be written, and what languages should be accepted in court proceedings?

Code Switching

The practice of moving back and forth between two languages or between two dialects or registers of the same language is called code switching. It occurs far more often in conversation than in writing.

Examples and Observations:

"Code-switching performs several functions:

First, people may use code-switching to hide fluency or memory problems in the second language (but this accounts for about only 10 percent of code switches).

Second, code-switching is used to mark switching from informal situations (using native languages) to formal situations (using second language).

Third, code-switching is used to exert control, especially between parents and children.

Fourth, code-switching is used to align speakers with others in specific situations (e.g., defining oneself as a member of an ethnic group).

Code-switching also 'functions to announce specific identities, create certain meanings, and facilitate particular interpersonal relationships'

In a relatively small Puerto Rican neighborhood in New Jersey, some members freely used code-switching styles and extreme forms of borrowing both in everyday casual talk and in more formal gatherings. Other local residents were careful to speak only Spanish with a minimum of loans on formal occasions, reserving code-switching styles for informal talk. Others again spoke mainly English, using Spanish or code-switching styles only with small children or with neighbors.

African American Vernacular English and Standard American English

"It is common to find references to black speakers who code switch between AAVE [African American Vernacular English] and SAE [Standard American English] in the presence of whites or others speaking SAE. In employment interviews (Hopper & WIlliams, 1973; Akinnaso & Ajirotutu, 1982), formal education in a range of settings (Smitherman, 2000), legal discourse (Garner & Rubin, 1986), and various other contexts, it is advantageous for blacks to have code-switching competence. For a black person who can switch from AAVE to SAE in the presence of others who are speaking SAE, code switching is a skill that holds benefits in relation to the way success is often measured in institutional and professional settings. However, there are more dimensions to code switching than the black/white patterns in institutional settings."

"A Fuzzy-Edged Concept"

"The tendency to reify code switching as a unitary and clearly identifiable phenomenon has been questioned by Gardner-Chloros (1995: 70), who prefers to view code switching as a 'fuzzy-edged concept.' For her, the conventional view of code switching implies that speakers make binary choices, operating in one code or the other at any given time, when in fact code switching overlaps with other kinds of bilingual mixture, and the boundaries between them are difficult to establish. Moreover, it is often impossible to categorize the two codes involved in code switching as discrete and isolatable."

Code Switching and Language Change

"The role of CS, along with other symptoms of contact, in language change is still a matter of discussion. On the one hand, the relationship between contact and language change is now generally acknowledged: few espouse the traditional view that change follows universal, language-internal principles such as simplification, and takes place in the absence of contact with other varieties (James Milroy 1998). On the other hand, some researchers still downplay the role of CS in change, and contrast it with borrowing, which is seen as a form of convergence.

Language Change

Language change is variation over time in a language's phonetic, morphological, semantic, syntactic, and other features.

Causes of language change

Economy	Speakers tend to make their utterances as efficient and effective as possible to reach communicative goals. Purposeful speaking therefore involves a trade-off of costs and benefits.
The principle of least effort	Speakers especially use economy in their articulation, which tends to result in phonetic reduction of speech forms. See vowel reduction, cluster reduction, lenition, and elision. After some time a change may become widely accepted (it becomes a regular sound change) and may end up treated as a standard. For instance: going to [ˈɡoʊ.ɪŋ.tʊ] → gonna [ˈɡɔnə] or [ˈɡʌnə], with examples of both vowel reduction [ʊ] → [ə] and elision [nt] → [n], [oʊ.ɪ] → [ʌ].
Analogy	Reducing word forms by likening different forms of the word to the root.
Language Contact	Borrowing of words and constructions from foreign languages.
The medium of communication	is also one of the causes of language change.
Cultural Environment	Groups of speakers will reflect new places, situations, and objects in their language, whether they encounter different people there or not
Migration/Movement	Speakers will change and create languages, such as pidgins and creoles.

Types of language change

All languages change continuously, and do so in many and varied ways. Marcel Cohen details various types of language change under the overall headings of the external evolution and internal evolution of languages.

Lexical changes

The study of lexical changes forms the diachronic portion of the science of onomasiology. The ongoing influx of new words in the English language (for example) helps make it a rich field for investigation into language change, despite the difficulty of defining precisely and accurately the vocabulary available to speakers of English. Throughout its history English has not only borrowed words from other languages but has re-combined and recycled them to create new meanings, whilst losing some old words.

Dictionary-writers try to keep track of the changes in languages by recording (and, ideally, dating) the appearance in a language of new words, or of new usages for existing words. By the same token, they may tag some words as "archaic" or "obsolete".

Phonetic and phonological changes

The concept of sound change covers both phonetic and phonological developments. The sociolinguist William Labov recorded the change in pronunciation in a relatively short period in the American resort of Martha's Vineyard and showed how this resulted from social tensions and processes.[Even in the relatively short time that broadcast media have recorded their work, one can observe the difference between the pronunciation of the newsreaders of the 1940s and the 1950s and the pronunciation of today. The greater acceptance and fashion ability of regional accents in media may also reflect a more democratic, less formal society — compare the widespread adoption of language policies.

The mapping and recording of small-scale phonological changes poses difficulties, especially as the practical technology of sound recording dates only from the 19th century. Written texts provide the main (indirect) evidence of how language sounds have changed over the centuries . But note Ferdinand de Saussure's work on postulating the existence and disappearance of laryngeals in Proto-Indo-European as an example of other methods of detecting/reconstructing sound-changes within historical linguistics.

Spelling changes

Standardisation of spelling originated relatively recently. Differences in spelling often catch the eye of a reader of a text from a previous century. The pre-print era had fewer literate people: languages lacked fixed systems of orthography, and the handwritten manuscripts that survive often show words spelled according to regional pronunciation and to personal preference.

Semantic changes

Semantic changes are shifts in meaning of the existing words. They include:

Pejoration	in which a term acquires a negative association
Amelioration	in which a term acquires a positive association
Widening	in which a term acquires a broader meaning
Narrowing	in which a term acquires a narrower meaning

The appearance of a new word marks only the beginning of its existence. Once generally adopted as part of the language, the meanings and applications it has for speakers can shift dramatically, to the point of causing misunderstandings. For example, "villain" once meant a peasant or farmhand, but has come to imply a criminal individual in modern English. This exemplifies a word that has undergone pejoration, which means that a negative association has become attached to it. Conversely, other words have undergone amelioration where a more positive meaning prevails. Thus, the word 'wicked' (generally meaning 'evil'), as of 2009 means 'brilliant' in slang or in a colloquial context.

Other ways of semantic change include narrowing and broadening. Narrowing a word semantically limits its alternative meanings. For example the word "girl" once meant 'a young child' and "hound" (Old English hund) referred to any dog, whereas in modern English it demotes a particular type of canid. Examples of words that have been broadened semantically include "dog" (which once referred to a particular breed).

Syntactic change

Syntactic change is the evolution of the syntactic structure of a natural language. Over time, syntactic change is the greatest modifier of a particular language. Massive changes may occur both in syntax and vocabulary and are attributable to either creolization or relexification.

Sociolinguistics and Language Change

The sociolinguist Jennifer Coates, following William Labov, describes linguistic change as occurring in the context of linguistic heterogeneity. She explains that "linguistic change can be said to have taken place when a new linguistic form, used by some sub-group within a speech community, is adopted by other members of that community and accepted as the norm."

Can and Patton (2010) provide a quantitative analysis of twentieth century Turkish literature using forty novels of forty authors. Using weighted least squares regression and a sliding window approach, they show that, as time passes, words, in terms of both tokens (in text) and types (in vocabulary), have become longer. They indicate that the increase in word lengths with time can be attributed to the government-initiated language "reform" of the 20th century. This reform aimed at replacing foreign words used in Turkish, especially Arabic- and Persian-based words (since they were in majority when the reform was initiated in early 1930s), with newly coined pure Turkish neologisms created by adding suffixes to Turkish word stems (Lewis, 1999).

Can and Patton (2010), based on their observations of the change of a specific word use (more specifically in newer works the preference of ama over fakat, both borrowed from Arabic and meaning 'but', and their inverse usage correlation is statistically significant), also speculate that the word length increase can influence the common word choice preferences of authors.

Quantifying Language Change

Altintas, Can, and Patton (2007) introduce a systematic approach to language change quantification by studying unconsciously-used language features in time-separated parallel translations. For this purpose, they use objective style markers such as vocabulary richness and lengths of words, word stems and suffixes, and employ statistical methods to measure their changes over time.

Language Shift and Social Status

Languages perceived to be "higher status" stabilise or spread at the expense of other languages perceived by their own speakers to be "lower-status".

Historical examples are the early Welsh and Lutheran bible translations, leading to the liturgical languages Welsh and High German thriving today, unlike other Celtic or German variants.

For prehistory, Forster and Renfrew (2011) argue that in some cases there is a correlation of language change with intrusive male Y chromosomes but not with female DNA. They then speculate that technological innovation (transition from hunting-gathering to agriculture or from stone to metal tools) or military prowess (as in the abduction of British women by Vikings to Iceland) causes immigration of at least some males, and perceived status change. Then, in mixed-language marriages with these males, prehistoric women would often have chosen to transmit the "higher-status" spouse's language to their children, yielding the language/Y-chromosome correlation seen today.

Relationship between Language and Culture

Introduction

In any culture or region, language is much more than semantics, much more than what the written page or the spoken word can contain. Language does not end at the meaning or the use of words associated to a culture" words represent beliefs, history, and the culture of their origin and they must be used accordingly.

Language

Language as one element of culture has a very important role in human life. Language allows a person communicating with others in meeting their needs. Thus, it can be said is the main function of language as a communication tool. This does not mean that the language has only one function. Another function is as a tool to express self-expression, a tool to make integration and social adaptation, as well as a tool to hold social control.

Based on these functions we can say that language is a means of communication between members of the public symbol of the sound produced by means of said human. Language is a symbol of the sound produced by means of said human, and the system has means that are arbitrary; used by men in their life as a means of communication between each other to form, express, and communicate thoughts and feelings.

Based on the notions described above, it is clear that the language is a communication tool produced by the tool man has said symbol, system, meaning, and social are arbitrary and culturally. Every language has a symbol. With the symbol he will facilitate communication, although not directly dealing with the object. This is because each symbol already contains a concept or understanding. In order for the meaning of the symbols are understood, every language user must understand and follow the system language is used. Language system contains rules or rules that must be obeyed by the user's language. If the rules are not obeyed, the delivery information may be chaotic or communication cannot happen.

Languages are arbitrary means no direct relationship between the symbol with the symbolized. Symbolic emergence of an object is based on the convention. However, even so to be able to understand a language must be studied and used as a communication tool.

Culture

Culture is the whole communication system that binds and allows operation of a set of people called the public. Thus culture can be defined as a "system of rules of communication and interaction that allows a society occurs, preserved, and preserved".

The relation between human and culture is inseparable. Similarly, between the Pakistani and Pakistani culture. This is because human beings live alongside Pakistan in a unit area of ethnic communities, also live in a unity of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan. In this regard, they hold one culture, Pakistan is the national culture.

Culture is a result of creative initiative and the work of humans in an effort to improve the standard of living and adapt to their environment. These limits are more emphasized on the fact that humans are capable of producing culture, because humans are living beings who have mind and reason.

Relationship between Language and Culture

According to Sapir (1921), "language is a purely human and non-instinctive method of communicating ideas, emotions and desire by means of voluntarily produced symbols." Language is a part of culture and a part of human behavior.

It is often held that the function of language is to express thought and to communicate information. Language also fulfills many other tasks such as greeting people, conducting religious service, etc.

Krech（1962） explained the major functions of language from the following three aspects:

1. Language is the primary vehicle of communication;

2. Language reflects both the personality of the individual and the culture of his history. In turn, it helps shape both personality and culture;

3. Language makes possible the growth and transmission of culture, the continuity of societies, and the effective functioning and control of social group.

It is obvious that language plays a paramount role in developing, elaborating and transmitting culture and language, enabling us to store meanings and experience to facilitate communication. The function of language is so important in communication that it is even exaggerated by some scholars.

The problem of the relationship between language, culture and thought bothered many linguists and philosophers since ancient time. To think about this problem, we need to begin with the definition of language and culture. Language is generally accepted as a system of arbitrary vocal symbols used for human communication. And there is a most widely accepted definition of culture: culture is the total accumulation of beliefs, customs, values, behaviors, institutions and communication patterns that are shared, learned and passed down through the generation in an identifiable group of people.

The definitions of language and culture imply that the two are closely connected to each other. On one hand, culture seems so inclusive, it permeates almost every aspect of human life including languages people use. On the other hand, when people need to share a culture, they communicate through language.

However, the definition alone cannot provide us with a clear understanding on the relationship between language and culture. Problems remain unsolved as: how does culture influence people's linguistic behavior? And does language influence the culture in return. Various studies have been carried out, among them, a well-known hypothesis is the Sapir-Whorf Hypothesis made by two American linguists Edward Sapir and Benjamin Whorf. The Sapir-Whorf hypothesis describes the relationship between language, culture and thought. The core idea is that man's language moulds his perception of reality. We see the world in the way that our language describes it, so that the world we live in is a linguistic construct.

The Sapir-Whorf Hypothesis has two major components: linguistic determinism and linguistic relativity. The former holds the idea that the way one thinks is determined by the language one speaks, because one can only perceive the world in terms of the categories and distinctions encoded in the language. The latter means that the categories and distinctions encoded in one language system are unique to that system and incommensurable with those of others, therefore, the difference among languages must be reflected in the differences in the worldviews of their speakers.

Since the formulation of the hypothesis, discussions have never been ended. Many linguists and philosophers are against the linguistic determinism. They argue if language determines thought totally, and if there is no thought without language, speakers of different languages will never understand each other. Nevertheless, the weak interpretation of the hypothesis is now widely accepted that language does have influence on thought and culture. Evidence is easy to be found. A well-known example is that Eskimos have countless words for snow while there is only one word 'snow' in English. Therefore, a 'snow world' in Eskimo's eye and an English speaker's eye would be so different. This example shows that people's perceptions of their surroundings are modified by the conceptual categories their languages happen to provide.

The problem get more and more philosophical, as Winston Churchill once said, 'we shaped our buildings and afterwards our buildings shaped us.' We describe our experience and culture by using language, and the categories built into language, its structures influence our perceptions--language in turn shapes our thought and culture. Therefore, we should take a dialectical point of view on the relationship between language and culture. As is mentioned at the beginning, language and culture are inextricably intertwined. On one hand, language is a part of human being. It reflects people's attitudes, beliefs, and worldviews. Language both expressed and embodies cultural reality. On the other hand, language is a part of culture. It helps perpetuate the culture and it can influence the culture to a certain extent.

Conclusion

Language is a major component and supporter of culture as well as a primary tool for transferring message, which is inextricably bound with culture. Learning a second language also involves learning a second culture to varying degrees. On the other hand, language is influenced and shaped by culture. It reflects culture. Cultural differences are the most serious areas causing misunderstanding, unpleasantness and even conflict in cross-cultural communication. So both foreign language learners and teachers should pay more attention to cultural communication information.

The Romantic Movement in England

At the end of the 18th century a new literature arose in England. It was called Romanticism, and it opposed most of the ideas held earlier in the century. Romanticism had its roots in a changed attitude toward humankind. The forerunners of the Romanticists argued that humans are naturally good; society makes them bad. If the social world could be changed, all men might be happier. Many reforms were suggested: better treatment of people in prisons and almshouses (old homes), fewer death penalties for minor crimes, and an increase in charitable institutions.

The Romanticists believed that all people are kin and deserve the treatment to which human beings are by nature entitled. Every person has a right to life, liberty, and equal opportunity. These ideas had been well stated in the American Declaration of Independence. In France a revolution of the common people began in 1789. Many Englishmen hoped that the new democracies—France and the United States—would show the way for the rest of the world to follow. Along with democracy and individualism came other ideas. One of these ideas was that the simple, humble life is best. Another was that people should live close to nature. Thus the Romantic Movement was inherently anti-progress, if progress meant industrialization.

Because of this concern for nature and simple folk, authors began to take an interest in old legends, folk ballads, antiquities, ruins, "noble savages," and rustic characters. Many writers started to give more play to their senses and to their imaginations. Their pictures of nature became livelier and more realistic. They loved to describe rural scenes, graveyards, majestic mountains, and roaring waterfalls. They also liked to write poems and stories of such eerie or supernatural things as ghosts, haunted castles, fairies, and mad folk.

Thus Romanticism grew. The movement cannot be precisely defined. It was a group of ideas, a web of beliefs. No one Romantic writer expressed all these ideas, but each believed enough of them to set him apart from earlier writers. The Romanticists were emotional and imaginative. They acted through inspiration and intuition. They believed in democracy, humanity, and the possibility of achieving a better world.

The First Great Romanticists

William Blake was both poet and artist (see Blake, William). He not only wrote books, but he also illustrated and printed them. Many of his conservative contemporaries thought him insane because his ideas were so unusual. Chief among these "insane" ideas was his devotion to freedom and universal love. He was interested in children and animals—the most innocent of God's creatures. As he wrote in Songs of Innocence (1789):

When the voices of children are heard on the green,
And laughing is heard on the hill,
My heart is at rest within my breast,
And everything else is still.

Certainly no one has put more wonder and mystery into beautiful melodic verse than did Samuel Taylor Coleridge. The strange, haunting supernaturalism of The Rime of the Ancient Mariner (1798) and Christabel (1816) have universal and irresistible appeal.

A close friend of Coleridge's for many years was William Wordsworth. Together they brought out a volume of verse, Lyrical Ballads (1798), which sounded the new note in poetry. This book really signalled the beginning of English Romanticism. Coleridge found beauty in the unreal, Wordsworth found it in the realities of nature.

From nature Wordsworth learned that life may be a continuous development toward goodness. He believed that if people heed the lessons of nature they will grow in character and moral worth. (See also Wordsworth, William.)

Charles Lamb, a schoolmate of Coleridge's, for the most part had little of the serious quality that one sees in the authors of Lyrical Ballads; nor was he an ardent lover of nature. A city man, he showed how a person could live happily among his books by his own fireside. His best-known essay is the playful Dissertation on Roast Pig (1822). In Tales from Shakespeare (1807), he and his sister Mary rewrote many of Shakespeare's plays into stories for children. (See also Lamb, Charles.)

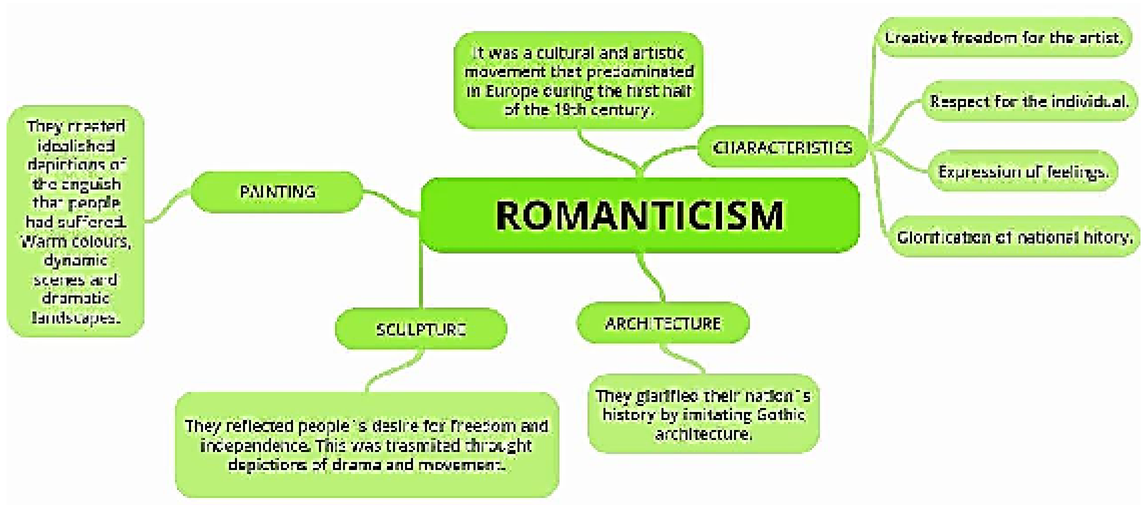
Interest in the past and in people and a love of rugged scenery are found in the works of Sir Walter Scott. The Lay of the Last Minstrel (1805) and The Lady of the Lake (1810) are representative of Scott's poems. Between 1814 and 1832 Scott wrote 32 novels. They include Guy Mannering (1815) and Ivanhoe (1819). (See also Scott, Walter.)

Jane Austen, a gifted writer of realistic novels, had difficulty finding a publisher for her skillfully drawn portraits of English middle-class people. Pride and Prejudice (1813) is her best-known work. (See also Austen, Jane.)

Among the lesser Romantic figures was Robert Southey, who was poet laureate of England and author of The Story of the Three Bears and The Battle of Blenheim. An industrious writer, he earned his living solely by his pen. William Hazlitt, on the other hand, earned his way by lecturing and by writing for critical magazines, such as The Edinburgh Review. (See also Hazlitt, William; Southey, Robert.)

The Younger Romanticists

By 1812 the older generation of Romanticists had grown conservative. They no longer supported radical causes or championed the oppressed. The younger Romantic writers, however, quickly and noisily took up the cry for liberty and justice.



George Gordon Byron was an outspoken critic of the evils of his time. He hoped for human perfection, but his recognition of man's faults led him frequently to despair and disillusionment (Manfred, 1817; Cain, 1821). Much of his work is satire, bitterly contemptuous of human foibles (Don Juan, 1819–24). His narrative poems (The Corsair, 1814; Mazeppa, 1819), about wild and impetuous persons, brought him success. He was a skilled versifier with a remarkable ear for rhythms. Byron influenced the youth of his day more than any other Romanticist. “Byronism” was a mood adopted by thousands of young men.

Percy Bysshe Shelley was the black sheep of a well-to-do, conservative family. Sonnets, songs, and poetic dramas flowed from his pen in the last four years of his life. Many of these works are profound and meditative (Prometheus Unbound, 1820). Others are exquisitely lyrical and beautiful (The Cloud, To a Skylark, Ode to the West Wind). Adonais (1821), his tribute to Keats, ranks among the greatest elegies.

John Keats was a greater poet than either Byron or Shelley (see Keats, John). He believed that true happiness was to be found in art and natural beauty (Ode on a Grecian Urn, 1819; Ode to a Nightingale, 1819). His verses are lively testimony to the truth of his words in Endymion (1818):

A thing of beauty is a joy forever:
Its loveliness increases; it will never Pass into nothingness;

Other Romanticists who deserve mention are Leigh Hunt, whose Abou Ben Adhem continues to be a favorite; Thomas Moore, whose Believe Me, If All Those Endearing Young Charms is still a favorite of vocal groups; and Thomas De Quincey, known best for his Confessions of an English Opium Eater (1822). De Quincey, however, ought to be better known for his useful distinction between the "literature of knowledge" and the "literature of power."

The English Romantic Movement as return to Nature

Nature stands as a source of inspiration for the poets but poets have taken it differently when they have written poetry in different Eras of history. For romantics, nature constituted in poetry differently but for 18th century poets, nature's role was different. Romanticism was a reaction against 18th century poets' outlook. Nature was admired by Romantics as it existed even wild and they considered Nature as their teacher, their guide, their source of inspiration and their mother while Nature for 18th century poets stood for normal reality of universal law. Dr. Johnson said, "Nothing can please many, and please long but just representations of general nature".

The Romantic age of English literature began as a deliberate movement in 1798 with the publication of Lyrical Ballads. It ended in 1832 with the death of Sir Walter Scott. It was not a sudden outburst but the result of long and gradual growth and development. The poets of the Romantic School– Wordsworth, Coleridge, Byron, Shelley, Keats etc.—were not even the first romantics of England, for the Elizabethan literature is essentially romantic in spirit. The pre-Romantics of the late 18th century William Cowper, Thomas Gray, Oliver Goldsmith, William Blake and Robert Burns helped pave the way for this movement by turning their interest away from the classicism of the Age of Pope and towards nature, country people, and simplicity of expression.

In 1798, William Wordsworth and S. T. Coleridge published a collection of poems entitled as Lyrical Ballads and with it began the new age known as the Romantic Age. This new poetry, Known as romantic poetry, has revolutionary notes in comparison with the social and satirical poetry of the school of Alexander Pope. It is rather an inevitable reaction of the artificial and critical poetry of the eighteenth century. Romantic poets and novelists turned to the common people and simple things of field and home and daily life that common people could understand. High imagination, subjectivity, liberalism, love of nature, Hellenism, and the use of supernatural powers characterized the literature of this period.

The basic aims of Romanticism were various: a return to nature and to belief in the goodness of humanity; the rediscovery of the artist as a supremely individual creator; the development of nationalistic pride; and the exaltation of the senses and emotions over reason and intellect. In addition, Romanticism was a philosophical revolt against rationalism. The characteristic features of English Romantic poetry are:

(1) Love and worship of Nature and dislike for the urban life.

(2) Love for the Medieval Age.

(3) Love for the supernatural and the mystical.

(4) Poetry came to be regarded as the spontaneous expression of the poet's own subjective feelings and did not conform to the poetic conventions of classical doctrines.

(5) Completely abandoned the 'Heroic Couplet' and substituted it with simpler verse forms like the ballads which belonged to the English rural Folk.

(6) The 'poetic diction' of the Neo-Classical Age was completely overthrown and the language of the ordinary people became the language of Romantic poetry.

(7) The subjects of Romantic poetry were often ordinary people: "The Idiot Boy".

The Romantic period of English literature was mainly a period of poetry. This poetry was largely produced by the five great names which dominated the age: William Wordsworth, Samuel Taylor Coleridge, George Gordon Lord Byron, P. B. Shelley and John Keats. William Wordsworth began this new tradition in poetry with this simple, heart-felt poems of humble and rustic life. He chose common people for his poetry.

Love for nature is one of Wordsworth's predominant themes. Nature took a different role in each of the Romantic poets and even the Pre-Romantics and Victorians writings, but each of these writers has that one major thing in common. They all write extensively on the role of nature in the lives of people. Like Wordsworth, Coleridge and Shelly, John Keats is definitely under the impression of nature being a great force: almost divine.

The English Romantic Writers expressed a particular view of nature, man and the supernatural. They had a strong sense of the beauty in the world around them and took great pleasure in nature. Some, like Shelley and Keats, actually worshiped nature instead of god. Romantic poets are found essentially imaginative and their imaginative vigour expresses itself not merely in a colorful vision of the external world but also in a mystic communion. Mysticism is an inseparable part of romantic imagination and this is the essence of Wordsworth's pantheism, Coleridge's metaphysical speculation and Shelly's myth-making power.

Zest for the beauties of exterior world characterizes all romantic poetry. Romantic poetry carries us away from the suffocating atmosphere of critics into the fresh and invigorating company of the out–of–door world. It not only sings of the sensuous beauty of nature, but also sees into the 'heart of things' and reveals the soul that lies behind. Their hearts overflow with sympathy for the poor and the down trodden. They glorify the innocence and simplicity of the common man. They try to see the heart of man and understand human nature. They find the divine in Man.

In end, English Romanticism is thus both a revolt and a revival; it is a revolt against 18th century traditions and conventions; it is a revival of old English meters and old English masters of poetry.

Samuel Taylor Coleridge

Samuel Taylor Coleridge was born on October 21st, 1772, in Devonshire, England. His father, John Coleridge, was a vicar of a parish and master of a grammar school. After his father died in 1781, Coleridge attended Christ's Hospital School in London, where he met lifelong friend Charles Lamb.

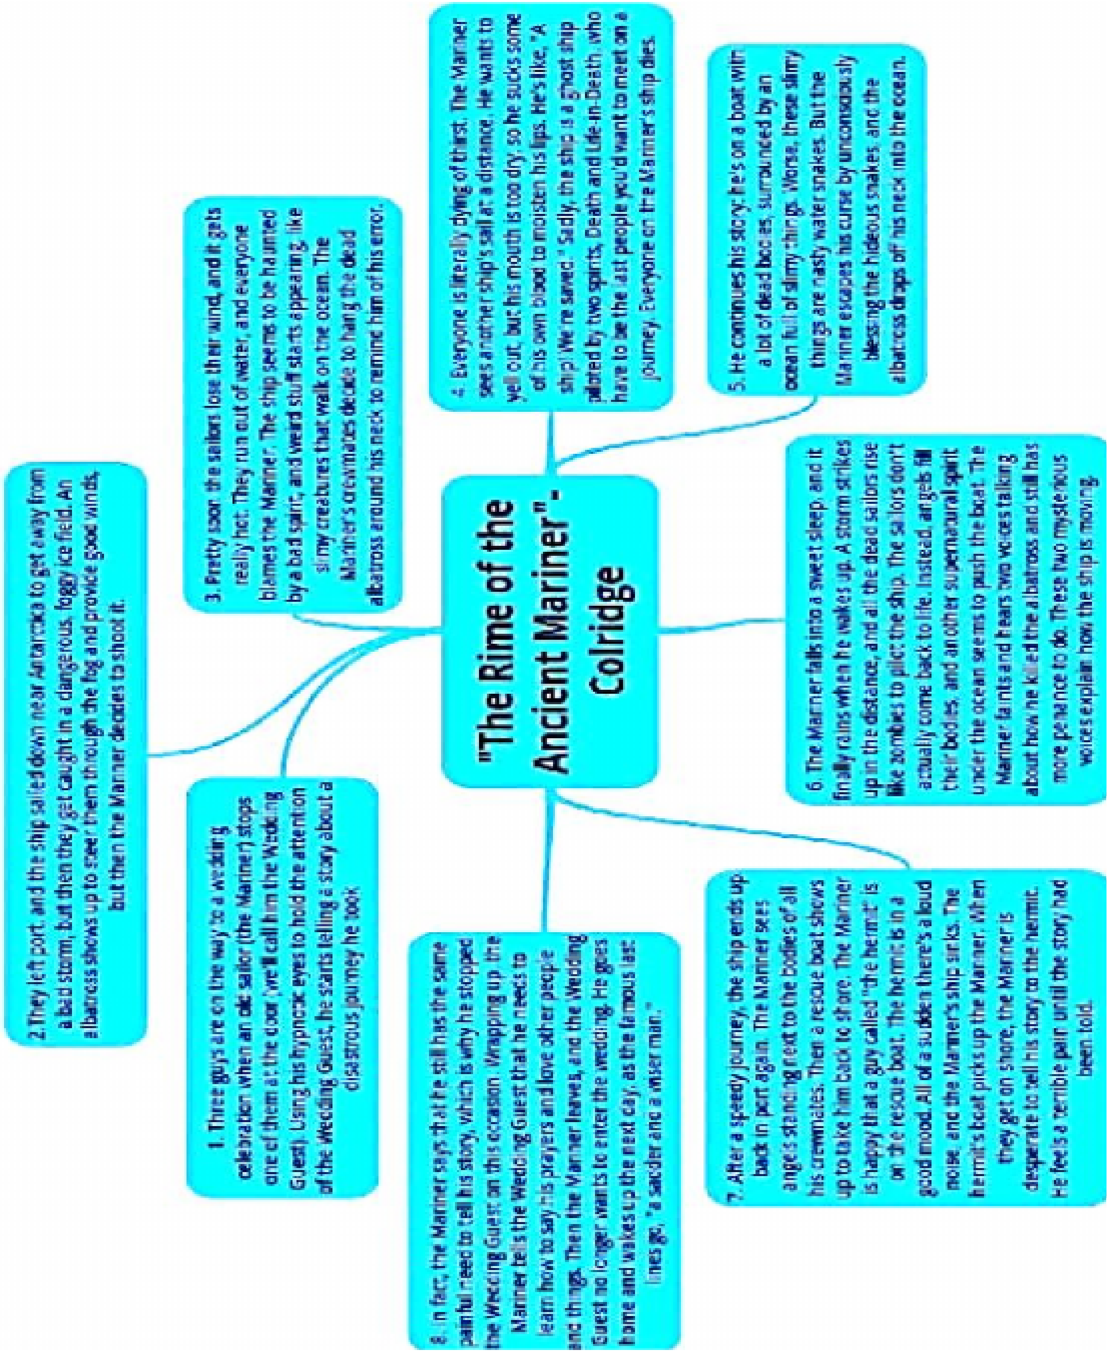
Coleridge's father had always wanted his son to be a clergyman, so when Coleridge entered Jesus College, at the University of Cambridge in 1791. Coleridge's Christian views as he became a supporter of William Frend, a Fellow (an elite academic) at the college whose Unitarian (naming God as one person, not 'persons') beliefs made him a controversial figure.

En route to Wales in June 1794, Coleridge met a student named Robert Southey. Influenced by Plato's Republic, they constructed a vision of pantisocracy (equal government by all), which involved immigrating to the New World (America) with ten other families to set up a commune. Coleridge and Southey envisioned the men sharing the workload, a great library, philosophical discussions, and freedom of religious and political beliefs.

After finally visiting Wales, Coleridge returned to England to find that Southey had become engaged to a woman named Edith Fricker. As marriage was an integral part of the plan for communal living in the New World, Coleridge decided to marry another Fricker daughter, Sarah. Coleridge's marriage was unhappy and he spent much of it apart from his wife.

While the pantisocracy was still in the planning stages, Southey abandoned the project to pursue his legacy in law. Left without an alternative plan, Coleridge spent the next few years beginning his career as a writer. He never returned to Cambridge to finish his degree.

Due to increasing nervousness and stress, Coleridge turned to opium, in search for a drug that could relax his nerves and reverse his depression. Laudanum, a mixture of opium and alcohol, soon became Coleridge's source of literary genius, as he experienced opium dreams of complete imagination. This addiction would lead to his financial and physical downfall.



In 1795 Coleridge befriended William Wordsworth, who greatly influenced Coleridge's verse. Coleridge, whose early work was celebratory and conventional, began writing in a more natural style. In his "conversation poems," such as Frost at Midnight and This Lime-Tree Bower my Prison, Coleridge used his intimate friends, such as Charles Lamb, and their experiences as subjects. From 1797 to 1798 he lived near Wordsworth and his sister, Dorothy, in Somersetshire. In 1798 the two men collaborated on a joint volume of poetry entitled Lyrical Ballads. The collection is considered the first great work of the Romantic school of poetry and contains Coleridge's famous poem, The Rime of the Ancient Mariner.

In 1798 the two poets travelled to the Continent together. Coleridge spent most of the trip in Germany, studying the philosophy of Immanuel Kant, Jakob Boehme, and G.E. Lessing. While there he mastered the German language and began translating. When he returned to England in 1800, he settled with family and friends at Keswick. Over the next two decades Coleridge lectured on literature and philosophy, wrote about religious and political theory, spent two years on the island of Malta in an effort to overcome his poor health and his opium addiction, and lived off of financial donations and grants.

Still addicted to opium, he moved in with the physician James Gillman in 1816. In 1817, he published Biographia Literaria, which contained his finest literary criticism. He continued to publish poetry and prose, notably Sibylline Leaves (1817), Aids to Reflection (1825), and Church and State (1830). He died in London on July 25th, 1834 aged 61.

Though he's really only known today for his poetry, Coleridge's contributions to the field of criticism and our language were many. For instance, he not only coined the word 'selfless,' he introduced the word 'aesthetic' to the English language. Coleridge summed himself up this way, in the epitaph he wrote for himself:

Beneath this sod
A Poet lies; or that which once was he.
O lift one thought in prayer for S.T.C.
That he, who many a year with toil of breath,
Found Death in Life, may here find Life in Death.

"The Rime of the Ancient Mariner"- Colridge
1. Three guys are on the way to a wedding celebration when an old sailor (the Mariner) stops one of them at the door (we'll call him the Wedding Guest). Using his hypnotic eyes to hold the attention of the Wedding Guest, he starts telling a story about a disastrous journey he took
2.They left port, and the ship sailed down near Antarctica to get away from a bad storm, but then they get caught in a dangerous, foggy ice field. An albatross shows up to steer them through the fog and provide good winds, but then the Mariner decides to shoot it.
3. Pretty soon the sailors lose their wind, and it gets really hot. They run out of water, and everyone blames the Mariner. The ship seems to be haunted by a bad spirit, and weird stuff starts appearing, like slimy creatures that walk on the ocean. The Mariner's crewmates decide to hang the dead albatross around his neck to remind him of his error.
4. Everyone is literally dying of thirst. The Mariner sees another ship's sail at a distance. He wants to yell out, but his mouth is too dry, so he sucks some of his own blood to moisten his lips. He's like, "A ship! We're saved." Sadly, the ship is a ghost ship piloted by two spirits, Death and Life-in-Death, who have to be the last people you'd want to meet on a journey. Everyone on the Mariner's ship dies.
5. He continues his story: he's on a boat with a lot of dead bodies, surrounded by an ocean full of slimy things. Worse, these slimy things are nasty water snakes. But the Mariner escapes his curse by unconsciously blessing the hideous snakes, and the albatross drops off his neck into the ocean.
6. The Mariner falls into a sweet sleep, and it finally rains when he wakes up. A storm strikes up in the distance, and all the dead sailors rise like zombies to pilot the ship. The sailors don't actually come back to life. Instead, angels fill their bodies, and another supernatural spirit under the ocean seems to push the boat. The Mariner faints and hears two voices talking about how he killed the albatross and still has more penance to do. These two mysterious voices explain how the ship is moving.
7. After a speedy journey, the ship ends up back in port again. The Mariner sees angels standing next to the bodies of all his crewmates. Then a rescue boat shows up to take him back to shore. The Mariner is happy that a guy called "the hermit" is on the rescue boat. The hermit is in a good mood. All of a sudden there's a loud noise, and the Mariner's ship sinks. The hermit's boat picks up the Mariner. When they get on shore, the Mariner is desperate to tell his story to the hermit. He feels a terrible pain until the story had been told.
8. In fact, the Mariner says that he still has the same painful need to tell his story, which is why he stopped the Wedding Guest on this occasion. Wrapping up, the Mariner tells the Wedding Guest that he needs to learn how to say his prayers and love other people and things. Then the Mariner leaves, and the Wedding Guest no longer wants to enter the wedding. He goes home and wakes up the next day, as the famous last lines go, "a sadder and a wiser man."

"The Rime of Ancient Mariner" : Characters List

Ancient Mariner: The poem's protagonist. He is unnaturally old, with skinny, deeply-tanned limbs and a "glittering eye." He sets sail from his native country with two hundred other men who are all saved from a strange, icy patch of ocean when they are kind to an Albatross that lives there. Impulsively and inexplicably, he shoots the Albatross with his crossbow and is punished for his crime by a spirit who loved the Albatross. He is cursed to be haunted indefinitely by his dead shipmates, and to be compelled to tell the tale of his downfall at random times. Each time he is compelled to share his story with someone, he feels a physical agony that is abated only temporarily once he finishes telling the tale.

Wedding Guest: One of three people on their way to a wedding reception; he is next of kin to the bridegroom. The Ancient Mariner stops him, and despite his protests compels him to sit and listen to the entirety of his story. He is afraid of the Ancient Mariner and yearns to join the merriment of the wedding celebration, but after he hears the Ancient Mariner's story, he becomes both "sadder and...wiser."

The Sailors: Two hundred seamen who set sail with the Ancient Mariner one clear, sunny day and find themselves in the icy world of the "rime" after a storm, from which the Albatross frees them. They feed and play with the Albatross until the Ancient Mariner inexplicably kills it. They begin to suffer from debilitating heat and thirst. They hang the Albatross's corpse around the Ancient Mariner's neck to punish him. When Life-in-Death wins the Ancient Mariner's soul, the sailors' souls are left to Death and they curse the Ancient Mariner with their eyes before dying suddenly. Even though their souls fly out, their bodies refuse to rot and lie open-eyed on the deck, continuously cursing the Ancient Mariner. After the rain returns, the sailors come alive and silently man the ship, singing beautiful melodies. When the ship reaches the harbor, they once again curse the Ancient Mariner with their eyes and then disappear, leaving only their corpses behind. The Ancient Mariner is destined to suffer the curse of a living death and continually be haunted by their cursing eyes.

Albatross: A great, White Sea bird that presumably saves the sailors from the icy world of the "rime" by allowing them to steer through the ice and sending them a good, strong wind. The Albatross, however, also makes a strange mist follow the ship. It flies alongside the ship, plays with the sailors, and eats their food, until the Ancient Mariner shoots it with his crossbow. Its corpse is hung around the Ancient Mariner's neck as a reminder of his crime and falls off only when he is able to appreciate the beauty of nature and pray once more. The Albatross is loved by a powerful spirit who wreaks havoc on and kills the sailors while leaving the Ancient Mariner to the special agony of Life-in-Death.

Death: Embodied in a hulking form on the ghost ship. He loses at dice to Life-in-Death, who gets to claim the Ancient Mariner's soul; instead, Death wins the two hundred sailors.

The Night-mare Life-in-Death: Embodied in a beautiful, naked, ghostly woman with golden hair and red lips. She wins at dice over Death and gets to claim the Ancient Mariner's soul, condemning him to a limbo-like living death.

Pilot: The captain of the small boat that rows out to the Ancient Mariner's ship. He loses his mind when the Ancient Mariner abruptly comes to life and begins to row his boat.

Pilot's Boy: The assistant to the Pilot; he rows the small boat. He loses his mind when the Ancient Mariner, whom he thinks is dead, abruptly comes to life and takes the oars from him.

Hermit: A recluse (solitary) who prays three times a day and lives in communion with nature in the woods. He accompanies the Pilot and the Pilot's boy on the small boat because "he loves to talk with mariners / from a far countree." The Ancient Mariner reveres the Hermit as a righteous and holy man, and asks him to absolve him of his sin. The Hermit is the first person to whom the Ancient Mariner is compelled to tell his tale.

First Voice: One of two voices presumably belonging to a spirit. The Ancient Mariner hears the First Voice after he is knocked unconscious when the ship jolts forward. He explains that the Ancient Mariner offended a spirit by killing the Albatross, because the spirit loved the bird. Other than this moment, the First Voice relies on the Second Voice to explain the Ancient Mariner's situation to him.

Second Voice: The second of two voices presumably belonging to a spirit. The Second Voice is softer than the First Voice-"as soft as honey-dew"-and more knowledgeable. He explains to the First Voice that the Ancient Mariner will pay for his crime much more dearly than he already has. Even though the First Voice tells the Second Voice that the Ancient Mariner angered a spirit who loved the Albatross, the latter explains that the Moon and air move the ship in lieu of wind, and not the spirit who loved the Albatross. Then he urges the First Voice onward, as they are hurrying somewhere.

"The Rime of Ancient Mariner" : Summary

Summary : Parts I-IV

Three young men are walking together to a wedding, when one of them is detained by a grizzled old sailor. The young Wedding-Guest angrily demands that the Mariner let go of him, and the Mariner obeys. But the young man is transfixed by the ancient Mariner's "glittering eye" and can do nothing but sit on a stone and listen to his strange tale. The Mariner says that he sailed on a ship out of his native harbor—"below the kirk, below the hill, / Below the lighthouse top"—and into a sunny and cheerful sea. Hearing bassoon music drifting from the direction of the wedding, the Wedding-Guest imagines that the bride has entered the hall, but he is still helpless to tear himself from the Mariner's story. The Mariner recalls that the voyage quickly darkened, as a giant storm rose up in the sea and chased the ship southward. Quickly, the ship came to a frigid land "of mist and snow," where "ice, mast-high, came floating by"; the ship was hemmed inside this maze of ice. But then the sailors encountered an Albatross, a great sea bird. As it flew around the ship, the ice cracked and split, and a wind from the south propelled the ship out of the frigid regions, into a foggy stretch of water. The Albatross followed behind it, a symbol of good luck to the sailors. A pained look crosses the Mariner's face, and the Wedding-Guest asks him, "Why look'st thou so?" The Mariner confesses that he shot and killed the Albatross with his crossbow.

At first, the other sailors were furious with the Mariner for having killed the bird that made the breezes blow. But when the fog lifted soon afterward, the sailors decided that the bird had actually brought not the breezes but the fog; they now congratulated the Mariner on his deed. The wind pushed the ship into a silent sea where the sailors were quickly stranded; the winds died down, and the ship was

> "As idle as a painted ship
> Upon a painted ocean."

The ocean thickened, and the men had no water to drink; as if the sea were rotting, slimy creatures crawled out of it and walked across the surface. At night, the water burned green, blue, and white with death fire. Some of the sailors dreamed that a spirit, nine fathoms deep, followed them beneath the ship from the land of mist and snow. The sailors blamed the Mariner for their plight and hung the corpse of the Albatross around his neck like a cross.

A weary time passed; the sailors became so parched, their mouths so dry, that they were unable to speak. But one day, gazing westward, the Mariner saw a tiny speck on the horizon. It resolved into a ship, moving toward them. Too dry-mouthed to speak out and inform the other sailors, the Mariner bit down on his arm; sucking the blood, he was able to moisten his tongue enough to cry out, "A sail! a sail!" The sailors smiled, believing they were saved. But as the ship neared, they saw that it was a ghostly, skeletal hull of a ship and that its crew included two figures: Death and the Night-mare Life-in-Death, who takes the form of a pale woman with golden locks and red lips, and "thicks man's blood with cold." Death and Life-in-Death began to throw dice, and the woman won, whereupon she whistled three times, causing the sun to sink to the horizon, the stars to instantly emerge. As the moon rose, chased by a single star, the sailors dropped dead one by one—all except the Mariner, whom each sailor cursed "with his eye" before dying. The souls of the dead men leapt from their bodies and rushed by the Mariner.

The Wedding-Guest declares that he fears the Mariner, with his glittering eye and his skinny hand. The Mariner reassures the Wedding-Guest that there is no need for dread; he was not among the men who died, and he is a living man, not a ghost. Alone on the ship, surrounded by two hundred corpses, the Mariner was surrounded by the slimy sea and the slimy creatures that crawled across its surface. He tried to pray but was deterred by a "wicked whisper" that made his heart "as dry as dust." He closed his eyes, unable to bear the sight of the dead men, each of who glared at him with the malice of their final curse. For seven days and seven nights the Mariner endured the sight, and yet he was unable to die. At last the moon rose, casting the great shadow of the ship across the waters; where the ship's shadow touched the waters, they burned red. The great water snakes moved through the silvery moonlight, glittering; blue, green, and black, the snakes coiled and swam and became beautiful in the Mariner's eyes. He blessed the beautiful creatures in his heart; at that moment, he found himself able to pray, and the corpse of the Albatross fell from his neck, sinking "like lead into the sea."

Summary : Parts V-VII

The Mariner continues telling his story to the Wedding-Guest. Free of the curse of the Albatross, the Mariner was able to sleep, and as he did so, the rains came, drenching him. The moon broke through the clouds, and a host of spirits entered the dead men's bodies, which began to move about and perform their old sailors' tasks. The ship was propelled forward as the Mariner joined in the work. The Wedding-Guest declares again that he is afraid of the Mariner, but the Mariner tells him that the men's bodies were inhabited by blessed spirits, not cursed souls. At dawn, the bodies clustered around the mast, and sweet sounds rose up from their mouths—the sounds of the spirits leaving their bodies. The spirits flew around the ship, singing. The ship continued to surge forward until noon, driven by the spirit from the land of mist and snow, nine fathoms deep in the sea. At noon, however, the ship stopped, then began to move backward and forward as if it were trapped in a tug of war. Finally, it broke free, and the Mariner fell to the deck with the jolt of sudden acceleration. He heard two disembodied voices in the air; one asked if he was the man who had killed the Albatross, and the other declared softly that he had done penance for his crime and would do more penance before all was rectified.

In dialogue, the two voices discussed the situation. The moon overpowered the sea, they said, and enabled the ship to move; an angelic power moved the ship northward at an astonishingly rapid pace. When the Mariner awoke from his trance, he saw the dead men standing together, looking at him. But a breeze rose up and propelled the ship back to its native country, back to the Mariner's home; he recognized the kirk, the hill, and the lighthouse. As they neared the bay, seraphs—figures made of pure light—stepped out of the corpses of the sailors, which fell to the deck. Each seraph waved at the Mariner, who was powerfully moved. Soon, he heard the sound of oars; the Pilot, the Pilot's son, and the holy Hermit were rowing out toward him. The Mariner hoped that the Hermit could shrive (absolve) him of his sin, washing the blood of the Albatross off his soul.

The Hermit, a holy man who lived in the woods and loved to talk to mariners from strange lands, had encouraged the Pilot and his son not to be afraid and to row out to the ship. But as they reached the Mariner's ship, it sank in a sudden whirlpool, leaving the Mariner afloat and the Pilot's rowboat spinning in the wake. The Mariner was loaded aboard the Pilot's ship, and the Pilot's boy, mad with terror, laughed hysterically and declared that the devil knows how to row. On land, the Mariner begged the Hermit to shrive him, and the Hermit bade the Mariner tell his tale. Once it was told, the Mariner was free from the agony of his guilt. However, the guilt returned over time and persisted until the Mariner traveled to a new place and told his tale again. The moment he comes upon the man to whom he is destined to tell his tale, he knows it, and he has no choice but to relate the story then and there to his appointed audience; the Wedding-Guest is one such person.

The church doors burst open, and the wedding party streams outside. The Mariner declares to the Wedding-Guest that he who loves all God's creatures leads a happier, better life; he then takes his leave. The Wedding-Guest walks away from the party, stunned, and awakes the next morning "a sadder and a wiser man."

"The Rime of Ancient Mariner" : Critical Analysis

The Ancient Mariner illustrates the working of the inexorable law of one life. Any infringement of the law inevitably invites punishment. The Mariner shoots the innocent and friendly albatross, thus suffering misery in the form of loneliness and spiritual anguish. He becomes aware of the enormity of his sin and undergoes severe penance. This extreme penance burns out his ego, the sense of separateness, and finally he realizes oneness of all life. He discovers the joy of human companion in God and declares the moral, "He prayeth best, who loveth best."

The journey of The Ancient Mariner is symbolic. He undergoes an experience which belongs to a world beyond the phenomenal world. In this supernatural world, the ordinary law of cause and effect does not operate. In The Ancient Mariner, Coleridge constructs a series of cause-effect situations which on the face of it, are logical and irrational. The introduction of the storm blast, the polar spirit, Nightmare, Life-in-Death and the troop of spirits is not subject to the law of cause and effect.

Through the ministry of awe, the Mariner is led to realise the existence of a spiritual order of universal love, the sacramental vision, the vision of oneness of life. We are not separate and independent entities. We are part of one web of Life. When this truth dawns upon him, his whole gestalt undergoes a radical change. He views his thoughts and acts as a spectator, a bystander watching at the roadside. His ego was annihilated and was reborn into self which pervades the whole universe. Evil and good deeds have both disappeared as if he had performed them in a dream.

The Ancient Mariner is a harmonious whole. The natural, the supernatural and the human are artistically fused. The poem emerges as a finished work of art. We are led to see into the mystery of life that is made up of both the natural and the supernatural. Finally we come to believe with the poet the sovereign law of life and have enshrined in the lines:

He prayeth best, who loveth best,
All things both great and small;
For the dear God who loveth us,
He made and loveth all.

In Part I of the poem, the Mariner intrudes with the festivities of a wedding going on the background, and detains one of the three wedding guests to listen to his tale. The sudden appearance of the Mariner with his 'long grey beard', 'glittering eye' and 'skinny hand' strikes a sombre and discordant note to the gay atmosphere of the wedding. The wedding guest is impatient to get away, but the Mariner hypnotizes him with his appearances and speech in such a way that he is rooted to the ground and is forced to hear out the Mariner like a three-year-old child. The gay atmosphere of the wedding is portrayed by the use of expressions like 'merry din', 'loud bosom', 'bride pacing the hall red as a rose', 'the merry minstrelsy'. The Mariner begins to narrate his journey which also commences on a happy note: 'the ship was cheered', 'merrily did we drop.'

The wedding guest is the symbol of social life as yet uninitiated to the spiritual life, whereas the Mariner stands for spiritual life having realized the aloneness of his self. The narration of his sombre story by the Mariner is interspersed with the description of rejoicing going on in the wedding house. The sombre and the cheerful are woven fine so as to present the whole picture of life.

After line 40 of the narration, the atmosphere suddenly becomes sombre with the advent of the storm blast. The ship has entered the world of Nature beyond the control of man. The ship is now at the mercy of the elements of Nature. The bright cheerful atmosphere becomes dismal, horrible and dangerous. There is ice all around which is here the symbol of death. The unfavourable wind is blowing and driving the ship to the polar region. The mariners are in a hopeless and helpless situation. They see no succour to their misery.

The sudden appearance of an albatross on the ship brought relief to their frayed nerves. The bird provided the much-needed company to relieve them of the tedium of loneliness, and to give them solace. The appearance of the bird augurs well for the Mariners as the ice splits and a favourable South wind starts blowing. The storm has blown over and the ship once again sails smoothly. At this point it is revealed in dramatic manner that the Mariner, driven by some unconscious impulse, has killed the innocent, auspicious and friendly bird.

The Part II of the poem begins with the change of wind. The ship sailing northwards comes out of Antarctic and enters the Pacific Ocean and is heading towards the Equator. The sin of killing the friendly bird haunts the Mariner and his companions. They blame the Mariner for this gruesome murder of the good bird that had caused the unfavourable wind to blow. After sometime, when the sun shines brightly and clears off the fog and mist, they change their opinion and justify the killing of the albatross. In this way they make themselves accomplices in the crime. But their euphoria is short-lived. The ship soon enters the silent and still sea. It becomes close and the ship stands still. Dark sadness supervenes. The sun looks like the moon turning the day into virtual night. There is no sign of life anywhere. Death stalks the whole atmosphere. The ship and the ocean appear as 'painted', bereft of all life. There is extreme heat. The irony of their situation is that there is water all around but they cannot take even a drop to quench their thirst. They are stupefied by acute thirst and paralyzed by terror. Their tongues are 'withered' at the roots and their throats 'choked'. The words 'withered' and 'choked' show the intensity of their thirst.

Corruption is rampant everywhere. Things are rotting in the stagnant sea. Abominable slimy creatures are crawling upon the sea presenting a horrible sight. The Albatross at this stage begins to be avenged. A tormenting spirit dogs them to avenge the killing of the bird. The shipmates cast an accusing look at him and hold him responsible for their miserable condition. They hang the dead albatross around his neck in place of the cross thus making him a damned sinner.

The nominal groups, animate and inanimate, abound in this part of the poem. The animate nominal groups refer to the Mariner and his companions. The inanimate nominal groups like 'sea', 'mist', 'wind', 'breeze', 'fog', 'copper sky', 'noon', 'moon', 'night', relate to the objects of Nature. 'Death fires', 'a witch's oil', 'dream', 'the spirit', 'the nine fathom deep' are objects showing the supernatural in a manner that everything is received with credibility. The expressions like 'silent sea', 'copper sky', 'bloody sun', 'slimy things', 'slimy sea', strike terror in the mind of the reader. The repetition of the nominal water shows the desperate situation of the mariners. The nominal 'sun' is repeated three times. Coleridge uses the rising and setting of the sun not only to indicate the time and the direction of the ship but to show the change of direction in the Mariner's mind also.

In a dazed state afflicted with extreme thirst and heat, time hangs heavy on the shipmates. Suddenly the Mariner spies something moving towards them. A ship of a sort is approaching them. Thirst and heat has rendered them speechless. The Mariner bits his arm and sucks blood to quench his thirst and is thus able to speak. He regains his power of speech and informs his companion about the approaching ship. At first they are glad to see the ship coming, but soon they are disillusioned and consequently feel horrified on seeing the mysterious movements of the ship without wind or tide. The ribs of the ship appear as bars against the rays of the setting sun. The horrible inmates of the ship were Nightmare, Life-in-Death and Death. The Life-in-Death struck terror in their mind with her 'red lips', golden yellow looks and 'white skin'. Life-in-Death and Death diced for the ship's crew and the former wins the Mariner. In the meantime the sun sets and it becomes dark.

In Part III of the poem, the human nominal groups again provide cohesion as they relate to the Mariner and his companions, round whom the poem revolves. Though this part is full of supernatural beings and incidents, yet the setting remains natural. 'A speck', 'a mist', 'a shape', 'Life-in-Death', 'a spectre bark' are the objects showing the supernatural. The air of reality is imparted by the natural setting. The supernatural appears in human form with his strength and weakness. The expressions like 'horned Moon' and 'the star dogged Moon' deepen the supernatural atmosphere. Nature acts in such a way as to advance the action of the story. 'The spectre bark' appears on the scene to seal the fate of the mariners. The nominal 'weary' occurs five times and the impending collapse and death. The broad and burning face of the setting sun forebodes terrible happenings. The nominal 'Moon' is repeated twice. The appearance of the 'Star-dogged Moon' is the precursor of mass death of the mariners. The moon, as it were, exercises both good and evil effect. It is the star between its horns that represents the demonic vengeance upon the mariners. As the Life-in-Death begins her work, the two hundred ship-mates drop down dead one by one. Their souls pass by the Mariner making 'whizz' sound similar to that made by his crossbow when he killed the Albatross. So the 'whizz' sound reminded him of his heinous crime.

The use of most of the verbs like 'parched', 'glazed', 'unslaked', 'baked' bring out the extreme thirst and the utter desolation under which the mariners are smarting. Extreme thirst and fright has benumbed them. The sight of the skeleton ship makes the heart of the Mariner 'beat fast' and 'thicked' his blood with fear. Pitch darkness increases their fear. Darkness seems to 'sip' the Mariner's blood. The ship-mates are so overwhelmed with horror that they can neither 'groan' nor 'sigh' and in their utter despair abandoned themselves to their fate.

In Part IV of the poem, the Mariner goes through the anguish of remorse and repentance. His whole being is transformed. He, who had earlier expressed revulsion at the sight of the slimy water snakes, is now filled with love for them. His whole gestalt, the total perspective to life, has undergone a radical change. Earlier encased in his little ego, he viewed the snakes as something separate from himself. He even regretted that human beings were lying dead and rotting while the ugly snakes were alive. Now blessed by the divine grace he has come to realize that outward beauty is skin deep and underneath every form surges the same spirit in all creatures. There is nothing high or low, ugly and beautiful. All the contraries disappear at the spiritual attitude. On the realization of this truth, he is redeemed of his sin. The dead albatross fell off his neck and sank into the sea to symbolically mark his redemption.

At the stage of the narration of the story, the wedding guest is overwhelmed with fear when he hears that all the mariners had dropped down dead. The Mariner's 'skinny hand' and 'glittering eye' fan his fears that the Mariner is none other than a ghost talking to him.

The nominal group 'alone' occurs four times in two lines. It expresses the Mariner's utter loneliness and his frustrated craving for human companionship. The heinous crime of killing the albatross weighs heavily on his soul and torments him. The utter isolation is symbolized by the ribbed sea bed. The Mariner stands forlorn amidst the rotting corpses of his ship-mates on the deck surrounded by the rotting sea infested with abominable water snakes. The extreme physical and spiritual loneliness bring our genuine remorse and repentance in the Mariner. Being forsaken by man and God, and he finds himself in the boundary situation whereby he dies to his old egoistic self and is reborn.

The nominal 'weary eye' shows the Mariner in a desperate situation. The Mariner is utterly fed up with his hellish life and expresses his wish to die. The nominals 'slimy thing', 'rotting sea', 'rotting deck' relate to all pervading corruption and evil.

The 'white' moonlight is a contrast to the ominous red shadow of the ship. The yearning for a movement of the moon replaces the sense of revulsion for the rotting stagnation felt by the Mariner. The movement of the moon symbolizes life that can put an end to the rot which has set in the static universe. The work of retribution takes place under the light of the sun while redemption occurs under the light of the moon.

The 'spring' is an image of divine grace and benediction. It is noteworthy that the internal and the external images blend in the poem. The spring of love that gushed from the Mariner's heart is followed by the longed for shower of rain.

The use of verbs like 'lie', 'die', and 'closed' creates a death-like atmosphere. The repetition of the word 'fear' engenders fear in the heart of the readers also.

The 'albatross' and 'the water snakes' stand for one life. The Mariner's realization of the truth of one life ushers in his redemption.

In part V of the poem, with the redemption of his sin, the Mariner feels relieved and a great weight of guilt is off his mind. He feels light and falls into pleasant sleep. Earlier he could not sleep for seven nights because of the curse that afflicted him and the nagging conscience that tormented him day and night. When he awakes from his sweet sleep, he finds that it is raining. There is drought no more. Rain is the symbol of divine grace with which the Mariner is now blessed. Now he finds himself at one with all nature. The dead bodies are manned by the spirits and they rise up to do their assigned jobs on the ship. The ship moves on. The mariner's nephew is at his work beside him, but there is no communication between them. Though physically quite near, they are far apart spiritually. It is intolerable and painful to the Mariner. At this stage of the narration of the story, the wedding guest interrupts the Mariner and gives vent to his fears. But the Mariner at once silences him and allays his fear saying the dead had not come to life. Only their bodies moved because they were possessed by the spirits.

The Mariner comes out of his shell of egoism and enjoys the company of birds and the heavenly bodies. The spirit from the South Pole carries the ship as far as the Equator. At this stage, the Polar Spirit leaves the ship. The ship moves on silently. The penance of the Mariner falls down on the deck and passes into a trance. When he comes out of the trance, he is a completely changed man.

On coming out of his trance, the Mariner hears the Polar Spirit's fellow demons engaged in conversation. One demon tells the other that the Mariner is the very guilty person who has committed the heinous crime of killing the friendly and innocent guest bird. The other demon remarks that the man has already undergone penance enough and shall do more penance.

This part is changed with supernatural atmosphere. The 'sleep' which the Mariner has experienced, is' in fact, the vision he has had of the ideal universe which is interrelated and interdependent.

The 'dream' state which is invoked here is, in fact, the visionary state into which the Mariner falls and experiences supernatural things. He has the vision in which he hears the two voices of the Polar Spirit's fellow demons.

The nominal 'rain' stands for divine grace and heralds the removal of the curse and the drought with which the place is afflicted. It rescues the Mariner from the jaws of death. The vision of 'a hundred fire flags' awakens in him the awareness of the ideal universe. The Sun is shown as the source of both light and sound which are the manifestations of the single identity.

The dead bodies of the mariners working on the ship present a ghastly and horrible scene. It strikes terror in the heart of the wedding guest as well as readers.

The use of verbs like 'shook', 'burst', 'hurried', 'danced', 'roared' mark the advent of movement of life in a death-like situation. When the curse is removed, the Mariner's loneliness is broken. The ship begins to move. Even the dead mariners seem to rise to life. The helmsman 'steered' as the mariners 'worked at the ropes. They 'raised' their limbs. The Ancient Mariner himself pulled at a rope.

The rescue of the Mariner from damnation and death by the divine grace is celebrated by Nature and Super nature. The birds sing sweet songs to mark the occasion.

In part VI, the conversation between the two demon spirits continues. When questioned by the first spirit, the second replies that the course of the ship is being directed by the benign Moon. The ship is moving at a supernatural speed so as to reach its destination before the Mariner comes out of his trance because the physical frame of the Mariner will not be able to stand the strain and stress of the fantastic speed of the ship. Coleridge makes use of the scientific principle of Venturi effect when he makes the Second Demon explain to the First Demon that the extraordinary speed is achieved by decreasing the air pressure in front of the ship and increasing it from behind. When the Mariner comes out of his trance at night, the ship resumes its normal speed. The atmosphere is calm and the mind of the Mariner is at ease.

The dead man still stands s on the deck staring at him with cursing look. The Mariner dares not look back to the past unpleasant events. He looks to the hopeful future. The welcome gentle breeze blows over him and showers benediction on him. He is overwhelmed with joy when he spies the familiar landmarks like the lighthouse, the hill, the church appearing in reverse order. He recognizes that he is in his own native country. Purged of all dross of guilt, he can now pray.

As the angelic spirit leaves the dead bodies, the bodies drop down once again, lifeless and flat. Before leaving the deck, the spirits signal to the shore for rescue. The Mariner sees a boat carrying the Pilot, the Pilot's boy and the Hermit, coming toward the ship. He is glad to think that the Hermit will redeem his soul of sin.

The nominals, 'the ocean', 'the moon', 'wave', 'wind', and 'breeze' describe Nature in its tranquil moments. Peace pervades the whole Nature, so does it in the mind of the Mariner. The pleasant and soothing whiteness of the Moon has replaced the burning red Sun. The benign Moon acts as the guiding and presiding power. The redemption of the Mariner starts under the silent, moving Moon. The Hermit acts as priest of both Nature and God and unites the Mariner with Man and God.

The phrase 'tell me' is repeated twice to show the impatience and curiosity on the part of the First Spirit to know what makes the ship move at that supernatural speed. Silence and calm has replaced the noise and agitation. The divine grace works through the seraph band that man the dead bodies to make them work on the deck and finally signal to shore to secure help for the Mariner. The verbs 'shrieve' and 'wash away' are used to stand for the removal of the stain of sin from the soul of the Mariner.

The part VII, the concluding part of the poem, finds the Mariner in his own native country. The boat, carrying the Pilot, the Pilot's boy and the Hermit, approaches the ship. They are amazed to find the ship dilapidated, desolate and diabolical. The Pilot hesitates to take the boat further to the ship, but the Hermit urges him to 'push on.' The Mariner is so stupefied that he can neither speak nor stir. As soon as the boat comes close beneath the ship, the ship goes down 'like lead' and sinks. The sky and ocean resound with the loud and dreadful sound the ship makes while sinking. The Mariner is 'stunned' and 'floated' on the ocean like a drowned man. The crew of the boat takes him to be dead and retrieves his body. When the Mariner opens his mouth to speak, the Pilot is so terrified that he falls down senseless. The Hermit too is afraid and prays to ward off his fear. When the Mariner begins to row, the Pilot's boy goes mad with fear.

When they land on the shore, the Mariner entreats the Hermit to redeem him of the sin, but the stain of sin cannot be washed away so easily. He finds himself condemned permanently, tied to the wheel of penance. From time to time, throughout his future life, he is doomed to travel from place to place and unburden the agony of his soul by narrating his ghastly tale to a suitable listener.

When the vesper bell rings he informs the wedding guest that he must go to Church to pray. He teaches the wedding guest that the best prayer is love and reverence for all creatures, as the same spirit pervades all phenomenal manifestations. The Mariner's words have profound effect on the wedding guest and lead him to realize the truth of oneness of life. The wedding guest is now a totally changed man. He renounces the pleasure of wedding rejoicings and turns to pray.

Most of the nominals like 'wood', 'sea', 'moss', 'old oak stump', 'leaves', 'brook', 'snow', 'hill' relate to Nature and objects of Nature. 'Church' stands for religious life while 'wedding' for worldly pleasures. The Mariner chooses religious life and spurns the worldly life of social relation. Social relations are a hindrance to spiritual growth and progress. So the wedding guest also turns away from the 'bridegroom's door' and is left 'sadder and wiser'. The word 'sadder' here means more steadfast, grave and serious rather than simply cheerless.

The poet emphasizes the point that human love is meaningful only when it is understood in the context of universal love.

Most of the verbal and nominal groups relate to the central action of the poem. They also form the subject matter of the poem. The spirit, with which the whole poem is charged with, is summed up in the following lines:

> He prayeth best, who loveth best
> All things both great and small

The telling words of the Mariner bring about unobtrusive change in the being of not only the wedding guest but of the reader too, who is led to realize intimate kinship of man with all things.

The Rime of the Ancient Mariner : Major Themes

The Natural World: The Physical: While it can be beautiful and frightening (often simultaneously), the natural world's power in "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner" is unquestionable. In a move typical of Romantic poets both preceding and following Coleridge, and especially typical of his colleague, William Wordsworth, Coleridge emphasizes the way in which the natural world dwarfs and asserts its awesome power over man. Especially in the 1817 text, in which Coleridge includes marginal glosses, it is clear that the spiritual world controls and utilizes the natural world. At times the natural world seems to be a character itself, based on the way it interacts with the Ancient Mariner. From the moment the Ancient Mariner offends the spirit of the "rime," retribution comes in the form of natural phenomena. The wind dies, the sun intensifies, and it will not rain. The ocean becomes revolting, "rotting" and thrashing with "slimy" creatures and sizzling with strange fires. Only when the Ancient Mariner expresses love for the natural world-the water-snakes-does his punishment abate even slightly. It rains, but the storm is unusually awesome, with a thick stream of fire pouring from one huge cloud. A spirit, whether God or a pagan one, dominates the physical world in order to punish and inspire reverence in the Ancient Mariner. At the poem's end, the Ancient Mariner preaches respect for the natural world as a way to remain in good standing with the spiritual world, because in order to respect God, one must respect all of his creations. This is why he valorizes the Hermit, who sets the example of both prayer and living in harmony with nature. In his final advice to the Wedding Guest, the Ancient Mariner affirms that one can access the sublime, "the image of a greater and better world," only by seeing the value of the mundane, "the petty things of daily life."

The Spiritual World: The Metaphysical: "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner" occurs in the natural, physical world-the land and ocean. However, the work has popularly been interpreted as an allegory of man's connection to the spiritual, metaphysical world. In the epigraph, Burnet speaks of man's urge to "classify" things since Adam named the animals. The Ancient Mariner shoots the Albatross as if to prove that it is not an airy spirit, but rather a mortal creature; in a

"classify" the Albatross. Like all natural things, the Albatross is intimately tied to the spiritual world, and thus begins the Ancient Mariner's punishment by the spiritual world by means of the natural world. Rather than address him directly; the supernatural communicates through the natural. The ocean, sun, and lack of wind and rain punish the Ancient Mariner and his shipmates. When the dead men come alive to curse the Ancient Mariner with their eyes, things that are natural-their corpses-are inhabited by a powerful spirit. Men (like Adam) feel the urge to define things, and the Ancient Mariner seems to feel this urge when he suddenly and inexplicably kills the Albatross, shooting it from the sky as though he needs to bring it into the physical, definable realm. It is mortal, but closely tied to the metaphysical, spiritual world-it even flies like a spirit because it is a bird.

The Ancient Mariner detects spirits in their pure form several times in the poem. Even then, they talk only about him, and not to him. When the ghost ship carrying Death and Life-in-Death sails by, the Ancient Mariner overhears them gambling. Then when he lies unconscious on the deck, he hears the First Voice and Second Voice discussing his fate. When angels appear over the sailors' corpses near the shore, they do not talk to the Ancient Mariner, but only guide his ship. In all these instances, it is unclear whether the spirits are real or figments of his imagination. The Ancient Mariner-and we the reader-being mortal beings, require physical affirmation of the spiritual. Coleridge's spiritual world in the poem balances between the religious and the purely fantastical. The Ancient Mariner's prayers do have an effect, as when he blesses the water-snakes and is relieved of his thirst. At the poem's end, he valorizes the holy Hermit and the act of praying with others. However, the spirit that follows the sailors from the "rime", Death, Life-in-Death, the voices, and the angels, are not necessarily Christian archetypes. In a move typical of both Romantic writers and painters, Coleridge locates the spiritual and/or holy in the natural world in order to emphasize man's connection to it. Society can distance man from the sublime by championing worldly pleasures and abandoning reverence for the otherworld. In this way, the wedding reception represents man's alienation from the holy - even in a religious tradition like marriage. However, society can also bring man closer to the sublime, such as when people gather together in prayer.

Liminality: "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner" typifies the Romantic fascination with liminal spaces. A liminal space is defined as a place on the edge of a realm or between two realms, whether a forest and a field, or reason and imagination. A liminal space often signifies a liminal state of mind, such as the threshold of the imagination's wonders. Romantics such as Coleridge, Wordsworth, and Keats valorize the liminal space and state as places where one can experience the sublime. For this reason they are often - and especially in the case of Coleridge's poems - associated with drug-induced euphoria. Following from this, liminal spaces and states are those in which pain and pleasure are inextricable. Romantic poets frequently had their protagonists enter liminal spaces and become irreversibly changed. Starting in the epigraph to "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner", Coleridge expresses a fascination with the liminal state between the spiritual and natural, or the mundane and the divine. Recall that this is what Burnet calls the "certain [and] uncertain" and "day [and] night."

In the Ancient Mariner's story, liminal spaces are bewildering and cause pain. The first liminal space the sailors encounter is the equator, which is in a sense about as liminal a location as exists; after all, it is the threshold between the Earth's hemispheres. No sooner has the ship crossed the equator than a terrible storm ensues and drives it into the poem's ultimate symbolic liminal space, the icy world of the "rime." It is liminal by its very physical makeup; there, water exists not in one a single, definitive state, but in all three forms: liquid (water), solid (ice), and gas (mist). They are still most definitely in the ocean, but surrounding them are mountainous icebergs reminiscent of the land. The

"rime" fits the archetype of the Romantic liminal space in that it is simultaneously terrifying and beautiful, and in that the sailors do not navigate there purposely, but are rather transported there by some other force. Whereas the open ocean is a wild territory representing the mysteries of the mind and the sublime, the "rime" exists just on its edge. As a liminal space it holds great power, and indeed a powerful spirit inhabits the "rime."

As punishment for his crime of killing the Albatross, the Ancient Mariner is sentenced to Life-in-Death, condemned to be trapped in a limbo-like state where his "glittering eye" tells of both powerful genius and pain. He can compel others to listen to his story from beginning to end, but is forced to do so to relieve his pain. The Ancient Mariner is caught in a liminal state that, as in much of Romantic poetry, is comparable to addiction. He can relieve his suffering temporarily by sharing his story, but must do so continually. The Ancient Mariner suffers because of his experience in the "rime" and afterwards, but has also been extremely close to the divine and sublime because of it. Therefore his curse is somewhat of a blessing; great and unusual knowledge accompanies his pain. The Wedding Guest, the Hermit, and all others to whom he relates his tale enter into a momentary liminal state themselves where they have a distinct sensation of being stunned or mesmerized.

Religion: Although Christian and pagan themes are confounded at times in "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner", many readers and critics have insisted on a Christian interpretation. Coleridge claimed that he did not intend for the poem to have a moral, but it is difficult not to find one in Part 7. The Ancient Mariner essentially preaches closeness to God through prayer and the willingness to show respect to all of God's creatures. He also says that he finds no greater joy than in joining others in prayer:

"To walk together to the kirk,
And all together pray,
While each to his great Father bends,
Old men, and babes, and loving friends,
And youths and maidens gay!"

He also champions the Hermit, who does nothing but pray, practice humility before God, and openly revere God's creatures. The Ancient Mariner's shooting of the Albatross can be compared to several Judeo-Christian stories of betrayal, including the original sin of Adam and Eve, and Cain's betrayal of Abel. Like Adam and Eve, the Ancient Mariner fails to respect God's rules and is tempted to try to understand things that should remain out of his reach. Like them, he is forbidden from being truly close to the sublime, existing in a limbo-like rather than an Eden-like state. However, as a son of Adam and Eve, the Ancient Mariner is already a sinner and cast out of the divine realm. Like Cain, the Ancient Mariner angers God by killing another creature. Most obviously, the Ancient Mariner can be seen as the archetypal Judas or the universal sinner who betrays Christ by sinning. Like Judas, he murders the "Christian soul" who could lead to his salvation and greater understanding of the divine. Many readers have interpreted the Albatross as Christ, since it is the "rime" spirit's favorite creature, and the Ancient Mariner pays dearly for killing it. The Albatross is even hung around the Ancient Mariner's neck to mark him for his sin. Though the rain baptizes him after he is finally able to pray, like a real baptism, it does not ensure his salvation. In the end, the Ancient Mariner is like a strange prophet, kept alive to pass word of God's greatness onto others.

Imprisonment: "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner" is in many ways a portrait of imprisonment and its inherent loneliness and torment. The first instance of imprisonment occurs when the sailors are swept by a storm into the "rime." The ice is "mast-high", and the captain cannot steer the ship through it. The sailors' confir

"rime" foreshadows the Ancient Mariner's later imprisonment within a bewildered limbo-like existence. In the beginning of the poem, the ship is a vehicle of adventure, and the sailors set out in one another's happy company. However, once the Ancient Mariner shoots the Albatross, it quickly becomes a prison. Without wind to sail the ship, the sailors lose all control over their fate. They are cut off from civilization, even though they have each other's company. They are imprisoned further by thirst, which silences them and effectively puts them in isolation; they are denied the basic human ability to communicate. When the other sailors drop dead, the ship becomes a private prison for the Ancient Mariner.

Even more dramatically, the ghost ship seems to imprison the sun:

"And straight the sun was flecked with bars,

(Heaven's Mother send us grace!)

As if through a dungeon-grate he peered

With broad and burning face."

The ghost ship has such power that it can imprison even the epitome of the natural world's power, the sun. These lines symbolize the spiritual world's power over the natural and physical; spirits can control not only mortals, but the very planets themselves. After he is rescued from the prison that is the ship, the Ancient Mariner is subject to the indefinite imprisonment of his soul within his physical body. His "glittering" eye represents his frenzied soul, eager to escape from his ravaged body. He is imprisoned by the addiction to his own story, as though trapped in the "rime" forever. In a sense, the Ancient Mariner imprisons others by compelling them to listen to his story; they are physically compelled to join him in his torment until he releases them.

Retribution: "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner" is a tale of retribution, since the Ancient Mariner spends most of the poem paying for his one, impulsive error of killing the Albatross. The spiritual world avenges the Albatross's death by wreaking physical and psychological havoc on the Ancient Mariner and his shipmates. Even before the sailors die, their punishment is extensive; they become delirious from a debilitating state of thirst, their lips bake black in the sun, and they must endure the torment of seeing water all around them while being unable to drink it for its saltiness. Eventually the sailors all die, their souls flying either to heaven or hell. There are at least two ways to interpret the fact that the sailors suffer with the Ancient Mariner although they themselves have not erred. The first is that retribution is blind; inspired by anger and the desire to punish others, even a spirit may hurt the wrong people. The second is that the sailors are implicated in the Ancient Mariner's crime. If the Ancient Mariner represents the universal sinner, then each sailor, as a human, is guilty of having at some point disrespected one of God's creatures-or if not, he would have in the future. But the eternal punishment called Life-in-Death is reserved for the Ancient Mariner. Presumably the spirit, being immortal, must endure eternal grief over the murder of its beloved Albatross. In retribution, it forces the Ancient Mariner to endure eternal torment as well, in the form of his curse. Though he never dies - and may never, in a sense - the Ancient Mariner speaks from beyond the grave to warn others about the harsh, permanent consequences of momentary foolishness, selfishness, and disrespect of the natural world.

The Act of Storytelling: In "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner," Coleridge draws our attention not only to the Ancient Mariner's story, but to the act of storytelling itself. The Ancient Mariner's tale comprises so much of the poem that moments that occur outside of it often seem like interruptions. We are not only Coleridge's audience, but the Ancient Mariner's. Therefore, the messages that the protagonist delivers to his audier us, as well. Storytelling is a preventative measure in the poem, used to dissuade those who favor the pleasures of society (like the Wedding Guest and, presumably, ourselves) from disregarding the natural and spiritual worlds. The poem can also be seen as an allegory for the writer's task. Coleridge uses the word "teach" to describe the Ancient Mariner's storytelling, and says that he has "strange power of speech." In this way, he compares the protagonist to himself: both are gifted storytellers who impart their wisdom unto others. By associating himself with the Ancient Mariner, Coleridge implies that he, and by extension all writers, are not only inspired but compelled to write. Their gift is equally a curse; the pleasure of writing is marred with torment. According to this interpretation, the writer writes not to please himself or others, but to sate a painful urge. Inherent in the writer's task is communication with others, whom he must warn lest they suffer a similar fate. Just as the Ancient Mariner is forced to balance in a painful limbo between life and death, the writer is compelled and even condemned to balance in the liminal space of the imagination "until [his] tale is told." Like a writer, he is equally enthralled and pained by his imagination. Both are addicts, and storytelling is their drug; it provides only momentary relief until the urge to tell returns. In modern psychological terms, the Ancient Mariner as well as the writer relies on "the talking cure" to relieve himself of his psychological burden. But for the Ancient Mariner, the cure - reliving the experience that started with the "rime" by repeating his "rhyme" - is part of the torture. Coleridge paints an equally powerful and pathetic image of the writer. The Ancient Mariner is able to inspire the Wedding Guest so that he awakes the next day a new man, yet he is also the constant victim of his own talent - a curse that torments, but never destroys.

"The Rime of Ancient Mariner" : As a Christian Allegory

Samuel Taylor Coleridge's "The Rime of an Ancient Mariner" is a lyrical ballad that seems more like a miniature epic. However, not only it is a ballad talking about the adventure of an old mariner who is cursed for life because he kills an albatross; deeper than that, it is also a religious allegory conveying numerous themes pertaining to Christianity. On the one hand, if one reads "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner" simply as a tale at sea, the poem stands remarkable because of its simple rhyme and easy flow. On the other hand, if one reads deeper into the intricate details, symbolism, themes, and literary aspects, Coleridge will therefore have produced a masterpiece.

Furthermore, many critics agree that there are several religious connotations in this ballad; however, very few agree upon it being a religious allegory carrying a main religious theme that reflects Christian beliefs. This paper will discuss all the possible religious notions conveyed in Coleridge's artwork.

Christianity preaches that life is a trial by which we either pass and go to heaven, or fail and go to purgatory. Also, the human body is a victim of the human thought and action, which is represented by the soul. Therefore, in relation to the ballad, we can refer to the ship as the human body and the Mariner who steers the ship and leads it to destruction as the human soul. This ship led by the Mariner goes through a trial of storm and winds, but fails because of the Mariner. In Christianity, when a person is over with the trial (dies), his body rots away, "…for dust you are and to dust you will return," (Genesis 3:16 – 19), and the soul remains alive, either tortured, or pleased. The ship sinks. However, the Mariner becomes a captive of Life-in-Death (purgatory) and remains perpetually cursed for the mistake he has done.

Another symbolism conveyed through Coleridge's ballad is the Albatross that symbolizes Jesus Christ. When things start to fall apart in the ship, and the storm destroys all, the Albatross appears as a good omen that saves the ship from the remnants of the storm.

Just as the time when Christ was born and things gradually started to improve, sick people were healed, the blind saw, the deaf heard, and the mute spoke.

> "At length did cross an Albatross,
> Thorough the fog it came ;
> As if it had been a Christian soul,
> We hailed it in God's name."

(Mariner, p. 424)

The Albatross leads the ship to its right track, just as Christ leads His followers to heaven. "Our citizenship is in heaven. And we eagerly await a Savior from there, the Lord Jesus Christ" (Philippians 3:20). However, salvation is not a mate during the trip, for the bird is killed. Another reference of the Albatross to Christ is when the Mariner kills it by a cross-bow, as a symbol of the cross Christ died on. Also, after the murder, guilt strikes him for killing a good spirit: "Instead of the cross, the Albatross/About my neck was hung" (p. 426). Again, referring back to the Holy Bible we see that Judea kills himself because of the great guilt of turning in Christ to the cross and denying his name three times before dawn (just as he was told by the Lord.)

After killing the albatross, a second skeletal ship appears carrying Death and Life-in-Death. This ship represents man's life without Christ; Christianity states that life without religion and faith is void and empty. Hence, the skeletal ship carries death and its partner and reaches for the Mariner, since his life appears to be without Christ, for he kills His symbol.

The Mariner's story can also be related to Cain's, the son of Adam and Eve, who kills his brother. God curses him to forever wander, but marks him with a sign so that no one shall kill him (mark of Cain). The Mariner, here, becomes cursed forever and doesn't die, but lives Life-in-Death, which is much worse than dyeing. He is destined to wander around with a burden and narrate his story whenever necessary to make him feel better.

Moving away from symbolism, numerological Christian references are also significant in the ballad. Number three represents The Father, The Son, and The Holy Spirit (The Holy Trinity), as well as Christ's resurrection on the third day after He got crucified. In the ballad, in Part III, Death-in-Life wins the battle and whistles three times. Furthermore, the Hermit, his son, and the Mariner, together in one boat, are very relevant to the Trinity, where the Hermit and his son are the Father and Son, and the Mariner is the soul (as I had mentioned), the Holy Spirit. Number seven is significant in the Bible because it counts the number of days it took God to create the earth. In the ballad, the Mariner remains afloat for seven days until he gets rescued by the boat; and for seven days and seven nights he is haunted by the curse of the dead shipmates' open eyes. Nevertheless, the poem is made of seven parts; Part III includes the climax - the important part of the story - where the Mariner gets cursed, and Part VII is where the ballad ends with the moral.

Another important religious theme is the one that relates the Mariner's story to Adam and Eve's, conveying the notion of sin, punishment, and regret. The first people on earth were the first sinners, so does Genesis say. Adam and Eve were the cause of all humankind's suffering, just like the Mariner's sin which causes his shipmates pain and torture. In both stories, a sin is committed, a punishment and a curse are set, and regret is felt after living the curse, which leads to moments of epiphany. The snake in Adam and Eve's story is a major character that encouraged them to sin. In the Rime of the Ancient Mariner however, the religious irony stands in the snakes, for they are there for him to bless in order to be freed of the curse. Ironically, the Mariner needs to praise the cause of his torture (for if it wasn't for Adam and Eve's snake we'd all be in paradise now), in order to feel better.

Finally, the theme of narration sums up the whole story; the Mariner narrates his story to the wedding guest, and will always have to narrate it wherever he goes. Relating this theme to religion, it can be the notion of preaching. On the surface, the Mariner narrates his story to feel better. On a deeper level, the Mariner preaches the moral of respect and reverence towards God's creatures. In the Bible, the theme of preaching is very significant, for this is one reason why Jesus was sent to us, and that was the job of the apostles after Him. Here, the Mariner could be a symbol of Christ himself who suffers in order to preach the message to others in order to save them from mankind sin.

Therefore, once this ballad is read and apprehended, one would realize how deep its Christian allegory is and how important it is to understand the symbols conveyed by the author to the reader. There is no doubt that Samuel Taylor Coleridge is one of the best poets of his time; for this ballad, with its intricate meanings and rimes, could've never been written as such by an ordinary poet. In fact, "The Rime of an Ancient Mariner" is one of the poems that carry various themes in which a person would enjoy studying and writing about in depth. The more we read it, the more we learn about it, and the more we admire it.

"The Rime of Ancient Mariner" : Use of Literary Devices

To point out some of the several literacy devices used in a lyrical ballad, Rime of the Ancient Mariner by Samuel Taylor Coleridge has been chosen. The literary devices explained with examples from the ballad include alliteration, anaphora, assonance, consonance, elision, hyperbole, imagery, inversion, irony, metaphor, onomatopoeia, oxymoron, paradox, personification, rhyme scheme, simile and symbols.

Alliteration: Alliteration is a literary device where words are used in quick succession and begin with letters belonging to the same sound group. Whether it is the consonant sound or a specific vowel group, the alliteration involves creating a repetition of similar sounds in the sentence. Alliterations are also created when the words all begin with the same letter. Alliterations are used to add character to the writing. For example in part 2, line 102-103;

> The breezes blew, the white foam flew,
> The furrow follow'd free:

The bold word is an example of alliteration in the poem.

Anaphora: The term anaphora refers to a type of parallelism created when successive phrases or lines begin with the same words. The repetition can be as simple as a single word or as long as an entire phrase. For example in part 1, line 27-28:

Here, 'below' is used as anaphora to create a litany and rhyme.

Assonance: It is the effect created when there is a repetition of a vowel sound in stressed syllables with different consonant sounds. Assonance can be understood to be a kind of alliteration. What sets it apart from alliterations is that it is the repetition of only vowel sounds. This effect is used widely throughout the ballad to establish its rhythm. For example in part 1, line 21-22:

The Ship was cheer'd, the Harbour clear'd--
Merrily did we drop

Assonance appears in the long 'e' sound in cheer'd and clear'd.

Consonance: Consonance refers to repetition of sounds in quick succession produced by consonants within a sentence or phrase. The repetitive sound is often found at the end of a word. Consonance is the opposite of assonance. For example in part 1, line 27-28:

And he shone bright, and on the right
Went down into the Sea.

The words 'bright' and 'right' have the same last consonants, creating the effect of consonance.

Elision: Elision refers to the leaving out of an unstressed syllable or vowel, usually in order to keep a regular meter in a line of poetry. It is the deliberate omission of a sound between two words. In Rime of the Ancient Mariner, elision is used repeatedly:

It crack'd and growl'd, and roar'd and howl'd--
Like noises of a swound. (Line 61-62)
It ate the food it ne'er had eat,
And round and round it flew. (Line 67-68)
And I had done a hellish thing,
And it would work 'em woe: (Line 91-92)

The highlighted words are examples of elision.

Hyperbole: A hyperbole is a literary device wherein the author uses specific words and phrases that exaggerate and overemphasize the basic crux of the statement in order to produce a grander, more noticeable effect. The purpose of hyperbole is to create a larger-than-life effect and overly stress a specific point. Such sentences usually convey an action or sentiment that is generally not practically or realistically possible or plausible but helps emphasize an emotion. For example in lines

As idle as a painted Ship
Upon a painted Ocean. (Line 117-118)

This hyperbole is used because it stretches the truth so that we understand how still the boat is.

Water, water, everywhere,
Nor any drop to drink. (Line 121-122)

The poet has used exaggeration to define the ancient mariner's thirst when he is stranded in the ocean and how he can't drink a drop of that huge mass of water.

Imagery: In poetry, one of the strongest devices is imagery when the poet uses words and phrases to create 'mental images' for the reader. Imagery helps the reader to visualize and hence more realistically experience the author's writings. The usage of descriptive words and similes, amongst other literary forms, in order to awaken the readers' sensory perceptions is referred to as imagery. Imagery is not limited to only visual sensations, but also refers to sensations of taste, smell, touch and hearing as well. For example

The ice was here, the ice was there,

The ice was all around:
It cracked and growled, and roared and howled,
Like noises in a swound! (Line 59-62)

These lines appeal specifically to the sense of sight and hearing when the ice is described as cracking, growling, roaring and howling noises.

Water, water, everywhere,
Nor any drop to drink. (Lines 121-122)

These lines portray the intense thirst the narrator felt which plays with the reader's sense of taste.

Yea, slimy things did crawl with legs
Upon the slimy sea. (Lines 125-126)

These lines appeal to the sense of touch because we are repulsed by the reading the description of 'slimy insects' with their legs and the sea as 'slimy'.

Inversion: The term 'inversion' refers to the practice of changing the conventional placement of words. It is a literary practice typical of the classical poetry. It is usually used for the purpose of laying emphasis. It helps to arrange the poem in a manner that catches the attention of the reader not only with its content but also with its physical appearance; a result of the peculiar structuring. For example Coleridge inverts the word order from time to time, as the following lines demonstrate:

Instead of the cross, the Albatross
*About my neck was hung. (*Lines 141-142)

The normal word order of this line would be 'was hung about my neck'.

The naked hulk alongside came (line 195)

Here the normal word order would be 'came alongside'.

Irony: The use of irony refers to playing around with words such that the meaning implied by a sentence or word is actually different from the literal meaning derived. Often, irony is used to suggest the stark contrast of the literal meaning being put forth. The deeper, real layer of significance is revealed not by the words themselves but the situation and the context in which they are placed. For example:

Water, water, everywhere,
And all the boards did shrink;
Water, water, everywhere,
Nor any drop to drink. (Lines 119-122)

These lines signify that water is everywhere, but there is none to actually drink.

Metaphor: A metaphor refers to a meaning or identity ascribed to one subject by way of another. In a metaphor, one subject is implied to be another so as to draw a comparison between their similarities and shared traits. The first subject, which is the focus of the sentences, is usually compared to the second subject, which is used to convey a degree of meaning that is used to characterize the first. The purpose of using a metaphor is to take an identity or concept that we understand clearly (second subject) and use it to better understand the lesser-known element (the first subject). For example:

They coil'd and swam; and every track
Was a flash of golden fire. (Lines 281-282)

In the above stated lines, the metaphor is the comparison of the wake of the waves left by the sea snakes with fire.

O happy living things! no tongue
Their beauty might declare:
A spring of love gushed from my heart,
And I blessèd them unaware: (Lines 282-285)

A 'spring of love gushed from my heart' is the metaphor used for love in this line by Coleridge. It shows how beautiful the bride and groom looked that the ancient mariner blessed them with a spring of love gushing from his heart.

Onomatopoeia: The term refers to words whose very sound is very close to the sound they are meant to depict. In other words, it refers to sound words whose pronunciation to the actual sound or noise they represent. For example

It crack'd and growl'd, and roar'd and howl'd (Line 61)

The words in bold are onomatopoeia i.e. when pronounced they portray the sounds of actions they represent.

Oxymoron: It allows the author to use contradictory, contrasting concepts placed together in a manner that actually ends up making sense in a strange, and slightly complex manner. An oxymoron is an interesting literary device because it helps to perceive a deeper level of truth and explore different layers of semantics while writing. For example:

And now there came both mist and snow,
And it grew wondrous cold: (Line 51-52)

The phrase wondrous cold is an oxymoron.

And through the drifts the snowy clifts
*Did send a dismal sheen: (*Line 55-56)

'Dismal sheen' is the oxymoron used in these lines.

Paradox: A paradox refers to the use of concepts or ideas that are contradictory to one another, yet, when placed together they hold significant value on several levels. The uniqueness of paradoxes lies in the fact that a deeper level of meaning and significance is not revealed at first glance, but when it does crystallize, it provides astonishing insight. For example:

Her beams bemocked the sultry main,
Like April hoar-frost spread;
But where the ship's huge shadow lay,
The charmèd water burnt alway
A still and awful red. (Lines 267-271)

This warring imagery of the moon spreads frosty colors across the ship, but the water burns red in its shadow. While the moon might calm the curse momentarily, it still lies beneath.

Personification: Personification refers to the practice of attaching human traits and characteristics with inanimate objects, phenomena and animals.

The Sun came up upon the left,

Out of the sea came he!
And he shone bright, and on the right
Went down into the sea. (Lines 25-28)

In these lines, the sun is personified as a human being.

Her beams bemocked the sultry main,
*Like April hoar-frost spread; (*Line 267-268)

The moon in these lines is personified as a mocking woman.

Rhyme Scheme: It is the practice of rhyming words placed at the end of the lines. Rhyme scheme refers to the order in which particular words rhyme. If the alternate words rhyme, it is an "a-b-a-b" rhyme scheme, which means "a" is the rhyme for the lines 1 and 3 and "b" is the rhyme affected in the lines 2 and 4. For example most stanzas in 'Rime of the Ancient Mariner' have four-lines, called a 'quatrain', but not all of the stanzas have exactly four lines. The second and fourth line of each four-line stanza rhyme, providing a song like rhythm; e.g. 'hand' and 'sand' in the first stanza. But some stanzas have five lines. In these stanzas the second line rhymes with the fifth, the third line rhymes with the fourth. Some stanzas contain six lines. In these stanzas the second, fourth and sixth lines rhyme.

Simile: It is the practice of drawing parallels or comparisons between two unrelated and dissimilar things, people, beings, places and concepts. By using similes a greater degree of meaning and understanding is attached to an otherwise simple sentence. The reader is able to better understand the sentiment the author wishes to convey. Similes are marked by the use of the words 'as' or 'such as' or 'like'. For example

Every soul, it passed me by,
Like the whizz of my crossbow! (Lines 223-224)

In these lines, there is the comparison of the passing of a soul to the sound of a shot arrow.

The sky and the sea, and the sea and the sky
*Lay like a load on my weary eye (*Lines 251-252)

Comparison of the sky and sea to a weight on the eye is the simile in these lines.

Symbol: A symbol is literary device that contains several layers of meaning, often concealed at first sight, and is representative of several other aspects or concepts and traits than those that are visible in the literal translation alone. Symbol is using an object or action that means something more than its literal meaning. For example, in the Rime of the Ancient Mariner, the Mariner is an actual symbolic representation of Adam. The Ancient Mariner slaying of the Albatross is equal to Adam and Eve eating the forbidden fruit from the Tree of Knowledge. The moon and sun also play an important symbol in this story. The sun represents God's influence of wrathful power but the moon has a more positive association than the sun. Generally troubling outcome happens to the Mariner during the day while more favorable result happens by moon light. For example, the mariner's curse lifts and he returns home by moonlight.

"The Rime of Ancient Mariner" : As a Ballad

Ballad is a short narrative folk song that fixes on the most dramatic part of a story, moving to its conclusion by means of dialogue and a series of incidents. It is one of the earliest forms of literature The Ancient Mariner by S.T. Coleridge is a literary ballad.

Following this age old tradition Coleridge created a marvelous ballad poem. Here goes a discussion on what have made The Ancient Mariner a perfect ballad.

Use of Refrains: The refrain of words, lines and sometimes stanza is a special feature of folk ballads. Coleridge makes use of refrain in a subtle way. He makes use of refrain for emphasis or for reminding us of the essence of a thing. In the following lines refrain is clearly meant for emphasis. In the following lines repetition is clearly meant for emphasis:

Water, water everywhere
Nor any drop to drink."

Musical arrangement of words: Coleridge has shown great skill in arranging the words of his verses in a melodious manner. For the sake of musical arrangement of words he has frequently employed alliteration, assonance, and various rhythms. In the following passage he has employed the hissing sounds of "s" to convey the idea of movement in a musical manner.

Swiftly, swiftly flew the ship,
Yet she sailed softly too
Sweetly sweetly blew the breeze
On me alone it blew.

Supernatural Machinery and Mysticism: Supernatural element is an essential element of ballads of all description. Coleridge in this poem has built in a large supernatural machinery to draw and effective and purposeful contrast between things natural and things human. The supernatural world or life has logic of its own and comes into action to impose the due punishment. It even controls, influences, and takes advantages of natural elements like the wind, the stars, the rain, the fog and the mist. The Ancient Mariner is also packed with mystery of an awful nature. The Mariner's ship is becalmed. The ocean begins to rot. Then the ship begins to sail without a tide. The Mariner tells nothing of who he is and little of what he does. In the poem we find him as a helpless soul passing through strange experiences.

Short ballad stanzas: The poem is written in short ballad stanzas. Many of them are four-line stanzas. But some are also five line, or six line stanzas. The verses are iambic tetrameters followed by iambic trimeters. The rhythms are various. The stanza is the same that occurs in Thoma's Pery's ballads. But Coleridge's stanza is more polished and finished than Percy's.

Modernity: The Ancient Mariner has touches of modernity. The psychological effect in which the poem abounds is something modern and original. In old ballads entire emphasis is laid upon external events. In Ancient Mariner the poet describes not only the external events but also what happens in the mind of the ancient Mariner. Thus we are told that The Ancient Mariner felt extremely fear stricken when the ghost-ship disappeared all of a sudden on the sea.

Fear at my heart at a cup
My life blood seemed to sip.

In the light of the above discussion, it may be concluded that "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner" is obviously a ballad in its form. The poem has everything- a vivid story, dramatic action, verbal music, a scenic setting, and mystery. It is a beautiful ballad possessing all the characteristics of a ballad in a more polished and finished form.

"The Rime of Ancient Mariner" : Use of Symbols

Symbolism can be defined as the practice, system and art of representing ideas by means of symbols. The term 'symbol' although is a word, a phrase, an object, or a clause even, yet it always represents an abstraction. So the thing represented is an idea, quality, condition, or any other abstract thing.

Kinds of symbols: Coleridge has employed symboli in "The Rime of The Ancient Mariner". These symbols are summed up in two artistic symbolic Categories – symbols of distance and symbols of life in Middle Ages.

The symbols of the art of storytelling serve to heighten the illusion; credibly the marvels, provide an approach to them, a middle distance, which makes them appropriately more remote. There is also nearer distance. The Wedding Guest is a symbol of the middle distance. He stands between the Ancient Mariner and his voyage in a land of marvels. The marginal comment of the poet is a symbol of nearer distance. It stands between the reader and the marvel land of poetry.

Further, the Hermit, the pilot and the Pilot's boy, the background of the sea-port hill, the church, and the lighthouse are symbols of the vanished life of the middle ages. Hence in the words of Stoll, "when the Mariner and his strip, equally bewitched arrive, the effect of the mere sight of them on normal every day Hermit, pilot and pilot boy is startling, shocking. The effect of that, in turn, upon the Wedding Guest and also the reader is convincing".

The Mariner: A symbol of inquiring spirit: Adopting the spiritual point of view we can look upon the Ancient Mariner as a symbol of "an unusually inquiring spirit", and his voyage as a 'mental adventure'. The Mariner's tale is a story of a voyage into the interior. Not only into the unfathomable depths of the sources of human action; the story also takes us beyond the human world altogether. Again, it is a voyage of extreme contrasts of suffering and of expiation, of the human and social and an altogether alien cosmos with its own terrible yet beautiful order.

Moon symbolism: In The Ancient Mariner, a weak or waning moon is pretty clearly a powerful symbol for loss of mother love. In Part-III the crescent moon rises after life in death has won the Mariner's soul and Death has won his ship mates, lives. Here the moon rises in the eas6t, while the moon always rises in the west.

Shooting of the Albatross: The Albatross, following the ship, stands for the power of Nature coming to the help of the Mariner and his crew. It saves them from snow and fog. The bird seems to suggest some redeeming force in creation that guides humanity:

> "As if it had been a Christian soul,
> We hailed it in God's name".

The shooting of the Albatross comes quite suddenly and irrationally. It symbolizes the sin of ignorance the act is explicitly called 'hellish'. As a result, the ship is becalmed in a tropic sea. Parching heat replaces icy cold. The Mariner gradually discovers from the result of his action that the killing of the Albatross is the violation of a great sanctity. The sympathy between Nature and voyage is broken and terrible, retribution follows. The knowledge of evil is symbolized by the 'shiny things' that crawl on the retiring ocean, and the 'death-fires' and 'witch's oil' burning by night.

Conclusion: Coleridge defines a symbol as something which presents the eternal in the temporal, and the universal in the particular. It is through the use of symbols that a poet conveys universal truth. The Ancient Mariner, being a tale of the supernatural, is also symbolic and allegorical.

Through a set of symbols the poem becomes a moral allegory which says,

"He prayeth well, who loveth well
Both man and bird and beast".

The whole poem illustrates the moral of an intimate kinship between all living things. God is on the side of pity and love, and the forces of the universe become hostile to those who show cruelty towards animals. According to Bowra, this poem is a "myth of guilt and redemption".

"The Rime of Ancient Mariner" : As an Allegory

An allegory is described as a fictional literary narrative or artistic expression that conveys a symbolic meaning parallel to but distinct from, and more important than, the literal meaning. Allegory has also been defined as an extended metaphor. The symbolic meaning is usually expressed through personifications and other symbols

"The Rime of the Ancient Mariner" is an allegory that symbolizes the inherent struggle of human beings facing the ideas of sin and redemption. In writing this poem, Coleridge spent four months of sustained writing upon his purpose of supposing that supernatural situations are real. This purpose is seen clearly in "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner", which demonstrates salvation, and the power of sympathetic imagination. The story of the ancient mariner takes place on a sea voyage around the horn of Africa and through the Pacific Ocean to England, which Coleridge uses to symbolize the passage into the spirit world of guilt, retribution, and rebirth.

In discussing the symbolism of guilt in "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner", it is important to understand that in the eyes of the Romantics God was one with Nature. Because of this belief a sin against Nature was seen as a sin against God. In line 82 of the poem, the Mariner simply says, "I shot the Albatross." In saying this, the reader often questions why the bird was shot. There is no explanation. The Albatross was shot without reason or motive very much like the sin of humans. Here the poem begins to take on its allegorical purpose in which the Albatross symbolizes not only sin, but possibly Jesus as well. In Christianity, Jesus died upon the cross for the sins of humanity. He was punished in order for humankind to be forgiven. Like Jesus, the Albatross died not for its own sins, but rather for the sins of humans-the sin of the Mariner.

In order for the Mariner to be forgiven of this sin he must first admit his guilt. In lines 91 through 96 he does so by saying,

"And I had done a hellish thing,
And it would work 'em woe:
For all averred, I had killed the bird
That made the breeze to blow.
Ah wretch! said they, the bird to slay,
That made the breeze to blow!"

It is this admission of guilt that allows the process of forgiveness for the Mariner to begin. It also allows the Albatross to become a reminder of the Mariner's sin, a representation of Christ's suffering, and a symbol of the Christian cross. In lines 40 and 41 it says:

"Instead of the cross,
the Albatross About my neck was hung."

The next symbolic theme in "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner" is that of retribution. In lines 143-146 Coleridge illustrates a time of draught for the sailors on the voyage. Without any water to drink they are suffering. This symbolizes the spiritual draught that human beings face in Christianity. Without the love for Christ human beings are thirsting for spiritual enlightenment and forgiveness-without which they suffer.

Also as a symbol for retribution in the poem is the appearance of Life in Death. In Christianity, in order to experience everlasting life in heaven, humans must succumb to death first. Coleridge uses supernatural events to show real life situations in his poem. The real life situation of life in death in Christianity is symbolized as a supernatural being in in lines 188-193 of the poem. This symbolism of Life-in-Death is expressed through personification in saying,

"Her lips were red, her looks were free,
Her locks were yellow as gold:
Her skin was as white as leprosy,
The Night-mare Life-in-Death was she,
Who thicks man's blood with cold."

The final symbolic theme in Coleridge's "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner" is that of rebirth. This rebirth is seen in the Mariner's realization that all creatures are a part of God. In lines 272-281 the Mariner discusses the beauty of the water snakes that are around the boat. This realization leads to the Mariner's rebirth when in lines 284-285 he says:

"A spring of love gushed from my heart
And I blessed them unaware."

It is at this moment of recognition that the Albatross falls from the Mariner's neck because he no longer needs it as a reminder of his sin. He has been forgiven in his heart as he sees the beauty that God is in Nature.

Another symbol of rebirth in the poem is seen in the rain. After a draught of endless time through which the Mariner did not realize his sin or the beauty of Nature in God, he finally feels rain that he can drink, and be quenched from his physical and spiritual draught. With his recognition the Mariner experiences rain as a symbol of baptism and rebirth in lines 299-300 when he says:

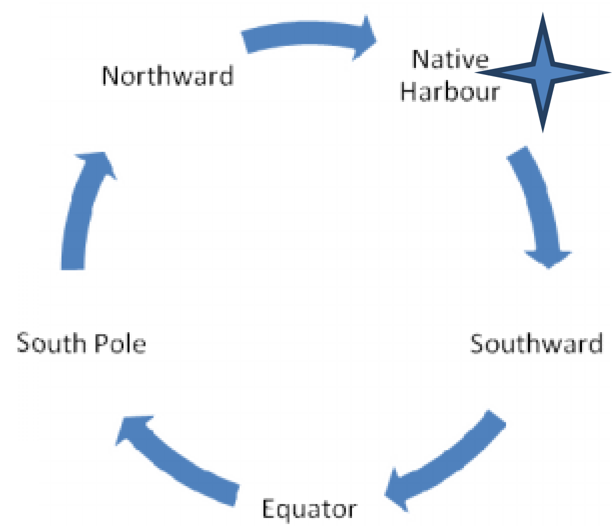
"I dreamt that they were filled with dew;
And when I awoke, it rained."

In Christianity, baptism symbolizes the rebirth of the human from his or her sin into a new enlightenment, as does the rain in "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner."

In the conclusion to the poem, Coleridge provides closure to the spiritual journey of the Mariner by expressing his Anglican upbringing. In lines 574-577 the Mariner asks a holy Hermit for forgiveness and is given penance. To fulfill his spiritual rebirth the Mariner is told by the Hermit in lines 578-581 to tell the story of his journey of death in life and rebirth in love to others. This penance is what allows the Mariner to be reborn.

The last stanza of the poem tells the reader of the wedding guest who has been listening to the story all along. It expresses the moral of the story in saying,

"He went like one that hath been stunned,
And is of sense forlorn:
A sadder and a wiser man,



He rose the morrow morn."

Coleridge uses "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner" to transport the reader into a spiritual journey of guilt, retribution, and rebirth as a symbol of the journey of Christianity. Expressing the inherent struggles of humanity for sin and redemption, "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner" allows the reader to suppose that supernatural situations are real. Coleridge uses supernatural events to bring to live the ideas he expresses in his work. "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner" clearly demonstrates the ideals of Christianity as salvation and the power of sympathetic imagination.

"The Rime of Ancient Mariner" : Depiction of Spiritual Journey

S.T. Coleridge's 'The Rime of the Ancient Mariner', being a multi-meaningful poem, has now become one of the most famous poems in English literature. In general, it is a story of a mariner's interesting voyage or journey on the sea, but, at the same time, includes many supernatural elements. Actually, there is a story of a spiritual journey under the inner fold of the poem showing three stages of human soul – innocence, experience, and super or greater innocence through self- realization. Again, it is also a poem of guilt and redemption, sin and suffering, crime and punishment. Now, we will evaluate both of the journeys and other ideas of the poem and the similar examples of journey in other great pieces of English literature.

Physically the ship of the ancient Mariner leaves the harbour for southward with a good wind and fair weather till it reaches the Equator. Then it is driven by a storm towards the South Pole where huge ice-burgs dangerously float in the sea and no living creature is visible. With the coming of an Albatross, a favourable south-wind begins to blow and the ship sails northwards. But by the killing of the Albatross, the Mariner experiences many extremely horrible and mysterious incidents. At last the ship sails swiftly over the sea and the Mariner sees his native harbour. So the Mariner's physical journey may be marked in this way as shown in diagram:

Besides the physical journey of the Mariner, the main significance lies in the spiritual journey where there is a development of a soul from the stage of innocence to the stage of experience, and from stage of experience to the stage of super innocence where one can know one's own self. In order to show this, the poet uses some symbols and some horrible and mysterious incidents that intensify the mode of the journey.

At the innocent stage of this journey, we observe that all are favourable for innocent joy, natural atmosphere. The Mariner says-

"The ship was cheered the harbour cleared
Merrily did we drop"

He starts his journey with the cheerful faces of all people at the harbour including the ship, with no mark of disorder. This reminds us of the merry-time of birth when we generally begin our journey in this world. Again, there appears an Albatross bearing good omen and happenings. Here the Albatross is not a simple bird but it represents innocence, nature and God Himself. The Mariner says:

"As if it had been a Christian soul
We hailed it in God's name.''

In our world, similarly, Christ bearing good things for us came to save humanity. Moreover, the bird is an innocent creation of nature making a relation between God and our innocent world.

But the stage of innocence does not last long. It comes to an end with the killing of Albatross by the Mariner, as Christ was killed. Then the stage of experience begins. We should mention a stanza now-

God save thee, ancient Mariner
From the fiends that plague thee thus!-
Why look'st thou so?
With my cross-bow
I shot the Albatross.

Here a question may generally be raised that why the Mariner suddenly kills the bird. The answer may- from the indication of 'fiends' in the stanza above – be that something 'evil' prompted the Mariner to shoot the 'Albatross'

Indeed, this killing is not an ordinary one, rather it is symbolically the killing of God's representative, breaking of the relation between man and nature as well as man and God. Thus in the spiritual world, he commits a great sin.

In addition, in every religion we see a system of punishment for one's sin. So, here the Mariner must be punished -either physically or spiritually or both.

In the meantime, his physical punishment has already begun. The previous 'glorious Sun' has now become 'bloody Sun' just above them. They become as lifeless as painted picture and cannot do anything. The poet expresses it exactly in the stanza below-

Day after day, day after day,
We stuck, nor breath nor motion,
As idle as a painted ship
Upon a painted ocean.

#

Water, water, everywhere,
And all the boards did shrink
Even,
Water, water, every where
Nor any drop to drink.

Additionally their spiritual punishment also begins -

The very deep did rot: O Christ
That ever this should be!
Yea, slimy things did crawl with legs
Upon the slimy sea.
…..

The death fires danced at night

The water, like a witch's oils.

Here extremely spiritual horror, from where the Mariner wants to be released by God, has been expressed. But as he feels hatred to the lower creation of nature created by God, his punishment is later increased with the Albatross which is hung about his neck, as the symbol of his sin.

In this way both of their mental and physical punishments gradually increase. Suddenly a skeleton- ship appears between them and the Sun, as if an executioner between the criminal and the justice. There are in the ship, Death and life-in-Death playing at dice and their stake being the Mariner. The result is as follows-

The game is done! I've won! I've won!
Quoth she, and whistles thrice.
…..
The sun's rim dips; the stars rush out:

That is the Mariner is won by Death in life, and with this, the court of the Sun is closed. Consequently all the sailors become dead, and only the Mariner remains 'alive but in death' to suffer lifelong agony. However the cause of the sailors' punishment is that they shared some of the Mariner's crime by supporting him to kill the bird. But Mariner will suffer a lot. So he becomes 'alone on a wide wide sea' and no saint takes pity on his 'soul in agony'.

Moreover, he discriminates between the upper creation and lower creation. He thinks that there are so many beautiful men but in death, while –

'A thousand thousand slimy things
Lived on and so did I

Consequently, he cannot say any prayer, rather his heart becomes 'as dry as dust', and yet the stage of experience continues.

Next, there happens a self- realization in the Mariners spirit or mind; he loves and blesses the lower creatures and can pray; and becomes free from his sin, Albatross, and reaches the stage of greater innocence

O happy living things! No tongue
Their beauty might declare:
A spring of love gushed from my heart.
And I blessed them unaware:
Sure my kind saint took pity on me,
And I blessed them unaware.
…..
The self- same moment I could pray;
From my neck so free
The Albatross fell of, and sank
Like lead into the sea.

At the end of the part V, from the second one of the two voices, we know the condition of the Mariner in the stage of greater innocence-

'The man hath penance done
And penance more will do'

Then he sees his native harbour and is rescued by the Pilot of the boat carrying a Hermit, after his boat has been sunk into the sea; he feels relief from his agony only when he has related the story of his journey to the Hermit. Since then, the Mariner occasionally experiences the same agony, and relates his journey to the men whom he chooses and thus gets relief. Actually, this indicates us the Christian term, 'Confession of saints'.

Then, what is the result of this spiritual journey? – The Mariner prefers walking to the church to worldly merriment. Moreover, the wedding guest, having heard the whole story of the Mariner, does not go to the feast- as he has also become experienced like the Mariner through this journey and next becomes 'A sadder and a wise man.'

To sum up the discussion, we can say that journey does not prevail only in the 'Rime of the Ancient Mariner.' Rather in every step of our life, we are always making journey – either physical or mental. However, the experienced stage of our soul is more important than the innocent. Because innocence is governed by God or natural intuition; but in the stage of experience there happens an experiment through which we may overcome the stage of experience and may reach the stage of greater innocence.

"The Rime of Ancient Mariner" : Sin and Redemption

The premise of sin and redemption is evident in Samuel Taylor Coleridge's famous ballad "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner". The poem focuses on the trials and tribulations of the main character, the mariner. The narrative starts as the mariner and his ship set off to sea.

The mariner's sin is fundamentally unpremeditated and unfounded. According to the editors of Webster's New Collegiate Dictionary, "Sin is a vitiated state of human nature in which the self is estranged from God". Sin was precisely what happened to the mariner. In a display of utter disregard for one of god's creatures, the mariner shot the albatross. The murder of the Albatross came abruptly and for no apparent reason. "…With my crossbow I shot the Albatross!" illustrates how motiveless the killing of the albatross really was.

The idea of a crime against God implements itself through a crime against nature. If the mariner murders a human, the crime is then against man, and thus eclipses the religious significance involved in the murder. The implication of a crime against God progresses when the crewmembers remove the cross from around the mariner's neck; and replace it with the albatross:

"Ah, well a day!
What evil looks had I from old and young!
Instead of the cross,
The Albatross about my neck was hung"

This action is an important element in the advancement of the poem. By replacing the mariner's cross with the albatross, the crewmember's action symbolically characterized the exodus of the Holy Spirit from the mariner. The death of the creature of God, like the death of Jesus, will work to aid in the redemption and salvation of the mariner.

The crewmembers played a vital role in the sin of the mariner. The crewmember's first reaction to the murder of the albatross is to rebuke it as shown by this quote,

"Ah Wretch! Said they, such birds to slay
That made the breeze to blow".

By making a remark, the crewmembers formed the first foundation of their sin. By judging the mariner, the crewmembers submitted themselves to the judgment of heaven. By doing so, they set themselves up for a punishment that could be deemed far worse that any that they might have deserved.

The second sin of the crewmembers comes when they overlook the murder of the albatross by saying:

> "T'was right, said they, such birds to slay
> That bring the fog and mist".

As the crewmembers notice that the murder of the albatross bears no immediate effect on the weather, they consequently approve of the murder. By doing so, the crewmembers made themselves collaborators in the crime. Subsequently, the breeze vanished and the sky became foggy again.

> "Down dropped the breeze,
> The sails dropped down,
> T'was sad as sad could be;
> And we did speak only to break the silence of the sea".

The crewmembers again contradict themselves and condemn the mariner for what he had done:

> "Ah, well a day!
> What evil looks had I from old and young!
> Instead of the cross,
> The Albatross about my neck was hung"

After an encounter with life-in-death, the crewmembers all drop dead. The deaths of the crewmembers were justified in that the fellow mariners have, made the desire the measure of the act: they first condemn the act, when the think the bird had brought the fog; then in the dead calm, again condemn the act. By doing so, the crewmembers isolate themselves from nature and thereby, from god since nature is the work of god.

The sun and the moon play a symbolic role in "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner". Robert Penn Warren states: "There is a constant contrast between moonlight and sunlight, and the main events of the poem can be sorted out according to the kinds of light in which they occur". In the poem, the good events correlate with the moon, and the bad events take place while under the sun. Coleridge highlights the importance of the distinction between the two kinds of light.

In "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner", as the voyage begins, the sun is burning brightly overhead. The crew is in good spirits, but soon hereafter a storm strikes the ship sending it wildly off course. At night, when the moon comes out, the Albatross first shows up "in mist or cloud, on mast or shroud, it perched for vespers nine; whiles all the night, through fog-smoke white, glimmered the white moon-shine".

The moon is not the only element of nature that is associated with the albatross, the wind relates with the bird as well. As shown when the albatross first showed up,

> "And a good south wind sprung up behind;
> the albatross did follow …".

Before long, the mariner shoots the albatross, and the rising of the sun soon follows. Immediately upon the rising of the sun, the mariners accept the murder of the albatross. The sun is symbolically the cause of their acceptance of the crime.

The crewmembers justify the crime because the bird had brought the fog and mist or, the moon. To say it another way, the crewmembers renounce the fog and mist, which are one and the same with the moon. At this point, the sun is first introduced. According to Warren the sun is, "the light which shows the familiar as familiar, it is the light of practical convenience, it is the light in which pride preens (cleans) itself, which had risen so promisingly and so gloriously".

Part III is split into two scenes, one of the sun, one of the moon, in even balance. In part III, there is an elaborate description of the sun. As the sun goes down, the moon comes out, and a description is given of it as well. Warren states that in the moon there are three phases of the redeeming process, which are:

"First, the recognition of happiness and beauty; second, love; third; the blessing of the creatures; fourth, freedom from the spell".

As the mariner and his ship make their way home, he spots his home port, which he sees in the moonlight.

While the theme of sin has been thoroughly covered, the premise of redemption is left open for explanation. Redemption is the act of being pardoned after one has requested forgiveness. This is mostly seen in the bible when Jesus encourages his followers to pray to god for forgiveness, and they would be saved. According to this definition, redemption is exactly what the mariner experienced. He saw the sea snakes, he recognized their beauty, and he blessed them by saying,

"Oh happy living things!
No tongue their beauty might declare…
Sure my kind saint took pity on me,
and I blessed them unaware"

He quietly blessed them. The act of blessing the sea snakes was the first step towards the mariner's redemption. According to Humphry House: "Just as the albatross was not a mere bird, so these are not mere water-snakes – they stand for all happy living things".

The first step towards redemption for the mariner was the recovery of love and the recovery of the power of prayer. As the mariner blesses the sea snakes, the albatross, which has been hung around his neck, falls off and sinks into the sea. This symbolically is the return of Christ to the mariner. The second redemption of the mariner comes when the crewmembers reappear. The reappearance of the crewmembers comes to be the relief from the curse.

The Hermit and the Wedding Guest are the important figures in the redemption of the mariner. The Hermit is a priest of god and the Wedding Guest is the catalyst into which the mariner confides his story, as he is doomed to do for the remainder of his days. The Hermit is not only a priest of God, he is also a priest of society. It is the Hermit that accepts the mariner back into society. The Wedding Guest is a crucial figure in the plot as he is the way of confession for the mariner. While at first the Wedding Guest fears that the mariner is a ghost, the mariner assures the Wedding Guest that he is a true human,

"Be calm, thou wedding guest!
'Twas not those souls that fled in pain"

As the mariner's story continues, the Wedding Guest becomes sucked in and cannot make himself leave the mariner. This is because whenever the mariner comes into contact with someone that he needs to tell his story to, he and his subject become powerless but to listen to each other. In this way the story of sin and redemption is narrated to educate the listeners and make them wiser and sadder.

"The Rime of Ancient Mariner" : Gothicism

Gothicsim is a style in fictional literature characterized by gloomy settings, violent or grotesque action, and a mood of decay, degeneration. The Gothic begins with later - eighteenth-century writers' turn to past; in the context of the Romantic Period the Gothic is a type of imitation medievalism. When it was launched in the later eighteenth century the Gothic features accounts of terrifying experiences in ancient castles -experiences connected with dungeons, secret passageways, flickering lamps, screams, moons, bloody hands, ghosts, graveyards and the rest. By extension, it came to designate the mysterious, fantastic, supernatural, and again the terrifying, especially the pleasurably terrifying, in literature more generally.

The Gothic is a prominent and distinctive element in the writings of the Romantic Ag. The mode had originated in novels of the mid-eighteenth century that in radical opposition to the Enlightenment ideals of order, decorum, and rational control. It had opened to literary exploration the realm of nightmarish terror, violence.

The Gothic introduces a genre that both influenced Romantic poetry and in its day for outstripped it in popularity. This topic cluster explores signs of Gothic influence in some of the most frequently read works of Coleridge e.g. , the account of the skeleton ship and crew's reaction in Coleridge's The Rime of the Ancient Mariner.

The Rime of the Ancient Mariner is full of strange, uncanny or "Gothic" elements. Gothic horror fiction was very popular at the time it was written. The Gothic elements in the poem;

- The strange weather
- The albatross as a bird of good men
- Death and life-in-death
- The spirit from the land of mist and snow, and the two spirits the mariner hears in his trance
- The angelic spirits which move the bodies of the dead men
- The madness of the pilot and his boy
- The mariner's strange power of speech

The Rime of the Ancient Mariner has been acclaimed to be one of the many original works of Gothic literature because of its supernatural, horrific and romantic elements that are brought together within its narrative and language. The most dominant Gothic elements are the supernatural quality which can be found in the mariner's voyage, and also The Mariner's killing of the albatross, the terrifying death of his shipmates and the grotesque descriptions of the supernatural spirits are chief Gothic elements in the Rime of the Ancient Mariner that develop the story.

"Kubla Khan"

Summary

The speaker describes the "stately pleasure-dome" built in Xanadu according to the decree of Kubla Khan, in the place where Alph, the sacred river, ran "throu measureless to man / Down to a sunless sea." Walls and towers were raised around "twice five miles of fertile ground," filled with beautiful gardens and forests. A "deep romantic chasm" slanted down a green hill, occasionally spewing forth a violent and powerful burst of water, so great that it flung boulders up with it "like rebounding hail." The river ran five miles through the woods, finally sinking "in tumult to a lifeless ocean." Amid that tumult, in the place "as holy and enchanted / As e'er beneath a waning moon was haunted / By woman wailing to her demon-lover," Kubla heard "ancestral voices" bringing prophesies of war. The pleasure-dome's shadow floated on the waves, where the mingled sounds of the fountain and the caves could be heard. "It was a miracle of rare device," the speaker says, "A sunny pleasure-dome with caves of ice!"

The speaker says that he once saw a "damsel with a dulcimer," an Abyssinian maid who played her dulcimer and sang "of Mount Abora." He says that if he could revive "her symphony and song" within him, he would rebuild the pleasure-dome out of music, and all who heard him would cry "Beware!" of "His flashing eyes, his floating hair!" The hearers would circle him thrice and close their eyes with "holy dread," knowing that he had tasted honeydew, "and drunk the milk of Paradise."

Commentary

Along with "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner," "Kubla Khan" is one of Coleridge's most famous and enduring poems. The story of its composition is also one of the most famous in the history of English poetry. As the poet explains in the short preface to this poem, he had fallen asleep after taking "an anodyne" prescribed "in consequence of a slight disposition" (this is a euphemism for opium, to which Coleridge was known to be addicted). Before falling asleep, he had been reading a story in which Kubla Khan commanded the building of a new palace; Coleridge claims that while he slept, he had a fantastic vision and composed simultaneously—while sleeping—some two or three hundred lines of poetry, "if that indeed can be called composition in which all the images rose up before him as things, with a parallel production of the correspondent expressions, without any sensation or conscious effort."

Waking after about three hours, the poet seized a pen and began writing furiously; however, after copying down the first three stanzas of his dreamt poem—the first three stanzas of the current poem as we know it—he was interrupted by a "person on business from Porlock," who detained him for an hour. After this interruption, he was unable to recall the rest of the vision or the poetry he had composed in his opium dream. It is thought that the final stanza of the poem, thematizing the idea of the lost vision through the figure of the "damsel with a dulcimer" and the milk of Paradise, was written post-interruption. The mysterious person from Porlock is one of the most notorious and enigmatic figures in Coleridge's biography; no one knows who he was or why he disturbed the poet or what he wanted or, indeed, whether any of Coleridge's story is actually true. But the person from Porlock has become a metaphor for the malicious interruptions the world throws in the way of inspiration and genius, and "Kubla Khan," strange and ambiguous as it is, has become what is perhaps the definitive statement on the obstruction and thwarting of the visionary genius.

Regrettably, the story of the poem's composition, while thematically rich in and of itself, often overshadows the poem proper, which is one of Coleridge's most haunting and beautiful. The first three stanzas are products of pure imagination: The pleasure-dome of Kubla Khan is not a useful metaphor for anything in particular (though in the context of the poem's history, it becomes a metaphor for the unbuilt monument of imagination); however, it is a fantastically prodigious descriptive act. The poem becomes especially evocative when, after the second stanza, the meter suddenly tightens; the resulting lines are terse and solid, almost beating out the sound of the war drums ("The shadow of the dome of pleasure / Floated midway on the waves...").

The fourth stanza states the theme of the poem as a whole (though "Kubla Khan" is almost impossible to consider as a unified whole, as its parts are so sharply divided). The speaker says that he once had a vision of the damsel singing of Mount Abora; this vision becomes a metaphor for Coleridge's vision of the 300-hundred-line masterpiece he never completed. The speaker insists that if he could only "revive" within him "her symphony and song," he would recreate the pleasure-dome out of music and words, and take on the persona of the magician or visionary. His hearers would recognize the dangerous power of the vision, which would manifest itself in his "flashing eyes" and "floating hair." But, awestruck, they would nonetheless dutifully take part in the ritual, recognizing that "he on honey-dew hath fed, / And drunk the milk of Paradise."

Analysis of Kubla Khan as a Dream Poem

Coleridge's dream faculty is his strong point as a poet and he is a dreamer of dreams and his Kubla Khan(1798) is not the product of his observation but has come out from mysterious dreams. Coleridge himself claimed that the poem "Kubla Khan" was the product of a hallucinatory dream experienced after he had taken opium "in consequence of a slight indisposition." On awaking, he began to commit the experience to paper but was interrupted by "a person on business from Porlock." On returning to his desk, he found that the intensity of his impressions had faded. The poem claims to be "scattered lines and images" from a longer, forgotten work. Whether the story is true or not, the poem takes the unrecapturable nature of such dreams as its theme. It opens with sumptuous images of a mythic land, in which a powerful ruler orders the construction of a fabulous palace. It is an edifice of dream, a fragment of pure romance and a product of a dream rooted in imagination.

Apparently Kubla Khan lacks any logical coherence of ideas. It has the essence of poetry and dream because its aim is to delight, not to present the truth. Farther, it has procession of images which are Vague. All these romantic associations are concentrated within a short space to arouse a sense of wonder, mystery and awe. Such romantic images include ancient forests and hills, caverns which are measureless to man, spots of greenery, music of dulcimer, a damsel with a dulcimer, milk of paradise, a waning moon, and a woman waiting for her demon lover:

"But oh! That deep romantic chasm which slanted
Down the green hill athwart a cedern cover.
A savage place! As holy and enchanted.
As e'er beneath a waning moon was haunted
By woman wailing for her demon lover".

So to say, the images are not also linked logically. They come one after the other through association as happens in dreams. In first four lines Kubla Khan orders a palace to be built. In the ensuring four lines, it is built,

"In xanadu did Kubla Khan,
A stately pleasure dome decree"

With walls and tower girdled round
And there were gardens bright with sinuous rills"

In the midst of highly romantic description of landscape, the poet introduces an entirely different note:

"Ancestral voices prophesying war"

Farther when the dream is broken midway, the poet feels himself unable to give description of the pleasure dome. So the poet wishes romantically to revive within him the symphony and the song.

The poem has two parts. In the first part there is a record of the vision or dream. The second part is the poet's efforts to realize that dream and to build that dome in the air. In fact, Kubla Khan is the most perfect example of what might pleasure dome, its sacred river, its panting fountain, its caves of ice, its ecstatic figure with flashing eyes and floating hair, Kubla Khan is clearly a poem about poetic inspiration. Though symbolism and loose disconnections the poetic mood of ecstasy can not be missed in this poem. The organic links among the different parts of this poem is its symbolic unity which simultaneously defines a world of separation of head and heart, action and contemplation, the matter of fact world and the realm of imagination. The richness of this poem is its dream quality, multiple point of view and an apparent ambiguity.

There are temporary changes in the metre because the poem has dreamy origin. In this connection three points may be mentioned:

(i) There is irregularity of the rhymes.

(ii) There is unevenness of the lines

(iii) There are temporary changes.

As if the words images and visions are so loose and floating in the world of conscience which is best poetically revealed in the poem. For example:

"It was a miracle of rare device
A sunny pleasure dome with eaves of ice.
A damsel with a dulcimer
In a vision once I san".

Again Coleridge conveys the idea of harmony and order by imitating the word order of the Latin language, using strong single-syllable rhymes, and providing a percussive beat heightened by alliteration. The poem offers sensual images of an oriental paradise: There are "gardens bright with sinuous rills" and "many an incense-bearing tree". With a powerful sense of movement, the poem follows the progress of the river Alph in order to focus on a violent natural force beyond the palace walls: a "chasm, with ceaseless turmoil seething." Coleridge describes this place with a mass of contradictory adjectives: It is "holy," "enchanted," and "savage," its massive force like that of a living being. If, as literary critics have suggested, this place is a metaphor for the imagination, its blasts might be compared to Wordsworth's definition of the poetic process as "a spontaneous overflow of powerful feeling."

Possible Interpretations of Kubla Khan

If a man could pass through' Paradise in a Dream, & have a flower presented to him as a pledge that his Soul had really been there, & found that flower in his hand when he awoke -- Aye! And what then? Kubla Khan is a fascinating and exasperating poem written by Samuel Taylor Coleridge. Almost everyone, who has read it, has been charmed by its magic. It must surely be true that no poem of comparable length in English or any other language has been the subject of so much critical commentary. Its fifty-four lines have spawned thousands of pages of discussion and analysis. Kubla Khan is the sole or a major subject in five book-length studies; close to 150 articles and book-chapters have been devoted exclusively to it; and brief notes and incidental comments on it are without number.

Despite this deluge, however, there is no critical unanimity and very little agreement on a number of important issues connected with the poem: its date of composition, its meaning, its sources in Coleridge's reading and observation of nature, its structural integrity (i.e. fragment versus complete poem), and its relationship to the Preface by which Coleridge introduced it on its first publication in 1816. Coleridge’s philosophical explorations appear in his greatest poems. 'Kubla Khan', with its exotic imagery and symbols, rich vocabulary and rhythms, written, by Coleridge's account, under the influence of laudanum, was often considered a brilliant work, but without any defined theme. However, despite its complexity the poem can be read as a well-constructed exposition on human genius and art.

Throughout the nineteenth century and during the first quarter of the twentieth century Kubla Khan was considered, almost universally, to be a poem in which sound overwhelms sense. With a few exceptions (such as Lamb and Leigh Hunt), Romantic critics -- accustomed to poetry of statement and antipathetic to any notion of a great artist -- summarily dismissed Kubla Khan as a meaningless farrago of sonorous phrases beneath the notice of serious criticism. It only demonstrated, according to William Hazlitt, that Mr. Coleridge can write better nonsense verses than any man in England --and then he added, politically, it is not a poem, but a musical composition.

For Victorian and Early Modern readers, on the other hand, Kubla Khan was a poem not below but beyond the reach of criticism, and they adopted (without the irony) Hazlitt’s perception that it must properly be appreciated as verbalised music. When it has been said, wrote Swinburne of Kubla Khan, that such melodies were never heard, such dreams never dreamed, such speech never spoken, the chief thing remains unsaid, and unspeakable. There is a charm upon this poem, which can only be felt in silent submission of wonder. Even John Livingston Lowes -- culpable, if ever anyone has been, of murdering to dissect - insisted on the elusive magic of Coleridge's dream vision: For Kubla Khan is as near enchantment, as we are like to come in this dull world. While one may track or attempt to track individual images to their sources, Kubla Khan as a whole remains utterly inexplicable - a dissolving phantasmagoria of highly charged images whose streaming pageant is, in the final analysis, as aimless as it is magnificent.

There are, in short, as many different interpretations of Kubla Khan as there are critics who have written about it. Kubla Khan, a poem about poetic process Generally speaking, the most popular view by far is that Kubla Khan is concerned with the poetic process itself. What is Kubla Khan about? This is, or ought to be, an established fact of criticism: Kubla Khan is a poem about poetry. On this reading, the Tartar prince Kubla Khan, who causes a pleasure-dome and elaborate gardens to be constructed in Xanadu, is a type of the artist, whose glorious creation, as the ancestral voices from the deep caverns warn, is a precariously balanced reconciliation of the natural and the artificial. The dream of Xanadu itself is an inspired vision which expresses dramatically the very nature of vision: the fountain that throws up its waters from an underground ocean and so gives birth to the sacred river that meanders five miles through Kubla's hortus conclusus before sinking again into the subterraneous depths images the sudden eruption of the subconscious into the realm of the conscious mind and its eventual inevitable recession back into the deep well of the unconscious.

Kubla Khan records an early, perhaps largely unconscious, exploration of critical perceptions united only loosely in an inchoate theory of literature. Freudian Analysis a poem such as Kubla Khan - so provokingly enigmatic and so deliciously suggestive -also provides an irresistibly fertile ground for psychological speculation, especially of Freudian critics. When Coleridge called the poem a psychological curiosity in his 1816 Preface and confessed that Kubla Khan was the record of an actual dream, he unwittingly opened wide the door to analysts anxious to expound the latent psychological implications of his symphony and song. One of the earliest of the Freudian readings was offered in 1924 by Robert Graves, who proposed that Kubla Khan expressed Coleridge's subconscious determination to shun the mazy complications of life by retreating to a bower of poetry, solitude and opium - a serene refuge beyond the bitter reproaches of Mrs. Coleridge (the woman who is wailing for her demon lover) and almost beyond the gloomy prophecies of addiction uttered by the ancestral voices of Lamb and Charles Lloyd. By comparison with recent Freudian interpretations, this is pretty tame stuff. Nevertheless, it was enough to alert I.A. Richards almost immediately to the chilling possibilities of such an approach: The reader acquainted with current methods of [psychological] analysis, he warned, can imagine the results of a thoroughgoing Freudian onslaught.

In general, the Freudians treat Kubla Khan as an unconscious revelation of personal fantasies and repressed, usually erotic, urges; but there is little agreement about the precise nature of these subliminal drives. Douglas Angus argues that the poem illustrates psychoneurotic pattern of narcissism that reflects Coleridge's abnormal need for love and sympathy; Eugene Sloane, however, is convinced that Kubla Khan is an elaborate development of a birth dream, expressing an unconscious desire to return to the warmth and security of the womb (the hair in line 50, for example, is floating in amniotic fluid);and Gerald Enscoe finds the core of the poem's meaning in the unresolved struggle between two conflicting attitudes toward the subject of erotic feeling, i.e. the attitude . . .that the sexual impulse is to be confined within a controlled system is opposed to the anarchistic belief that the erotic neither should nor can be subjected to such control.

Still other readers prefer to follow Robert Graves by concentrating on what the poem implies about Coleridge's experience with opium: James Bramwell reads Kubla Khan as a dream-fable representing Coleridge's conscience in the act of casting him out, spiritually and bodily, from the paradise of his opium paradise; and Eli Marcovitz, who sets out to treat the poem as we would a dream in our clinical practice, confidently concludes that Kubla Khan is almost a chart of the psychosexual history of a personality ineluctably embarked on the road to addiction: It depicts the life of the poet -- his infancy and early childhood, the pleasures and deprivations of the oral period, the stimulation and dread of his oedipal period, the reaction to the death of his father at nine, the fear of incest and geniality with the regression to passive-femininity and morality, and the attempt to cope with his life's problems by the appeal to the muse and to opium.

Who would have supposed, without guidance, that so much repressed meaning was compressed into fifty-four lines? Even this brief sampling illustrates clearly enough the limitations and liabilities of using Freudian keys to unlock the mysteries of Kubla Khan. In the first place, of course, there is no received consensus (as we have just seen) about precisely what the poem reveals about Coleridge's subconscious mind. Nor is there agreement about the symbolic significance of the major images: is the stately pleasure-dome to be identified as the female breast (maternal or otherwise), or does it represent, as some think, the mons veneris? Similarly, what are we to make of the violent eructation of the fountain forced with ceaseless turmoil from the deep romantic chasm -- the ejaculation of semen, or the throes of parturition? And then there is the hapless Abyssinian maid, who has been variously identified as Coleridge's muse, as his mother, as Mary Evans (an early flame), as Dorothy Wordsworth, and (since Abyssinian damsels are Negroid) as the symbol of Coleridge's repressed impulse toward miscegenation.

A second and more serious problem with many Freudian readings, as the foregoing examples make clear, is a tendency to ignore basic rules of evidence and to indulge, as a consequence, in strained and unwarranted speculation. In one account, for example, we are asked (without irony) to believe that the last two lines of Kubla Khan point by indirection to fellatio, cunnilingus and deep oral attachment to the mother. Another analyst, James F. Hoyle, interprets Coleridge's enforced retirement to the farmhouse near Porlock as the neurotic person's 'vegetative retreat' to parasympathetic preponderance with over stimulation of gastrointestinal functions, resulting in diarrhoea -- and then, as if this were not enough, goes on to conclude that the costive opium taken to check the attack of dysentery probably helped in converting depression to hypomania and so was instrumental in transforming the diarrhoea of Coleridge's failure in poetry and life to the logorrhoea of Kubla Khan.

Literary criticism has more and more become a science of solutions. When a lurking mystery is discovered, analytical floodlights are trained upon it to dispel the shadows and open its dark recesses. But Kubla Khan, as Charles Lamb acutely perceived, is an owl that won't bear daylight. We must learn to take the poem on its own terms and, instead of attempting to salvage it by reducing it to a coherent substratum of symbols, we must reconcile ourselves to the fact that no single interpretation will ever resolve the complexities of so protean a product of the human imagination. Mystery and ambiguity, verisimilitude and teasing suggestiveness, are essential ingredients in Kubla Khan -- a poem which reflects, though darkly, Coleridge's largely subconscious ruminations on poetry, paradise, and the heights and depths of his own unfathomable intellectual and spiritual being. Kubla Khan is one of those ethereal finger-pointing so prized by Keats; it is a poem that has no palpable design upon us, and it provides at least one instance of an occasion on which Coleridge did not let go by a fine isolated verisimilitude caught from the Penetration of mystery, from being incapable of remaining content with half knowledge.

"Dejection: An Ode"

Summary

The speaker recalls a poem that tells the tale of Sir Patrick Spence: In this poem, the moon takes on a certain strange appearance that presages the coming of a storm. The speaker declares that if the author of the poem possessed a sound understanding of weather, then a storm will break on this night as well, for the moon looks now as it did in the poem. The speaker wishes ardently for a storm to erupt, for the violence of the squall might cure his numb feeling. He says that he feels only a 'dull pain," "a grief without a pang"—a constant deadening of all his feelings. Speaking to a woman whom he addresses as "O Lady," he admits that he has been gazing at the western sky all evening, able to see its beauty but unable fully to feel it. He says that staring at the green sky will never raise his spirits, for no "outward forms" can generate feelings: Emotions can only emerge from within.

According to the speaker, "we receive but what we give": the soul itself must provide the light by which we may hope to see nature's true beauty—a beauty not given to the common crowd of human beings ("the poor loveless ever-anxious crowd"). Calling the Lady "pure of heart," the speaker says that she already knows about the light and music of the soul, which is Joy. Joy, he says, marries us to nature, thereby giving us "a new Earth and new Heaven, / Undreamt of by the sensual and the proud."

The speaker insists that there was a time when he was full of hope, when every tribulation was simply the material with which "fancy made me dreams of happiness." But now his afflictions press him to the earth; he does not mind the decline of his mirth, but he cannot bear the corresponding degeneration of his imagination, which is the source of his creativity and his understanding of the human condition, that which enables him to construct "from my own nature all the natural man." Hoping to escape the "viper thoughts" that coil around his mind, the speaker turns his attention to the howling wind that has begun to blow. He thinks of the world as an instrument played by a musician, who spins out of the wind a "worse than wintry song." This melody first calls to mind the rush of an army on the field; quieting, it then evokes a young girl, lost and alone.

It is midnight, but the speaker has "small thoughts" of sleep. However, he hopes that his friend the Lady will be visited by "gentle Sleep" and that she will wake with joyful thoughts and "light heart." Calling the Lady the "friend devoutest of my choice," the speaker wishes that she might "ever, evermore rejoice."

Commentary

In this poem, Coleridge continues his sophisticated philosophical exploration of the relationship between man and nature, positing as he did in "The Nightingale" that human feelings and the forms of nature are essentially separate. Just as the speaker insisted in the earlier poem that the nightingale's song should not be called melancholy simply because it sounded so to a melancholy poet, he insists here that the beauty of the sky before the storm does not have the power to fill him with joy, for the source of human feeling is within. Only when the individual has access to that source, so that joy shines from him like a light, is he able to see the beauty of nature and to respond to it. (As in "Frost in Midnight," the city-raised Coleridge insists on a sharper demarcation between the mind and nature than the country-raised Wordsworth would ever have done.)

Coleridge blames his desolate numbness for sapping his creative powers and leaving him without his habitual method of understanding human nature. Despite his insistence on the separation between the mind and the world, Coleridge nevertheless continues to find metaphors for his own feelings in nature: His dejection is reflected in the gloom of the night as it awaits the storm.

"Dejection" was written in 1802 but was originally drafted in the form of a letter to Sara Hutchinson, the woman Coleridge loved. The much longer original version of the poem contained many of the same elements as "The Nightingale" and "Frost at Midnight," including the same meditation on his children and their natural education. This version also referred explicitly to "Sara" (replaced in the later version by "Lady") and "William" (a clear reference to Wordsworth). Coleridge's strict revision process shortened and tightened the poem, depersonalizing it, but the earlier draft hints at just how important the poem's themes were to Coleridge personally and indicates that the feelings expressed were the poet's true beliefs about his own place in the world.

A side note: The story of Sir Patrick Spence, to which the poet alludes in the first stanza, is an ancient Scottish ballad about a sailor who drowns with a boatload of Scottish noblemen, sailing on orders from the king but against his own better judgment. It contains lines that refer to the moon as a predictor of storms, which Coleridge quotes as an epigraph for his ode:

"Late, late yestreen I saw the new Moon
With the old Moon in her arms;
And I fear, I fear, my Master dear!
We shall have a deadly storm."

"Dejection an Ode" : Poetic Creative Process

The diverse features of Coleridge's verse discriminate him as the most inclusive representative of the English Romantic Movement of the early nineteenth century. His best poetry is very small in its bulk and is the product of a brief but amazing period of creative activity but it ranges among the rarest treasures of English Literature. We can segregate the major works of Coleridge into personal, political and romantic poems. "Dejection: An Ode" behaves as one of the personal poems. In this poem the poet expresses his sense of failure and sterility. "Dejection: An Ode", the last great poem is written by Coleridge, bewails the loss of creative powers.

"Dejection: An Ode" is written in a meditative mood. In fact, in this ode, he deplores the metaphysical strain in his thinking as responsible for the death of the poet in him. He has taken recourse to abstract philosophy, he says, in order to escape his grief, but metaphysical musing gradually becomes a habit with him and it slowly contaminates his poetic faculties. The motto of this poem is taken from the Ballad of Sir Patrick Spence printed by Thomas Percy. Percy's collection has already made a great impression on all the romantic poets.

In the first stanza, Coleridge through a clever use of images has suggested the chilling up of his poetic imagination. This has driven him to dejection and he feels a very dull pain in his heart. He longs for a violent storm that could invigorate his mind and at least, get him out of this pitiable condition. The poet would not like to indulge in self-pity in his poems. He would be happier if the lute were not to produce any sounds at all. The moon has a peculiar place in the poetic activity of Coleridge. According to Bowra, "Coleridge took the moon as 'a symbol of the poets' power to transform the material world into a world of imagination"

Here the moon overspread with a phantom light points to his dejection, a certain chilling of his springs of poetry. But we find there is a certain silver thread rimming and circling it. This should salvage the situation slightly. We might say that the creative powers instead of having been dried up permanently have been temporarily suspended. The poet wishes that the wind has already gained strength and changed into a fierce storm. The poet does not expect the storm to bring any relief from the pain. But at least it could give some sort of life to it, as it is the sluggish monotony of this pain, which is almost unbearable to the poet.

In the second stanza, the poet is not able to provide any natural outlet to his stifled, unimpassioned anguish. Throughout the peaceful evening, he has been gazing at the beautiful sights of nature but he thinks he has lost the capacity of feeling that beauty.

"A grief without a pang, void, dark and drear,
A stifled, drowsy, unimpassioned grief."

In these two lines the poet describes the nature of his heartache. It is a suppressed, sleepy, unaroused, passive kind of grief. It does not cause any piercing sensation in his heart, which appears to be just blank. His soreness is related to the "dull pain "mentioned in the last line of the first stanza.

"Might startle this dull pain and make it move and live!"

The sparkle or the dimness of the stars obviously corresponds to the fluctuations in the poet's soul. Even though bedimmed, the stars are "always seen". This corroborates our earlier understanding of the poem that the poet has not fully lost his poetic creativity. In the original version after taking about the "lake of blue", the poet speaks of "a boat becalmed". The becalming of the boat has a symbolic reference to the creative activity in Coleridge. The "fixed moon" also suggests the same thing.

In the third stanza, the natural cheerfulness of the poet has forsaken him. The real sources of passion and life are within and when they have dried up, merely eternal forms of beauty cannot raise his spirits. The poet's failure to respond to the 'yellow green light of the evening' has particularly disturbed him. He is shocked to realise that the outward forms are no longer capable of evoking his zest for life. Instead of helping him to recover his vitality, the external Nature makes him aware of his loss of feeling. Coleridge also feels that thinking and feeling are closely bound with each other. Lack of sensation makes his thinking also unproductive. Feeling beauty is a creative process; its real fountains lie within. But once the inward sources are desiccated, a certain loss of sensibility with regard to the physical objects appears quite inevitable.

In the fourth stanza, the moods that we see in nature are actually our own moods. Nature does not have any life of its own. It appears to be joyous or mournful in accord to the mood and feelings of an onlooker. This denotes that the outward forms of Nature are created by man with the assistance of his own imagination. The outward forms present a gloomy spectacle if we are caught in a web of sorrows, then even a tranquil scene of colourful evening portends a mighty storm, as happens in the case of Coleridge. Seeing is thus coloured with feeling. What Coleridge is lamenting in this poem is the fact that his seeing is not charged with his feeling. He notices beauty but he does not feel it. It should be observed that in these lines, Coleridge is contending against the Wordsworthian doctrine of the influence of Nature. Earlier he has shared Wordsworth's belief in a beneficent power of Nature, healing and spiritualizing all those who care for her. However, with his own shaping spirit of imagination gone, he finds it impossible to derive strength from nature. We have already seen how the poet believes that the mystic colouring of one's inner life animates every object of nature. This type of intuition that can shape nature is denied to the "poor loveless ever anxious crowed". Though the crowed is devoid of love and joy yet nature gets its life from the beholder's own amorous feelings. The loveliness of Nature as well as the sweetness of its sounds is torn by a convulsion; it can create only an equally disastrous seizure in the external nature. This is the mood in which the poem begins.

In the fifth stanza, the source of light and glory that can invest the earth with loveliness and sweetness is joy. This delight can be experienced only by the pure in their purest hour. This joy enables one to see a new earth and new heaven which the proud and the sensual can never witness. In the previous stanza, the poet has talked of 'a fair, luminous cloud' and 'a sweet and potent voice' that must emanate from one's soul and envelop the whole earth if one is to see something "of higher worth" in Nature, that would otherwise remain an "inanimate cold world". Continuing the same theme, the poet says that this "fair, luminous mist" and this "strong music in soul" are not only beautiful themselves but they also have a beauty making power. They can make the external objects of Nature look beautiful. Then addressing Sara, he says that it is not necessary for her to enquire what exactly the source of this glory and this music is. Coleridge has not explained the nature of this joy but it is clear that it is a creative principle having moral implications. Nature is just cold and inanimate the beauty we see in it actually exists within our soul. The source of this beauty is joy. So joy is a kind of creative principle. Only the pure hearted and virtuous people like Sara can experience it. The artist cannot create anything in its absence.

In the sixth stanza, there was a time when the poet was capable of experiencing this joy; then he was full of hope. He could weave dreams of happiness even out of his misfortunes. But now his joy is gone and his shaping spirit of imagination has greatly declined. He takes to abstract philosophy and metaphysics as an escape from his grief but this has stifled the poet in him. The poet recalls the time when he can experience joy in spite of the fact that his life is full of sorrows and impediments. So indomitable is his joy within that he cares little for his sufferings. Coleridge says that his only resource against his increasing melancholy is deliberately to divert his mind from his feelings to cultivate a quiet mode of life and to immerse himself in deep metaphysical studies, in the hope of changing his nature and conquering his excessive sensitiveness.

In the seventh stanza the poet dismisses his depressing thoughts and turns his attention to the various sounds being made by the wind. To begin with, the wind appears to be screaming with agony. Next, these sounds appear to be similar to the one produced by a retreating army. Finally, he feels that the wind is producing a moaning sound like the one made by a little girl who has lost her way. The wind appears to the poet as an actor adept in producing all kinds of tragic sounds. Humphrey House believes that Dejection: An Ode is not a whole poem. His argument is that 'the opening of stanza VII especially, and its placing and relevance are serious obstacles to accepting the poem as a whole.

Humphrey House thinks that this stanza opens with a sudden twist of thoughts, in a very awkward language. The poet addresses the wind as a reckless musician and says that in this mouth of showers, of dark brown gardens, of peeping flowers, of blossoms, buds and tremulous leaves, it is producing sounds worse than the ones heard during the bleak months of winter, as if it is celebrating a devil's Christmas. The sounds produced by wind remind the poet of the devils howling and shrinking in malicious joy. As the poet thinks of this tale about a lost girl, we feel that there is a slight awakening of his genial spirits, which he says, has failed him:

> "My genial spirits fail;
> And what can these avail,"

His imagination is activated and his feelings are awake. Now his imagination has created for him a complex unity of grief, fear and delight.

In the eighth stanza, the poet concludes with a prayer for Sara. May gentle sleep visit her! Then next morning, may she get up with a light and cheerful heart! May she experience joy! Addressing the 'Lady', the poet says that we recline from Nature only what we give it. The poem concludes with the prayer that joy may raise her spirits and sweeten her voice, that all things may be the manifestation of her life and may exist for her sake, and that she may be blessed with enduring happiness.

Coleridge's attitude to Nature as depicted in the Ode to Dejection is radically different from the attitude he held earlier under the persuasive influence of Wordsworth. Wordsworth, with his affect and encouragement, stimulated Coleridge's creative imagination. He feels his inner vitality being fructified and life assumes some meaning for him. This fills his heart with joy, which makes him perceive joy all around and in the company of Wordsworth. Nature ceases to be the physical manifestation of a divine spirit capable of exerting a moral and educative influence. It is reduced into just a lifeless mass.

Themes of Coleridge's Poetry

The Transformative Power of the Imagination: Coleridge believed that a strong, active imagination could become a vehicle for transcending unpleasant circumstances. Many of his poems are powered exclusively by imaginative flights, wherein the speaker temporarily abandons his immediate surroundings, exchanging them for an entirely new and completely fabricated experience. Using the imagination in this way is both empowering and surprising because it encourages a total and complete disrespect for the confines of time and place. These mental and emotional jumps are often well rewarded. Perhaps Coleridge's most famous use of imagination occurs in "This Lime-Tree Bower My Prison" (1797), in which the speaker employs a keen poetic mind that allows him to take part in a journey that he cannot physically make. When he "returns" to the bower, after having imagined himself on a fantastic stroll through the countryside, the speaker discovers, as a reward, plenty of things to enjoy from inside the bower itself, including the leaves, the trees, and the shadows. The power of imagination transforms the prison into a perfectly pleasant spot.

The Interplay of Philosophy, Piety, and Poetry: Coleridge used his poetry to explore conflicting issues in philosophy and religious piety. Some critics argue that Coleridge's interest in philosophy was simply his attempt to understand the imaginative and intellectual impulses that fueled his poetry. To support the claim that his imaginative and intellectual forces were, in fact, organic and derived from the natural world, Coleridge linked them to God, spirituality, and worship. In his work, however, poetry, philosophy, and piety clashed, creating friction and disorder for Coleridge, both on and off the page. In "The Eolian Harp" (1795), Coleridge struggles to reconcile the three forces. Here, the speaker's philosophical tendencies, particularly the belief that an "intellectual breeze" (47) brushes by and inhabits all living things with consciousness, collide with those of his orthodox wife, who disapproves of his unconventional ideas and urges him to Christ. While his wife lies untroubled, the speaker agonizes over his spiritual conflict, caught between Christianity and a unique, individual spirituality that equates nature with God. The poem ends by discounting the pantheist spirit, and the speaker concludes by privileging God and Christ over nature and praising them for having healed him from the spiritual wounds inflicted by these unorthodox views.

Nature and the Development of the Individual: Coleridge, Wordsworth, and other romantic poets praised the unencumbered, imaginative soul of youth, finding images in nature with which to describe it. According to their formulation, experiencing nature was an integral part of the development of a complete soul and sense of personhood. The death of his father forced Coleridge to attend school in London, far away from the rural idylls of his youth, and he lamented the missed opportunities of his sheltered, city-bound adolescence in many poems, including "Frost at Midnight" (1798). Here, the speaker sits quietly by a fire, musing on his life, while his infant son sleeps nearby. He recalls his boarding school days, during which he would both daydream and lull himself to sleep by remembering his home far away from the city, and he tells his son that he shall never be removed from nature, the way the speaker once was. Unlike the speaker, the son shall experience the seasons and shall learn about God by discovering the beauty and bounty of the natural world. The son shall be given the opportunity to develop a relationship with God and with nature, an opportunity denied to both the speaker and Coleridge himself. For Coleridge, nature had the capacity to teach joy, love, freedom, and piety, crucial characteristics for a worthy, developed individual.

Motifs of Coleridge's Poems

Conversation Poems: Coleridge wanted to mimic the patterns and cadences of everyday speech in his poetry. Many of his poems openly address a single figure—the speaker's wife, son, friend, and so on—who listens silently to the simple, straightforward language of the speaker. Unlike the descriptive, long, digressive poems of Coleridge's classicist predecessors, Coleridge's so-called conversation poems are short, self-contained, and often without a discernable poetic form. Colloquial, spontaneous, and friendly, Coleridge's conversation poetry is also highly personal, frequently incorporating events and details of his domestic life in an effort to widen the scope of possible poetic content. Although he sometimes wrote in blank verse, unrhymed iambic pentameter, he adapted this metrical form to suit a more colloquial rhythm. Both Wordsworth and Coleridge believed that everyday language and speech rhythms would help broaden poetry's audience to include the middle and lower classes, who might have felt excluded or put off by the form and content of neoclassicists, such as Alexander Pope, Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, and John Dryden.

Delight in the Natural World: Like the other romantics, Coleridge worshiped nature and recognized poetry's capacity to describe the beauty of the natural world. Nearly all of Coleridge's poems express a respect for and delight in natural beauty. Close observation, great attention to detail, and precise descriptions of color aptly demonstrate Coleridge's respect and delight. Some poems, such as "This Lime-Tree Bower My Prison," "Youth and Age" (1834), and "Frost at Midnight," mourn the speakers' physical isolation from the outside world. Others, including "The Eolian Harp," use images of nature to explore philosophical and analytical ideas. Still other poems, including "The Nightingale" (ca. 1798), simply praise nature's beauty. Even poems that don't directly deal with nature, including "Kubla Khan" and "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner," derive some symbols and images from nature. Nevertheless, Coleridge guarded against the pathetic fallacy, or the attribution of human feeling to the natural world. To Coleridge, nature contained an innate, constant joyousness wholly separate from the ups and downs of human experience.

Prayer: Although Coleridge's prose reveals more of his religious philosophizing than his poetry, God, Christianity, and the act of prayer appear in some form in nearly all of his poems. The son of an Anglican vicar, Coleridge vacillated from supporting to criticizing Christian tenets and the Church of England. Despite his criticisms, Coleridge remained defiantly supportive of prayer, praising it in his notebooks and repeatedly referencing it in his poems. He once told the novelist Thomas de Quincey that prayer demanded such close attention that it was the one of the hardest actions of which human hearts were capable. The conclusion to Part 1 of Christabel portrays Christabel in prayer, "a lovely sight to see" (279). In "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner," the mariner is stripped of his ability to speak as part of his extreme punishment and, consequently, left incapable of praying. "The Pains of Sleep" (1803) contrasts the speaker at restful prayer, in which he prays silently, with the speaker at passionate prayer, in which he battles imaginary demons to pray aloud. In the sad poem, "Epitaph" (1833), Coleridge composes an epitaph for himself, which urges people to pray for him after he dies. Rather than recommend a manner or method of prayer, Coleridge's poems reflect a wide variety, which emphasizes his belief in the importance of individuality.

Symbols of Coleridge's Poems

The Sun: Coleridge believed that symbolic language was the only acceptable way of expressing deep religious truths and consistently employed the sun as a symbol of God. In "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner," Coleridge compares the sun to "God's own head" (97) and, later, attributes the first phase of the mariner's punishment to the sun, as it dehydrates the crew. All told, this poem contains eleven references to the sun, many of which signify the Christian conception of a wrathful, vengeful God. Bad, troubling things happen to the crew during the day, while smooth sailing and calm weather occur at night, by the light of the moon. Frequently, the sun stands in for God's influence and power, as well as a symbol of his authority. The setting sun spurs philosophical musings, as in "The Eolian Harp," and the dancing rays of sunlight represent a pinnacle of nature's beauty, as in "This Lime-Tree Bower My Prison."

The Moon: Like the sun, the moon often symbolizes God, but the moon has more positive connotations than the sun. In "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner," the sun and the moon represent two sides of the Christian God: the sun represents the angry, wrathful God, whereas the moon represents the benevolent, repentant God. All told, the moon appears fourteen times in "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner," and generall things occur during night, in contrast to the horrors that occur during the day. For example, the mariner's curse lifts and he returns home by moonlight. "Dejection: An Ode" (1802) begins with an epitaph about the new moon and goes on to describe the beauty of a moonlit night, contrasting its beauty with the speaker's sorrowful soul. Similarly, "Frost at Midnight" also praises the moon as it illuminates icicles on a winter evening and spurs the speaker to great thought.

Dreams and Dreaming: Coleridge explores dreams and dreaming in his poetry to communicate the power of the imagination, as well as the inaccessible clarity of vision. "Kubla Khan" is subtitled "A Vision in a Dream." According to Coleridge, he fell asleep while reading and dreamed of a marvelous pleasure palace for the next few hours. Upon awakening, he began transcribing the dream-vision but was soon called away; when he returned, he wrote out the fragments that now comprise "Kubla Khan." Some critics doubt Coleridge's story, attributing it to an attempt at increasing the poem's dramatic effect. Nevertheless, the poem speaks to the imaginative possibilities of the subconscious. Dreams usually have a pleasurable connotation, as in "Frost at Midnight." There, the speaker, lonely and insomniac as a child at boarding school, comforts himself by imagining and then dreaming of his rural home. In his real life, however, Coleridge suffered from nightmares so terrible that sometimes his own screams would wake him, a phenomenon he details in "The Pains of Sleep." Opium probably gave Coleridge a sense of well-being that allowed him to sleep without the threat of nightmares.

Chief Characteristics of Coleridge as a Romantic Poet

Romanticism, in art, is European and American movement extending from about 1800 to 1850. Romanticism cannot be identified with a single style, technique, or attitude, but romantic painting is generally characterized by a highly imaginative and subjective approach, emotional intensity, and a dreamlike or visionary quality.

S. T Coleridge is one of the most prominent writers of Romantic Movement. The chief characteristics in his poetry are; supernaturalism, element of mystery, fertile imagination, dream quality, medievalism, love of Nature, meditative note, humanitarianism, music and narrative skill which distinguish Coleridge's poetry as the most complete representative of the English Romantic poetry of the early nineteenth century. We can take these characteristics of his poetry one by one:

Supernaturalism: Supernaturalism is something that is above and beyond what is natural; events which cannot be directly explained by known laws and observations. Exploration of the occult (supposedly supernatural or magic) and of infinity, mysticism, and numerology (study of the supposed influence of number) are some other manifestation of the intense desire of man to know what exists or lies beyond the finite mind. Imaginative and inventive fiction and poetry have been created upon this appeal. This element of supernaturalism is found in the three major works of Coleridge, 'The Ancient Mariner', 'Kubla Khan' and 'Christabel". The outstanding quality of Coleridge's supernaturalism, however, is that his writings do not excite one's senses to a feverish pitch and do not remain remote from human reality. He is capable of creating the still, sad music of humanity. In his supernaturalism we do not find any kind of crudeness as is found in other poets Horace and Monk Lewis. He replaced the crudeness with suggestiveness. He did not portray horror, he suggested it. Both in the cases of the Night-mare Life-in-Death and the serpent woman Geraldine, he resists the temptation of depicting their hideous monstrosity. He conveys the gruesomeness (horrification) of Life-in-Death in a few suggestive lines.

Her lips were red, her looks were free
Her locks were yellow as gold

Her skin was white as leprosy
The Night-mare Life-in-Death was she
Who thicks Man's blood with cold.

Or through the Mariner's response to her

Fear at my heart, as at a cup
My life-blood seemed to sip.

In the same manner the repulsiveness (unpleasantness) of Geraldine's ugly bosom is conveyed through a clever suggestion,

A sight to dream of, not to tell!
O shield her! Shield sweet Christabel!

Coleridge has successfully kept the reality of supernatural phenomena by avoiding the descriptions of details. He deepens his effect by mystery surrounding it. Along with this Coleridge's supernaturalism has essentially psychological truth in it. The supernatural touches in 'Kubla Khan' or 'The Ancient Mariner' are so managed that they are in perfect harmony with the mental and emotional moulds of the characters as well as the readers. The ancestral voices heard by Kubla Khan prophesy war. The poet in his poetic frenzy is capable of building supernatural awe in the minds of the readers when the people coming see his castle see his flashing eyes and waving hair and draw a circle around him thrice to keep them safe from this man who has been fed on honey and dew and drank the milk of paradise. The supernatural drama of the 'The Ancient Mariner' catches hold of the readers' sub-conscious mind. This is, however, noteworthy that Coleridge like Homer and Shakespeare makes the element of supernaturalism the part of a wider scheme which is intimately related to living human experience. The central idea of the need of human love and compassion with man, bird and beast and the entire creation of God and the painful experience caused by their absence is so intensely human that even the supernatural character of the events cannot becloud its truthfulness.

Element of Mystery or Mysteriousness; Mysteriousness is that condition in which some character, event or situation remains hidden and is not revealed to the usual vision or common understanding. It is not completely known but makes its presence feel to the people. Coleridge possesses an unusual gift of evoking the mystery of things. The Ancient Mariner is made a mysterious character just by the mention of the glittering eyes long grey beard and skinny hands. Geraldine's sudden appearance in an unexpected circumstance makes her mysterious. Her being beautiful exceedingly also makes her mysterious. But Coleridge uses this faculty most effectively by keeping alive the ordinary natural phenomena intact. The blowing of the winds and the twinkling of stars assume a mysterious character. Mast-high ice sending a dismal sheen and making cracking and growling sound is bound to appear mysterious. Similarly mysterious is found in the death fires dancing in red and rout and water burning green, blue and white like a witch's oils. The romantic chasm in 'Kubla Khan' is given a touch of mystery by the mention of the 'woman wailing for her demon love.'

Fertile and Rich imagination: Imagination is a mental faculty of framing images of external objects which are not present to the five senses. It is a process of using all the faculties so as to realize with intensity what is not perceived, and to do this in a way that integrates and orders everything present to the mind so that reality is enhanced thereby. Coleridge in his 'Biographia Literaria' writes of imagination thus; 'The power reveals itself in the balance or reconcilement of opposite and discordant qualities of sameness, with the differences of the general; with the concrete; the idea with the image; the individual with the representative; the sense of novelty and freshness with old familiar objects; a more than usual state of emotion with more than usual order. We see that Coleridge's imagination has all these qualities to a superb order.

Coleridge is gifted with the most fertile and vigorous imagination among all the Romantic Poets. It is by this rich and fertile imagination that he is able to create his perplexing mystery. In this respect he goes ahead of Wordsworth who was too conscientious to describe or present those things that were not seen personally by him. Coleridge, on the other hand, was able to describe and present those things which he came across during his vast study through his faculty of imagination. He had the faculty of presenting such unseen and inexperienced things so vividly as if those had been literally present before his eyes. He presents the place of Kubla Khan's palace as he was practically present there, 'here Kubla Khan commanded a palace to be built and a stately garden there unto. And thus ten miles of fertile ground was enclosed with a wall,' set imagination on fire and we can have vivid picture of Kubla Khan's stately pleasure dome. According to the great Greek critic Longinus, a great writer is that one who has the capability of transporting the reader to his own imaginative world. Coleridge, no doubt, was bestowed with this quality. Not only this, he had the rare skill to create an imaginary world, changed it into imaginative and then transformed it to a make-belief condition. The world created by Coleridge in his whole poem of 'The Ancient Mariner' is the best example of this faculty of Coleridge. J.L. Lowes' book 'The Road to Xanadu' amply illustrates how Coleridge's imagination could transform simple facts collected during his reading into something mysterious and wonderful.

Dream Quality: Dream quality is a quality of imagining while asleep. It is a process of or a sequence of images that appear involuntarily to the mind of a sleeping person, often a mixture of real and imaginary characters, places and events. The major poems of Coleridge have a strange dream like atmosphere about them. Dreams with him are no shadows. They are the very substance of his life. He fed on his dreams and vitalized him in his poems. 'Kubla Khan' is essentially a dream poem recounting in a poetic form what he saw in a vision. 'The Ancient Mariner' displays a dream- like movement. C.M Bowra in the 'Romantic Imagination' illustrates the affinity of 'The ancient Mariner' with a dream. 'On the surface it shows many qualities of a dream,' he says. 'It moves in abrupt stages each of which has its own single dominating character. Its visual impressions are remarkably brilliant and absorbing. Its emotional impacts change rapidly but always come with unusual force as if the poet were hunted and obsessed by them. When it is all over, to cling to the memory with a peculiar tenacity (tending to stick firmly)just as on waking it is difficult at first to disentangle (get freed) ordinary experience from influences which still survive from sleep.' The dramatic texture (structure) of Coleridge's poems gives them a kind of twilight vagueness intensifying their mystery.

Medievalism: Medievalism means devotion to the Middle Ages, a devotion to the spirit of beliefs of the Middle Ages. Coleridge's love for supernatural led him to the exploration of Middle Ages. He was fascinated by the romance and legends associated with them. 'The Ancient Mariner' 'Christable' and 'Kubla Khan' are all wrought with the glamours of Middle Ages. But it should be kept in mind that Medievalism does not form the substance of his poems. It gives them the much needed sense of remoteness and offers a fit setting for the marvelous which is Coleridge's purpose to hint at or openly display.

Love of Nature: Nature means a physical world including all natural phenomena and living things. It also means a force that is represented before man in the form of beautiful scenes. Wordsworth is stated to be communicating new order of experience for which Nature serves us a point of departure and there was not such an experience in English poetry before his time. Coleridge shows for Nature the same loving devotion as we find in Wordsworth. But Bowra rightly points out that his eye for Nature is for its more charms and less obvious appeals and he takes richer and more luxurious pleasure in those aspects of Nature that can present a dramatic and mysterious look. Whether his descriptions are based on his personal experiences or on what he has read, he never fails to give them a semblance of truth. The bergs around the skiff or the single sudden stride of a tropical night are scenes that he could not have seen, but they look a lively and realistic as the fire wild torrents actually seen by him rushing down the sides of the hoary, majestic sky. He can evoke the richness of colour as well as the magical associations of sound much better than any other poet. And he is equally successful both in giving graphic descriptions and in achieving broad generalized effects. In his earlier attitude towards Nature, he had a pantheistic view and also accepts it as a moral teacher, but later he comes to believe that it is we who invest Nature with life and it simply reflects our own moods. This later stage of his attitude towards Nature is the stage when he says in 'Dejection: An Ode.'

O Lady! We receive but what we give,
And in our life alone doth Nature live
Ours is her wedding garment, ours her shroud!

Meditative Note: Meditative thinking is the result of reflective and speculative temper. It is a philosophic bent of mind. Coleridge was amply gifted with this quality. This tendency of mind was present even in his early age which made him to do serious reading. He was especially impressed by the German philosophers Kant and Schiller. 'Dejection: An Ode' is also written in a meditative mood in which he deplores the loss of imaginative power because of the metaphysical strain in his thinking. The verses in 'The Rime of the Ancient Mariner' (which also hint at the theme of the poem) clearly reflects his meditative mind when he says;

'He prayth well, who loveth well
Both man and bird and beast.'

He prayth best, who loveth best
All things both great and small
For the dear God who loveth us
He made and loveth all.;

Humanitarianism: Humanitarianism means the love of humanity and a commitment to improving the lives of others. We find humanitarianism in Coleridge's poetry. Both he and Wordsworth strongly supported the French Revolution in the hope that it would free the masses from the tyranny of the dictators. But they were miserably disappointed in their hope. When Coleridge discovered that the revolutionists were perverting or violating the very principles they had stood for, he did not hesitate to denounce them in his,; French : An Ode'. His love of humanity is expressed in different poems and also in the moral of 'The Ancient Mariner' when he says

'He prayth well who loveth well
Both man and bird and beast'

Music: Music is the art of arranging sounds, the art of arranging or making sound, usually those of musical instruments or voices, in groups and patterns that create a pleasing or stimulating effect. It can be presented in the written form indicating pitch, duration, rhythm, and tone of notes to be played. 'Coleridge is always a singer', says H.D. Traill. Court Hope also agrees that there is a tendency to approximate the art of poetry to the art of music. Coleridge's musical genius can best be seen in such poems as 'The Ancient Mariner', 'Christable', 'Kubla Khan' and 'Youth and Age'. 'The Ancient

Mariner' has woven cunning sound patterns with the help of internal rhyme or of clever use of alliteration

The ice was here, the ice was there
The ice was all around
It cracked and growled, and roared and howled
Like noises in the swound!

The internal rhyme and the alliterative effect in the following lines is note worthy

'The fair breeze blew, the white foam flew
The furrow followed free
We were the first that ever burst
Into that silent sea.'

The musical quality in 'Christable' and 'Kubla Khan' puts the reader into a hypnotic spell.

Narrative skill: Narrative skill is the art of telling a story or giving an account of a sequence of events in the order in which they happened. Coleridge is superb in the art of storytelling. He knows how to create suspense or to evoke interest in the narrative. In 'The Ancient Mariner' he invests the Mariner with a hypnotic power in order to raise our curiosity in his story. And he introduces his events very dramatically. By bringing the specter –ship gradually closer to view, a hush of expectancy is created before death and Life-in-Death are dramatically brought on the scene to determine the fate of the Mariner. The dropping down of his two hundred sailor companions one by one after the killing of Albatross and their souls going out making a whiz sound of the cross bow produces a very dramatic effect. The wedding guest's interruptions are used to high light the climatic moments. All these devices give the poem an incomparable narrative beauty.

The above are the characteristics that distinguish Coleridge from other romantic poets and make him the most complete representative of the English Romantic poetry of the early nineteenth century.

Medievalism in S.T Coleridge

Introduction: - Medievalism means devotion to the Middle Ages, a devotion to the spirit of beliefs of the Middle Ages. Coleridge's love for supernatural led him to the exploration of Middle Ages. He was fascinated by the romance and legends associated with them. 'The Ancient Mariner' 'Christabel' and 'Kubla Khan' are all wrought with the glamours of Middle Ages. But it should be kept in mind that Medievalism does not form the substance of his poems. It gives them the much needed sense of remoteness and offers a fit setting for the marvellous which is Coleridge's purpose to hint at or openly display.

Medievalism in Coleridge's Poetry: - The scene set in distant times and remote places. The three important poems in which Coleridge has made use of the supernatural are 'The Ancient Mariner, Christabel and Kubla Khan. It is significant that in all the three poems, Coleridge takes us to distant times and remote places. The remoteness of scene in all the three poems is quite deliberate. Medieval times are associated with magic and witchcraft. The appearance of an evil spirit in Sir Leoline's castle does not strike us as improbable nor do we feel any inappropriateness in Kubla Khan's hearing ancestral voices prophesying war amidst the tumultuous noises heard from the fountain as well as the cavers measureless to man. The moment the poet effects temporal and spatial remoteness, the rigorous logic governing the familiar world of reality is suspended and the poet feels free to create a new logic in a comparatively new world.

There is much of medievalism in the works of almost all the romantic poets, with the exception of Wordsworth. The romantics inclined towards the distant and the remote in preference to the homely and familiar. Coleridge who mainly dealt with supernatural subjects was all the more attracted by the legends and romances of the Medieval times. The people were superstitious and they had a real faith in the supernatural. The Middle Ages, thus, provided Coleridge not only with his themes but also offered appropriate setting and atmosphere for the enactment of those themes. All the important poems of his, 'The Ancient Mariner' 'Christabel,' 'Kubla Khan' and 'Love' are wrought with the glamour of the Middle Ages.

'The Ancient Mariner' does not employ the medieval atmosphere as completely as 'Christabel,' where we have moat-castles, (castles having ditches around it) feudal lords, serpent6 women, and bards and pages. Still whosoever will read 'The ancient Mariner' a little careful reader will not fail to notice the medieval touches generously given to it. The very opening line, 'It is an Ancient Mariner' strikes the key-not of the poem. The word 'ancient' not only refer to the old age of the Mariner but immediately distinguishes him as belonging to the olden times. The reader is thus warned at the outset to be ready to be wafted to distant times. The reader is thus warned at the outset to be ready to be wafted (floated gently) to distant times. The ceremonials and rituals hinted at in the beginning are connected with the medieval church. The 'loud bassoon', the 'merry minstrelsy' and 'the blushing bride, suggest a medieval wedding, when measures were danced and wine flowed in rounds, and songs and ballads were sung with great enthusiasm and joy. Moreover, the ship, the masts, the oars, the sails, the Pilot and the Pilot's boy, and the lighthouse – all point to the past. The sailors, like people in the Middle Ages, are a superstitious set. They believe in portent (omen) and omens. They take the Albatross to be a bird of good omen, and condemn the Mariner for having killed it. The moral theme of the poem consisting in the catholic idea of redemption through penance or expiation is also medieval in spirit. The cross-bow with which the Mariner shoots the Albatross was also used in the Middle Ages.

Coleridge Medievalism also includes the following elements which are closed connected to one another. Those are Supernaturalism, Dream-like Quality, Love of Nature, Fertile and rich Imagination the element of Mystery and Mysteriousness and a very effective and impressive Narrative Skill.

Supernaturalism: - Coleridge's romanticism in the sense of his artistic rendering of the supernatural phenomena. Although it has not the same level of supernaturalism as is found in 'The Rime of the Ancient Mariner', or 'Christabel; yet the supernatural in the poem stand out quite conspicuously, (easily availably). The woman waiting for her demon lover and the ancestral voices prophesying war; are obviously supernatural occurrences. The poetic frenzy of an inspired poet borders on the supernatural. The tumultuous rise of the river Alph from a deep romantic chasm is also given an unmistakable supernatural touch. But what is remarkable about 'Kubla Khan' is the convincing presentation of the supernatural elements. The description of the landscape is so vivid and precise; the similes used for the mighty fountain so homely (plain) and familiar that it does not occur to the reader that anything incredible is being described. The psychological truth hidden behind Kubla Khan's hearing ancestral voices prophesying war or the representation of the poet as a super human being make these facts acceptable.

Love of Nature: - Nature means a physical world including all natural phenomena and living things. It also means a force that is represented before man in the form of beautiful scenes. Wordsworth is stated to be communicating new order of experience for which Nature serves us a point of departure and there was not such an experience in English poetry before his time. Coleridge shows for Nature the same loving devotion as we find in Wordsworth. But Bowra rightly points out that his eye for Nature is for its more charms and less obvious appeals and he takes richer and more luxurious pleasure in those aspects of Nature that can present a dramatic and mysterious look. Whether his descriptions are based on his personal experiences or on what he has read, he never fails to give them a semblance of truth. The bergs around the skiff or the single sudden stride of a tropical night are scenes that he could not have seen, but they look a lively and realistic as the fire wild torrents actually seen by him rushing down the sides of the hoary, majestic sky. He can evoke the richness of colour as well as the magical associations of sound much better than any other poet. The dramatic texture (structure) of Coleridge's poems gives them a kind of twilight vagueness intensifying their mystery.

Element of Mystery or Mysteriousness: - Mysteriousness is that condition in which some character, event or situation remains hidden and is not revealed to the usual vision or common understanding. It is not completely known but makes its presence feel to the people. Coleridge possesses an unusual gift of evoking the mystery of things. We can say that Coleridge's Medievalism does not take us only to remote and distant places and men but has within it the other qualities of the poet's art like supernatural, fertile imagination, dream-quality, an effective and impressive narrative skill and his love of Nature.

Supernaturalism in S.T. Coleridge

Samuel Taylor Coleridge is one of the fabulous poets of Romantic Movement in English literature. His thoughts are philosophical. But his style is simple and clear. Supernaturalism is his special field. He writes about supernatural elements and events and describes what is unseen and beyond nature. But he describes them in such a way that they appear nature and life like. He differs from his contemporaries, Lewis, Mrs. Radcliff and poet, who create horror by showing reshaped and horrible paces. He on the other hand, creates horror by creating horrible atmosphere. He is a great artist.

It is true that what is best in Coleridge's poetry is very small in amount but that little is of great value. He seems to have more interest in describing supernatural element. But his greatness lies in the fact that he describes them in such a way that looks to be natural and life like.

What is the supernatural? Though the ages phenomena which could not be explained by the know laws of nature have been attributed to supernatural powers and influences. If these happenings led to the benevolent powers; if or the contrary they resulted in suffering and misery, they were ascribed to evil spirits literature has continuously been enriched by stories in which the supernatural plays an important part. The desire of hearing about the miraculous is as strong in the civilized man as it was in his primitive ancestors, as it is in the native child. The folklores of all ages and countries abound in tales of magic, fairies, spirits ghosts and demons however be explained by the laws of science and that seem to involve gods or music.

The interest in the supernatural was an important aspect of the romantic spirit that appeared in the eighteenth century. The fashionable cult of the strangeness turned inevitably to this alluring world of the unknown and exploited it with a reckless carelessness. To Coleridge the supernatural appealed with a special power.

Samuel Taylor Coleridge's poems "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner", 'Kubla Khan' and "Christable" are the precious assets of the English literature for supernatural elements. These are the poems that made him immortal in the world of literature.

"The Rime of The Ancient Mariner" is a poem in the romantic tradition with high imagination and supernatural elements. But at the same time Coleridge has put a moral lesson for his readers in the poem. He shows that any crime, big or small cannot go unpunished. Again, with true love the suffering soul may be purified and regenerated.

As a poet of the romantic tradition, Coleridge has put the supernatural in his poem "The Rime of The Ancient Mariner", He put it perhaps to satisfy the taste of ordinary people of his day, we find every details of a sea voyage, the condition, the climate of the sea and the mariners on board. But at the same time there are so much incidents and scenes in the poem that cannot be believed with reason. Coleridge has created a willing suspension of disbelief here.

The Ancient Mariner is a tale of a curse which the narrator, the Mariner himself, brings upon himself and his companions by killing an Albatross without reason. Coleridge's power of handling the supernatural is like the pure music of his verse. The moral of the poem is one of all-embracing love. This poem is full of moral teachings for human beings. Humphry House expresses his agreement with three great critics, Dr. Tillyard, Dr. Bowra, and Robert Penn Warren, that the poem has a very serious moral and spiritual effect on human life. The moral of the ancient Mariner's story is that one should love all God's creatures.

Coleridge is regarded as the greatest poet of the supernatural in English literature and The Ancient Mariner is regarded as a masterpiece of supernatural poetry. His supernatural is controlled by thought and study. Cazamian says, "The very center of Coleridge art lies in his faculty of evoking the mystery of things, and making it actual, widespread, and obsessing. Even better than Wordsworth, he knows how to handle that species of the supernatural whose essence (spirit) is entirely psychological. The supernatural element in The Ancient Mariner is a hallucination, the outcome of remorse; by the most sober of method." His skill in dealing with the supernatural in this poem is two-fold: first, he has fully achieved his aim of making the supernatural appear to be natural; and, second, he has employed suggestive, psychological, and refined (sophisticated) methods of producing the feelings of mystery and horror in the poem, not crude and sensational like that of the writers before him, i.e. Horace, Walpole, Mrs. Radcliffe, and Monk Lewis. The greatness of The Ancient Mariner lies chiefly in the technique by which the supernatural has been made believable and convincing. There are, no doubt, a number of impossible, incredible, and fantastic situation in the poem, such as: the mesmeric (magnetic) power in the mariner's gaze, the sudden appearance of the mysterious skeleton ship, the spectre woman and her mate, the coming back to life of the dead crew, the seraph-band making signals to the land, the sudden sinking of the ship, and the polar spirit commenting on or influencing the course of events. But these supernatural phenomena are so skillfully blended with the perfectly believable and natural phenomena that the whole looks real. The sun shinning brightly at the outset, the mist and snow, the freezing cold of the polar regions, the floating ice bergs floating in the water, the torrid (very hot) fierceness of stagnant water, the slimy things crawling on the sea, the moon going up the sky, the roaring wind, the rainfall—such are the natural phenomena in the poem. The realistic effect is enhanced by a description of the state of mind of the ancient mariner; that is how he tried to pray but he could not, how lonely he felt on a wide, wide sea, how he wanted to die but in vain (useless), how he suffered mental and spiritual anguish (torture). This psychological study of the mariner adds to the realistic effect because we are made to feel that any man would suffer in the same way under similar circumstances.. Again, the details of the ship's voyage have such a diary-like air that we accept them as a faithful recording of facts. There is, too, the logic of cause and effect in the poem. The punishment and torture have a convincing cause behind them.

The realistic effect achieved by Coleridge in The Ancient Mariner is one his great achievements which make the poem not only convincing and exciting but also in some sense a criticism of life. There are a large number of situations and episodes in The Ancient Mariner, which fill us either with a sense of mystery or a feeling of horror or with both. The first situation that strikes terror in the heart of the Mariner (and also the reader) is the appearance of the skeleton-ship. When this skeleton-ship is sighted in the distance, the sailors feel happy to think that they will now get water to quench their burning thirst. But in a few moment they discover the reality of this ship. The description of the ship with its "ribs" and its "gossamere-like sails" fill us with terror. It is a strange mystery that this ship should sail on the sea without wind and without a tide, while the Mariner's ship stands still "like a painted shop upon a painted ocean". Obvi supernatural force, which drives the ship, and the crew also consists of supernatural characters. The feeling of terror is heightened when a reference is made to the crew of this ship. The crew consists of Death and Life-in-Death. But Coleridge creates the sense of horror in this poem not by describing a direct and crude description but by employing suggestive and psychological methods. For instance, he does not describe the physical features of the spectre woman and her death mate or other external phenomena at length, but he simply portrays the effect of those external things on the mariner's mind. The appearance of Life-in-Death is described in the following three lines: Her lips were red, her looks were free, Her locks were yellow as gold: Her skin was as white as leprosy. (Lines 190-92) These three lines are followed by these two: The night-mare Life-in-Death was she, Who thicks man's blood with cold. (lines 193-94) Coleridge, after giving us only three lines of description, conveys the horror by saying that the sight of her would have the effect of freezing a man's blood. In other words, he leaves it to us to imagine for ourselves the horrible appearance of Life-in-Death that personifies the unspeakable torture of a man who cannot die.

Coleridge merely offers a few suggestions to be developed by the reader himself. The effect of the skeleton-ship with Death and Life-in-Death on board again conveyed to as by the following two lines:

"Fear at my heart, as at a cup,
My life-blood seemed to sip!"

That is, instead of giving us a detailed description of the whole horrible sight, Coleridge refers to the effect of that horrible sight upon the mind of the Mariner and says that fear sipped his life-blood. Another situation that produces horror in the poem is the death of the two hundred sailors who dropped down one by one, and each of them looked at the ancient Mariner with a curse in his eyes:

"One after one, by the star-dogged Moon,
Too quick for groan or sigh,
Each turned his face with a ghastly pang,
And cursed me with his eye."

The ancient Mariner heard a whiz-like sound every time a soul left its body:

"The souls did from their bodies fly,—
They fled to bliss or woe!
And every soul, it passed me by,
Like the whiz of my cross-bow!"

What a horrible experience it must have been for the ancient Mariner and how horrible for the reader too. The agony and spiritual torture of the lonely ancient Mariner on a wide wide sea when he could not pray or die are, perhaps, the most terrifying and horrifying elements in the poem. The following stanzas convey some of the horror of the Mariner's state:

"I looked upon the rotting sea,
And drew my eyes away;
I looked upon the rooting deck,
And there the dead men lay.
I looked to heaven, and tried to pray;
But or ever a prayer had gusht,
A wicked whisper came, and made
My heart as dry as dust."

What makes the situation still more horrifying is that the curse in dead men's eyes had never passed away: "The look with which they looked on me Had never passed away." "Seven days, seven nights, I saw that curse, And yet I could not die." Here, again, no ugly details are provided. We are to imagine the horror of the situation ourselves. We shudder (tremble) with fear to think of the Mariner who is left alone after seeing "four times fifty living men" dropping down one by one, "with heavy thump, a lifeless lump." It is at this stage that the Weeding-Guest begins to experience a sensation of fear because he thinks that the Marines himself must also have dropped down dead and that it is the Mariner's ghost who is now speaking to him and so he says:

'I fear thee, ancient Mariner!
I fear thy skinny hand!
....
I fear thee and thy glittering eye,
And thy skinny hand, so brown.'

Next, the groaning, stirring, and coming back to life of the dead crew must have been a terrifying experience for the ancient mariner till he discovered that the bodies were inspired not by their original souls but by a troop of angelic spirit. We are certainly terrified when we read:

"The dead men gave groan,
They groaned, they stirred, they all uprose,
Nor spake, nor moved their eyes;"

"They raised their limbs like lifeless tools
We were a ghastly crew."

In real life, if a dead man happens to open his eyes (because he has not really died), all the mourners get terribly frightened and run away helter-skelter. In this case two hundred dead men got up on their feet and started working at the oars.

The horror of the situation can well be imagined. Again, towards the close of the poem, the poet wishes to tell us how horrifying the Mariner's face appeared after he had undergone his strange adventures. The poet does not describe the features the face; he simply describes the effect of the face upon the Pilot's mind:

"I moved my lips—the Pilot shrieked
And fell down in a fit;"

In other words, the Mariner's face was ghastly like the face of a dead man, and it struck so much terror in the Pilot's heart that the Pilot fainted. The Pilot must have thought that the Mariner was not a human being but some horrible spectre. The effect on the Pilot's boy was that he went crazy with fear:

"I took the oars: the Pilot's boy,
Who now doth crazy go,
Laughed loud and long, and all the while
His eyes went to and fro."

As for the Hermit, he too was terrified but, being a holy man, he sought courage from God:

"The holy Hermit raised his eyes,
And prayed where he did sit."

The Hermit is, indeed, badly shaken and, on stepping forth from the boat, could scarcely stand because of fear:

"The Hermit stepped forth from the boat,
And scarcely he could stand."

In a nervous state of mind, the Hermit asks the Mariner to tell him immediately what manner of man he is. In short, the horror of the Mariner's face is conveyed to us through the reactions of the Pilot, the Pilot's boy, and the Hermit. Coleridge's treatment of the supernatural is quite different from that of such writers as Horace, Walpole, Mrs. Radcliffe, and Monk Lewis. The difference between Coleridge and the others is the difference between the maker of horror and the maker of horrors. Coleridge creates the atmosphere of mystery and fear by indefiniteness and by subtle suggestion, while the others employ crude description and they pile horrors in order to send a cold shiver down the reader's spine and to curdle the reader's blood. The theme of this poem is crime, punishment and reconciliation. In this poem the Mariner did not act but was only acted upon and he was the recipient rather than the doer. He is the recipient of the odd and of the fate. There is a tragic flaw for the Mariner as the killing of the bird starts his suffering. The suffering endured by the Mariner is due to killing the bird that represents imagination, and by killing the bird the Mariner kills the imagination and the loss of the imagination is a kind of death. The Mariner suffers mentally and spiritually, and he is isolated. Then in his suffering, he sees water snakes and blesses them, which eventually releases his suffering.

The ancient mariner is the story of a real life sea voyage pervaded by a supernatural atmosphere. There is an strangeness in the hypnotic eyes of the mariner, the spectral ship with death and nightmare life in death as its crew dicing or the deck, the winds that sound but never come near, the polar spirits entering the corpses of the mariners and activating them, and the mariners ship sinking mysteriously with a thundering sound coming from under the water. Terror is produced by Coleridge's ability to provide visual descriptions of striking vividness. The story with its supernatural accounts is obviously incredible, but within this frame work there is the human reality.

"God save thee, ancient mariner
From the fiends, that plague you thus!"

Here Coleridge vividly presents the supernatural issues by dwelling upon the hideous relations on the face of the mariner. This is the indirect way of treatment of the supernatural, Coleridge was perhaps aware of the fact that such supernatural scenes would not be accepted or believed by his readers. Hence he has dealt with the reactions of the persons that we experience.

'And some is dreams assured were
Of the spirit that plagued us so
Nine fathom deep he had followed us
From the land of mist and snow.'

Then comes the appearance from nowhere of the skeleton ship with gossamer-like sails, carrying death and life in death engaged in a gambling contest. This ship sails on the sea without wind or tide and it disappears as suddenly as it had appeared. The stanza where this incident is described as horrifying in their effect upon us and sends a cold shiver down our spine. The manner of the death of all the sailors except the ancient mariner is supernatural. There is something supernatural about the way in which the dead body of the albatross automatically falls down from the ancient mariner's neck into the sea. The moving of the ship upon the sea without a wind is supernatural

'A speck, a mist, a shape, I wist!
And still it neared and neared;
Asif it dodged a water-sprite,
If plunged and tacked and veered.'

In these lines the ancient mariner describes the gradual approach of the skeleton ship. He and his companions had passed a long and weary time, in thirst and loneliness. One day, looking towards the western sky, where the sun was setting, the ancient mariner saw a strange sight. At first the thing appeared like a den in the moving piece of mist; it was still to indistinct to be clearly distinguished.

Then as it came still nearer, the mariner found it had a definite shape-it was a ship, it was moving so fast that it appeared to be escaping from the pursuit of a water spirit. Besides, its course was very unsteady. The strange behavior of the ship made the ancient mariner think that the ship was trying to escape from a water spirit that was pursuing it to take revenge.

The poet skillfully suggests the supernatural nature of the ship. The ship of the ancient mariner was becalmed for there was no wind and tide, but in the same sea there was another ship which was moving fast and very fast. How could the second ship move thus, without wind or tide, unless there was something supernatural about it.

"Kubla khan" by Samuel Taylor Coleridge is one of the most mysterious and ambiguous piece of literature ever written. Allegedly written after a laudanum induced dream, the author claims to have been planning a two hundred to three hundred line poem before he got interrupted by a man. This is partly true, as the language seems often in genial Christianity.

Coleridge's philosophy in life was very romantic and so nearly all of his poems exemplify the romantic idea, especially "Kubla Khan". This romantic poem uses brilliant imagery and metaphors to contrast the ideals of romantic paganism with often in genial Christianity. The vision of paganism is the first idea introduced in the poem. The supernatural reference to "Alph" or Alpheus as it is historically known.

"The sacred river ran
Though caverns measureless to man
Down to a sunless sea"

The river Alph is directly related to the Greek god Alpheus, who the river god. According to Greek mythology, a pagan belief, the god Alpheus had fallen in love with Arethusa the daughter of Nereus and a Hesperides. This again adds to the supernatural quality of the poem.

Suggestiveness is the basic feature of Coleridge's supernaturalism. It is true that a very vivid and graphic description of the surrounding of the pleasure-dome is given in the poem but the supernatural element is suggestive. Coleridge is a superb artist for intermingling the natural and supernatural so that the probable and the improbable interfuse. Here are lines which for sheer suggestiveness and mystery are perhaps unsurpassed.

"A savage place: as holy and enchanted
As e'er beneath a waiting moon was haunted
By woman wailing for her demon-lover"

A complete story of love's tragedy is hidden in these three lines. And then the following two lines:

"And mid this tumult Kubla heard from for Ancestral voices prophesying war!"

The poet in these lines, describes the visionary landscape of the palace of Kubla Khan. Kubla Khan, the mighty emperor ordered to build a pleasure dome. The poet says that the place is a wild one which may be awe-inspiring. Again this is holy and magic land. The influence of magic seems to be there. This place says Coleridge is visited repeatedly by a woman to find out her lover who is a demon. Under the fading light of the waning moon she looks for her lover and wails. These lines are full of dream elements that run through the whole poem. Coleridge's supernaturalism is at its height as he describes a mysterious and terrible landscape.

In lines, 37-46, Coleridge here presents a visionary scene where a maiden is playing her musical instrument and singing. The poet says in these lines, describes the visionary landscape of the palace of Kubla Khan. The poet says that once he saw in a vision or dream that an Abyssinian girl was playing on a musical instrument called dulcimer. The maid was also singing a wonderful song that charmed the poet. If he could remember that music he could build a pleasure-dome in the air, with his inspired poetry. The poem here gets a supernatural touch with the maid and her musical instrument. The maid is Abyssinian and her instrument is a dulcimer which is from faraway place and time.

'For he on honey-dew hath fed,
And drunk the milk of paradise.'

The poem here gets a supernatural touch with boney dew and milk of paradise. These are the foods of magicians and by taking them he could get the supernatural quality himself.

However Coleridge never forgets that his real purpose was to make the supernatural natural and to bring about the "willing suspension of disbelief which constitutes poetics faith." Whether Kubla Khan is seen as a poem about poetic creativity or about life, it is a convincing work.

Coleridge made the supernatural as the region and haunt of his genius and shows the way to its most artistic use. There are two ways of treating the supernatural, one external and decorative and the other suggestive and psychological. In the first the supernatural horrors may be multiplied through a number of direct and vivid descriptions, in the second they may be subtly suggested and intensified through the depiction of their effect on the human victim. Coleridge knew how to handle that type of the supernatural whose essence is entirely psychological. He creates an atmosphere of mystery and horror by using supernatural elements. The influence of the supernatural has been brought to bear not only on human nature but or phenomenal nature also. Coleridge makes the natural seem supernatural by attributing to nature something of the special power and proficiency of the supernatural. Coleridge is best known for his haunting ballad, Rime of the Ancient Mariner, the dream like Kubla Khan and the unfinished Christabel. He used supernatural elements vastly in his three best known poems and supernaturalism gives him a new identity.

S.T Coleridge's Willing Suspension of Disbelief

No phrase in the language has acquired such wide and universe popularity, and has had such a profound impact on subsequent literary theory as Coleridge's phrase, "Willing suspension of disbelief", which he used to indicate the nature of poetic dramatic illusion. All through the Neo-classics era the question of dramatic illusion and credibility had exercised the mind of critics, and the observance of the unities was considered essential for, their violation puts too severe a strain on the credibility of the audience and thus dramatic illusion is violated. The topic was hotly debated and both Dryden and Dr. Johnson have expressed their views on it, views which are in advance of those of their contemporaries. However, it was Coleridge who said the last word on the subject, and finally put the controversy at rest.

Coleridge uses the phrase in connection with his account in Chapter XIV of the Biographia Literaria of the origin and genesis of the Lyrical Ballads. He writes,

“In this idea originated the plan of the Lyrical ballads; in which it was agreed that my endeavours should be directed to persons and characters supernatural or at least romantic; yet so as to transfer from our inward nature a human interest and a semblance of truth sufficient to procure for these shadows of imagination that willing suspension of disbelief for the moment which constitutes poetic faith”.

Thus he was to treat of characters supernatural, which are incredible and improbable and which under normal circumstances we would not believe in but the treatment was to be such that as long as we were reading his poems, there would be, “a willing suspension of disbelief”, and we would believe for the moment in what is essentially incredible and improbable. In other words, the treatment should be such as would send the judgment of readers to sleep, so that they would pursue the poem with delight.

In Chapter XXIII of the Biographia Literaria he explains himself further and writes:

“The poet does not require us to be awake and believe; he solicits us only to yield ourselves to a dream; and this, too, with our eyes open, and with our judgment pursue behind the curtain, really to awaken us at the first motion of our will, and meantime, only, not to disbelieve”.

The poet sends our judgment to sleep, for as long as we are reading his word or seeing his play. He does not ask us to believe in what is presented to our mind; he only requires that we should not disbelieve. Only a momentary suspension of disbelief is required for an enjoyment of imaginative literature. We are not under any illusion that it is reality; only, for the moment, there is a voluntary remission of judgment, we enjoy what we dream of. Similarly, the poet, if he is sufficiently skilful, sends our judgments to sleep so that we neither believe nor disbelieve, it to be reality, but merely enjoy what is presented to the mind’s eye. Our reason, or rational judgment, our consciousness, is in voluntarily suspension and this suspension of judgment enables us to enjoy what is in our waking moments when the spell is broken, we would condemn as incredible. Distancing in time and place, humanizing of the marvelous and the supernatural, etc., are some of the devices used to procure such, “willing suspension of disbelief”.

Further light on Coleridge's views in this connection is thrown through a comparison with the view of Dr. Johnson. Dr. Johnson was of the view that the reader or the spectator deludes himself into believing a play to be a reality, as long as he is witnessing it. The spectator knows, “from the first to the last that the stage is only a stage and that the players are only players”. But knowingly he deludes himself and regards it as the reality. Not unlike Johnson, Coleridge is of the view that it is not in this state that a tale or play is enjoyed, or that the reader or the spectator allows himself to be deluded even temporarily, to be able to enjoy it. On the contrary, he just takes leave of his judgment for the time being. ‘The true stage-illusion consists not in the mind’s judging it to be a forest, but in its remission of the judgment that it is not a forest’. While Dr. Johnson believed that the spectator is in full exercise of his judgment and knows that what is being presented to him is not reality, Coleridge believes that the spectator does not voluntarily exercise his judgment for the time being. His critical faculty is asleep so to say. Thus Coleridge’s position is a middle one: the spectator or the reader c actively believe nor disbelieve. His judgment is in a state of suspension for the time being. Voluntarily he is persuaded not to exercise it as long as he is reading a poem or witnessing a play. Imaginative literature owes its appeal to such suspension of disbelief.

What is Apocalypse and how it is manipulated in the Rime of Ancient Mariner Apocalypse is a situation in which a lot of people die or suffer and a lot of damage is done. Apocalyptic is warning people about terrible events that will happen in future. The Rime of Ancient Mariner contains apocalyptic and natural symbolism that dominates the core of the poem. The Biblical symbolism found in this poem mainly reflects the apocalypse as it deals with the Mariner's revelation that good will triumph over evil, and his acceptance of all nature as God's creation.

William Blake

William Blake—Life and Works

The Family: William Blake, mystic, poet, and artist, was born in London on November 28, 1757. His father was a hosier, living at 28, Broad Street, Golden Square. The family consisted of four sons and a daughter, William being the second son, and the only one to achieve distinction. The eldest, James, succeeded his father in the hosiery business. The third, John, died young after leading a dissolute life. The youngest, Robert, who showed considerable capabilities as an artist, was greatly loved by William, and was nursed by him through the illness of which he died at the age of 21. Another boy, Richard, died in infancy.

Early Training and Poetical Attempts: William showed his artistic tastes at an early age. At the age of ten he was sent to a drawing school in the Strand. At fifteen he was apprenticed to an engraver. He also made drawings of the monuments in Westminster Abbey. He was greatly influenced by the Gothic style. His creative faculty found an outlet in the early years in poetry, some of which has survived in the thin volume of Poetical Sketches, printed for him by his friends in 1783. These pieces were composed between his 12th and 20th years.

As a Professional Engraver: In 1779 Blake set out to earn his living as a professional engraver. He did a lot of work in this line for the booksellers and publishers. During the next twenty years or so he supported himself largely by this means.

Marriage: In 1781 Blake met Catherine Boucher, the illiterate daughter of a market-gardener, and married her in August, 1782. She made a perfect wife for him. She learned to draw and paint well enough to be able to help him in his work. She remained childless, and survived him by four years, dying in 1831.

A New Method of Printing: During the years 1783-87 Blake met a number of distinguished persons, but this society soon disgusted him, and he ridiculed it in a satire known as An Island in the Moon written in 1785. In 1788 he began to experiment with a new method of printing from etched copper-plates. It is related that the secret of this process was revealed to him in a vision by the spirit of his brother Robert. The first results of this process were the small dogmatic works: There is No Natural Religion and All Religions are One. It developed further with the production of Songs of Innocence, which consisted of simple lyrical poems etched on copper with decorations coloured by hand.

The volume was finished in 1789 and was sold for a few shillings. This was the prelude to the remarkable series of books in "illuminated printing" which occupied Blake in some degree for the rest of his life.

Mysticism and Philosophy: Blake was now living in Hercules Road, Lambeth. Here he completed the works entitled The Book of Thel (1789); The Marriage of Heaven and Hell (1793); America (1793); Visions of the Daughters of Albion (1793); Songs of Experience (1794); Europe (1794); Urizen (1794); The Book of Los (1795); The Book of Ahania (1795); and The Song of Los (1795).

During this period Blake was deeply under the influence of his visionary powers, and mysticism and philosophy emerged as his dominant interests.

Colour-prints: Blake's output as an artist was considerable. In 1795 he produced his stupendous series of large colour prints which can scarcely be matched in the whole history of art for imaginative content and magnificence of colouring. These include "Nebuchadnezzar", "The Elohim Creating Adam", and "Newton". By 1797 he had completed his series of 537 water-colour designs for Young's Night Thoughts.

The Problem of Earning a Livelihood: Blake's circle of friends had become a little wider now, and included Thomas Butts. It was chiefly Butts's patronage which enabled Blake to earn a livelihood while devoting much time and energy to his symbolical works which never produced any adequate return by their sales. He even laboured over a long poem, The Four Zoas. It is a poem of the greatest significance for the understanding of Blake.

Life and Work at Felpham: During the seven years from 1793 to 1800, Blake's creative output was enormous. In 1800, Blake moved with his wife and sister, from London to Felpham in Sussex in order to work at some engravings for William Hayley. But three years later he returned to London with a great sense of relief. At first he had been able to work happily enough at Felpham, but soon he became more and more irritated by Hayley's patronizing airs and lack of understanding. He also experienced much spiritual discomfort at Felpham because of the visions that he incessantly saw. He was forced to lead a double life, submitting on the surface to Hayley's vanities and developing in secret his own imaginative faculties. The Felpham period was, therefore; a strangely mixed output of second-rate engravings for Hayley, of fine paintings, and of mystical poetry of great power, which was mostly embodied in the poem Milton. In January,1804 Blake was tried on a false charge of having used treasonable words against the King, and was acquitted.

Association with Cromek: In 1805 Blake joined the engraver Cromek in a scheme for the production of a series of engravings for Robert Blair's The Grave. But here he was again deceived; Cromek paid him a small sum for the designs, and then employed another man to engrave them. Blake, already embittered by neglect, felt still more embittered and suffered from fits of depression.

The Failure of His Exhibition: In 1809 Blake held an exhibition of his works at the house of his brother James in Broad Street, Golden Square. Sixteen pictures were exhibited, including his large painting of Chaucer's Canterbury pilgrims, and each visitor to the house received for his entrance to the house a copy of the now celebrated "Descriptive Catalogue". The exhibition attracted very little notice, the only criticism of it, which appeared in Leigh Hunt's The Examiner being malicious and unfair.

Years of Obscurity: During the years that followed, Blake fell into complete obscurity. It is not known for certain how he earned his living during 1810-17. It has even been suggested that for part of this period he was confined to a mental hospital. Some of his acquaintances, such as Robert Southey, who visited him in 1811, did regard him as insane. But his intimate friends were convinced that he was not at all mad. Throughout this period he was occasionally selling copies of his illuminated books. He also executed engravings for various employers. He was occupied, too, with the 100 etched plates of his greatest symbolical poem, Jerusalem.

"Illustrations of the Book of Job": In 1818, Blake entered upon the last phase of his life, and until his death in 1827 was probably happier with his friends and in his work than he had been at any other period. He was now able to obtain more work, and became the centre of a circle of young artists who regarded him with affection and reverence. In 1821, Blake moved from South Molton Street to 3, Fountain Court, Strand, and here he executed his most widely known work in creative art, the "Illustrations of the Book of Job". Though superficially illustrations of the Bible story, the engravings form one of the most important of Blake's symbolical works. Their mystical content has not prevented the designs from being the most widely known and generally appreciated of his works.

Illustrations of the "Divine Comedy", and Death: Blake was to make one more great effort in his art. In October, 1825, he was asked to make illustrations of Dante's Divine Comedy and to engrave them. He completed a hundred water-colour designs, of which seven were engraved, and he was still at work upon these when he died on the 12th August, 1827. He was buried in an unmarked grave in Bunhill Fields Cemetery, the approximate place being now indicated by a tablet placed there.

Blake's Character: Blake suffered from the defects of his qualities. His mind was never systematically cultivated. His qualities isolated him from his contemporaries and drove his mind upon itself, so that the interpretation of his message to mankind cannot be made with accuracy. But through all his mental turmoil and difficulties in dealings with his fellow men he preserved his intellectual integrity, and he never prostituted his art. Throughout his life he tried to exalt the things of the mind, and for him the imagination was man's highest faculty. Ceaselessly he fought against materialism. He was deeply religious, though in no conventional sense. In his later years Christ became identified in his mind with Art, and this fact provides many clues for the understanding of his doctrines. But perhaps the most illuminating revelation of his mind for most readers are the aphorisms and didactic statements which he engraved about the year 1820 around a representation of the Laocoon group.

Conclusion: Blake was not much understood by his contemporaries. He influenced them as little as he was influenced by them, and for many years after his death his name was unknown. His first full biography, written by Alexander Gilchrist, was published in 1863, and was reprinted under the supervision of D.G. Kossetti in 1880. Since that time his power and originality have gained fuller recognition, and he now holds a position as one of the greatest figures in English poetry and art. A bronze bust of him was placed in the Poets' Corner in Westminster Abbey in November, 1957 to mark the bicentenary of his birth. Many of his pictures are to be seen in the Tate Gallery, London, and collections of his illuminated books in the British Museum.

A Brief Survey of William Blake's Poetry

Saw Spiritual Presences: William Blake, though a poet and a mystic of the most extraordinary genius, had little or no influence on his generation. The greater part of his message was so obscure, so wild, so incoherently delivered, that even now, after much study, his commentators have succeeded in making clear only a portion of what he wrote. He belonged to that type of mind which in superstitious ages is described as being '"possessed". When a very young child he one day screamed with fear because, he said, he had seen God put His face to the window. In boyhood he saw several angels, very bright, standing in a tree by the roadside. In his manhood, the earth and the air were for him full of spiritual presences, all concerned with his fate or with that of his friends.

His Visual Imagination: With a metaphysical gift which made it natural for Blake to move in an ideal world, he combined a visual imagination of abnormal, almost miraculous power, which enabled him to give bodily form to abstractions, and to summon at any moment before him "armies of angels that soar, legions of demons that lurk.'' Outwardly he led a regular, quiet, laborious life, all the while pouring out poems, drawings, and vast "prophetical books" full of shadowy mythologies and mystical thought-systems which show that his inward life was one of perhaps unparalleled excitement and adventure.

His Fame as a Poet: Aside from the prophetical works, such as The Book of Thel and The French Revolution, his fame as a poet rests chiefly on his Poetical Sketches (1783) and on his Songs of Innocence (1789) and Songs of Experience (1794). These little volumes contain some of the simplest and sweetest as well as some of the most powerful short poems in the language. At his best, Blake has a simplicity as great as Wordsworth's, and a magic which reminds us of Coleridge, combined with a depth and pregnancy of meaning peculiar to himself. In him the whole transcendental side of the Romantic Movement was expressed by hint and implication, if not by accomplishment.

Poetical Sketches": The most admirable of Blake's poems are to be found in his earlier volumes—Poetical Sketches (1783), Songs of Innocence (1789), and Songs of Experience (1794). These contain matchless lyrics, which show him as almost entirely apart from the 18th century influence and conventions. His models—as far as he has any—are the Elizabethans, though, in Poetical Sketches, there are some pieces of rhythmical, poetic prose, whose inspiration is Macpherson. In four lyrics on the seasons in this volume he describes Nature symbolically; others of the poems are ballads; others are dainty little poems which might almost have come from an Elizabethan; while others, again, with their talk of the "more than mortal fire (that) burns in (his) soul", sound the note of the visionary, a note to grow deeper and deeper later on.

"Songs of Innocence" and "Songs of Experience": Songs of Innocence and Songs of Experience are companion collections of lyrics, in which there are many pairs of poems, each in a different mood. In Blake's words they were meant to show "the two contrary states of the human soul". The tone of the first series is admirably sounded by the introductory "Piping down the valleys wild". The volume contains such lovely lyrics as The Lamb, Infant Joy, Cradle Song, and Holy Thursday, recording the happy procession of charity children to St. Paul's Cathedral, and the picture of The Chimney Sweeper in which little "Tom was happy and warm". But, in the companion series, the happy-songs are changed. The symbol is no more the Lamb, "woolly bright", image of Christ, but the Tiger, "burning bright in the forests of the night"; and Blake asks: "Did he who made the Lamb make thee?" Holy Thursday is now viewed in the light of experience, and the procession of the children no longer gives the poet joy; but he is miserable to see so many poor babes "fed with cold and usurous hand". The Chimneysweeper, too, is nowseen "clothed in the clothes of death"; and Blake is bitter against those who go "up to the Church to pray" while the misery of the innocent is around them.

"Auguries of Innocence": The rest of Blake's poetic work does not have the same appeal. Auguries of Innocence, found in manuscript, is not great poetry, but it is the expression of his love of all creatures which makes him hate those who put "a robin redbreast in a cage" or hunt the hare, and of his intense mysticism in which he sees all the world as symbolical of spiritual verities:

> To see a world in a grain of sand,
> And a Heaven in a wild flower,
> Hold Infinity in the palm of your hand,
> And Eternity in an hour.

"Thel": Thel, in unrhymed rhythmical lines, has much lyrical beauty. Thel, "youngest daughter of the Seraphim", laments until comforted by the Lily of the Valley, the Cloud, and the Worm.

Prophetic Books: The prophetic books were "dictated" to Blake by spirits. Some have seen a coherent symbolism in them, but to the ordinary reader they are a non- sensical chaos, broken by flashes of fine lyric or prose sentences enshrining in condensed expression deeply philosophical thoughts. There is the well-known lyric in Milton in which concludes thus:

Bring me my bow of burning gold!
Bring me my arrows of desire!
Bring me my spear! O clouds, unfold!
Bring me my chariot of fire.
I will not cease from mental strife,
Nor shall my sword sleep in my hand,
Till we have built Jerusalem
In England's green and pleasant land.
Marriage of Heaven and Hell

In the prose work called Marriage of Heaven and Hell we have among the Proverbs of Hell the following: "He whose face gives no light, shall never become a star." "The road of excess leads to the palace of wisdom". "Exuberance is beauty." Though his oracular sayings are generally hard to interpret, intense spiritual thinking lies behind them.

Blake’s World-View

Platonism: Blake was influenced in part by the views of Plato for whom the physical world is an imperfect reflection of a perfect spiritual world beyond this (what Plato calls the world of Ideal Forms or Essences). From this point of view, every physical object (e.g. a horse) is a reflection or imitation of a perfect or ideal form or essence (‘horseness’).

Christianity: Another important influence upon Blake is the Bible. He was very taken by the view of classic Christian thinkers like St. Augustine and St. Thomas Aquinas, among others, that this world is the handiwork of God. If we are to know God, we need to study his physical handiwork which allows us, albeit most often only fleetingly, to intuit the spiritual world beyond this and, by extension, the Creator himself. Blake was of the view that this world is less the imperfect physical reflection or mirror of a perfect spiritual world beyond this (Plato’s view) than the multifarious ‘expression’ or manifestation of God/Spirit. Like a lamp, everyone and everything physical manifests the presence / light of the divine. Tragically, however, mankind has forgotten this. (It should be noted that, although influenced by Christianity, Blake invents his own personal mythology designed to counter lapse and rescue mankind from this fall from grace.)

Blake sought to emphasise in this regard what some critics have taken to calling a ‘multi-fold vision.’ He drew a distinction between, on the one hand, seeing ‘with the eye’ (the realist / materialist reliance solely on the senses inspired by John Locke the Empiricist) which allows one to perceive only the material surface or appearance of things, utilising that part of the mind which deals only with sense impressions, and, on the other hand, seeing ‘through the eye’ (the use, inspired by Immanuel Kant, of one’s ‘imagination’ to see the wonder latent within the material world, to discern the spiritual in and through the physical). Later, Coleridge would distinguish similarly between the Understanding (which registers the impressions empirically gathered by the senses) and the Imagination (the capacity of Reason to grasp the true nature of reality, to read, as it were, God’s presence suffusing all things).

Hegelianism: Blake was also influenced, directly or indirectly, by the dialectical theory of history advanced by the German Idealist philosopher G. W. F. Hegel. According to Hegel, the history of human civilisation is synonymous with the growth towards perfection of Spirit (the German word Geist when translated means ‘Spirit’ which serves, roughly speaking, as Hegel’s synonym for God). History is, as such, viewable in terms of a progression culminating in the perfection of, in Hegel’s view, Enlightenment Germany. The history of humankind up to this time is divisible into three broad stages, each of which is dominated by a particular Zeitgeist (or ‘spirit of the age’). That is, each stage is the expression of one particular aspect of Spirit to the exclusion of other aspe progresses dialectically: each stage (thesis) gives way to its antithesis in which opposing qualities of Spirit are manifested. These are both subsumed, however, in a third stage (synthesis) in which the best qualities of both the preceding stages are assimilated before the dialectical process is repeated all over again. In Hegel's scheme of things, the ancient Asian world (China, India, Persia) gave way to its antithesis, classical European civilisation (Greece and Rome) the best parts of which were synthesised by modern European civilisation (or, more exactly, Enlightenment Germany). European history itself advanced dialectically: the long, dark night of Feudalism during which the Catholic church held sway was succeeded by the Protestant Reformation. The best features of the two were combined to produce the Enlightenment which reached its zenith in the French Revolution (notwithstanding its bloody excesses) and the democratic legacy it bequeathed to Western Europe. It is in this way that humankind (and, by extension, Spirit) draws ever nearer to perfection. (For a fuller but clear explication of Hegel, see Peter Singer's Hegel.)

Blake views the world as structured dialectically. At first glance, when one sees reality merely 'with the eye,' the world appears to consist solely of irreconcilable but fundamental binary opposites (good versus evil, black versus white, love versus hate, etc.). However, when rightly viewed, that is, when one sees through the eye, these seeming opposites are each revealed to play a part in the greater scheme of things. In Blake's The Marriage of Heaven and Hell, he expressed the view that Without contraries is no progression. Attraction and repulsion, reason and energy, love and hate, are necessary to human existence. . . . From these contraries spring what the religious call good and evil. . . . Good is the passive that obey reason; Evil is the active springing from energy.

In other words, the world is a fusion of binary opposites caught up in a dialectical relationship with each other, each inexplicable without reference to and inseparable from the other. In the dialectical scheme of things which Hegel inherited from Plato, the opposites (thesis and antithesis) come together to form a synthesis which combines the best features of the opposites. Some of the opposites which are dealt with in Blake's poetry include: innocence versus experience, ignorance versus knowledge, youth versus maturity; naiveté versus cynicism, good versus evil; etc. At first glance, Blake would seem to extoll the virtues of innocence, etc. but it quickly becomes apparent on closer inspection that there is an insufficiency that inheres in the heart of innocence (it lacks, for example, the knowledge that comes with experience); paradoxically, too, Blake links goodness with reason, passivity, self-control and discipline [the biblical 'Thou Shalt Not . . .'], that is, the repression of emotion, activity [what he calls 'energy'] and all that is vital and alive. The shortcomings of the opposing side ought to be more evident.

Blake's Radical Politics: From Blake's point of view, the world was mad with its anxiety, bloodshed, oppression, cruelty, selfishness, lovelessness, and repressive morality. Many of the ills afflicting society, he felt, were rooted in sacrifice which formed the basis of a repressive social organisation that turned children into chimney sweeps, for example. The major cause of our warped civilisation was a failure of imagination, the failure to conceive reality and our part in it other than as they appear to our senses. Precisely because he believed himself able to perceive the manifestation of the divine in and through the imperfect material world, Blake was an idealistic visionary. He viewed himself as something of a seer, a visionary, and considered the poet's vocation to be one of social amelioration, hence, the necessity of communicating his visions to as wide a public as possible. His work, he wrote, was an "Endeavour to Restore what the Ancients call'd the Golden Age." However, he came increasingly to feel frustrated in his personal life because he felt that he was rarely or insufficiently heeded.

Blake was a political radical influenced by such contemporaries as William Godwin and Thomas Paine. He supported both the American rebels in their quest for freedom from British rule and the desire of the French middle class to liberate themselves from the oppressive yoke of the aristocracy which culminated in the French Revolution. He also supported the struggles against economic and social injustice in England in the wake of the Industrial Revolution. He lamented the widening gap between the rising class of Capitalists and the working classes who laboured for them. Hence, the frequent albeit subtle presence of socio-political concerns in so many of his poems, especially in Songs of Experience. He also critiqued imperialist expansion by the European powers, colonialism, slavery, and racism in poems like "Little Black Boy" and Visions of the Daughters of Albion.

Social /political context of Songs of Innocence and Experience

(a) The Spirit of Rebellion - Society

Rural poverty and change: - The second half of the eighteenth century was a time of great change. It was the first phase of the Industrial Revolution. Mills and foundries were beginning to be established, changing long-established patterns of work and residence. The seeds for the growth of the great industrial cities like Manchester were being sown. The beginnings of mechanization were beginning to hit the weaver working from home. In the countryside, landlords were changing the enclosure system, leaving many peasant farmers without land and work.

Anti-Catholic unrest – the Gordon Riots: - There were also other causes of unrest such as the Gordon Riots in June 1780 which Blake witnessed in London. Unrest was whipped-up by Lord George Gordon against Catholics and the supporters of the Catholic Relief Act. This Act made it possible for Catholics to join the army without compromising their religion.

The riots caused great havoc and raised fears for the safety of the State. Troops were brought in to quell the riots and 25 ringleaders were hanged for treason. Lord Gordon, however, remained unscathed.

Child-labour and prostitution: - One of the great causes of social reformers in this period was the plight of the child chimney sweeps. From the age of four, children who were orphans in the workhouse or from very poor families would be sold as apprentice sweeps. They had to crawl naked up chimneys, often spurred on by prods from their masters or by having a fire lit under them. They would work in the mornings and then be abandoned onto the streets, unfed, in rags or naked, left to fend for themselves. Physically, these children would be deformed and sick because of their work; they had no education.

Apprentices in other trades were equally poorly served. An apprentice was a source of cheap labour. Nobody had responsibility for their welfare, so many died while still very young as a result of cruelty or neglect.

Prostitution and venereal disease were rampant in late 18th century England. The ‘double standard' of different moral codes for men and women applied. Many prostitutes ended up in prison. The plight of such women, as well as women prisoners in general, was a cause espoused by reformers such as the Quaker Elizabeth Fry.

(b) The Spirit of Rebellion - Politics

Blake's was a time of turmoil arising out of challenges to established ideas about monarchy, hierarchy, human nature and human rights.

Jean-Jacques Rousseau: - In 1762, Jean-Jacques Rousseau published his work The Social Contract, about human society and human rights. This championed republicanism and democracy. It was centred upon the idea of freedom as active participation in political life and legislation. Rousseau was the first philosopher of Romanticism, valuing feeling and innocence highly whilst downplaying the role of intellect. He said that 'Man was born free but everywhere is found in chains.' Rousseau also held that children were born good and had an in-built capacity to learn through experience. Formal education distorted the child's creativity, imagination and freedom to develop.

The American War of Independence and the French Revolution: - The spirit of rebellion took political form very clearly in America and France. In 1775, the American War of Independence began, ending in 1783. This was seen as a blow to monarchy and a victory for Republicanism. In 1789, the French Revolution began. This led to the execution of King Louis XVI of France in 1793 and the beginning of the Reign of Terror. Many French aristocrats took refuge in Britain. However, 1794 saw the execution of Danton, Robespierre and other leaders of the French Revolution. Many who had originally supported the Revolution were alienated by the cruelties it involved and by the way in which one tyranny was replaced by another. In 1795, Napoleon Bonaparte began his rise to power. This led to more war and to fear of a new tyrant emerging.

Tom Paine's The Rights of Man: - The French Revolution spurred the publication of Thomas Paine's The Rights of Man, part 1 in 1791 and part 2 in 1792. In this work, Paine attacked hereditary government and the monarchy. He argued for the abolition of the monarchy and the House of Lords. He advocated equal political rights and proposed that all men over twenty-one in Britain should have the vote. He believed this would create a House of Commons willing to pass laws favourable to working people.

The book was immediately banned. Paine was charged with seditious libel but he escaped to France before he could be arrested. Paine gave anyone the right to reprint his book. It was produced in cheap editions so that it could achieve a working class readership. In just over two years, more than 200,000 people in Britain managed to buy a copy. This led to the founding in 1792 of the London Corresponding Society by a shoemaker, Thomas Hardy (not to be confused with the 19th century novelist and poet). The society's aim was to win the vote for all adult males.

Paine also produced The Age of Reason, attacking the claims of Christianity. He criticised the Old Testament as being untrue and immoral and claimed that the Gospels were contradictory. This caused further outrage and lost him popularity with many of his earlier supporters, including Blake.

Religious and Political Dissent: - Paine's main themes in The Rights of Man chimed in with the beliefs of many of the Christian sects which abounded in England at the end of the 18th century. These sects were called Dissenters because they did not agree with the establishment of a state church with the monarch at its head. Most of them would have been seen as politically revolutionary, since they rejected monarchy, hierarchy in state and church and espoused equal rights for all people. They were the descendants of the sects which had flourished after the English Civil War in the previous century, such as the Levellers. The basic approach of the dissenters was summed up in a saying from a much earlier period:

'When Adam delved and Eve span
Who was then the gentleman?'

They believed that government by royalty and with a system of hereditary power was wrong. It divided people into classes, giving civil rights only to the few while keeping the majority unnaturally poor. This was seen as a perversion. God did not intend this enslavement when he created human beings. 'It was not so in the beginning' was the core belief.

Blake's Response to Politics: - Blake moved among politically radical people but rarely entered wholeheartedly into any political movement, largely because most radicals were Deists or freethinkers. For example, he admired Thomas Paine for his support of equality and belief in the ideals of a non-hierarchical democracy. However, he disagreed strongly with Paine's Deist, anti-Christian beliefs.

Blake's initial support of the French Revolution was later tempered by his abhorrence (strong disapproval) of the violence it involved. He was also shocked to see that the revolutionaries quickly became tyrannical oppressors in their turn.

(c) Blake's Religious Outlook

Blake and formal religion: - As a consequence of his philosophical views, Blake rejected formalised religion. He saw the Christianity of his day as being a distortion of true spiritual life. It changed spirituality into a system of moral laws which bound people in shame or in fear of punishment. This made them obedient to society's laws and rules. Organised religion was, therefore, an agent of social control, instead of a source of life and liberation. It bound its adherents (supporter) to the will of those in control. Blake felt that what should have been a message of love and brotherhood had become one of cruelty.

Blake's perspective on God: - Blake had some interesting perspectives on God, which sometimes varied from biblical and church teaching about the Creator. Like other Dissenters, Blake rejected the concept of a transcendent God 'out there'. Instead, he is focussed on the presence of Christ's Holy Spirit as a principle of each person's inner life, and the reality of divine inspiration / imagination.

He rejected the Old Testament stereotype of God as being vengeful and punitive. He felt people used this idea to justify their own revenge, bloodthirstiness and desire for land and power. Blake went further in rejecting completely the accepted view of God as a transcendent ruler, who takes offence and requires appeasement through sacrifice. Traditional Christianity taught that God's justice required the sinfulness of human behaviour to be 'paid for'. This was achieved when the sinless Son of God, Jesus was crucified on a cross as a sacrificial substitute for humanity.

This approach to the sacrifice of Christ was abhorrent to Blake. He believed it was a 'mind-forged fetter' made when people 'fell' into their separate selfhood (see Blake's view of the 'Fall' of Adam and Eve) and began to interpret the world solely from the point of view of experience. That is, they developed a view of God that was actually an image of themselves – jealous, possessive and tyrannical.

In the last three lines, Blake is referring to how he saw the account of the Fall of humankind in Genesis (Genesis 2:4-18 Genesis 3:1-13, where God forbade the eating of fruit from the Tree of knowledge of good and evil in Eden. A serpent tempted Eve to eat it in defiance of God's ban). Blake rejected this view of a God whose will is law and who binds people with prohibitions.

Blake's view of the 'Fall' of Adam and Eve: - According to Blake, the Fall of Adam and Eve was not a fall into sin. It was a fall into a distorted way of seeing God, the world and the self. This distorted perspective resulted in the development of the image of a God in humankind's image, who was thus perceived as being vengeful, punitive and bloodthirsty. It caused people to see themselves as being separate, isolated selves who needed to be protected, rather than as part of a unified creation. This self must also 'fight its own corner' and put itself first, rather than live in harmony with others.

Fallen sexuality: - Blake also believed that the 'fall from grace' brought about a separation between the sexes - interior division where there should be unity (as he stated in The Marriage of Heaven and Hell (1793)). The effects of this are to distort human sexuality, make it possessive, jealous and devouring. Sex, therefore, has to be surrounded by prohibitions and inhibitions. These deny the potential for true joy in sexual experience.

Blake held that fallen sexuality was 'set right' by Christ, who repudiated a religion based on obeying laws (this is Blake's interpretation, rather than being entirely consistent with the Gospel accounts). Blake believed that the repression of sexuality caused personal unhappiness and social ills, such as prostitution, which in turn led to poverty and venereal disease. Instead, he believed in 'free love', although there is no sign that he put his beliefs into practice in his life.

(d) Philosophical Influences on Blake

New philosophies: - In the later eighteenth century, Dissenters like Blake became very interested in the works of earlier Christians, who had moved away from orthodox, biblical Christianity and combined Christian ideas with beliefs drawn from magic, astrology and alchemy. Works by thinkers like Paracelsus and Jacob Boehme were readily available and highly popular among the Christians among whom Blake moved. As a result of this interest many became followers of the Swedish thinker Emanuel Swedenborg. A Swedenborgian chapel was established in London and Blake and his wife were members of this church for some time.

The influence of Swedenborg: - Like other Dissenters, Blake was initially an admirer of Swedenborg. Some of the beliefs taught by Swedenborg which can be found in Blake's work include the ideas that Heaven and hell are products of a person's state of mind, self-created by every individual during his or her life on earth. All angels were once human. Man was so created by God as to be able to speak with spirits and angels while living in the body. A human being is essentially a spirit clothed with a body. The spiritual person is the only true reality. What we call 'nature' and the 'natural' is actually a distortion of the truth - a lie. People need to be transformed from the 'false' natural state into their 'true' spiritual state. The Christian understanding of God as Father, Son and Holy Spirit, a doctrine known as the Holy Trinity, is wrong. The Trinity exists in one person only, Jesus Christ, just as a trinity of soul, body and spirit exists in each person.

Many of these ideas would be considered as heresy by mainstream Christians. Blake himself rejected Swedenborgianism when the Swedenborgian chapel in London began to organise itself hierarchically and to teach along more traditional lines. Like other Dissenters, Blake rejected all monarchy and hierarchy within society and the Church

Blake and Jacob Boehme: - Following his disaffection with Swedenborg, Blake became influenced by the writings of the German, Jacob Boehme. Some of Boehme's key themes, found in Blake's work, are everything exists, but can be understood only through its opposite, evil is a necessary element in goodness would become inert and progress would be impossible, evil is a result of the striving of single elements of Deity to become the whole, God himself contains conflicting elements and antithetical principles within his nature. As with the theories of Swedenborg, these ideas do not tally with the teaching of the Bible about such issues.

(e) Attitudes to man and God in the Age of Reason

A new perspective on 'truth': - Described as the 'Age of Reason' the eighteenth century saw a movement away from an understanding of truth as something which was revealed by God and, therefore, independent of human reason. Instead, truth could be found through observation of the world and by the use of human reason. Accordingly, laws were to be judged valid because they met human requirements of reasonableness, rather than because they were based on divine commands encountered in the Bible.

John Locke: - In his Essay Concerning Human Understanding, John Locke (1632 - 1704) argued that the human mind is a blank slate at birth. Therefore, there are no innate (inborn) ideas. Everything humans think or know comes to them through the experience of their senses, an experience upon which they reflect. This means that knowledge of the world issues from observation and analysis. Locke's thought was seen as laying foundations for the scientific thinking of such men as Robert Boyle and Isaac Newton.

Blake's opposition to Locke: - Blake reacted violently against the philosophy of John Locke, seeing him as an 'agent of the devil'. According to Blake, Locke's emphasis on rationality at the centre of human life was a distortion of humanity. Instead, Blake believed that the imagination was central, since it allows humans to perceive, relate to, and express, divine reality.

According to Blake, people cannot understand anything fundamental about the natural world by observing, measuring or analysing it. Understanding can only be achieved by employing the creative power of the imagination, since this enables people to see, as it were, through the eyes of the creative imagination responsible for the world (i.e. God).

For this reason, Blake also vehemently opposed the scientific method he saw as being embodied in Isaac Newton's work, which he believed, produced a model of the world as a mechanism to be analysed, measured and regulated. Blake's views put him in alignment with the European Romantics, as well as with the views of other Dissenters.

Changing attitudes to God: - Locke and Newton remained convinced theists and still upheld some kind of belief in revealed religion. Revealed religion refers to the idea that God makes himself known to human beings who could not know him in any other way. However, in the eighteenth century many Christian thinkers believed in natural religion. Natural religion is the belief that people can arrive at knowledge of God by using their reason and drawing inferences from their experience and observation of the world.

Deism: - Influenced by the dominance of reason and science, many key thinkers of the period started to regard God in a way described as Deism. Deists believed that reason required the existence of a creator but did not require his continued involvement with his creation. A popular Deist description of God was as a clockmaker. He was responsible for creating the complex mechanism, or clock, of the universe. Once in existence, however, it has no further need of its creator's involvement. A clock runs according to its mechanical nature and does not need interference from the clockmaker. So, too, the universe runs according to its own laws and has no further need of its creator. The outworking of this view is that God is purely a philosophical necessity, as 'first cause'. There is no need for a God who engages with human beings and intervenes in his creation.

Blake's reaction to Deism: - Although thinkers such as Tom Paine espoused Deism, Blake was very antagonistic towards the mechanistic view of the world which it implied. He rejected the Deism represented by writers such as Voltaire. He rejected Christian writers such as William Paley, who attempted to establish the existence of God from rational arguments which considered the natural world as a complex mechanism. For Blake, the deist approach rendered the world dead, barren and devoid of the active presence of creative divine power (in which creative power human beings participated when they employed their own imagination).

Blake further rejected a mechanical vision of the world because it implied that laws or rules govern the world. People could therefore fulfil themselves by following laws. These laws, however, are man-made and imprison the human spirit. For Blake, true fulfilment comes from being transformed through the development of the imagination and thus participating in divine life.

Literary context of Songs of Innocence and Experience

(a) Reactions to Rationality

There was a reaction against the dominance of reason which was expressed through two literary genres.

Sentimental and gothic literature: - 'Sentimentalism' developed as a reaction to rationalism in philosophy and to Calvinism in religion. The Enlightenment encouraged distrust of feelings, whilst Calvinism taught that the human heart was intrinsically evil. 'Sentimentalism' emphasised the central importance of feelings and the essential goodness of the human heart.

A sentimental approach can be found in novels like Sir Charles Grandison by Samuel Richardson. It is also highlighted in the debate between reason and sentiment in Jane Austen's Sense and Sensibility.

The genre of the gothic-horror novel such as The Castle of Otranto by Horace Walpole is also related to this reaction against the emphasis on reason. The gothic novel represents a world that is not totally controlled by, and accessible to, human reason. It is aware of deeper psychological and sexual impulses beyond the realm of reason.

European Romanticism: - Reaction to rationality was also expressed by the rise of European romanticism. This was associated with the work of people such as Goethe, Schiller and Klinger in Germany and Wordsworth and Coleridge in England.

Klinger's play Sturm und Drang (Storm and Stress) gave its name to a movement in which the struggle for self-realization of the artistic 'genius' was central. The power of creative imagination was given priority over the power of reason. The poet was perceived as a seer or prophet. His/her genius (guiding spirit) enabled him/her to enter into the realities of existence. This higher 'truth' was closed to those who relied on reason and on surface observation.

For the Romantics, imagination was not an ability to conjure up a world which wasn't 'real' or didn't exist. Instead it referred to a capacity to penetrate reality, to have vision or insight into the inner reality of the world.

Blake's Romanticism: - Other early European Romantics such as Novalis were Christians. They believed that dreaming and imagining were ways of participating in the life of God. They understood that the 'real' world is not the world of surface material reality, but a world infused with the divine. This could be perceived by using imagination.

Blake is often seen as the first English Romantic poet because of his insistence on imagination as the means of apprehending the reality of the universe and his opposition to rationalism.

(b) The Age of Reason

The Elevation of Rationality: - The eighteenth century is frequently referred to as 'The Age of Reason'. It was marked by confidence in the powers of the human mind to discover the secrets of the universe. Human beings felt capable of discovering the workings of the world, from the human body to the solar system, by the application of science and rationality. The world was open to scientific enquiry. It could be measured, analysed and exploited.

Earlier ages had been marked by a belief that, since God was the creator of all things and could not be fully comprehensible to human minds, human understanding and reason could not reliably grasp the whole 'truth'. People would expect the world to involve an element of mystery. However, this perception shifted in the Age of Reason to a belief that human reason could be the ultimate judge of truth.

Confidence in Human Analysis: - The eighteenth century saw an increasing confidence that human beings could gather together all information about the world and put it into an organised form. This meant that this was the century when the first dictionaries and encyclopaedias were compiled. It was believed that dictionaries could tie down the origin and meaning of words, whilst language could be standardised by establishing the rules of grammar. Consequently, Samuel Johnson is perhaps better known for his dictionary than for his other literary

(c) Enlightenment Literature

Rational poetry: - Poetry generated in the Age of Reason characteristically appealed to the head and to appreciation of form, rather than to the 'heart' or imagination. Consequently, wit was highly valued. The standard form was the closed heroic couplet, such as this from Alexander Pope's An Essay on Criticism (1711):

In Wit, as Nature, what affects our hearts
Is not th' exactness of peculiar parts;
'Tis not a lip, or eye, we beauty call,
But the joint force and full result of all.

The above poem is constructed from a sequence of rhyming pairs of iambic pentameter lines with masculine rhymes. The heroic couplet tends to give the effect of neatness and finality, with an implication that life can be similarly neat and controllable. Used by less gifted poets, it could be a very mechanical form.

Songs of Innocence and Experience (SoIE) [1793]

The Meaning of the Collection: Although conceived and written independently, Songs of Innocence (SoI) (1789) should be read in conjunction with Songs of Experience (SoE) which he published in 1793 with a new edition of SoI. The two collections of lyrics represent, as Blake said in 1794, "the two contrary states of the human soul" and often develop opposing points of view on the same subject matter. Some critics argue that there is an unresolved tension between the two collections that are not reconciled until the much more comprehensive vision contained in his later, more prophetic poems. However, others contend that there is a dialectical relation between the two collections (evidently, Blake's dialectical world-view shaped his conceptualisation of the two volumes) as a result of which many of poems ought to be paired for dual consideration. When read dialectically (i.e. in conjunction with each other), the upshot is that 'innocence' (and its ideals) cannot be apprehended without an understanding of 'experience' (life in a fallen world) while, on the other hand, experience uninformed by innocence degenerates into wickedness and exploitativeness. What is indispensable, Blake seems to aver, is a dialectical fusion or synthesis of the opposing qualities symbolised by innocence and experience, respectively, in order to adequately grasp the full complexity of human existence. (Note, to this end, the metamorphosis in SoE of specific motifs [e.g. the chimney sweeper] first found in SoI.)

Blake's Intention: Harold Bloom avers in studies like The Anxiety of Influence that Blake is the first of the English Romantic poets to 'write back' to Milton whose legacy, he argues, casts an enormous shadow over all succeeding poets, each of whom respond to and attempt to rewrite their precursor in various ways. Milton regurgitates in Paradise Lost the Christian narrative that attempts to explain the human predicament by depicting mankind has having fallen from grace (man is literally kicked out of paradise) due to original sin. Milton contends that mankind may, however, redeem itself through the sacrifice of Christ. In SoIE, Blake seems to aver that the vicissitudes of the human condition are not explicable by reference to some primordial fall from grace. Rather, it is the nature of human existence to be in a world seemingly pulled simultaneously in two opposing directions. Humans are caught on the cusp between innocence and experience, good and evil, etc., torn in both directions. They key things is to 'see through' or beyond this apparent contradiction and to realise that to understand the human condition involves assimilating or synthesising these two contrasting poles of human experience. In short, Blake's theme is the possibility of salvation which he locates in the Imagination.

Particular Themes:

SoI: Innocence here implies several aspects-the new-born innocence of children and lambs; the exploited innocence of neglected and enslaved children; the mature vision of a world of love in which the divine is glimpsed in the merciful and peaceful actions of men and women. Although seemingly naive, innocence is in fact a powerful scalpel to dissect and denounce a stale and unjust human society.

The adult persona is led and 'dictated' to by the child-what he hears is the wisdom of the child, a voice not corrupted by the complexities and pretensions of adult life. The Lamb is celebration of an earthly paradise in which animals and humans live in complete love and harmony under the protection of a benevolent God--a delight in the divine glories inherent in nature. The Little Black Boy is naive conception of a world without racial prejudice. The Chimney Sweeper is innocence exploited without being aware of the exploitation. Holy Thursday is the innocence of orphans left to the care of 'beadles' and charitable institutions and The Divine Image is celebration of the divine inherent in the human

SoE: 'Experience' is the opposite of everything for which 'innocence' stands. The adult's view predominates over that of the child—the persona claims omniscience (in the guise of prophecy) for himself. The Tyger is an interrogation of the purpose of (an) evil (creature) in a world made by an allegedly good God. London is a terrifying, almost surrealistic vision of contemporary English society. Holy Thursday (II) is the children's song becomes weeping. The Human Abstract is the virtues of Mercy, Pity, Peace and

Love are not seen as divine qualities so much as they are the consequences (rather than the redemption) of a fallen world.

Persona: the speaking voice in these poems varies. In SoI, Blake adopts the voice of the 'piper of innocence' whose muse is a child. The speakers in particular poems here are often children or child-like, and the songs express their emotions and their vision. To them, the cosmos is one of 'Mercy, Pity, Peace, and Love' received by all creatures from the Creator who himself became a child and is often symbolised as a lamb. In SoE, Blake adopts the prophetic point of view of the Bard of Experience.

Tone: In SoI, the speaker's tone is most often simplistic and even naive; In SoE, an almost omniscient, even cynical point of view is adopted.

Poet: neither the piper nor the Bard is meant to be completely identified with Blake. Each expresses a point of view that is, from its own standpoint, both accurate and limited. Innocence unfortified by experience deteriorates into naiveté, whereas experience by itself depicts the world to which we are confined when our knowledge is merely sensory, not imaginative.

Impact: this is didactic poetry with an important difference from that of Blake's predecessors. Like Pope's, SoIE is designed to ameliorate humanity. However, unlike a poem like The Rape of the Lock, it is designed to appeal more to the emotions than the intellect or reason, that is, Blake's goal is to make you feel the truth of what he is saying and thereby to enact changes in your life..

Aspects of Form / Poetic Technique: Although born in the middle of the eighteenth century, generally speaking, Blake writes in a radically new style very different from the Neo-classical dictates of eighteenth century poetry. His simple, down to earth style is opposed to the artificial, pretentious, grandiose and ornate style of writers synonymous with Neo-Classicism such as Alexander Pope.

Some of the characteristic features of his poetic style in SoI and SoE include:

Poetic Kind: the collection consists mostly of brief lyric poems expressed in the first person

Poetic Genre: there are no identifiable genres (e.g. sonnet) even though many, not all, of the poems are divided into stanzas many, not all, follow a particular rhyme scheme many, not all, have a definable metre.

Blake's style is very idiosyncratic in these respects. Perhaps the best term to describe the genre of these poems is the one chosen by Blake himself: 'song.'

Diction: Blake's diction is most often down-to-earth and simple. Note his imagery in specific poems by discussing his choice of particular metaphors, etc. and say how these contribute to the meaning of the poem in question.

Rhetorical Devices: note particular examples of litotes, etc. and show how these contribute to the meaning of the poem in question. One device to note the use of is:

Irony: for example, although the speakers in SoI are innocent and even naive in their outlook, the poems themselves are often anything but. In the "the Chimney Sweeper," the child is optimistic and full of faith in outlook even though he does not realise that he has been wronged by his own father.

Naiveté: by the opposite token, as Blake put it elsewhere, the "innocence of a child" can often reproach the "errors of acquired folly." One of these errors is to trust in the reality of the world presented to us by our senses and to ignore the world of imagination and vision.

Sound note particular examples of alliteration, etc. and show how these contribute to the meaning of the poem in question.

"The Songs of Innocence and Experience": Critical Analysis

The Songs of Innocence and Experience is probably Blake's most famous work. The Songs of Innocence were originally published in 1789, and the two sets of poems together appeared in 1794. But when we say "published" we have to be, as always with Blake, aware that they were not published in any conventional sense; rather Blake himself prepared a number of copies, each consisting of Plates on which words and visual images mingle and intertwine. No two copies are identical; furthermore, there are variations in the arrangement of the poems and even occasional differences as to which sequence a poem belongs to.

Songs of Innocence have often been described as exemplary poems of childhood, and this was very much how nineteenth-century anthologists saw them of poems like "A Cradle Song" and "The Lamb" this may well be true, in that they (and others) are written in a voice with the limpidity of childhood perception; here the "innocence" of the title is portrayed as an unequivocal and valued property of the child. With other poems, though, the situation is more complex. "The Chimney Sweeper" in Innocence, for example, seems to offer a perspective of innocence that nevertheless ends up by appearing to validate a proverb ("If all do their duty, they need not fear harm") of which Blake could surely never have approved.

Innocence, then, is shown to us as a state to be valued, but also as one to be superseded in the gradual development of consciousness. The Songs of Experience represent a further stage of this evolution, and again the positions of the narrators are often more uncertain and equivocal than they may appear at first glance. "The Tyger", for example, has often been seen as paired with "The Lamb", although there is no specific evidence for this; certainly we may see the two poems as offering visions of two different sides of the divine (and human) creative process, but here the tiger stands for a force that can be seen - and should be seen by the artist - as positive, creative even, in the "awe" of its destructive potential.

On the other hand, if we look at the two "Nurse's Songs" from Innocence and Experience, what we see is a movement from innocence, from a nurse-figure who understands her charges' desires and is willing to indulge their freedom, to corruption, a nurse-figure whose only concern is for a kind of repression that arises from her own psychopathology and her memories of her own distorted childhood ("The days of my youth rise fresh in my mind,/My face turns green and pale"). Similarly the second "Chimney Sweeper" poem mounts a direct challenge to the perspective of its "innocent" counterpart by attacking "God and his priest and king, /who make up a Heaven of our misery".

Apart from "The Lamb" and "The Tyger", perhaps the best known of all Blake's lyrics, "London", appears in the Songs of Experience, and in its first stanza it summarises Blake's view of the pathos and tragedy of a city oppressed by laws and regulations that reduce its inhabitants to mere cogs in a machine:

I wander through each chartered street

Near where the chartered Thames does flow,
And mark in every face I meet
Marks of weakness, marks of woe.

The poem builds up to an astonishing crescendo of indictment, in which Blake hears the sound of the "mind-forged manacles" that bind us not only through direct repression but also through our own complicity in the ideologies of power:

How the chimney-sweeper's cry
Every blackening church appalls
And the hapless soldier's sigh
Runs in blood down palace walls;
But most through midnight streets I hear
How the youthful harlot's curse
Blasts the new-born infant's tear
And blights with plagues the marriage hearse.

Here we have an example of the full density and complexity of Blake's language, with almost every word ("blackening", "appalls", "marriage hearse", to take but three examples) loaded with multiple meanings: meanings that serve to underline the duplicities of power, while nevertheless acknowledging that the voice of experience maybe necessary if we are to work through to a fuller understanding of contemporary social conditions and their place in the wider scheme of things.

What in general, then, are the Songs of Innocence and of Experience about? The most obvious answer is that they are about what they say they are about, the two "contrary states" of "innocence" and "experience", and that the individual poems in the two books are still essentially exemplars of these states. Innocence, then, would be the condition allied to childhood: a condition in which we can view the natural and human world without fear, and can feel confident that we have a home in that world. Behind this, of course, lies a whole realm of biblical myth, in particular that of the Garden of Eden, although there are significant differences between the biblical Garden and Blake innocence.

Perhaps the most obvious difference concerns sexuality. Adam and Eve, after all, were ejected from the Garden because of their accession to carnal knowledge, and throughout Christianity there is a connection between sex and the fall of man. To Blake things were quite otherwise: the world of innocence is one of natural, unforced pleasure in sexuality, as in all other matters of the body, and it is interesting that this significant alteration of emphasis constitutes one of Blake's many prefigurations of the much later discoveries of Freud, who first demonstrated the sexual interests of the infant systematically.

Innocence, however, cannot last forever unchallenged, although it is always possible to prolong or regain it temporarily through love, through poetry and through beauty. It is, however, inevitably under threat of being superseded as we move into adulthood and encounter cares, duties, responsibilities. But - and this is a very important point for Blake - although this "progression" (which is also a fall from grace) is inevitable, it is also true that we make it much worse than it needs to be. We make it worse through all kinds of tyranny and harshness at the political level, through the rule of the moral law and an ethic of punishment rather than forgiveness at the religious level, and through selfishness, possessiveness and jealousy at the personal and psychological level.

In Blake, though - and this is what makes some of the Songs, as well as most of his other works, so complex - these levels cannot be separated out. We hear again in the famous phrase about "mind-forg'd manacles" in "London" a double meaning. On the one hand, we could say that the "minds" that forge these manacles are the mir people; when we observe the inhumanity of urban life we are seeing the imposition of some people's will upon others, or, to put it another way, we are witnessing the suppression of healthy individual life by an ideology comprised of work, power and repression. It is at the same time true, however, that the mind that places these shackles upon us is, in an important sense, our own. Again, to use a more modern terminology, we could say that what Blake shows us is not only the forces of violence at war in society and the economy; he also shows us a process of internalisation by means of which we absorb these forces inside ourselves and accept them without question, an acceptance which kills off the all-important development of the imagination inside us.

In most of these respects the Songs encourage us to see Blake as a “romantic” poet. Most of the other major romantics - Wordsworth, Coleridge, Shelley, Keats – share Blake's mistrust of the forces abroad in contemporary society: they too detect an increasing mechanisation in the world around them, and they too recommend are consideration of a more “innocent” state as part of the solution to the problem. Yet in none of these other writers, with the possible exception of Wordsworth, do we find quite the level of detail in the description of everyday city life. This is, of course, partly because Blake knew everyday life and its pressure better than they; the “escape to the country” was not for him remotely financially viable. It could also be argued that the Songs show him to be the most politically radical of them, with the possible exception of Shelley.

It is also fair to say that the Songs are quite different poetically from anything the other romantics wrote. It is true that the form of the ballad was popular with all of them, trying as they were to find a kind of poetry which was freed from the formal constraints of classical eighteenth-century poetry; but nowhere in the balladic forms of the other romantics do we find quite the terseness of form, the extreme compression of the best of the Songs, and nowhere, not even in Wordsworth - who shared with Blake an intense respect for childhood and its perceptions - do we find the strange courage that enabled him to write and, in his own unique way, publish poems like the simpler of the Songs of Innocence.

Yet it seems clear that Blake is not “putting on voices” in these poems; rather, he was one of those rare artists who still had inside him the voice of childhood and was able, from time to time, to bring it forth in an unforced fashion, and this is again one of the elements that makes the Songs so powerful. For the questions we are induced to ask, about man's inhumanity to man, while reading the Songs of Experience are rendered vastly more poignant by the way that Blake has introduced us to the voices of the children who exist as the subjects of, and subject to, the world of suffering depicted as the - perhaps inevitable, but perhaps supremely avoidable - fate of experience.

A Poison Tree : Critical Analysis

Human beings, along with the ability to reason and question, possess the capacity to hate, and yet also to forgive. Unfortunately, forgiving someone is not always as easy as holding a grudge against them and this lack of control over one’s actions is inherent to human nature. In “A poison tree”, William Blake critically discusses these two opposing forces, uncovering the inherent weakness in humans, and the effects of these innate flaws.

Through the use of extended metaphors and vivid imagery, Blake symbolically portrays this fundamental flaw through the poem. The central theme in the poem is hatred and anger, dominating much of the author’s thoughts. Blake expresses this through the introduction of a clever parallelism – the treatment of anger between a friend and a foe. Through this, Blake emphasizes the nature of anger – while expressing and letting go of wrath ends it, suppression nurtures it. Blake startles the rea poem, and with metaphors that can apply to many instances of life. A Poison Tree is an allegory. The tree here represents repressed wrath; the water represents fear; the apple is symbolic of the fruit of the deceit which results from repression. This deceit gives rise to the speaker's action in laying a death-trap for his enemy. The deeper meaning of the poem is that aggressive feelings, if suppressed, almost certainly destroy personal relationships.

> "And it grew both day and night
> Till it bore an apple bright"

Blake further symbolizes this in the next two stanzas. He appears to metaphor the repression of anger and hatred to 'a poison tree', thus giving it an identity. The personification in "A Poison Tree" exists both as a means by which the poem's metaphors are revealed, supported, and as a way for Blake to forecast the greater illustration of the wrath. The wrath the speaker feels is not directly personified as a tree, but as something that grows slowly and bears fruit. In the opening stanza the speaker states, "My wrath did grow." The speaker later describes the living nature of the wrath as one which, "grew both day and night," and, "bore an apple bright." This comparison by personification of wrath to a tree illustrates the speaker's idea that, like the slow and steady growth of a tree, anger and wrath gradually accumulate and form just as mighty and deadly as a poisoned tree.

> "And I water' d it in fears,
> Night and morning with my tears;
> And I sunned it with smiles,
> And with soft deceitful wiles"

To understand the metaphorical sense of the poem, one must first examine the title, "A Poison Tree," which alerts the reader that some type of metaphor will stand to dominate the poem. In the second stanza, Blake employs several metaphors that reflect the growing and nurturing of a tree which compare to the feeding of hate and vanity explored by the speaker. The verses, "And I watered it …with my tears" show how the tears life lead an object of destruction. The speaker goes further to say, "And I sunned it with smiles" describing not only false intentions, but the processing of "sunning", giving nutrients to a plant so that it may not only grow and live, but flourish. In both of these metaphors, the basic elements for a tree to survive, water and sunlight are shown in human despair and sadness.

Blake called the original draft of "A Poison Tree" "Christian Forbearance," suggesting that what is meant to appear as a gentle attitude is often a mask for disdain and anger. Furthermore, Blake believed that the attitudes of piety that adherents of conventional Christianity were taught to maintain actually led to hypocrisy, causing people to pretend to be friendly and accepting when they were not. The righteousness that the conventional religion prescribed, Blake believed, allowed people to hide evil intent and to perform evil deeds, such as stifling the healthy growth of children, under the cover of appearing virtuous.

> "And into my garden stole
> When the night had veiled the pole
> In the morning glad I see
> My foe outstretched beneath the tree"

The religious context of the poem is also evident in two metaphorical allusions made by the speaker towards the end of the poem. Blake, being a religious visionary, has also criticized the views and actions of Christianity. This is evident in the symbol of the 'poison tree', which can be seen to make direct biblical reference to t[illegible] knowledge, representing the evil existing within man. Thus, as the garden is symbolic of the Garden of Eden, the apple is symbolic of apple which brought Adam and eve to their demise. It is the evil and poison that is bared from anger, the fruit of the poison tree. As in the biblical story, the apple here is beautiful on the outside, while poisonous and deadly underneath. By presenting the apple, Black is symbolic of the Serpent, maliciously deceiving his foe and bringing his demise. The serpent in Black is his weakness, and just like he, all humans have this inherent flaw inside of them. Black uses this to criticize Christian forgiveness, expressing that while Christians believe in 'turning the other cheek', by forgiving and repressing anger, they are ignoring the basic flaw existing in our human nature. Symbolically, the speaker represents God, the foe and garden represent Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden, and the tree represents the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil in Genesis. If this analogy is true, it shows God rejoicing in killing his enemies, which most people think the God they know would never do.

Conclusively, "A Poison Tree" teaches a lesson and asserts a moral proposition rather than offering a critique of a theological system, the lesson is less concerned with anger than with demonstrating that suppressing the expression of feelings leads to a corruption of those feelings, to a decay of innocence, and to the growth of cunning and guile. Repeatedly in Songs of Experience, not just in "A Poison Tree," Blake argues that the religious doctrines intended to train people, especially children, in virtue are cruel and cause harm. In addition, Blake depicts those who implement religious discipline as sadistic. Blake's poetry, while easy to understand and simplistic, usually implies a moral motif on an almost basic level. The powerful figurative language in "A Poison Tree" is so apparent that it brings forth an apparent message as well. The poem is not a celebration of wrath; rather it is Blake's cry against it. Through this, Blake warns the reader of the dangers of repression and of rejoicing in the sorrow of our foes.

Tyger : Critical Analysis

"The Tyger" represents an intense, visionary style with which William Blake confronts a timeless question through the creation of a still-life reverie. To examine "The Tyger's" world, a reader must inspect Blake's word choice, images, allusions, rhyme scheme, meter, and theme. "The Tyger" seems like a simple poem, yet this simple poem contains all the complexities of the human mystery. The first impression that William Blake gives is that he sees a terrible tiger in the night, and, as a result of his state of panic, the poet exaggerates the description of the animal when he writes:

> 'Tyger! Tyger! Burning bright
> In the forests of the night…'

The opening question enacts what will be the single dramatic gesture of the poem, and each subsequent stanza elaborates on this conception. Blake is building on the conventional idea that nature, like a work of art, must in some way contain a reflection of its creator. The tiger is strikingly beautiful yet also horrific in its capacity for violence. What kind of a God, then, could or would design such a terrifying beast as the tiger? In more general terms, what does the undeniable existence of evil and violence in the world tell us about the nature of God, and what does it mean to live in a world where a being can at once contain both beauty and horror? Immediately after seeing the 'Tyger' in the forests, the poet asks it what deity could have created it:

> 'What immortal hand and eye,
> Could frame thy fearful symmetry?'

The word 'immortal' gives the reader a clue that the poet refers to God. Then, in the second stanza, the author wonders in what far-away places the tiger was made, maybe, referring that these places cannot be reached by any mortal.

poet asks again, once the tiger's heart began to beat, who could make such a frightening and evil animal. Next, in the forth stanza, William Blake asks questions about the tools used by God. And he names the hammer, the chain, the furnace, and anvil. All these elements are used by an ironsmith. The tiger initially appears as a strikingly sensuous image. However, as the poem progresses, it takes on a symbolic character, and comes to embody the spiritual and moral problem the poem explores: perfectly beautiful and yet perfectly destructive, Blake's tiger becomes the symbolic center for an investigation into the presence of evil in the world. Since the tiger's remarkable nature exists both in physical and moral terms, the speaker's questions about its origin must also encompass both physical and moral dimensions. The poem's series of questions repeatedly ask what sort of physical creative capacity the "fearful symmetry" of the tiger bespeaks; assumedly only a very strong and powerful being could be capable of such a creation.

> "What the hammer? what the chain?
> In what furnace was thy brain?"

The smithy represents a traditional image of artistic creation; here Blake applies it to the divine creation of the natural world. The "forging" of the tiger suggests a very physical, laborious, and deliberate kind of making; it emphasizes the awesome physical presence of the tiger and precludes the idea that such a creation could have been in any way accidentally or haphazardly produced. It also continues from the first description of the tiger the imagery of fire with its simultaneous connotations of creation, purification, and destruction. The speaker stands in awe of the tiger as a sheer physical and aesthetic achievement, even as he recoils in horror from the moral implications of such a creation; for the poem addresses not only the question of who could make such a creature as the tiger, but who would perform this act. This is a question of creative responsibility and of will, and the poet carefully includes this moral question with the consideration of physical power. Note, in the third stanza, the parallelism of "shoulder" and "art," as well as the fact that it is not just the body but also the "heart" of the tiger that is being forged. The repeated use of word the "dare" to replace the "could" of the first stanza introduces a dimension of aspiration and willfulness into the sheer might of the creative act.

> "Did he smile his work to see?
> Did he who made the Lamb make thee?"

The reference to the lamb in the penultimate stanza reminds the reader that a tiger and a lamb have been created by the same God, and raises questions about the implications of this. It also invites a contrast between the perspectives of "experience" and "innocence" represented here and in the poem "The Lamb." "The Tyger" consists entirely of unanswered questions, and the poet leaves us to awe at the complexity of creation, the sheer magnitude of God's power, and the inscrutability of divine will. The perspective of experience in this poem involves a sophisticated acknowledgment of what is unexplainable in the universe, presenting evil as the prime example of something that cannot be denied, but will not withstand facile explanation, either. The open awe of "The Tyger" contrasts with the easy confidence, in "The Lamb," of a child's innocent faith in a benevolent universe. The meekness of Blake's lamb makes his "fearful" and "deadly" tiger appear all the more horrific, but to conclude that one is decidedly good and the other evil would be incorrect. The innocent portrayal of childhood in "The Lamb," though attractive, lacks imagination. The tiger, conversely, is repeatedly associated with fire or brightness, providing a sharp contrast against the dark forests from which it emerges — "Tyger! Tyger! burning bright / In the forests of the night." While such brightness might symbolize violence, it can also imply insight, energy, and vitality. The tiger's domain is one of unrestrained self-assertion. Far from evil, Blake's poem celebrates the tiger and the sublime excessiveness he represents. "Jesus was all virtue," wrote Blake "and acted from impulse, not from rules."

William Blake never answers his question about the unknown nature of god. He leaves it up to the reader to decide. By beginning and ending his poem with the same quatrain he asks the question about god creating evil as well as good, again. In conclusion, a reading of "The Tyger" offers different thematic possibilities. The poem seems to change as the reader changes, but the beauty of the words and meter make this poem an astonishing, enjoyable excursion into the humanity of theology. Moreover, the poem is quotable in various situations, and it leaves a permanent impression on the reader. Therefore, "The Tyger" by William Blake emerges from creation's cold, clear stream as a perpetual inspiration – a classic. In my opinion, William Blake wrote the poem with a simple structure and a perfect rhyme to help the reader see the images he wanted to transmit. Above all, the description of the tiger is glaringly graphic due to essentially the contrast between fire and night.

London : Critical Analysis

The poem, 'London' is a devastating and concise political analysis, delivered with passionate anger, revealing the complex connections between patterns of ownership and the ruling ideology, the way all human relations are inescapably bound together within a single destructive society. The poem's opening shows the narrator wandering the "charter'd" streets of London down to the "charter'd Thames".

The loaded word "charter'd" – changed from the first draft's politically empty "dirty" – is used in a critical sense, and Blake's contemporary readers would no doubt have picked up on it. The use of this loaded word – repeated to sharpen the ironic point that the streets, the very river itself, are privately owned – suggests the oppressive nature of early capitalism, in which the Whig alliance of merchants, rising finance capitalists and some of the most powerful landed aristocrats who did not need to lean on the crown for power, were busy accumulating capital via taxation and the establishment of a national debt, thus transferring wealth from the majority to the minority. As the narrator wanders, he marks, notices, the suffering population:

> "And mark in every face I meet
> Marks of weakness, marks of woe"

The repetition of "marks" is emphatic; the Londoners are branded with visible signs of sickness and misery. The subtle shift from "mark" used as a verb in line 3 to a noun in line 4 binds the narrator to those he sees, showing he is not a disinterested observer but one of the sufferers himself. No-one is immune. This is a picture of a whole society in chains, and the tightness of the poem's structure – especially in the formal second verse – emphasizes this feeling of entrapment. The move from visual to aural description makes turning away, escape, impossible – ears cannot be shut. In the second verse, this commonality of suffering is hammered home by the pounding rhythm, stressing the word "every", five times:

> "In every voice, in every ban,
> The mind-forg'd manacles I hear"

The cumulative effect of this verse enacts the narrator's helplessness. The "I" figure doesn't appear till the very end of the verse, as if he has been overwhelmed by the sounds of human torment. The sense of imprisonment is made absolutely plain in the phrase "mind-forg'd manacles" – literally, metal restraining cuffs, devised by the mind of man to subjugate people by physical force, such as the prisoners languishing in Newgate; but also, metaphorically, mental chains imprisoning through ideological acceptance of the status quo. After the dirge of passivity in: "In every cry of every Man / In every Infant's cry of fear", we are jolted by the phrase into a sudden moment of analysis, of understanding. The tone of anger and condemnat verse, the long list of accusatory examples has an unstoppable momentum. The verse begins, as if in mid-sentence:

> "How the Chimney-sweeper's cry
> Every black'ning Church appalls;
> And the hapless Soldier's sigh
> Runs in blood down Palace walls"

From now on in this cinematic poem, we lose sight of the narrator altogether as he becomes subsumed within his furious indictment, leaving the general misery on scene to zoom in on three specific social types – the chimney sweep, the soldier and the harlot – all emblematic figures, a point made clear by the use of capitals, used also for the representative institutions. The boy sweep blackens the church by literally making the churches sooty but also in the sense that the church's reputation is increasingly tarnished by its whitewashing of the brutal, smoke-belching commercial system which exploits child-labour. The word "appalls" here means 'indicts' rather than the modern usage of 'disgusts'. The church is not appalled in a compassionate way, but is fearful of the menace the sweeps represent. The soldier whose sigh "Runs in blood down Palace walls" is a "hapless" victim, in spite of the fact that he is part of the armed state. The soldier, sighing in death or fear, metaphorically stains the palace walls with his blood just as the sweep's cry blackens the churches. Perhaps the soldier's discontented "sigh" takes the tangible form of red-painted protest slogans on palace walls. The final verse, which Blake only added in a later revision, reveals how the system, constructed on the savage institutions of power – the law, church, monarchy and army – poisons personal relationships at the deepest level. This is the culmination of the narrator's apocalyptic description:

> "But most thro' midnight streets I hear
> How the youthful Harlot's curse
> Blasts the new-born Infant's tear
> And blights with plagues the Marriage hearse."

It is no longer daytime, but midnight. The harlot is a young victim, like the boy sweep. She has been robbed of the chance to love her baby, because it is the result of commerce, not love, and because its existence only brings her increased poverty. She passes her own misery onto her child, and that child, like her, will pass its misery onto further generations. Her curse, like the sweep's cry and the soldier's sigh, has actual effects. Like "mind-forg'd manacles", "Marriage hearse" is a fantastically potent phrase, reverberating with meanings: the two words are linked oxymoronically, with the notion of joyous, fruitful marriage undermined by its grim apotheosis, death by venereal disease. The phrase also fillets bourgeois marriage in all its hypocrisy, the husband routinely unfaithful to his wife, and suggests the sterile death-in-life of the wedded state. Marriage has become the funeral of love, the death of freedom. By striking at the family, the poem attacks the reproductive system of society itself. The harlot's curse does more than make the baby cry; it destroys bourgeois complacency. It's a fitting end; the poem's final line has the incantatory power of a curse itself, with the rhyme shutting the lid on the poem once the build-up of hard alliterative sounds (black'ning, blood, Blasts, blights and plagues) has reached its crescendo.

London begins with the economic system, couched in that abstract, legalistic word "charter'd", protected by its "bans" (laws), and moves to its consequences – the selling of bodies and souls within a sealed system of commercial exploitation. Yet, though the poem describes claustrophobic trappedness, paradoxically it does not feel defeatist. This is an anti-vision poem, but it implies that a vision is needed, and this lifts it out of despair. Its rising anger, reaching its height in the Shakespearean last line, is like a battle cry, or at least the precursor to one. It doesn't just catalogue the woes, but by ordering the encounters, reveals their cause and their inter-connection. It shows the power of articulation both in the victims' utterances – the sweep, soldier and harlot marking the city, by black'ning, splashing their blood, infecting it – and in the poem's own rhetorical eloquence.

Finally, we can conclude that London is a devastating portrait of a society in which all souls and bodies were trapped, exploited and infected.

Holy Thursday (I) of SoI and Holy Thursday (II) of SoE : Comparison and Contrast

The two poems: Holy Thursday I, II reflect Blake's theory of contrariness. The tile of the poems refers to the Thursday before Easter Sunday, observed by Christians in commemoration of Christ's Last Supper in which the ceremony of the washing of the feet is performed: the celebrant washes the feet of 12 people to commemorate Christ's washing of his disciples' feet. In England a custom survives of giving alms to the poor.

So the title has religious significance. Both poems deal with the same theme; but their approach to the theme is different; the first being light and ironic and the second being more savage and direct. I first analyse Holy Thursday (I) and then Holy Thursday (II) and finally, I will compare and contrast both the poems.

> "Till into the high dome of Paul's they > like Thames' waters flow."

The poem's (Holy Thursday I) dramatic setting refers to a traditional Charity School service at St. Paul's Cathedral. The first stanza captures the movement of the children from the schools to the church, likening the lines of children to the Thames River, which flows through the heart of London: the children are carried along by the current of their innocent faith. In the second stanza, the metaphor for the children changes. First they become "flowers of London town." This comparison emphasizes their beauty and fragility; it undercuts the assumption that these destitute children are the city's refuse and burden, rendering them instead as London's fairest and finest. Thus Blake emphasizes their innocence and beauty in Holy Thursday I. Next the children are described as resembling lambs in their innocence and meekness, as well as in the sound of their little voices. The image transforms the character of humming "multitudes," into something heavenly and sublime. The lamb metaphor links the children to Christ and reminds the reader of Jesus's special tenderness and care for children. As the children begin to sing in the third stanza, they are no longer just weak and mild; the strength of their combined voices raised toward God evokes something more powerful and puts them in direct contact with heaven. The simile for their song is first given as "a mighty wind" and then as "harmonious thunderings." The beadles, under whose authority the children live, are eclipsed in their aged pallor by the internal radiance of the children. Thus the 'guardians' are beneath the children. The final line advises compassion for the poor. Blake's basic aim in this poem is to emphasize the heavenliness and innocent or the children. The beginning of Holy Thursday (I) is transformed into Holy Thursday II as:

> "Is that trembling cry a song?
> Can it be a song of joy?

Holy Thursday II in contrast begins with a series of questions: how holy is the sight of children living in misery in a prosperous country? Might the children's "cry," as they sit assembled in St. Paul's Cathedral on Holy Thursday, really be a song? "Can it be a song of joy?" In the first stanza, we learn that whatever care these children receive is minimal and grudgingly bestowed. The "cold and usurous hand" that feeds them is motivated more by self-interest than by love and pity. Moreover, this "hand" metonymically represents not just the daily guardians of the orphans, but the city of London as a whole: the entire city has a civic responsibility to these most helpless members of their society, yet it delegates or denies this obligation. Here the children must participate in a public display of joy that poorly reflects their actual circumstances, but serves rather to reinforce the self-righteous complacency of those who are supposed to care for them. The song that had sounded so majestic in the Songs of Innocence shrivels, here, to a "trembling cry." In the first poem, the parade of children found natural symbolization in London�much's mighty river. Here, however, the children and the natural world conceptually connect via a strikingly different set of images: the failing crops and sunless fields symbolize the wasting of a nation's resources and the public's neglect of the future. The thorns, which line their paths, link their suffering to that of Christ. They live in an 'eternal winter', where they experience neither physical comfort nor the warmth of love.

Holy Thursday I is meek and lenient in tone; but the poem calls upon the reader to be more critical than the speaker is: we are asked to contemplate the true meaning of Christian pity, and to contrast the institutionalized charity of the schools with the love of which God–and innocent children–are capable. Moreover, the visual picture given in the first two stanzas contains a number of unsettling aspects: the mention of the children's clean faces suggests that they have been tidied up for this public occasion; that their usual state is quite different. The public display of love and charity conceals the cruelty to which impoverished children were often subjected. Moreover, the orderliness of the children's march and the ominous "wands" (or rods) of the beadles suggest rigidity, regimentation, and violent authority rather than charity and love. Lastly, the tempestuousness of the children's song, as the poem transitions from visual to aural imagery, carries a suggestion of divine vengeance as in these lines:

> "Then cherish pity, lest you drive > an angel from your door."

In the Innocence version, Blake described the public appearance of charity school children in St. Paul‛s Cathedral In "experienced" version, however, he critiques rather than praises the charity of the institutions responsible for hapless children. The speaker entertains questions about the children as victims of cruelty and injustice, some of which the earlier poem implied. The rhetorical technique of the poem is to pose a number of suspicious questions that receive indirect, yet quite censoriously toned answers as in:

> "Is this a holy thing to see
> In a rich and fruitful land"

The question may be asked which of the two "Holy Thursday" poems states the right attitude. According to John Beer, a famous critic the innocent poem displays greater insight, in spite of the greater worldly wisdom, and in spite of the superior moral interest, shown in the experienced poem. The innocent speaker, says this critic, sees more of the scene than the experienced one. The speaker in the experienced poem is so anxious to assert his moral ideas that the scene in St. Paul‛s becomes an excuse for a moral sermon rather than a situation he can give attention to. And John Beer concludes: "The innocent song ends on a positive note without preaching a sermon, while the experienced speaker preaches a sermon that is negative in tone, being full of moral anxiety but destructive of moral obligation." With his "Holy Thursday" of Experience", Blake clarifies his view of the hypocrisy of formalized religion and its claimed acts of charity. He exposes the established church's self-congratulatory hymns as a sham that the sound of the children is only a trembling cry.

"From Milton: And Did Those Feet" : Critical Appraisal

Of all the poets of eighteenth century, Blake is the most original and the most spontaneous. He is the poet of inspiration. He follows no man's lead and obeys no voice except that which he hears in his own mystic soul, he is always looking behind the visible frame of things, for the glories and terrors of the world of spirit. Blake's mysticism is based on the theology and philosophy of Swedenborg, Boehme, Kabbala and Christianity. Kathleen Raine regards him as; "perhaps the greatest Christian prophet of the modern world".

Blake's Song "And Did Those Feet" shows Blake's eternal relation between the eternal soul and eternal God, along with this, Blake seems deeply drunk in the passion of patriotism. He expresses his intense desire to purge England from all the evils. According to him, once England was a holy place where angles tread upon, where Jesus traversed through. Once it was the chosen land. But at the time of Blake this land turned into an evil den.

The scenario of society has been completely changed. England lived with an outward appearance of prosperity. England was winning her wards, trade and winning respect in foreign capitals. A wave of self-satisfied nationalism was sweeping the country. In Blake's time, religion itself was chipping in and the general tendencies of contemporary society had been formal, utilitarian and material. Blake drew his religious wisdom from the same sources as he drew his poetry and painting. This perennial source was human imagination, which he called, the Bosom of God, the Saviour, the Divine Humanity and Jesus.

England was, to Blake, a dreamland. He had a vision of the England that would have been the chestiest land. The poet is of the opinion that he has zeal and zest to change England.

"Bring me my bow of burning gold,
Bring me my arrows of desires,
Bring me my spear — O clouds, unfold!
Bring me my chariot of fire!"

He has burning golden bow and sheaf full of arrows. He would throw the arrows and destroy the evil everywhere from the society. He wants to equip himself with spear to fight against the forces of evil. His chariot of fire has potential to carry away all dross that has infected the body politic of England. The poet is ready on intellectual level to root out evil from England means to give new orientation to English society.

Blake is a mystic and throughout his poetry he dwells upon the innocent passion of being noble, chaste and loving. He wants England a place where only benevolence, kindness and goodness can prevail. He feels great sorrow when he feels, that England miserably failed to play its role. This crest-fallen England with evils, injustices and miseries taxed upon Blake's mind and forced by the circumstances, he decided to launch a ceaseless fight against the agents to evil. His fight is like gods of classical mythology. He desires from Almighty to assist him against evil.

His fight will be fought ceaselessly until Jerusalem is built upon the pastures of England.

"I will not cease from mental fight,
Nor shall my sword sleep in my hand,
Till we have built Jerusalem,
In England's green and pleasant land"

This is a small poem but each and every line has fathomless depth. The poem is divided into three stanzas. The first stanza has picturesque beauty different situations and the ancient times England. The second is his desire to fight and in third stanza he wants to reconstruct England on solid foundations.

The lyrics of poem have splendour and beauty. Every lyric is a window of imaginative world; symbols are used for multiple meanings. Its vocabulary is simple and symbols are universal. We can't find the most complete exposition of Blake's philosophy in this poem.

Auguries of Innocence : An Analysis

William Blake's "Auguries of Innocence" is a poem that was written with the mind-set of a Romantic. Before we delve into the poem, first a quick explanation of what romanticism is. Romanticism was a movement which was particularly popular from the late 1700s to about the mid-1800s. It was most commonly considered an intellectual movement of art, music, and literature; beyond that the idea of romanticism is a little unclear, as many people have different views on it. Suffice to say that expression was a prevalent theme in romanticism, and the intellectual aspect of it provided a lot of room for commenting on the perceived inadequacies of the time period.

Nowhere is the idea of complaining about the ills of society more observant than in "Auguries of Innocence." The poem is mainly William Blake listing an abundance of reasons as to why he is unhappy with the world around him (the early 1800s). A series of paradoxes make up the meat of the poem. The very first stanza reads, "To see the world in a grain of sand, and heaven in a wild flower, hold infinity in the palm of your hand, and eternity in an hour." Obviously no human being can literally see the kingdom of God in the petals of a rose, nor can they capture time in a bottle. But what exactly is William Blake's purpose by including all these paradoxes? Let's read on and find out.

The next major paradox of Blake's poem starts at about line 50. He claims that "the prince's robes and beggar's rags are toadstools on the miser's rags." This is an obvious paradox, as a prince is a far cry from a beggar. But he then goes on to say "a truth that's told with bad intent beats all the lies you can invent." This statement implies that it is much better to lie to someone (as long as you are doing it for a good reason) than to be honest to someone with malicious intent. For example, when your significant other asks you if they look big in a new outfit, you damn well know the answer to give.

Blake describes a bunch more paradoxes, like "man was made for joy and woe" and "the poor man's farthing is worth more, than all the gold on Affric's shore." I believe that Blake is using all of these paradoxical statements in order to make a statement about the intelligence of humanity. The statements that he made regarding holding infinity in your hand are clearly impossible, and we as humans cannot understand how this concept could make any sense. But then if it is impossible than how can we even create the thought of it in the first place? Surely our minds could not be able to create an impossible thought; if we can conceive of something, than surely in some way or another it must be possible. But we cannot understand how. Blake is saying that just because we think we know something that does not automatically make it true or false.

Blake exemplifies this thinking in another series of lines, wherein he states, "The questioner who sits so sly, shall never know how to reply". He makes it clear here that just when you believe that you know everything, is the exact point at which you know nothing. However, in the very next line Blake claims that "he, who replies to words of doubt, doth put the light of knowledge out." This line seems to be saying that once you begin to discuss doubt about preconceived notions, you are hurting the pursuit of knowledge. So just what the heck is Blake trying to really say? Perhaps these two lines themselves make up a great paradox. If we can conceive of these two statements, can they both be true? Or do they contradict one another?

Ultimately we feel that Blake is doing a great job at making people think when they read this poem. It completely exemplifies the Romantic Movement, in that it is an expression of many different statements, a lot of which are very contradictory. His paradoxes are not only made to make us think, but I feel that they can also represent human nature. Think about, how many possible thoughts we have going on in our head at one time or another. Look at the liar's paradox. If I were to say that I always lie, how would you know if I am lying or telling the truth? It is the nature of human beings to be paradoxical, because we are so complex a species that it is impossible to simplify us down into one category. We are at the same time good and evil, pretty and ugly, smart and dumb. We can fully support Blake's goals in getting people to think, and believe that the paradoxes in the poem only help people to think for themselves even more.

Songs of Innocence & Songs of Experience : Major Themes

The Destruction of Innocence: Throughout both Songs of Innocence and Songs of Experience, Blake repeatedly addresses the destruction of childlike innocence, and in many cases of children's lives, by a society designed to use people for its own selfish ends. Blake romanticizes the children of his poems, only to place them in situations common to his day, in which they find their simple faith in parents or God challenged by harsh conditions. Songs of Experience is an attempt to denounce the cruel society that harms the human soul in such terrible ways, but it also calls the reader back to innocence, through Imagination, in an effort to redeem a fallen world.

Redemption: Throughout his works, Blake frequently refers to the redemptive work of Jesus Christ. While he alludes to the atoning act of Christ Crucified, more often Blake focuses on the Incarnation, the taking on of human form by the divine Creator, as the source of redemption for both human beings and nature. He emphasizes that Christ "became a little child" just as men and women need to return to a state of childlike grace in order to restore the innocence lost to the social machinery of a cruel world.

Religious Hypocrisy: In such poems as "Holy Thursday" and "The Little Vagabond," Blake critiques the religious leaders of his day for their abuse of spiritual authority. The men who should be shepherds to their flocks are in fact reinforcing a political and economic system that turns children into short-lived chimney sweepers and that represses love and creative expression in adults. Blake has no patience with clergy who would assuage their own or their earthly patrons' guilt by parading poor children through a church on Ascension Day, as in "Holy Thursday" from both sections, and he reserves most of his sharpest verse for these men.

Imagination over Reason: Blake is a strong proponent of the value of human creativity, or Imagination, over materialistic rationalism, or Reason. As a poet and artist, Blake sees the power of art in its various forms to raise the human spirit above its earth-bound mire. He also sees the soul-killing materialism of his day, which uses rational thought as an excuse to perpetuate crimes against the innocent via societal and religious norms. Songs of Experience in particular decries Reason's hold over Imagination, and it uses several ironic poems to undermine the alleged superiority of rationalism.

Blake was not opposed to intelligent inquiry, however. In "A Little Boy Lost" from Songs of Experience, Blake admires the boy's inquiries into the nature of God and his own thought, even as he sharply criticizes the religious leaders of his day for demanding mindless obedience to dogma.

Nature as the Purest State of Man: Like many of his contemporary Romantic poets, Blake sees in the natural world an idyllic universe that can influence human beings in a positive manner. Many of his poems, such as "Spring," celebrate the beauty and fecundity of nature, while others, such as "London," deride urban society. Blake's characters are happiest when they are surrounded by natural beauty and following their natural instincts; they are most oppressed when they are trapped in social or religious institutions or are subject to the horrors of urban living.

The Flaws of Earthly Parents: One recurring motif in both Songs of Innocence and Songs of Experience is the failure of human parents to properly nurture their children. The "Little Boy Lost" is abandoned by his earthly father, yet rescued by his Heavenly Father. The parents of "The Little Vagabond" weep in vain as their son is burned alive for heresy. Both mother and father seem frustrated by their child's temperament in "Infant Sorrow." This recurring motif allows Blake to emphasize the frailty of human communities, in which the roles of mother and father are defined by society rather than by natural instincts, and to emphasize the supremacy of Nature and of divine care in the form of God the Father.

Social Reform: While much of Blake's poetry focuses on leaving behind the material world in favour of a more perfect spiritual nature, his poetry nonetheless offers realistic and socially conscious critiques of existing situations. Both of his "Chimney Sweeper" poems highlight the abuse of children by parents and employers as they are forced into hazardous, and potentially fatal, situations for the sake of earning money. Both "Holy Thursday" poems decry the overt display of the poor as a spectacle of absolution for the wealthy and affluent. "The Human Abstract" points out that our virtues are predicated on the existence of human suffering. Although Blake is certainly more spiritually than practically minded, the seeds of social reform can be seen in the philosophy underlying his verses: innocence is a state of man that must be preserved, not destroyed, and the social systems that seek to destroy innocence must be changed or eliminated.

William Blake’s Theory of Contrariness

Songs of Innocence and of Experience is a collection of short lyric poems accompanied by Blake’s original illustrations. The two sections juxtapose the state of innocence and that of experience. Many of the poems in Blake’s words they were meant to show “the two contrary states of the human soul”; the illustration of innocence and experience. The tone of the first series is admirably sounded by the introductory “Piping down the valleys wild” and that of second the dark picture of poor babes “fed with cold and usurous hand”.

Blake is bitter against those who go “up to the Church to pray” while the misery of the innocent is around them. His theory of Contraries is summarized in The Marriage of Heaven and Hell: “Without Contraries is no progression. Attraction and repulsion, reason and energy, love and hate, are necessary to human existence.” The essence of Blake’s theory is that, in some paradoxical way, it is possible for the contraries of innocence and experience to co-exist within a human being. The crime of “religion” was its attempt “to destroy existence” by ignoring or minimizing the essential oppositions in human nature. The word ‘contrary’ had a very specific and important meaning for Blake. Like almost all great poets, he was an enemy of dualism. Western thought has been intensely dualistic, seeing everything as composed of warring opposites, head and heart, body and spirit, male and female as though the split between the hemispheres of the human brain were projecting itself on everything perceived. A study of the poems in the two groups shows the emotional tensions between the two Contrary States.

“Piping down the valleys wild”

In the “Songs of Innocence”, Blake expresses the happiness of a child’s first thoughts about life. To the child, the world is one of happiness, beauty, and love. At that stage of life, the sunshine of love is so radiant that human suffering appears only temporary and fleeting. In the Introduction to the first series, Blake represents a laughing inspiration for his poems. And in the poems that follow in this series, Blake gives us his vision of the world as it appears to the child or as it affects the child. And this world is one of purity, joy, and security. The children are themselves pure, whether their skin is black or white. They are compared to lambs "whose innocent call" they hear. Both "child" and "lamb" serve as symbols for Christ. Joy is everywhere—in the "Joy but two days old"; in the leaping and shouting of the little ones; in the sun, in the bells, in the voices of the birds; in the Laughing Song all Nature rejoices. But, above all, there is security. There is hardly a poem in which a symbol of protection, a guardian figure of some kind, does not occur. In The Echoing Green, the old folk are close by, while the children play. Elsewhere there is the shepherd watching over his sheep; there are the mother, the nurse, the lion', the angels, and, most important of all, God Himself. There is spontaneous happiness and delight in these groups of poems as "The Infant Boy" illustrates, ''I happy am/ Joy is my name'.

"These flowers of London town!
Seated in companies they sit with radiance all their own"

In the first Holy Thursday, poor children sit "with radiance of their own"; while in the second Holy Thursday, the poet deplores the fact that there should be so many poor and hungry children depending on charity in a country which is otherwise rich and fruitful. The second poem is very moving, as it was intended to be. We thus have pictures of contrary states. In the "Songs of Innocence", the prevailing symbol is the Iamb, which is an innocent creature of God and which also symbolizes the child Christ. In the "Songs of Experience" the chief symbol is the tiger as expressed by the first stanza:

"Tiger! Tiger! burning bright
In the forests of the night"

Where 'forests of the night' symbolize experience. The tiger burns metaphorically with rage and quickly becomes for some a symbol of anger and passion. The poet asks a crucial question here. Did God Who made the lamb also make the tiger? The lamb, innocent and pretty, seems the work of a kindly, comprehensible Creator. The splendid but terrifying tiger makes us realize that God's purposes are not so easily understood. The tiger represents the created universe in its violent and terrifying aspects. It also symbolizes violent and terrifying forces within the individual man, and these terrifying forces have to be faced and fully recognized. The two poems called The Lamb and The Tiger do, indeed, represent two contrary states of the human soul. No contrast could have been more vivid and more striking. Blake sees exploitation in the songs of experience as exemplified by the following lines from, 'London'.

"And mark in every face I meet
Marks of weakness, marks of woe"

The poems in the second group record the wounds and cruelties of the civilized world. Some of them are bitter comments on the restraints forged by custom and law. Here Blake deplores the dominance of reason, religion, law, and morality, and he deplores the suppression of natural impulses, and more especially the suppression of the sexual impulse. Instead of innocence, joy, and security, Blake finds guilt, misery, and tyranny in the world. The protective guardians have disappeared and in their place are the tyrants. The rigors of sexual morality are depicted in A Little Girl Lost, The Sick Rose, The Angel, and Ah, Sunflower. The Sick Rose shows the destructive effects of sexual repression. In The Angel, the maiden realizes too late what she has missed. Ah, Sunflower shows the youth "pining away with desire", and the "pale virgin shrouded in snow", because both of them were denied sexual fulfillment.

The contrasts Blake sets forth in the Songs are echoes of English society's approach to the social and political issues of his era—a time characterized, on the one hand, by increasing desire for personal, political, and economic freedom, and on the other, by anxiety regarding the potential consequences of that freedom for social institutions. Several of the poems directly address contemporary social problems, for example, "The Chimney-Sweeper" deals with child labor and "Holy Thursday" describes the grim lives of charity children. The most fully-realized social protest poem in the Songs is "London," a critique of urban poverty and misery. Thus contrariness are a must. The language and vision not just of Blake but of poetry itself insists that the contraries are equally important and inseparable. 'Without contraries is no progression', wrote Blake. He sought to transform the energies generated by conflict into creative energies, moving towards mutual acceptance and harmony. Thus, by describing innocence and experience as 'contrary states of the human soul', Blake is warning us that we are not being invited to choose between them, that no such choice is possible. He is not going to assert that innocent joy is preferable to the sorrows of experience.

William Blake's Romanticism

William Blake is a romantic poet. The sparks of romanticism are vividly marked on his poetry. The question arises what is Romanticism? The answer is that it is a phenomenon characterized by reliance on the imagination and subjectivity of approach, freedom of thought and expression, and an idealization of nature.

It was Schelling who first defined romanticism as 'liberalism in literature'. Though romanticism officially started by the Lyrical Ballads jointly penned by Wordsworth and Coleridge in 1830, poets like William Blake made cracks to classicism towards the end of the18th century. In Romanticism, a piece of work could become, as Blake described, "an embodiment of the poet's imagination and vision." Many of the writers of the Romantic period were highly influenced by the war between England and France and the French Revolution. In the midst of all these changes, Blake too was inspired to write against these ancient ideas. 'All Religions Are One', and 'There is No Natural Religion' were composed in hopes of bringing change to the public's spiritual life. Blake felt that, unlike most people, his spiritual life was varied, free and dramatic. Blake's poetry features many characteristics of the romantic spirit. The romanticism of Blake consists in the importance he attached to imagination, in his mysticism and symbolism, in his love of liberty, in his humanitarian sympathies, in his idealization of childhood, in the pastoral setting of many of his poems, and in his lyricism.

"Bring me my spear! O clouds, unfold!
Bring me my chariot of fire"

The above lines from, 'Jerusalem' amply justifies the point. "Poetry fettered", said Blake, "fetters the human race". In theory as well as practice, the Romantic Movement began with the smashing of fetters. In his enthusiastic rage, Blake condemned the verse-forms which had become traditional. He poured scorn upon all that he associated with classicism in art and in criticism. "We do not want either Greek or Roman models if we are but just and true to our own imaginations", he said. The whole critical vocabulary of neo-classical criticism had evidently disgusted him. He could not endure it. The visions that Blake started seeing in his childhood and which he kept seeing throughout his life were doubtless a product of his ardent imagination. His visions profoundly controlled both his poetry and his painting. Of many of his poems he said that they were dictated to him by spirits. In this most literal sense he held that, inspiration could come to the aid of a poet. In a state of inspiration, the poet made use of his imagination. "Human imagination is the Divine Vision and Fruition", he said. Energy and delight accompany this expression of the Divine Vision. All these views on the subject of poetry spring from the intensely romantic nature of Blake. It is not merely the revolutionary spirit that permeates his poetry. The subject of child is more crucial to his art. We see in Holy Thursday I:

"These flowers of London town!
Seated in companies they sit
with radiance all their own"

The child is here the symbol of the most delicate and courageous intuitions in the human mind. The elements of Romanticism are present in these poems, some of them in the highest degree, such as the sense of wonder, the contemplation of Nature through fresh eyes, an intimate sympathy with the varieties of existence. Other elements of Romanticism are found in a much less degree, such as the obsession with the past, or the absorbing sense of self. Everything that the eyes of the child see is bathed in a halo of mystery and beauty. The words in these poems are perfectly adapted to the thought because they are as simple as possible, and the thought itself is simple. Blake's first style is in a way a juvenile form of Romanticism. The "Songs of Innocence" most completely fulfil the definition of Romanticism as "the renascence of wonder". The world of Nature and man is the world of love and beauty and innocence enjoyed by a happy child, or rather by a poet who miraculously retains an unspoiled and inspired vision. Despite his strong emotions and his unfamiliar ideas, Blake keeps his form wonderfully limpid and melodious. Besides love for children, imagination plays a key role in his poetry as Tyger embodies:

"When the stars threw down their spears,
And watered heaven with their tears;
Did he smile his work to see?
Did he Who made the Lamb make thee?"

Symbolically, this poem is an impassioned defense of energy and imagination which occupy a commanding position in Blake's thinking. The tiger is Blake's symbol for the "abundant life", and for regeneration. The poem effectively conveys to us the splendid though terrifying qualities of the tiger. The climax of the poem's lyricism is reached in the lines which, though somewhat cryptic, effectively produce and effect of wonder and amazement. Blake was a great champion of liberty and had strong humanitarian sympathies. This is another aspect of his Romanticism. Blake's humanitarian sympathies are seen in such poems of Experience as Holy Thursday, A Little Boy Lost, The Chimney Sweeper, and above all London as in the following lines:

"In every voice, in every ban.
The mind-forg'd manacles I hear"

In London, Blake attacks social injustice in its various forms, as it shows itself in the chimney sweeper's cry, the hapless soldier's sigh, and the youthful harlot's curse. He appears here as an enemy of what he calls "the-mind-forged manacles". Nor does, Blake show any mercy to the Church. The boy in Blake's poetry finds the church an inhospitable place, while the ale-house is warm and friendly because the church imposes religious discipline like fasting and prayer. Pastoralism, too is feature of poetry. The little pastoral poem 'The Shepherd' has a delicate simplicity. It celebrates the happiness of rural responsibility and trust. Noteworthy also is 'The Echoing Green' with its picturesqueness in a warmer hue, its delightful domesticity, and its expressive melody.

Finally, it is established that Blake is a romantic poet. Blake is one of the major Romantic poets, whose verse and artwork became part of the wider movement of Romanticism in late Eighteenth and early Nineteenth century European Culture. His writing combines a variety of styles: he is at once an artist, a lyric poet, a mystic and a visionary, and his work has fascinated, intrigued and sometimes bewildered rea nineteenth century reader Blake's work posed a single question: was he sane or mad? The poet Wordsworth, for example, commented that there "is no doubt that this poor man was mad, but there is something in his madness which interests me more than the sanity of Lord Byron and Walter Scott". Blake's use of images, symbols, metaphors and revolutionary spirit combined with simple diction and spontaneous expression of thoughts and emotions make him a typical romantic poet.

William Blake's Symbolism

Blake is a highly symbolic poet and his poetry is rich in symbols and allusions. Almost each and every other word in his poems is symbolic. A symbol is an object which stands for something else as dove symbolizes peace. Similarly, Blake's tiger symbolizes creative energy; Shelley's wind symbolizes inspiration; Ted Hughes's Hawk symbolizes terrible destructiveness at the heart of nature. Blake's symbols usually have a wide range of meaning and more obvious. Few critics would now wish to call Blake a symbolist poet, since his handling of symbols is markedly different from that of the French symbolistes', but the world inhabited by his mythical figures is defined through quasi-allegorical images of complex significance, and such images are no less important in his lyrical poetry. The use of symbols is one of the most striking features of Blake's poetry.

There is hardly any poem in the "Songs of Innocence and of Experience" which does not possess a symbolic or allegorical meaning, besides its apparent or surface meaning. If these poems are written in the simplest possible language, that fact does not deprive them of a depth of meaning. The language of these poems is like that of the Bible—at once simple and profound as the following lines read:

"O Rose, thou art sick!"

When Blake talks of the sick rose, he is really telling us how mysterious evil attacks the soul. Flower-symbolism is of particular importance in Songs of Innocence and Experience, being connected with the Fall by the motif of the garden; and its traditional links with sexuality inform the text of 'The Blossom' and the design for 'Infant Joy', which are taken up in Experience by the plate for 'The Sick Rose'. 'Ah! Sun-Flower' is a more symbolic text, and has evoked a greater variety of responses. Declaring this to be one of 'Blake's supreme poems', we can interpret the flower as a man who 'is bound to the flesh' but 'yearns after the liberty of Eternity". Harper claims that it describes the aspiration of all 'natural things' to 'the sun's eternality'. Identifying the speaker as 'Blake himself. Blake travels from flower-symbolism to animal symbols as in the 'Tyger':

"Did he smile his work to see
Did he who made the Lamb make thee!"

If the lamb symbolizes innocence and gentleness, the tiger is to Blake a symbol of the violent and terrifying forces within the individual man. The lamb, innocent and pretty, seems the work of a kindly Creator. The splendid but terrifying tiger makes us realize that God's purposes are not so easily understood, and that is why the question arises "Did he who made the Lamb make thee?" At the same time, the tiger is symbolic of the Creator's masterly skill which enabled Him to frame the "fearful symmetry" of the tiger. But the lion described in the poem Night (in the "Songs of Innocence") offers an interesting contrary to the tiger of the "Songs of Experience". Both the beasts seem dreadful, but the lion, like the beast of the fairy tale, can be magically transformed into a good and gentle creature: the tiger cannot. In the world of Experience the violent and destructive elements in Creation must be faced and accepted, and even admired. The tiger is also symbolic of the Energy and the Imagination of man, as opposed to the Reason. Blake was a great believer in natural impulses and hated all restraints.

Consequently he condemns all those who exercise restraints upon others. He states in Holy Thursday II:

“And their ways are fill’d with thorns
It is eternal winter there”

The eternal winter are symbolic of total destruction of the country and the perpetual devastation and ‘Grey-headed beadles’ in ‘Holy Thursday I’ are symbolic of authority and it is they exploit children for their own material interests. In the poem London, oppression and tyranny are symbolised by the king (who is responsible for the soldier’s blood being shed), social institutions like (loveless) marriage, and ‘”he mind-forged manacles”. Even further, personal and social relationships have been symbolised as:

“In the morning glad I see
My foe outstretched beneath the tree”

A Poison Tree is another allegory. The tree here represents repressed wrath; the water represents fear; the apple is symbolic of the fruit of the deceit which results from repression. This deceit gives rise to the speaker’s action in laying a death-trap for his enemy. The deeper meaning of the poem is that aggressive feelings, if suppressed, almost certainly destroy personal relationships. On the surface, however, the poem is a simple, ordinary story. Thus symbolism is crucial to understanding Blake as poet of earlier romanticism. What can be more symbolic than the following lines from, ‘Auguries of Innocence’?

“To see a world in a grain of sand,
And a heaven in a wild flower,
Hold infinity in the palm of your hand,
And eternity in an hour”

Thus, Blake’s poetry is charged with symbols. He has depicted nature and human nature; animals and plants as simple but profound symbols of powerful forces; “contrary states of the human soul” – for example, good and evil, or innocence and experience throughout his poetry. What is different in Blake is that he is not modeling after any symbols but his own. The symbols always have an inner relatedness that leads us from the outer world to the inner man. The symbols live in the ordered existence of his vision; the vision itself is entirely personal, in theme and in the logic that sustains it. Blake is difficult not because he invented symbols of his own; he created his symbols to show that the existence of any natural object and the value man’s mind places on it were one and the same. He was fighting the acceptance of reality in the light of science as much as he was fighting the suppression of human nature by ethical dogmas. He fought on two fronts, and shifted his arms from one to the other without letting us know—more exactly, he did not let himself know. He created for himself a personality, in life and in art, that was the image of the thing he sought.

In short, it is established that William Blake is a highly symbolic and even allegorical poet. His use of symbolism is unique and cinematic. It paints a lively and pulsating picture of dynamic life before us. Especially, the symbolic use of ‘Sun-flower’ gets so much stamped on the mind of the reader that it is difficult to forget it. He mentions a tiger it becomes a symbol of God’s power in creation, his lamb turns out to be a symbol of suffering innocence and Jesus Christ and his tree is symbolic of anger and desire to triumph over enemies; the dark side of human nature. Symbolism is the main trait of William Blake as a dramatist as a poet and this has been well-crystallized in his legendary work, ‘The Songs of Innocence and Experience’.

Blake's Concept of God

William Blake formed most of his works in the fashion of Romanticism. Much like William Wordsworth, Blake wrote from the heart, letting natural expression take over. Many of the writers of the Romantic period felt they had entered an imaginative climate, which some of them called "the Spirit Age." During this "Spirit Age," many authors felt that freedom and spontaneity were the key elements in poetry. Before this creative revolution, a poem was considered a classical work of art, assimilated to please an audience. In Romanticism, the "rules" hanging over poetry were dropped and a piece of work could become, as Blake described, "an embodiment of the poet's imagine vision. "Blake used these free-formed ideas and concepts in his later works.

Blake's essays, All Religions Are One, There is No Natural Religion, and There is No Natural Religion, all show Blake's views against Christian Orthodox, religion based on ancient scripture and against "Natural Religion," the belief that God is as natural organism, much like man. Blake was opposed to the idea that God is only what the church believes him to be but he was also opposed to the notion that God was here before we were.

Blake believed that man's "Poetic Genius," or imagination helped create the God of today. Many of the writers of the Romantic period were highly influenced by the war between England and France and the French Revolution. During the war, Blake was faced with charges of "speaking against his King and country." People of this era felt his works tested the boundaries of good art. Many of the other writers of this time also challenged previously accepted ideas. Mary Wollstonecroft wrote "A Vindication of the Rights of Women." Her work stood up against the female stereotypes and preconceived notions about women.

In the midst of all these changes, Blake too was inspired to write against these ancient ideas. All Religions Are One, There is No Natural Religion, and There is No Natural Religion were composed in hopes of bringing change to the public's spiritual life. Blake felt that, unlike most people, his spiritual life was varied, free and dramatic. Growing up he had no formal education. At the age of ten he joined a drawing school and later studied for a short time at a prestigious art school, the Royal Academy of the Arts. From this point in his life, art had the strongest influence. Later on, his work diminished and he went to a friend who was an artist, William Haley, for help. Haley attempted to change Blake's free art into conventional and breadwinning art. Blake soon rebelled, calling Haley the enemy of his spiritual life. After all of this, he began to write poetry, hoping to revive his free expression and flow. He wrote three works around 1788, to illustrate his views on religion, All Religions Are One, There is No Natural Religion, and There is No Natural Religion. He wrote All Religions Are One directed against Deism or "Natural Religion" and against Christian Orthodoxy.

Blake felt that God is not a natural or organic being; he is a creation of man's imagination or "Poetic Genius." He states that "The Jewish and Christian Testaments are an original derivation from the Poetic Genius," supporting his theory that man has imagined God. In There is No Natural Religion; he speaks against the argument that man naturally perceives God. He states that the desires and perceptions of man are not natural or organic, but are things taught to us.

Along with his prose work Blake's poetry presented the same ideas. His Songs of Innocence and Experience expose the presence of God and Spirituality in Innocence but the questions like "Could frame thy fearful symmetry?" and "Dare frame thy fearful symmetry?" make his belief more firm and unique. This is important because when the author initially poses the question, he wants to know who has the ability to make such a creature. After more interrogation, the question evolves to "who could create such a villain of its potential wrath, and why?" William Blake's implied answer is "God."

In the end, Blake reminds us that all things in this world were accepted as "natural," then "the philosophic and experimental would soon be at the ratio of all things, and stand still unable to do other than repeat the same dull round over again. "We as humans are too dependent upon acceptance and not enough on independence. in There is No Natural Religion, Blake tries to persuade his audience that our knowledge is not limited to the physical sense, it is free and unbounded, much like Blake's ideal spiritual life.

William Blake as a Lyric Poet

Lyric is a short poem that conveys intense feeling or profound thought. In ancient Greece, lyrics were sung or recited to the accompaniment of the lyre. The lyric is the commonest kind of the poetry of self-expression. Man has always liked to pour out his intensely-felt feelings and emotion, and hence the lyric is among the earliest forms of poetry to be written in the literary history of any people. When moved by some intense emotion, love, hatred, joy, sorrow, wonder, admiration, etc., man has always expressed himself in a poetic language, and this accounts for the early appearance of the lyric among all peoples. The chief qualities of a good lyric may be summarized as follows:

1. It is a short poem, characterised by simplicity in language and treatment.

2. It deals with a single emotion which is generally stated in the first few lines. Then the poet gives us the thoughts suggested by that particular emotion. The last and concluding part is in the nature of a summary or it embodies the conclusion reached by the poet. Such is the development of a lyric in general, but often these three parts are not distinctly marked. In moments of intense emotional excitement the poet may be carried away by his emotions and the lyric may develop along entirely different lines. A lyric is more often than not, mood-dictated.

3. It is musical. Verbal-music is an important element in its appeal and charm. Various devices are used by poets to enhance the music of their lyrics.

4. A lyric is always an expression of the moods and emotions of a poet. The best lyrics are emotional in tone. However, a poet may not express merely his emotions, he may also analyse them intellectually. This gives to the lyric a hard intellectual tone. Such intellectual analysis of emotion is an important characteristic of the metaphysical lyrics of the early 17th century. Such lyrics are also more elaborate than the ordinary lyric.

5. It is characterised by intensity and poignancy (causing sadness or pity). The best lyrics are the expressions of intensely felt emotions. Like fire, the intensity of the poet's emotion burns out the non-essentials, all attention is concentrated and the basic emotion, and the gain in poignancy is enormous. It comes directly out of the heart of the poet, and so goes directly to the heart of the readers. The lyric at its best is poignant, pathetic and intense.

6. Spontaneity is another important quality of a lyric. The lyric poet sings in strains of unpremeditated art. He sings effortlessly because he must, because of the inner urge for self-expression. Any conscious effort on his part, makes the lyric look unnatural and artificial.

William Blake is a lyric poet. He was born in the neo- classical age, but the things that distinguish him from other poets of his age are the lyrical qualities of his poetry. By the lyrical qualities we understand such poetic features as subjectivity, melodiousness, imagination, description and meditation. Moreover a lyric poem is usually short and may fall into such genres as elegy, ode, ballad, sonnet etc. A lyric poem expresses a poet's private thoughts and emotions rather than telling a story. From all these perspectives the poems of Blake in Songs of Innocence and Experience are lyrics.

The first quality that makes his poems lyrics is subjectivity. The neo-classical approach to poetry was objective. Blake on the other hand took a subjective approach. Blake was a disturbing prophet who desired social change. He was personally against all kinds of repressions, materialism, institutional corruption, racism, worship of money and hypocrisy.

Blake voiced against repression and constrains. He did not follow the neo-classical restrains of writing poem. He also expressed his hatred towards institutional and personal repressions in such poems as- The Holy Thursday, The Nurse's Songs (Experience),

In Blake's time many children had to depend upon charity. In his poem 'Holy Thursday', Blake raises his voice against such repression.

And their sun does never shine,
And their fields are bleak and bare,
And their as are filled with thorns
It is eternal winter there.

Blake means here that all children are angles, not scapegoats to be the butchered on the altar of the society. How can England call herself rich and fruitful land if she has hunger children waiting for food from the so-called benefactors of society? Blake believes that children should be free and their life should be colourful. But the guardians always try to restrict them. Blake opposes such kind of restriction. In Nurse's Song, the nurse keeps a constant watch over the children and her instincts reflect her disposition. From her angle of view, life is aimless, a useless waste of time in childhood and in old age, a shame. It has no purpose as she says:

Our spring and our day are wasted in play,
And your winter and night in disguise.

She sets all her views in a depressing background such as winter, night, and dew darkness and so on. She looks back with frustration on her childhood, and instead of feeling merry she grows pale. Her 'spring' and "day" seem to express the agony of growing up to a regretful maturity. She is hostile and insensitive to innocence. She takes the children back home, leaving them unable to protest, to play and enjoy.

William Blake dislikes Industrial Revolution and in his poems he focuses how the Industrial Revolution represents the devil and that it must be purged. Blake focused on child labour and prostitution-the two adverse effects of Industrialization Revolution in his poems The Chimney Sweeper and London.

Blake hated the exploitation of children's labour because of Industrial Revolution. Blake believed in the innocence of childhood pleasures. The Chimney Sweeper by William Blake expressed the difficult lives of working children. As the title reveals it, the children are cleaning chimneys all day long in unimaginable conditions. Blake gives his readers a clear understanding of the harsh conditions of these young chimney sweepers. He says:

"There's little Tom Dacre, who cried when his head
That curl'd like a lamb's back,"

Blake focuses how badly these children are left powerless and with no escape. On another instance, the poem relates the misery felt by these children when it says:

"A little black thing among the snow
Crying " 'weep, 'weep," in notes of woe!"

Blake is here pointing out that man is responsible for evils of society. The picture drawn by Blake is disturbing and heart-breaking at the same time.

In his poem "London," from his work Songs of Experience, Blake describes the woes of the Industrial Revolution. He describes the Thames River and the city streets as "chartered," or controlled by commercial interest. He refers to "mind-forged manacles"; he relates that every man's face contains "Marks of weakness, marks of woe"; and he discusses the "every cry of every Man" and "every Infant's cry of fear."

In "London" Blake describes a world during and after the industrial revolution in which there have been many ill-fated side effects as people move away from the traditional farming families and their beliefs.

Blake vividly portrays another worse effect of Industrial revolution, "prostitution", in his poem "London". A prostitute or an unwed mother is unable to rejoice in her child's birth. It tells of a married couple looking down upon her for what she does in order to make a living. This is ironic because the business of prostitution is caused in part by the restrictions placed upon the married man. It is also ironic because the married man is what has created the need for, and use of prostitutes. The harlot curses the respectable and polite society because it is they who have created the demand for her, and then look down upon what she does. "Blights with plagues" implies that perhaps she also infects them with some sort of venereal disease. The final words of the poem, "Marriage hearse" compares marriage to death. The narrator sees marriage as another type of restriction placed upon man by society, marriage is a sort of death in man's ability to be free to do as he wishes.

Blake believed in equality for all men, and this is reflected in his poem. William Blake's The Little Black Boy revolves around the theme of slavery and the ideal slave's mentality. Blake wrote about a black African-American and his experience with slavery. Blake probably expressed his own feelings towards the whites' racism and suppression acts towards African-Americans through the black boy, which is the speaker of the poem.

The poem is about an African-American, who is the speaker of the poem, who remembers his childhood with his mother where she used to indoctrinate her child with the racist beliefs of slavers. The black boy has a dream, that all humans will be equal.

Blake stands against puritan hypocrisy. Two of his poems from Songs of Experience present his views on the matter: 'The Chimney Sweeper' and "The Garden of Love'. In 'The Chimney Sweeper', the child (Blake) is telling society that his pain is being caused by those in whom he put his trust— his parents. They abandon him and go ...to praise God & his Priest & King (Blake, 11). Perhaps they do this, because on the outside their child looks happy and they probably think that they are helping him more than anything:

' And because I am happy, & dance& sing
They think they have done me no injury,'

In the meantime, the church is also playing a part in his misery. How? Because it allows the parents to come inside its building to pray when they should be protecting their child from all harm:

'They are both gone up to the church to pray
………………
………………
a heaven of our misery "

All of Blake's poem are short, some very short indeed. All are written in apparently simple style, and the most usual verse form in the rhymed quatrain. (stanza of four lines). A lyric poem is usually melodious. In many of Blake's poem like "The Tyger" we find melodious tone.

In what distant deeps or skies
Burnt the fire of thine eyes?
On what wings dare he aspire?
What the hand dare seize the fire?

For Blake "imagination" is that gift in man, which can hear the prompting's of God, or "spiritual sensation". 'Introduction' is a canonical poem of the romantic period. In it lies the key romantic element: imagination, emotion, idealism. In "Introduction" to Songs of Innocence Blake as a poet, playing his simple and innocent music attracts the attention of a muse or spirit that appears to him as a child on a cloud. The child encourages him to play a song about a "Lamb" and being impressed with the musician asks him to drop his pipe and write a book "that all may read". In this way the spirit is asking Blake to share his inspiration with a wider audience, an audience that would not depend on his presence to experience the happiness his imagination can bring.

Sometimes Blake asks question about creation: how can we understand a God who is capable of creating the innocence of the lamb and the fury of the tiger? The Tyger (Songs of Experience) is Blake's famous meditative poem. The tiger is Blake's symbol for the "abundant life", and for regeneration. Centrally, it Tyger! Tyger! Burning bright

In the forests of the night,
What immortal hand or eye
Dare frame thy fearful smmetry?

Nature was not the central focus of Blake's poems, but it was a theme that did occur in many of his works, such as "Nurse's Song" "The Lamb", "Earth's Answer", "The Garden of Love", "To Spring" and "To the Evening Star".

Each of his poems is a vehicle of expressing his personal emotion. It seems his art had been too adventurous and unconventional for the late eighteenth and early nineteenth century, and we may even say he was ahead of his time.

William Blake's views of life concerning innocence and experience

William Blake, being a visionary and mystic poet, could see the contemporary real picture of the society and foresee the coming crisis and offered suggestions to relieve from it, and put them into his writings. His dealing matter is more spiritual than physical. In his "Songs of Innocence and of Experience", he expresses two states of soul – innocence and experience and how the first one gradually turns to the second. (By a conscious going through these songs, we can realize Blake's views of life, concerning innocence and experience.)

At first we can take a general idea of Blake's views or philosophy. It "asserts the contrariety of systems with regard to soul and the other objects of creation." And this contrary is between the stage of innocence and of experience. The stage of experience is energetic and unavoidable for human salvation. He says "without contrary is no progression." For him 'good' is the passive that obeys reason whereas 'evil' is the active stemming out from energy.

At the stage of innocence, a soul remains very natural, joyful, universal and related to God Himself. But, after facing the hardness, cruelty and worldliness, and getting freedom of choice, it reaches the stage of experience. Almost in every case, it is encouraged or compelled to be converted into the stage of experience by the surroundings. Here one thing is mentionable that the latter stage is more important than the former because from the latter, there is a possibility of reaching the stage of higher or greater innocence, but the former is a heavenly thing.

Now we can look at the songs how the poet treats, with his excellent use of symbols, the stages and how the first turns to the second.

At the very introductory poem of the innocence, we are informed the nature of innocence. The setting of the poem is natural, pastoral and joyful, and it is about the children under the guidance of God, as 'a child' and 'lamb' represent Christ himself in the following lines-

"On a cloud I saw a child
And he laughing said to me
'Pipe a song about a lamb!' "

And at last

"Every child may joy to hear"

That means the followers of innocence may enjoy to hear the songs. On the other hand, the 'Introduction' of the song of experience expresses the nature of experience. It begins with these lines-

Here the voice of the Bard!
Who Present, Past and Future sees;
Whose ears have heard
The Holy word,
That walked among the ancient trees,

That is, the speaker himself is experienced here and not bound to anyone. Moreover, in this poem there is 'the lapsed soul', representing the human being that was expelled from the Garden of Eden through bitter experience. However, at last of the poem, there is a hint of regeneration and salvation of this mankind.

According to Blake, through experience, the innocent 'lamb' becomes the dreadful 'Tyger'. The symbolic poem 'The Lamb' represents the meek and mild part of human soul which is connected to the 'child' as well as 'lamb' or Christ, as we mentioned earlier. On the other hand, the poem, 'the Tyger', symbolizes the strong, reckless and harsher side of human soul. It is just opposite to the lamb. Even the poet himself is surprised at this creation-

"Did he who made the lamb make thee?"

There are two poems under same name, 'The Chimney Sweeper', in both sections of innocence and experience, but they are different in nature. This different sort of harsh profession of the child is resulted from the Industrial Revolution which moved the poet much. However, in the first poem, though he has to work hard, the child is satisfied with the thought of getting God as his father and of the fact that –

" if all do their duty they need not fear harm"

On the other hand, the child in the second poem of same name is just the prey to the contemporary church system that the parents of poor children go to church, leaving their children working for chimney sweeping. The chimney sweeper is now experienced not for his own wish but by the cruel society. So, he is sad not cheerful, though he ironically expresses it.

Again, there is another pair of poems named 'Holy Thursday'; both show the children of the charity school serving for the church. However, the first one shows them as 'flowers of London town!' and 'angles;' and advises the authority to be tender to them; giving hints of coming misery. On the contrary, the second one questions, seeing their misery, about their serving for the church –

Is that trembling cry a song?
Can it be a song of joy?
And so many children poor?
It is a land of poverty!

We see another pair of poems under same name. 'The Nurse's Song' in the innocence shows the nurse as innocent caretaker granting the children's claim to play more time. But the second one in the experience shows the contrary state. Here the nurse is experienced and grave, and she has no passion for joy, play and merriment. She can not bear with the children's playing.

In this context, in Coleridge's 'The Rime of the Ancient Mariner', we see that the innocent wedding guest, coming to the feast, did not attend there, after he had heard the story of the mariner's journey; he became grave because he had been experienced through hearing the story. In the same way the experienced stage of life becomes grave which can not accept the natural joy and pleasure.

'The Divine Image' in innocence with the definite article 'The', means the real, one and only divine Image which includes Mercy, Pity, Peace and love –

"Where Mercy, love and Pity dwell,
There God is dwelling too."

On the contrary, 'A Divine Image' in the experience, with indefinite article 'A', points at a particular divine image which has a unique growth. It shows the basic social thing of the experienced and cruel world, ironically saying:

"Cruelty has a human heart
And Jealousy a human face
Terror the human form of divine
And Secrecy the human dress."

C.M. Bowra, a critic, in his 'Romantic Imagination' comments on Blake's view of innocence and experience: "The two sections of Blake's book, the 'Songs of Innocence' and the 'Songs of Experience', are contrasted elements in a single design. The first part sets out an imaginative vision of the state of innocence; the second part shows how life challenges and corrupts and destroys it."

William Blake's Criticism of Society in his Poems

William Blake, as a critic of his time, took an active role in exposing the corruption taking place in his society. He also describes the woes and injustices of civilized society. According to Blake, men are short sighted and blind and they are ignorant of the spiritual nature of life. In this role Blake appears as a critic of the age and of contemporary condition.

William Blake wrote about how the industrial revolution represents the devil and that it must be purged. Blake focused on child labour and prostitution-the two adverse effects of Industrialization Revolution.

In his poem "London," from his work Songs of Experience, Blake describes the woes of the Industrial Revolution. He describes the Thames River and the city streets as "chartered," or controlled by commercial interest. He refers to "mind-forged manacles"; he relates that every man's face contains "Marks of weakness, marks of woe"; and he discusses the "every cry of every Man" and "every Infant's cry of fear."

"London" describes a world during and after the industrial revolution in which there have been many ill-fated side effects as people move away from the traditional farming families and their beliefs.

Prostitution is one of the worse effects of Industrial revolution. A prostitute or an unwed mother is unable to rejoice in her child's birth. It tells of a married couple looking down upon her for what she does in order to make a living. This is ironic because the business of prostitution is caused in part by the restrictions placed upon the married man. It is also ironic because the married man is what has created the need for, and use of prostitutes. The harlot curses the respectable and polite society because it is they who have created the demand for her, and then look down upon what she does. "Blights with plagues" implies that perhaps she also infects them with some sort of venereal disease. The final words of the poem, "Marriage hearse" compares marriage to death. The narrator sees marriage as another type of restriction placed upon man by society, marriage is a sort of death in man's ability to be free to do as he wishes.

He also criticizes the institutions that remained silent in the faces of injustice. 'Holy Thursday' is an indictment of a society which allows children to depend upon charity.

And their sun does never shine,
And their fields are bleak and bare,
And their as are filled with thorns
It is eternal winter there.

Blake means here that all children are angles, not scapegoats to be the butchered on the altar of the society. How can England call herself rich and fruitful land if she has hunger children waiting for food from the so-called benefactors of society?

In the poem "A divine Image' the poet says that cruelty, jealousy, terror and secrecy are human qualities. Cruelty may be seen in the heart of man, jealousy may be seen in the face of man. Terror is visible in the human shape which we call divine. Secrecy is the dress or the garment which human beings wear.

In conclusion, it can be easily seen how Blake stood against the suffering of human kind and used his poems to expose the corruption of the world that surrounded him. He clearly criticized the society and hoped that people would take action to change things for the better. The problems in Blake's society aren't very different than the ones in today's world. People should take a good look around them and take action to better their surroundings.

John Keats

No less individual and unique than the poetry of Byron and Shelley is that of the third member of this group, John Keats, who is, in a wholesome way, the most conspicuous great representative in English poetry since Chaucer of the spirit of 'Art for Art's sake.' Keats was born in London in 1795, the first son of a livery-stable keeper. Romantic emotion and passionateness were among his chief traits from the start; but he was equally distinguished by a generous spirit, physical vigor (though he was very short in build), and courage. His younger brothers he loved intensely and fought fiercely. At boarding-school, however, he turned from headstrong play to enthusiastic reading of Spenser and other great English and Latin poets and of dictionaries of Greek and Roman mythology and life. An orphan at fourteen, the mismanagement of his guardians kept him always in financial difficulties, and he was taken from school and apprenticed to a suburban surgeon. After five years of study and hospital practice the call of poetry proved too strong, and he abandoned his profession to revel in Spenser, Shakespeare, and the Italian epic authors. He now became an enthusiastic disciple of the literary and political radical, Leigh Hunt, in whose home at Hampstead he spent much time. Hunt was a great poetic stimulus to Keats, but he is largely responsible for the flippant jauntiness and formlessness of Keats' earlier poetry, and the connection brought on Keats from the outset the relentless hostility of the literacy critics, who had dubbed Hunt and his friends 'The Cockney [i.e., Vulgar] School of Poetry.'

Keats' first little volume of verse, published in 1817, when he was twenty-one,-contained some delightful poems and clearly displayed most of his chief tendencies. It was followed the next year by his longest poem, 'Endymion,' where he uses, one of the vaguely beautiful Greek myths as the basis for the expression of his own delight in the glory of the world and of youthful sensations. As a narrative the poem is wandering, almost chaotic; that it is immature Keats himself frankly admitted in his preface; but in luxuriant loveliness of sensuous imagination it is unsurpassed. Its theme, and indeed the theme of all Keats' poetry, may be said to be found in its famous first line--'A thing of beauty is a joy forever.' The remaining three years of Keats' life were mostly tragic. 'Endymion' and its author were brutally attacked in 'The Quarterly Review' and 'Blackwood's Magazine.' The sickness and death, from consumption, of one of Keats' dearly-loved brothers was followed by his infatuation with a certain Fanny Brawne, a commonplace girl seven years younger than himself. This infatuation thenceforth divided his life with poetry and helped to create in him a restless impatience that led him, among other things, to an unhappy effort to force his genius, in the hope of gain, into the very unsuitable channel of play-writing. But restlessness did not weaken his genuine and maturing poetic power; his third and last volume, published in 1820, and including 'The Eve of St. Agnes,' 'Isabella,' 'Lamia,' the fragmentary 'Hyperion,' and his half dozen great odes, probably contains more poetry of the highest order than any other book of original verse, of so small a size, ever sent from the press. By this time, however, Keats himself was stricken with consumption, and in the effort to save his life a warmer climate was the last resource. Lack of sympathy with Shelley and his poetry led him to reject Shelley's generous offer of entertainment at Pisa, and he sailed with his devoted friend the painter Joseph Severn to southern Italy. A few months later, in 1821, he died at Rome, at the age of twenty-five. His tombstone, in a neglected corner of the Protestant cemetery just outside the city wall, bears among other words those which in bitterness of spirit he himself had dictated: 'Here lies one whose name was writ in water.' But, in fact, not only had he created more g achieved by any other man at so early an age, but probably no other influence was to prove so great as his on the poets of the next generation.

The most important qualities of his poetry stand out clearly:

He is, as we have implied, the great apostle of full though not unhealthy enjoyment of external Beauty, the beauty of the senses. He once said: 'I feel sure I should write, from the mere yearning and tenderness I have for the beautiful, even if my night's labors should be burnt every morning and no eye ever rest upon them.' His use of beauty in his poetry is marked at first by passionate Romantic abandonment and always by lavish Romantic richness. This passion was partly stimulated in him by other poets, largely by the Italians, and especially by Spenser, from one of whose minor poems Keats chose the motto for his first volume: 'What more felicity can fall to creature than to enjoy delight with liberty?' Shelley's enthusiasm for Beauty, as we have seen, is somewhat similar to that of Keats. But for both Spenser and Shelley, in different fashions, external Beauty is only the outer garment of the Platonic spiritual Beauty, while to Keats in his poetry it is, in appearance at least, almost everything. He once exclaimed, even, 'Oh for a life of sensations rather than of thoughts!' Notable in his poetry is the absence of any moral purpose and of any interest in present-day life and character, particularly the absence of the democratic feeling which had figured so largely in most of his Romantic predecessors. These facts must not be over-emphasized, however. His famous final phrasing of the great poetic idea--'Beauty is truth, truth beauty'--itself shows consciousness of realities below the surface, and the inference which is sometimes hastily drawn that he was personally a fiberless dreamer is as far as possible from the truth. In fact he was always vigorous and normal, as well as sensitive; he was always devoted to outdoor life; and his very attractive letters, from which his nature can best be judged, are not only overflowing with unpretentious and cordial human feeling but testify that he was not really unaware of specific social and moral issues. Indeed, occasional passages in his poems indicate that he intended to deal with these issues in other poems when he should feel his powers adequately matured. Whether, had he lived, he would have proved capable of handling them significantly is one of the questions which must be left to conjecture, like the other question whether his power of style would have further developed. Almost all of Keats' poems are exquisite and luxuriant in their embodiment of sensuous beauty, but 'The Eve of St. Agnes,' in Spenser's richly lingering stanza, must be especially mentioned.

Keats is one of the supreme masters of poetic expression, expression the most beautiful, apt, vivid, condensed, and imaginatively suggestive. His poems are noble storehouses of such lines as these:

> The music, yearning like a God in pain.
> Into her dream he melted, as the rose
> Blendeth its odour with the violet.
> Magic casements, opening on the foam
> Of perilous seas, in faery lands forlorn.

It is primarily in this respect that he has been the teacher of later poets. Keats never attained dramatic or narrative power or skill in the presentation of individual character. In place of these elements he has the lyric gift of rendering moods. Aside from ecstatic delight, these are mostly moods of pensiveness, languor, or romantic sadness, like the one so magically suggested in the 'Ode to a Nightingale,' of Ruth standing lonely and 'in tears amid the alien corn.'

Conspicuous in Keats is his spiritual kinship with the ancient Greeks. He assimilated with eager delight all the riches of the Greek imagination, even though he never learned the language and was dependent on the dull mediums of dictionaries and translations. It is not only that his recognition of the permanently significant and beautiful embodiment of the central facts of life in the Greek stories led him to select some of them as the subjects for several of his most important poems; but his whole feeling, notably his feeling for Nature, seems almost precisely that of the Greeks, especially, perhaps, of the earlier generations among whom their mythology took shape. To him also Nature appears alive with divinities. Walking through the woods he almost expects to catch glimpses of hamadryads peering from their trees, nymphs rising from the fountains, and startled fauns with shaggy skins and cloven feet scurrying away among the bushes.

In his later poetry, also, the deeper force of the Greek spirit led him from his early Romantic formlessness to the achievement of the most exquisite classical perfection of form and finish. His Romantic glow and emotion never fade or cool, but such poems as the Odes to the Nightingale and to a Grecian Urn, and the fragment of 'Hyperion,' are absolutely flawless and satisfying in structure and expression.

John Keats' Negative Capability

The Romantic poet John Keats (1795-1821) coined the phrase 'Negative Capability' in a letter written to his brothers George and Thomas on the 21 December, 1817. In this letter he defined his new concept of writing: I mean Negative Capability, that is when man is capable of being in uncertainties, Mysteries, doubts, without any irritable reaching after fact and reason.

What Keats is advocating is a removal of the intellectual self while writing (or reading) poetry – after all:

> Beauty is truth, truth beauty – that is all
> Ye know on earth and all ye need know
> - Ode on a Grecian Urn, lines 49-50

Throughout his poetry and letters Keats proposes the theory that beauty is valuable in itself and that it does not need to declare anything for us to know that it is important. That is, beauty does not have to refer to anything beyond itself: I am certain of nothing but the holiness of the Heart's affections and the truth of Imagination - What the imagination seizes as Beauty must be truth – whether it existed before or not – for I have the same Idea of all our Passions as of Love they are all in their sublime, creative of essential Beauty. - Keats in letter to Benjamin Bailey (Saturday 22 November, 1817)

It is this ability to hold onto a beautiful truth despite the fact that it does not fit into an intellectual system that Keats praises in Shakespeare. He criticizes Coleridge for letting go 'by a thin isolated verisimilitude... from being incapable of remaining content with half knowledge' where he should realise that 'beauty overcomes every other consideration, or rather obliterates all consideration' (Keats in a letter to his brothers [Sunday 21 December, 1817]).

Keats' poems are full of contradictions in meaning ('a drowsy numbness pains') and emotion ('both together, sane and mad') and he accepts a double nature as a creative insight. In Ode to a Nightingale it is the apparent (or real) contradictions that allow Keats to create the sensual and hedonistic feeling of numbness that allows the reader to experience the half-swooning emotion Keats is trying to capture. Keats would have us experience the emotion of the language and pass over the half-truths in silence, to live a life 'of sensations rather than of Thoughts!' (letter to Benjamin Bailey [Saturday 22 November 1817]). Keats here can be seen to be extending Kant's principle that much thought is sublingual by making the meaning of words less important than their 'feel'. Since you can very often not find the exact word that you need (showing that much of your thinking occurs without language) Keats often deals in the sensations created by words rather than meaning. Even if the precise definition of words causes contradiction they can still be used together to create the right ambience. Negative Capability asks us to allow the atmosphere of Keats' poems to surround us without picking out individual meanings and inconsistencies.

Whatever the complicated relations between Truth and Beauty and their respective definitions, what matters to Keats are moments of intense feeling that combine 'thought' and 'emotion' in appreciating beauty. This explains why much of Keats' poetry is devoted to catching, and holding, moments of beauty. Keats addresses this desire directly in Ode on a Grecian Urn (lines 15 – 20) where he writes,

> Fair youth, beneath the trees, thou canst not leave
> Thy song, nor ever can those trees be bare;
> Bold Lover, never, never canst thou kiss,
> Though winning near the goal – yet, do not grieve;
> She cannot fade, tho thou hast not thy bliss,
> For ever wilt thou love, and she be fair.

Throughout this poem, and many others, Keats captures moments, like that of the 'fair youth' stooping to kiss his lover, and holds them to prevent change and decay, revelling in that moment of perfection.

In many of Keats' poems this need to hold a perfect instant leads to an excited tone, an almost excessive use of superlatives and an atmosphere of crushing, voluptuous intensity as Keats demonstrates the depth of his appreciation for the beautiful and in the act of appreciation creates poems as exquisite as that which he is admiring. Keats' Negative Capability is the ability to bask in the beautiful without questioning either it or his methods of description. In other words to take beauty simply as it is.

Keats' Odes: Pain and Beauty

Each of the five poems by John Keats, "Bards of Passion and Mirth," "Ode on a Grecian Urn," "Ode to Melancholy," "Ode to Autumn," and "Ode to a Nightingale," all come back to their common theme: the binary nature of the human soul. As a Romantic poet Keats' works seem to agree with the idea that the human experience is characterized by pain. Moreover, Keats links beauty and pain together, a concept that seems contradictory. He does this by his implications that there we can transport ourselves from pain and into beauty and even nature. This begs the question: Can we really leave pain through the imagination or through the appreciation of beauty? For example, if we long for something we will never obtain, can we escape that tragedy through the imagination? Is longing an inevitable condition of the human experience? The answers vary, especially in relation to time and what part of our lives we are in.

As seen in the works of Wordsworth and Blake in addition to Keats poems, we are led to believe that the human soul is double sided. There is pain and there is joy. There is passion and hatred and then there is apathy. There is good and evil, right and wrong. From "Bards of Passion and Mirth," the concept that the soul itself is a contradiction is best shown in lines 31 through 34 when Keats mentions the contrasting experiences we mortals face on a daily basis:

Of their sorrows and delights;
Of their passions and their spites;
Of their glory and their shame;
What doth strengthen and what maim.

This emphasizes that sorrow, for example, draws upon delight to define the separation between the two just as delight does sorrow. Keats upholds the belief that to understand one, the presence of its opponent is required. In "Ode on a Grecian Urn," the greatest contrast drawn in relation to the human soul is Time. Life passes quickly with Time. Keats says to the urn, "Thou shalt remain," which means that the Grecian urn will stay and pass through each generation. Also, the urn depicts moments in life that are frozen in time. Although the human soul changes and transforms, that which is seen on the Grecian urn never will. It is stuck. In "Ode to Melancholy," Keats mentions the passing of moods: "But when the melancholy fit shall fall." This implies that sadness comes and goes, prior to the "fit" the soul or being was in a state of something else. This idea is upheld in "Ode to Autumn," too. Keats speaks reverently of autumn but autumn, as beautiful as it is has a sad side to it. Autumn is the slowing of the nights, the cooling of the air, the aging of the year, and the withering of life because at the end of autumn is winter, which, for many people is associated with death and the End. "Ode to a Nightingale," supports this theme, too. The idea gleaned from this particular ode is ironic. In the Poem, the speaker is pained by his overwhelming joy at the nightingale's song. This is the essence of the human soul; it is a state of utter irony. This main idea was a common focus for the Romantics. It also relates to the idea of thesis and antithesis joining to become a synthesis, or in other words, the quintessence of experiences and emotions.

Another trademark Romantic idea was that life is characterized by pain. I feel that his is, in many cases, true. We can be defined by our pain and we can be defined by how we handle it. All of life is a test. It is hard. It is a struggle and we are put on earth to see how we fair- that is one way of looking at it. The other way is to see life as a state of suffering before the final reward. Either way, life is about pain. Pain is natural. It is good for us. It keeps us grounded.

In Keats' works, I think that pain and beauty are so closely linked is because Keats believed that we could escape pain if we could delve ourselves in to the appreciation of beauty or nature. It is possible to "escape" pain through appreciation of beauty or through the imagination. However, this is nothing more than the utilization of another object to distract us from a harsh reality. Oftentimes, we are miserable, we are told to do something rather than nothing. This keeps us from brooding. We can use our imagination to get away from what is happening. This can seem silly, if not immature, to pretend like something is not really happening, but sometimes it is necessary.

The initial link between beauty and pain is due to the fact that beauty can bring pain. A lover pining after a 'beauty" is in a kind of pain: heartsickness. We can be pained by beauty. The knowing that beauty doesn't last, that beauty dies, is a painful thought. In, "Ode to a Grecian Urn," the scene of the two lovers expresses the pain of passing beauty and love in a round-a-bout way.

Bold Lover, never never canst thou kiss,
Though winning near the goal-yet do not grieve;
She cannot fade, though thou hast not thy bliss,
For ever wilt thou love, and she be fair!

This is unlike in life where we can love and love will dissipate, and beauty can bloom and then will wither. Keats moves us out of the pain of knowing that there will never be change or growth and lightens the mood by pointing out that the beauty and happiness found in the urn is permanently preserved. Keats offers advice about how to take away the pain of a moment and transform it into another emotion in "Ode to Melancholy." "…glut thy sorrow on a morning rose/ Or on the wealth of globed peonies…" Here, Keats suggests that we move the magnitude of our emotions from sadness to the appreciation of something beautiful. "Ode to Autumn" has a similar lesson. Autumn, as mentioned before, has a withering, "winnowing," dying beauty. After harvest, the "stubble plain" and trees are left bare, the cider press only oozes, the swallows are gathering to leave the skies silent." In this instance, beauty and pain are linked in that beauty can cause pain. Autumn is a very pretty season but it has a forlorn undertone. "Ode to a Nightingale" best represents the pain of beauty. Keats begins this idea by saying that in life, in reality, there are many troubles and woes and this nightingale's song is a way of escape. If he could use alcohol to be with the nightingale, to be a part of that experience, which knows nothing of the human woes, he would find it much preferable to living in the human reality. He is so happy listening to the nightingale that he could die. Keats is then saddened by the knowledge that nightingale will continue to sing his beautiful song, "Still wouldst thou sing, and I have ears in vain," even when he is dead and can no longer enjoy the song. For him, the beauty will not last. Then he says to us that in death, there is no more pain.

> Now more than ever it seems rich to die,
> To cease upon the midnight with no pain,
> While thou art pouring forth thy soul abroad
> In such an ecstasy!

Pain and beauty can also be linked by how they both relate to longing for something that we cannot have. As in the case of the Grecian Urn, the two lovers can never have their joy but it is a comfort, in a way that they will always be beautiful and always in love. It is still a disappointment, though, to always have something out of reach. It is part of life though; it is inevitable. If we let longing be synonymous with pain, it is absolutely natural and an expected art of life. A common lesson that we see is that even if you have everything n the world, there will always be something lacking. You will always want something more. I do not think that the Romantics wanted us to circumvent the human state. And argument for that might be that they explained a lot of issues that people have and lessons that people sometimes learn the hard way but I think that the Romantics wanted us to go through the full range of emotions so that we were able to fully know what it means to feel, to live, to be.

Another thread that runs through all five of these poems is age (and the progression of life). From "Bards" we understand that wisdom is something that comes with age and when we die we are endowed with divine wisdom. From "Urn" we learn that age is ephemeral. The urn will teach the coming generations that will age and pass like the previous generations, and this follows the idea that with age comes wisdom and even sadness. In "Melancholy," again, life is fleeting, death comes fast enough and we should not quicken its pace: "For shade to shade will come too drowsily/And drown the wakeful anguish of the soul." Here, Keats is telling us not to give in to a fit of melancholy and end it all but to refocus our energy into something better. From "Autumn," we are told that in youth, or Spring, there is a beauty in it but old age, Autumn, has its own beauty, even though it is a fading and tragic beauty. Finally, in "Nightingale," we see that although there is joy in being young and sadness in aging and dying, on "the other side" of dying is eternal joy.

Keats as a Writer of odes

(i) Introduction: - Originally ode was a Greek form of verse, but odes have been written in Latin Poetry also. It meant a poetic composition written to be sung to the music of lyre. So it is known as lyrical in character. But when ode form came into the hands of the English writers, the idea of Music was considered to be essential and it became a type of lyric poem only. Thus in the context of English poetry, ode can be defined as a lyrical poem which expresses exalted or enthusiastic emotion in respect of a theme which is dignified and it does so in a metrical form.

(ii) Characteristics of an Ode: - Following are the characteristics of an ode.

(a) It is an address to an abstract object which means that it is written to and not written about.
(b) Ode is a natural and spontaneous overflow of the feelings of its writer.
(c) The ode must be highly serious in character due to its dignified theme.
(d) Its language and style should also be dignified and elevated.
(d) The ode must exhibit a very clear, logic in the development of thought of its writer.
(f) The ode can adopt any of the metres regular or irregular.

(iii) Keats' Odes

John- Keats dwelt on various forms of writing. But none of them has given him as great success as the ode form. Therefore Keats is always remembered as a writer of odes, Again, Keats holds a leading rank among the ode writers of English literature.

(iv) Unity of impression

The first and foremost quality of his odes is their unity of impression. The major odes of Keats — "Ode to a Nightingale", "Ode on a Grecian Urn" and "Ode to Autumn" Malancholy" have a common subject and theme. In all these odes the development of mood is more or less similar and the mood develops in a shape of drama, i.e. first the mood takes birth, it develops, reaches climax and finally the anticlimax takes place.

(v) Ode to Nightingale

Now we study the dramatic development of Keats's mood with reference to his odes. The very of opening stanza of "Ode to Nightingale" takes Keats in a mood of escape, He wants to escape from fever and fret of life. He longs for intoxicant, either a draught of vintage or "a beaker full of the warm sough to help him fade away into the form that is the nightingale's abode. Foreign to the worries of life, he wants to share the joys of nightingale in his imagination. He wants to live in the world of "immortal bird" that was not born for death. He says; "thou was not born for death, oh Immortal bird."

(vi) Ode on Grecian Urn

Similarly in "Ode on Grecian Urn", Keats is fully aware that in real life, every thing is short lived and fleeting. But the urn which is the great piece of art gives him a sense of immortality. The pictures curved upon it are immortal because they are fresh and vigorous from centuries. In both these poems the fascinating clement for Keats in the world of imagination. As he says in "Ode on Grecian urn;" Heard melodies are sweet, but those unheard are sweater,

The other binding element between nightingale and urn is their permanence. The song of nightingale is immortal; similarity the art that produced the urn is also immortal.

Escape into the world of imagination takes the two poems to a point of climax but in the right tradition of dramatic development, the anti-climax takes place and this anticlimax brings Keats back to the world of reality. In the "Ode to Nightingale", the world "Forlorn" and in "Ode on a Grecian Urn", the Urn's death brings Keats back into the world of man.

(vii) Ode to Autumn and Ode on Melancholy

"Ode to Autumn" can be read in the same light It depicts the theme of ripeness, decay and death in describing the natural cycle of seasons; Autumn winter, spring, summer. In "Ode on Melancholy" the throne of poem is that joys. and beauty are a source of human misery because they are short living. Thus WC have seen that there is a unifying force behind the great Odes of Keats.

We find that Keats undergoes various stages of development which a Shakespearean hero experiences. In the beginning he is in the position of Hamlet. He does not wish where to be or where not to be. "to be or riot be, that's question. " He continues to hang between the world of . reality and the world of imagination. But towards the end of his two odes, "Ode to a Nightingale and Ode on a Grecian Urn", we find that Keats has developed himself up to Hamlet's state of readiness as after his escape he is ready to accept the realities of life as they are. Keats did in odes o what Shakespeare had already done in dramas.

(viii) Keats' Negative Capability

In short, when Ode form came to Keats it reached the height of perfection and subjectivity. It was primarily under the influence of Shakespeare's negative capability that Keats came to adopt this form of verse. He wanted to attain that perfection in negative capability which Shakespeare had achieved in his dramas, but Keats found that instead of drama, Ode form of verse was best suited to his purpose.

Negative capability is a capacity to negate one's individual self and to assume the very personality of the person whom the writer wants to portray. It is a capacity to be like water with no colour of its own, but capable of assuming any colour that is put into it. Keats has been able to acquire this negative capability in his Odes and this is his individual contribution to this form of verse.

(ix) His Style

The style of the odes is as unifying as their mood and theme. Every ode has the same perfection of language. He makes use of a beautiful vocabulary. Every word is as full of meaning as it is beautiful. The language is concise, exact and concentrated. The right word has been used at the right place. The technical excellence of odes is as great as their poetical. In his odes, – we has the best and finest of Keats which is also best and finest in his poetry. Keat's odes, to sum up, are the best form of verse as far this genre is concerned. We may not find any other poet, a writer of odes, who can equal Keats in his cadence, rhythm and perfection as well as the sublimity of their themes.

Ode to a Nightingale : Summary and Critical Analysis

Summary

Keats is in a state of uncomfortable drowsiness. Envy of the imagined happiness of the nightingale is not responsible for his condition; rather, it is a reaction to the happiness he has experienced through sharing in the happiness of the nightingale. The bird's happiness is conveyed in its singing.

Keats longs for a draught of wine which would take him out of himself and allow him to join his existence with that of the bird. The wine would put him in a state in which he would no longer be himself, aware that life is full of pain that the young die, the old suffer, and that just to think about life brings sorrow and despair. But wine is not needed to enable him to escape. His imagination will serve just as well. As soon as he realizes this, he is, in spirit, lifted up above the trees and can see the moon and the stars even though where he is physically there is only a glimmering of light. He cannot see what flowers are growing around him, but from their odour and from his knowledge of what flowers should be in bloom at the time he can guess.

In the darkness he listens to the nightingale. Now, he feels, it would be a rich experience to die, "to cease upon the midnight with no pain" while the bird would continue to sing ecstatically. Many a time, he confesses, he has been "half in love with easeful Death." The nightingale is free from the human fate of having to die. The song of the nightingale that he is listening to was heard in ancient times by emperor and peasant. Perhaps even Ruth (whose story is told in the Old Testament) heard it.

"Forlorn," the last word of the preceding stanza, brings Keats in the concluding stanza back to consciousness of what he is and where he is. He cannot escape even with the help of the imagination. The singing of the bird grows fainter and dies away. The experience he has had seems so strange and confusing that he is not sure whether it was a vision or a daydream. He is even uncertain whether he is asleep or awake.

Critical Analysis

Keats's Ode to a Nightingale is considered one of the finest odes in English Literature. It reveals the highest imaginative powers of the poet. The poem was inspired by the song of a nightingale which the poet heard in the gardens of his friend Charles Brown.

The sweet music of the nightingale sent the poet in rapture and one morning he took his chair from the breakfast table, put it on the grass-plot under the plum tree and composed the poem. After he had finished the poem he came back with scraps of paper in his hand. Brown rescued the papers and found them to be the poem on the nightingale.

Thus the poem is an expression of Keats's feelings rising in his heart at the hearing of the melodious song of the bird. The song of the nightingale moves from the poet to the depth of his heart and creates in him a heartache and numbness as is created by the drinking of hemlock. He thinks that the bird lives in a place of beauty. When he hears the nightingale's song, he is entrenched by its sweetness and his joy becomes so excessive that it changes into a kind of pleasant pain. He is filled with a desire to escape from the world of cares to the world of beautiful place of the bird.

The poem presents the picture of the tragedy of human life. It brings out an expression of Keats's pessimism and dejection. He composed this poem at the time when his heart was full of sorrow. His youngest brother Tom had died, the second one had gone abroad and the poet himself was under the suspense and agony by the passionate love for Fanny Brawne. All these happenings had induced in the poet a mood of sorrow. He could not suppress it. Thus the poet enjoys the pleasure in sadness/ pain and feasts upon the very sadness/ pain into joy. This complex emotion gives the poem a unique charm.

In the beginning, Keats seems to be an immature youth with a melancholic heart urging to find a means of oblivion and escape. On catching the sight of a nightingale and hearing its music, which he assumes to be an immortal voice of happiness, Keats feels that his body is getting benumbed. But, he also feels an acute pain because he is conscious of his mortality and suffering. He fantasies of having drunk hemlock or 'some dull opiate': "My heart aches, and a drowsy numbness pains, / my sense, as though of hemlock I had drunk."

The initial situation of awareness and conflict is slowly to change and develop throughout the ode with a corresponding shift in tone. The tragic awareness of suffering inflicts on him a peculiar kind of ache because the opposing effect of dullness, which is the effect of desire, is increasing. The awareness is a burden that makes him 'sunk' gradually towards the world of oblivion.

After describing his plight, Keats acknowledges, rather than envy the bird's 'happy lot' and participates in its permanent happiness. He identifies the bird with dryad, the Greek Goddess of the tree. He contrasts the mortality and suffering of human being with the immortality and perfect happiness of the nightingale. Of course, Keats immortalizes the bird by thinking of the race of it as the symbol of universal and undying musical voice, which is the voice of nature, and also of ideal romantic poetry, of the world of art and spirit. This universal and eternal voice has comforted human beings embittered by life and tragedies by opening the casement of the remote, magical, spiritual, eternal, and the ideal. The poet is longing for the imaginative experience of an imaginatively perfect world. At this stage in the poem, the poet is trying to escape from the reality, and experience the ideal rather than complement one with the other. This dualism is to resolve later. Keats begins by urging for poison and wine, and then desires for poetic and imaginative experience.

But, as the poem develops, one feels that the numbness and intoxication the poet deliberately and imaginatively imposes upon his senses of pain are meant to awaken a higher sense of experience. The vintage, dance and song, the waters of poetic inspiration are the warmth of the south together make a compound and sensuous appeal.

Keats develops a dialectic by partaking both the states-the fretful here of man and the happy there of the Nightingale-and serves as the mediator between the two. After activating the world of insight and inner experience by obliterating that of the sense, Keats is revived into a special awareness of the conflict. With this awareness, he moves into a higher thematic ground moving from the ache of the beginning through yearning for permanence and eventually exploring the tension so as to balance the transient with the permanent.

In fact, no one can escape into the ideal world forever. Imaginative minds can have a momentary flight into the fanciful world. But, ultimately one has to return to the real world and must accept the reality. John Keats is no exception to this. He makes imaginative flights into the ideal world but accepts the realities of life despite its 'fever, fret and fury'.

The process of experience he has undergone has undoubtedly left him with a heightened awareness of both the modes of experience. When the imaginative life wakes, the pressures of ordinary experience is benumbed: and when ordinary experience becomes acute, the intensity of imaginative reality is reduced. And this makes life and experience more complete.

To sum up, Keats soars high with his 'wings of poesy' into the world of ideas and perfect happiness. But the next moment, consciousness makes him land on the grounds of reality and he bids farewell to the ideal bird. At this moment, Keats must also have been conscious that the very bird, which he had idealized and immortalized, existed in the real world, mortal and vulnerable to change and suffering like himself.

Ode on a Grecian Urn: Summary and Critical Analysis

Summary

Keats' imagined urn is addressed as if he were contemplating a real urn. It has survived intact from antiquity. It is a "sylvan historian" telling us a story, which the poet suggests by a series of questions. Who are these gods or men carved or painted on the urn? Who are these reluctant maidens? What is this mad pursuit? Why the struggle to escape? What is the explanation for the presence of musical instruments? Why this mad ecstasy?

Imagined melodies are lovelier than those heard by human ears. Therefore the poet urges the musician pictured on the urn to play on. His song can never end nor did the trees ever shed their leaves. The lover on the urn can never win a kiss from his beloved, but his beloved can never lose her beauty. Happy are the trees on the urn, for they can never lose their leaves. Happy is the musician forever playing songs forever new. The lovers on the urn enjoy a love forever warm, forever panting, and forever young, far better than actual love, which eventually brings frustration and dissatisfaction.

Who are the people coming to perform a sacrifice? To what altar does the priest lead a garlanded heifer? What town do they come from? That town will forever remain silent and deserted.

Fair urn, Keats says, adorned with figures of men and maidens, trees and grass, you bring our speculations to a point at which thought leads nowhere, like meditation on eternity. After our generation is gone, you will still be here, a friend to man, telling him that beauty is truth and truth is beauty — that is all he knows on earth and all he needs to know.

Critical Analysis

Ode on a Grecian Urn is an ode in which the speaker addresses to an engraved urn and expresses his feelings and ideas about the experience of an imagined world of art, in contrast to the reality of life, change and suffering. As an ode, it also has the unique features that Keats himself established in his great odes.

The features of Keatsian Romanticism and Keats' philosophy of art, beauty and truth are also important in this poem. Though it is a romantic poem, we find the unusual classical interests of Keats in the style and form of this poem. This is a romantic poem mainly because of its dominant imaginative quality.

Like Wordsworth's nature, Keats' imagination is a means to understand life, a means of the quest for truth and beauty, and the most reliable mode of experience and insight. The speaker in the poem begins with reality- an ancient marble urn with engravings around it. He addresses to the urn as a virgin bride of quietness. Time is slow for it. It is unchanging, perfect and silent. The carving around the urn is expressing the story of the pilgrims, lovers and other mysterious people recorded in times of gods and men on its outside. In the poet's imagination, this world and people made immortal by art are real as well as beautiful.

The Ode on a Grecian Urn expresses Keats's desire to belong to the realm of the eternal, the permanent, perfect and the pleasurable, by establishing the means to approach that world of his wish with the help of imagination. This ode is based on the tension between the 'ideal' and the 'real'. Keats here idealizes a work of art as symbolizing the world of art which represents the ideal world of his wish at an even deeper level. Then he experiences that world thus created through imagination. In this poem, the two domains of the transient real and the permanent ideal are the two facets of a deeper reality, the reality of imaginative experience. The perfect, permanent and pleasurable world of the Urn, or that of the ideal, stands against the destructive corrupting and painful effects of time. Keats' fascination with the immortality of art is duly counterbalanced with his awareness that it is lifeless. He neither supports gross realism against truly imaginative art, nor does he wander in imagination alone. Life compensates for the incompleteness of art and art compensates for the transience of life.

This ode which represents Keats mature vision consists of one of his central philosophical doctrines of art itself: "Truth is Beauty and beauty truth". This famous maxim of Keats has an intellectual basis of truth and also an emotional basis in beauty. Art may appeal to the sensuousness or just the emotion of common people, but Keats' response extends from the sensuous to the spiritual and from the passionate to the intellectual. Keats establishes a balance between the real and the ideal, and art and life, and he finds the deepest of reality in its balance. This ode gives a much importance to passion as to the idea of permanence. It is not a lyric of the escape of a dying young man, unwilling to face bitter life into the realm of everlasting happiness, but is a poem that embodies his mature understanding.

Keats indicates a contrast between the unchanging 'Urn' and temporal life in the very beginning of the poem, but shifting to the other side from where he seems to prefer warm life against the 'Cold Pastoral' where he finally resolves the duality in his doctrine of beauty and truth. The Ode begins with an apostrophe to the urn: "Thou still unravish'd bride of quietness, / Thou foster child of silence and slow time, / Sylvan historian". Keats addresses the urn as a bride of quietness that is still unravished by time. That reminds us of life that is ever ravished by time. The urn narrates its history in a silent but musical form. The silent music which Keats, the addressee, feels he can hear is sweeter than the music of the human voice for it is permanent. Unlike the temporal presentation of poetry which is prone to narrate the histories of human being, the urn narrates a 'leaf-fringed legend' as if it were in space rather than in time. The narration of the urn is itself liberated from time.

The worlds of reality and of imagination (or the real and the ideal) are explicitly contrasted in this ode. But the permanence of art created out of imagination is a complement to the temporary aspect of life. The creation of art and its realization in the contemplation of a higher reality is a complement to the tragic awareness of temporal and painful life. Even the realities are of two kinds: the reality of life or the objective reality and the reality of art or the world of imagination. On the one hand, the lover in the world of the urn can never kiss his beloved as one can in real life. But on the other hand, the lover on the urn has the privilege that the beauty of his beloved can never fade away – as it happens in real life. This is why the poet is seeking for the reality of life to be like that of the ideal art. The urn's immunity to the time could not be an absolute ideal without the consummation of love. But the temporary satisfaction in life only intensifies the awareness of transience by consummation itself. The act of imaginative experience can bring together the unheard into a lasting melody. The poet who is emotionally involved with the picture of passion also has the unifying vision that reconciles the real with the ideal by idealizing the real.

In short, the permanently ideal world of the urn is presented in the urn that is lifeless thing when seen from the viewpoint of real life. But the idea that comes under the domain of imaginative reality is reconciled in the act of imaginative creation of the urn's legend. Therefore, the real life is complemented and enriched by this ideal. Thus, the two domains of the real and the ideal coming into conflict as usual, ultimately reconcile to make a more permanent truth as asserted in the 'truth and beauty' maxim. To sum up, in this ode, Keats begins by idealizing, personifying, and immortalizing a real object. This ideal at first clashes with the real but is reconciled by imagination and insight at the end. The poem begins with an address to the Grecian urn and with almost envious amazement, but it ends with the realization that beauty or ideal is also a dimension of the truth of the real; the beauty of imaginative experience is a part of reality or truth and the knowledge of all truth is beautiful.

Ode to Autumn : Summary and Critical Analysis

Summary

Autumn joins with the maturing sun to load the vines with grapes, to ripen apples and other fruit, "swell the gourd," fill up the hazel shells, and set budding more and more flowers. Autumn may be seen sitting on a threshing floor, sound asleep in a grain field filled with poppies, carrying a load of grain across a brook, or watching the juice oozing from a cider press. The sounds of autumn are the wailing of gnats, the bleating of lambs, the singing of hedge crickets, the whistling of robins, and the twittering of swallows.

Critical Analysis

In this poem Keats describes the season of Autumn. The ode is an address to the season. It is the season of the mist and in this season fruits are ripened on the collaboration with the Sun. Autumn loads the vines with grapes. There are apple trees near the moss growth cottage. The season fills the apples with juice.

The hazel-shells also grow plumb. These are mellowed. The Sun and the autumn help the flowers of the summer to continue. The bees are humming on these flowers. They collect honey from them. The beehives are filled with honey. The clammy cells are overflowing with sweet honey. The bees think as if the summer would never end and warm days would continue for a long time. Autumn has been personified and compared to women farmer sitting carefree on the granary floor; there blows a gentle breeze and the hairs of the farmer are fluttering. Again Autumn is a reaper. It feels drowsy and sleeps on the half reaped corn. The poppy flowers have made her drowsy. The Autumn holds a sickle in its hand. It has spared the margin of the stalks intertwined with flowers. Lastly, Autumn is seen as a worker carrying a burden of corn on its head.

The worker balances his body while crossing a stream with a bundle on his head. The Autumn is like an onlooker sitting the juicy oozing for hours. The songs and joys of spring are not found in Autumn seasons. But Keats says that Autumn has its own music and charm. In an autumn evening mournful songs of the gnats are heard in the willows by the river banks. Besides the bleat of the lambs returning from the grassy hills is heard. The whistle of the red breast is heard from the garden. The grasshoppers chirp and swallow twitters in the sky. This indicates that the winter is coming.

Every stanza has a sense of finality when it closes. In every stanza a quatrain is followed by a sestet. The first stanza indicates the rich powers of the season. In the second stanza there is a suggestion of the gradual passing away of time. This makes the ode dramatic. Different postures are shown with the help of personification. Here we find imaginative elements in a series of images. A sense of sadness comes in the soft dying day, willful choir of small gnats etc. 'Bloom' and 'Sunset' symbolized twilight and darkness.

Ode to Autumn is an unconventional appreciation of the autumn season. It surprises the reader with the unusual idea that autumn is a season to rejoice. We are familiar with Thomas Hardy's like treatment of autumn as a season of gloom, chill and loneliness and the tragic sense of old age and approaching death. Keats sees the other side of the coin. He describes autumn as: "Season of mists and mellow fruitfulness! / Close bosom friend of the maturing sun". He understands maturity and ripeness as one with old age and decay. Obviously thin, old age is a complement to youth, as death is to life. Keats here appears as a melodist; he seems to have accepted the fundamental paradoxes of life as giving meaning to it. The very beginning of the poem is suggestive of acceptance and insight after a conflict.

The subject matter of this ode is reality itself at one level: Keats depicts the autumn season and claims that its unique music and its role of completing the round of seasons make it a part of the whole. Although autumn will be followed by the cold and barren winter, winter itself will in turn give way to fresh spring. Life must go on but it cannot continue in turn give way to fresh spring. Life must go on but it cannot continue without death that completes one individual life and begins another. This is indirectly conveyed with the concluding line of the ode: "And gathering swallows twitter in the skies". In one way, this gives a hint of the coming winter when shallows will fly to the warm south.

The theme of ripeness is complemented by the theme of death and that of death by rebirth. So, in the final stanza, the personified figure of autumn of the second stanza is replaced by concrete images of life. Autumn is a part of the year as old age is of life. Keats has accepted autumn, and connotatively, old age as natural parts and processes them.

Comparison of Ode to a Nightingale and Ode on a Grecian Urn

Both odes are masterpieces of poetry and are the fruit of mature art of the poet. Ode on Grecian Urn shows the poet’s fascination which he saw in British Museum. Throughout this ode Keats has appreciated the permanence of art and compared it with transitory nature of life and worldly things. In this ode Keats has given what we now term as Keats philosophy of life. Ode to a Nightingale is a tribute to nightingale bird. The poet expresses his fascination and appreciation for the happy condition of the bird and compares it with the miserable condition of human life on the earth. Keats wishes to escape into the nightingale's world; however, he finally realizes that he cannot run from his present condition because day dreaming is not the solution of his problem: only solution is facing and living with those problems.

In both odes poet's admiration is for the ideal worlds of art and nature. Things carved on the Grecian urn are permanent and free from decay whereas things of life are exposed to change and decay. The branches of the tree on the urn will always remain green; the lovers will enjoy their present state; the music will always remain enjoyable; the lover will always have his beloved before his eyes and the beloved will never grow old. On the other hand earthly things keep on changing. Earthly passions do not give satisfaction and comfort to human being rather they leave a heart high sorrowful and cloyed. Those who nourish these passions get nothing but a burning forehead, and a parching tongue.

If Ode on Grecian Urn shows Poet's admiration and yearning for the world of art, Ode to a Nightingale shows the same for the world of nature. Here once more the poet wants to escape in the world of nightingale which does not know and pain and suffering. The world of nightingale is free of fever and fret of human world; in that world pain and groan are totally absent; things do not grow old there; there is nothing like disease there; thought which makes people sad and sorrowful is not present in there; frustration and disappointment are nowhere in the world of nature; and love does not change there.

In both odes imagination of the poet seems to touching climax. Both poems are excellent manifestation which Kats called negative capability. Negative capability means expressing personal feelings in a way that they lose all the subjectivity. In other word make individual feelings and things universal. Negative capability also means to say things which are not true but which can be shown true with little logic. For example Keats says that lover on the urn will always enjoy love and the nightingale bird is immortal. Now both these things are not actually true but logic can prove their truth.

Ode on Grecian Urn gives us a very important message and this message is Keats' message which is recurrent motif running throughout Keats' poetry. The message is that beauty is truth and truth is beauty. On the other hand, the message which we get after reading Ode to a Nightingale is that human being can run away from the problems of life and they have to live with the problems of life.

Though subjectivity is present in both poems, Odes to a Nightingale shows comparatively stronger feelings of subjectivity. Consider the death wish of the poet. We do not find this wish in Ode on a Grecian Urn. However, the poet finally restores balance and overall impression of the poem is totally objectivity.

Pain and suffering are permanent features of Keats' poetry. Both odes dwell on pain and suffering. Greatness of Keats lies in fact that pain and suffering do not bring element of frustration and disappointment in Keats' poetry. Both odes show that Keats takes pain and suffering integral part of hum life. He wants to escape with strong realization he cannot escape.

Both odes are highly sensuous in their appeal. Keats' continuously arouses different senses of the readers: sometimes with unmatchable picture; sometimes with melodies voices; and sometimes with wonderful imagination.

Dramatic qualities are present in both odes. In Ode on Grecian Urn Keats seems to be talking to urn and in Ode to a Nightingale, he seems to talking to the nightingale. Both odes present the quick succession of picture and images and the reader feels to be watching a drama in theatre or a movie in cinema.

Both odes are full of lines which have become most quotable lines by any writer. Heard melodies are sweet, but those unheard are sweeter, beauty is truth is beauty, to cease upon midnight with no pain has become proverbial when we with how much frequency we find them quoted by people.

Keats love for compound words such as pouring forth, soul abroad, overwrought, evermore is very noticeable in both odes.

Music and melody which has become closely related with Keats' poetry are present in both odes to the level of perfection in both odes. Consider the following lines:

> Ah! Happy, happy boughs!
> Now a line from Ode to a Nightingale:
> Away! Away! For I will fly to thee

Both odes seem an earnest effort to create to ecstatic beauty. The poet does preach any philosophy or creed. If he wants it all it is the philosophy of life and existence.

Dissimilarity

The tone of "Ode to Nightingale" is pathetic and it is more subjective than "Ode on a Grecian Urn". The tone is joyous and objective in "Ode on a Grecian Urn". The overall tone of the poem is melancholic in "Ode to Nightingale". The poem is also very subjective, because it draws reference from Keats' own life. The expressions "fever and fret" the "spectre thin" etc clearly refer to the pathetic death of Keats' brother. The poem is written immediately after the death of his brother. On the other hand Keats' tone in "Ode to Grecian Urn" is very joyful. Here he celebrates the beauty of the Urn, the joyfulness of the lovers and the excitement of the religious sacrifice. He uses the word "happy" several times. More importantly unlike Nightingale it is not based on his personal loss. The poem was written after one of his visits to the British museum.

In these Odes the speaker wants to go beyond the better realties of the world by a kind of visionary imagination of the happy world. But when he comes to learn that the kind of imagination he is pursuing is a false temptation, he rejects the visionary imagination and comes back to harsh reality.

Conclusion

Keats is called least romantic of all the romantic poets. He uses all the elements of romantic poetry like imagination, escape, love of the past, enjoyment of beauty, love of picturesque, sensuality, spontaneous expression of feelings, experiment with form and theme, subjectivity, depiction of nature, love of exotic, death wish, simplicity of language and expression. Yet we find great care of a great classic poet in Keats' poetry. His balance is outstanding. Both odes carry all the qualities of classic art as well as romantic art. It is this blend of romanticism and classicism which makes Keats's poetry of everlasting appeal. And this blend is nowhere so prominent in Keats' poetry as we find them in his great odes. This is the reason that critics say that Keats' odes were enough for his greatness.

In Keats's great odes beauty that is truth includes much of human sorrows. Discuss

Both beauty and sorrow exist side by side in great odes which Keats wrote and which are the climax of Keats's achievement because in odes Keats's art transcends all the limitation and rawness which provided critics opportunities to criticize Keats so harshly that Poesy became the second of his beloved Fanny Browne who never rewarded him for all his passion and love for the girl: Keats loved Poesy with as much intensity as much he had for Fanny Browne. Keats's odes, the perfection of this art in English language, are full of beauty which was also truth for Keats. But, while studying these odes, the reader is seldom unaware of the sorrows which emerge from every line of these odes. We nowhere find such fine blend of subjectivity and objectivity in poetry as we find in Keats poetry and to a great extent all the beauty of Keats's odes depend upon this blending of subjectivity and objectivity. It does not imply that Keats does not make use of other skills of art to create beauty in his verse. Rather Keats seems working like a classical poet more than a romantic poet when we come to think of different ingredients which Keats has used in order to make his lines the odes pregnant with beauty: rhyme, rhythm, restrain, imagination, proportion, sights, sounds, melody, and control everything is present in odes.

Let us look on some of his odes to prove what we have said just now.

Keats's Ode to Grecian is one of the near to perfect creation of the poet. In this ode Keats's has given his idea of permanence of art and temporariness of earthly life. The ode is also important because the ode contains the most quoted line by Keats. "Beauty is Truth and Truth is Beauty" sums up Keats philosophy of life. Keats has used all the devices to make this ode a beautiful piece of art. We find dramatic opening very enchanting and convincing. Then there is cinema like presentation of picture throughout the ode. The trees, the people of the village, the piper, the lover, the maiden, the priest, the animal of sacrifice all come alive and vivid before our eye and this succession and vividness of picture conveys the reader in a beautiful world of imagination which is infinite and permanent.

If we have a look at the vocabulary of the ode, the use rhetoric becomes at once clear to us. Keats seems to be using elevated and sonorous language very close the language used by Milton and other epic poets. Grecian urn has been addressed as Attic shaped and cold pastoral.

Beauty and Greek way of life are completely associated and Keats has evoked Greek elements a number of times in his odes and the title of Ode on Grecian Urn is not an exception. In this ode Keats talks about Greek art and Greek way of life.

Imagination makes the things more beautiful than they actually are and Keats's imagination is so powerful that it forces the readers to imagine things in all their beauty. Keats believes that heard melodies are sweet but those unheard are sweeter which means that concrete things are beautiful but imagined or abstract things are more beautiful.

Music is an other source of beauty in Keats's poetry and his Ode to Grecian Urn is full of music. Keats has employed different techniques to make his verses musical. Alliteration, assonance, consonance, variation in rhyme and rhythm all add music to his verses. Consider the following lines:

> Ah, happy, happy boughs! That cannot shed
> Your leaves, nor ever bid the spring adieu,

Yet in spite of all the beauty present in this ode, a strong undercurrent of sorrow is overwhelming in this ode. Form where does this sorrow come is not difficult to answer. This sorrow is the result of his personal experiences of life. However, Keats's greatness lies in the fact that his personal experiences appear something universal as Keats has described them. The third stanza of Ode on a Grecian Urn is full of sorrowful undercurrents but it is Keats called negative capability of the poet that it appears something universal. Nevertheless intensity of the sad feelings of the poet is evident from every verse of this stanza. In this stanza Keats describe the difference between art and life. According the poet all breathing human passions give nothing but:

> That leaves a heart high sorrowful and cloy'd
> A burning forehead, and a parching tongue.

Beauty and sorrow exists side by side in Keats's Ode to a Nightingale as well. On the one hand we find beautiful painting of nature in this poem, but on the other hand picture of earth where everything is temporary and transitory haunts us and we feel like running from this world reality and where to think is full of but full of sorrow. Amid all the beauty and music of the nightingale, we find the desire of death in the poet.

> "That I might drink, and leave the world unseen,
> And with thee fade into the forest unseen.

Whichever ode we take, we find the very same qualities of existence of beauty and sorrow side by side. His Ode to Autumn is perhaps most objective of all. Here we do not subjective elements as we find in all other odes. The whole ode is studded with beautiful pictures. Personification of autumn and description of nature scenes is unmatchable any where in poetry. Yet the undercurrent of sorrow is always very prominent. There is very melancholy that broods on the total effect of the poem.

We can conclude our argument with reiterating the fact that Keats's odes are full of beauty which also truth for Keats but this beauty is not without all the pain which life has for us who life and experience things. It is this characteristic his that makes Keats least romantic of all romantics i. e. a fine blend of subjectivity and objectivity.

Keats as an Escapist

Escape means to run, to avoid and to flee. As a literary term escape means writing about things which are imaginary, having nothing do with the realities of life, which are pleasant, having very little of the bitterness of real life.

Escapism is a special characteristic of romantic poetry. Now term romantic is not easy to define, yet we can say that poetry which is the result of imagination is called romantic poetry. This kind of poetry generally does not deal what is happening with human beings as they living their life on this earth surrounded by different problems. Rather it seeks to present human beings in a sort of make belief work-a world which do not exist.

As I said that escapism is a very dominant trait of romantic poetry, we have to see why it confined to the romantic poetry and why it does not appear in classical poetry. In order to understand this we will have to socioeconomic changes which were taking place in English society at the time when romantic poetry was being written.

Escapism, which we find in romantic poetry, and industrialization and urbanization have vital relation. Both industrialization and urbanization affected the sensibility of the poets because of their special demands and those who could not fulfill the demands of the time found it convenient to avoid those demands and live in a world without those demands. Of course this world was not present. They had no option but to dream of that world.

Keats was one of the romantics and he felt what all romantics felt. Yet Keats was different from other romantics because of his unique experiences of life.

His failure in love, his failure to write poetry good enough to satisfy the critics of his time, his experience of death of his brother and his fear of death lend some special escapist traits to his poetry. Nowhere in his poetry has he discussed the social, moral and political issues of his time. Again and again he seems to escape or attempting to escape in a world which is not the real day to day world of his time. Rather and ideal world he creates with his powerful imagination.

In spite of the fact that Keats died at very young age, yet he created the poetry of highest order. His famous odes and his epic Hyperion put him the top English poets. All these poems show Keats as an escapist. In these poems he has created imaginary worlds of beauty and perfect calm. In all his odes he is concerned with creation of beauty. Though he has succeeded marvelously in his attempt, the beauty we find in his poems is not the beauty of our world. Rather it is the beauty of the world which the poets creates through his imagination in order to seek refuge from the harsh realities of life.

His odes are good examples to show escapism in his poetry. In Ode on Grecian Urn he seeks refuge in the beautiful world of antiquity. It is a world where things are permanent and enjoyable forever. It is world where passion though always remains unfulfilled; it does not leave parching tongue and heart cloyed. Consider the following lines from this ode:

More happy love! More happy, more happy love!
For ever warm and still to be enjoyed
For ever panting, and for ever young.
All breathing human passions far above
That leaves heart high sorrowful and cloyed
A burning forehead, and a parching tongue.

His Ode to Nightingale is very remarkable in many ways. In this ode the poet wants to escape in the world of nightingale because the world where nightingale lives is very different from the world where the poet lives. The world of the nightingale is free of weariness, fever, fret, death, pain and old age. His imagination actually carries him to the world of nightingale and he forgets his own world completely. The whole poem is search of an ideal world free of all pains and problems of the earthly life. Though the poem ends with realization that he cannot escape from his world yet nostalgia of the poet is never lost. Consider the last two lines of the poet:

Was it a vision, or a waking dream?
Fled is that music:-Do I wake or sleep?

Escapist elements are never absent from Keats' poetry. When we say Keats is an escapist poet, we mean that he does not write about the day to day matters of life. Rather he creates imaginary worlds in his poetry and it seems that he wants to escape in that world. Many things were responsible for lending this characteristic to Keats' poetry. Firstly, all the poets belonging to that period were escapist because of special circumstances of that period. Secondly, Keats never found anything in real world. His life was permanent disappointment. This led him live in the world of imagination. Thirdly, he believed that poetry should be a pure attempt to create beauty and for beauty, he turned to the world of imagination and in order to give true sparkle to his poetry, antiquity came as the best source.

Keats is different from other romantic poets in many ways. Though he creates imaginary world as much as other romantic poets do, we do not find the fever of other romantic poets in Keats. He is devoid f any idealism which is a dominant trait of other romantics. Actually other romantics exhibit two sort of escapism: escape in the past world and escape in the future world which they created with there idealism. But in Keats escapism is just creation of imaginary world and his imaginary world always belong to the past. It does not have any relation with future. The realization that the world is what it is gives objectivity to Keas poetry in spite of all the subjectivity which makes Keats' poetry something special and something unique.

Keats' concept of beauty

Keats was considerably influenced by Spenser and was, like Spenser, a passionate lover of beauty in all its forms and manifestations. The passion of beauty constitutes his aestheticism. Beauty was his pole star, beauty in nature, in woman and in art.

"A thing of beauty is a joy forever."

He writes and identifies beauty with truth. Of all the contemporary poets Keats is one of the most inevitably associated with the love of beauty. He was the most passionate lover of the world as the career of beautiful images and of many imaginative associations of an object or word with a heightened emotional appeal. Poetry, according to Keats, should be the incarnation of beauty, not a medium for the expression of religious or social philosophy. He hated didacticism in poetry. "We hate poetry that has a palpable design upon us."

He believed that poetry should be unobtrusive. The poet, according to him, is a creator and an artist, not a teacher or a prophet. In a letter to his brother he wrote: "With a great poet, the sense of beauty overcomes every other consideration."

He even disapproved Shelley for subordinating the true end of poetry to the object of social reform. He dedicated his brief life to the expression of beauty as he said: "I have loved the principle of beauty in all things."

For Keats the world of beauty was an escape from the dreary and painful life or experience. He escaped from the political and social problems of the world into the realm of imagination. Unlike Wordsworth, Coleridge, Byron and Shelley, he remained untouched by revolutionary theories for the regression of mankind. His later poems such as "Ode to a Nightingale" and "Hyperion" show an increasing interest in human problems and humanity and if he had lived he would have established a closer contact with reality. He may overall be termed as a poet of escape. With him poetry existed not as an instrument of social revolt nor of philosophical doctrine but for the expression of beauty. He aimed at expressing beauty for its own sake.

Keats did not like only those things that are beautiful according to the recognized standards. He had deep insight to see beauty even in those things that are not thought beautiful by ordinary people. He looked at autumn and says that even autumn has beauty and charm:

> "Where are the song of Spring? Ay, where are they?
> Think not of them, thou hast thy music too, –
> While barred clouds bloom the soft-dying day,
> And touch the stubble-plains with rosy hue."

In Keats, we have a remarkable contrast both with Byron on the one side and with Shelley on the other. Keats was neither rebel nor utopian dreamer. Endowed with a purely artistic nature, he took up in regard to all the movements and conflicts of his time, a position of almost complete detacher. He knew nothing of Byron's stormy spirit of hostility of the existing order of things and he had no sympathy with Shelley's humanitarian and passion for reforming the world. The famous opening line of "Endymion", 'A thing of beauty is a joy forever' strikes the keynote of his work. As the modern world seemed to him to be hard, cold and prosaic, he habitually sought an imaginative escape from it. He loved nature just for its own sake and for the glory and loveliness which he found in it, and no modern poet has ever been nearer than he was to the simple "poetry for earth" but there was nothing mystical in love and nature was never fraught for him, as for Wordsworth and Shelley, with spiritual message and meanings.

Keats was not only the last but also the most perfect of the Romantics while Scott was merely telling stories, and Wordsworth reforming poetry or upholding the moral law, and Shelley advocating the impossible reforms and Byron voicing his own egoism and the political measure. Worshipping beauty like a devotee, perfectly content to write what was in his own heart or to reflect some splendour of the natural world as he saw or dreamed it to be, he had the noble idea that poetry exists for its own sake and suffers loss by being devoted to philosophy or politics.

Disinterested love of beauty is one of the qualities that made Keats great and that distinguished him from his great contemporaries. He grasped the essential oneness of beauty and truth. His creed did not mean beauty of form alone. His ideal was the Greek ideal of beauty inward and outward, the perfect soul of verse and the perfect form. Precisely because he held this ideal, he was free from the wish to preach.

Keats' early sonnets are largely concerned with poets, pictures, sculptures or the rural solitude in which a poet might nurse his fancy. His great odes have for their subjects a storied Grecian Urn; a nightingale; the goddess Psyche, mistress of Cupid; the melancholy and indolence of a poet; and the season of autumn, to which he turns from the songs of spring. What he asked of poesy, of wine, or of nightingale's song was to help him:

> "Fade far away, dissolve, and quite forget,
> What thou amongst the leaves hast never known,
> The weariness, the fever and the fret,
> Here, where men sit and hear each other groan."

"I Stood Tiptoe Upon a Little Hill" and "Sleep and Poetry" – the theme of both these poems is that lovely things in nature suggest lovely tales to the poet, and great aim of poet is to be a friend to soothe the cares, and lift the thoughts of man. Perhaps Keats would have said that he attempted his nobler life of poetry in poems like "Lamia" and "Hyperion" but it is very doubtful whether he believed that he had done justice to this elevated type of poetic creation.

Keats' love of beauty is not 'Platonic' in nature. He loves physical objects and takes interest in human body. He does not become obscene but his love of beauty gives us very attractive and suggestive picture of women:

> "Yet still steadfast, still unchangeable,
> Pillow'd upon my fair love's ripening breast,
> To feel forever its soft fall and swell,
> Awake forever in a sweet unrest,
> Still, still to hear her tender taken breath,
> And so live ever."

Religion for him took definite shape in the adoration of the beautiful, an adoration which he developed into a doctrine. Beauty is the supreme truth. It is imagination that discovers beauty. This idealism, assumes a note of mysticism. One can see a sustained allegory in "Endymion" and certain passages are most surely possessed of a symbolical value. Sidney Colvin says:

"It was not Keats aim merely to create a paradise of art and beauty discovered from the cares and interests of the world. He did aim at the creation and revelation of beauty, but of beauty whatever its element existed. His concept of poetry covered the whole range of life and imagination."

As he did not live long enough, he was not able to fully illustrate the vast range of his conception of beauty. Fate did not give him time enough to fully unlock the 'mysteries of the heart' and to illuminate and put in proper perspective the great struggles and problems of human life.

Keats's Sensuousness

The term 'sensuous' usually refers to the enjoyment and delights borrowed from the senses. Sensuousness is that quality which is derived from five senses- sight, hearing, touch, smell and taste. It is a way of perception through five senses. A sensuous poet uses those word pictures that help the reader to understand the sights and sounds expressed or suggested in a poem .John Keats is best known for his use of such images that appeal to human senses. For this reason, he is often called a sensuous poet.

The Ode on a Grecian Urn contains a series of sensuous pictures—passionate men and gods chasing reluctant maidens, the flute-players playing their ecstatic music, the fair youth trying to kiss his beloved, the happy branches of the tree enjoying an everlasting spring, etc. The ecstasy of the passion of love and of youth is beautifully depicted in the following lines:

More happy love! more happy happy love!
For ever warm and still to be enjoy'd,
For ever panting, and for ever young.

The Ode to a Nightingale is one of the finest examples of Keats's rich sensuousness. The lines in which the poet expresses of passionate desire for some Provencal wine or the red wine from the fountain of the Muses appeal to both our senses of smell and taste:

O, for a draught of vintage! that hath been Cool'd a long age in the deep-delved earth,
Tasting of Flora and the country green,
Dance, and Provencal song, and sunburnt mirth!
O for a beaker full of the warm South,
Full of the true, the blushful Hippocrene…….

These lines bring before us a delightful picture of Provence with its fun and frolic, merry-making, drinking and dancing. Similarly the beaker full of the sparkling, blushful Hippocrene is highly pleasing. Then there is the magnificent picture of the moon shining in the sky and surrounded by stars. The rich feast of flowers described in the stanza that follows is one of the outstanding beauties of the poem. Flowers, soft incense, the fruit trees, the white hawthorn, the eglantine, the fast-fading violets, the coming musk-rose—all this is a delight for our senses.

In the Ode to Autumn, the bounty of the season has been described with all its sensuous appeal. The whole landscape is made to appear fresh and scented. There is great concentration in each line of the opening stanza. Each line is like the branch of a fruit tree laden with fruit to the breaking point. The vines suggesting grapes, the apples, the gourds, the hazels with their sweet kernel, the bees suggesting honey—all these appeal to our senses of taste and smell. The three stanzas of "To Autumn" Keats presents three different sets of images appealing to three different senses. "To Autumn", thus, very strongly reflects Keats' sensuousness.

The first stanza of "To Autumn" mainly appeals to the sense of taste. The poem opens with a rich picture of Autumn in the mind.

"Season of mists and mellow fruitfulness,
Close bosom friend of the maturing sun;"

Here autumn is a season of "mellow fruitfulness". The vines, laden with the clusters of the thatch roofed country houses. The juicy grapes appeals to the sense of taste of the readers. Similarly, the apples, the gourd, the hazelnuts and honey bring water to the mouths of the readers. Though these images at first appeal of the sense of sight, they ultimately appeal to the sense of taste.

The second stanza appeals to the sense of sight. Keats personifies 'Autumn' and presents it as a country woman to convey an idea about Autumn's occupations. Autumn, in the shape of a woman, is seen on a granary floor, sitting carelessly while her disordered hair is soft lifted by the winnowing wind. Sometimes, she is found in deep sleep on a half reaped cropland .At some other time, she is found to wade across a hilly brook taking the load of a gleaner on her head. She is also found to work patiently with her cider-press to collect juice from the fruits. Thus, autumn has several occupations that can be seen with our eyes. In other words, Autumn is a woman appeals to our sense of sight very vividly.

The third stanza deals with the sense of hearing. The poet says-

> "Where are the songs of spring? Ay, where are they?
> Think not for them, thou hast they music too,………"

In describing autumn, the poet alludes to the season of spring. Autumn does not have the song of spring. But she has her own music. There is the wailful choir of small gnats, which directly appeals to our sense of hearing. Then there are lambs 'bleating, the songs of the hedge-crickets, the whistles of redbreast, the twittering of the swallows that appeal directly, to the sense of hearing.

Conclusion

Keats is a poet of sensations. His thought is enclosed in sensuousness. In the epithets he uses are rich in sensuous quality – delicious face, melodious plot, sunburnt mirth, embalmed darkness and anguish moist. Not only are the sense perceptions of Keats are quick and alert but he has the rare gift of communicating these perceptions by concrete and sound imagery.

As time passes Keats mind matured and he expresses an intellectual and spiritual passion. He begins to see not only their beauty but also in their truth which makes Keats the "inheritor of unfulfill'd renown".

Keats is more poet of sensuousness than a poet of contemplation. Sometimes he passes from sensuousness to sentiments. In his mature works like Odes or the Hyperion, the poet mixes sensuousness with sentiments, voluptuousness with vitality, aestheticism with intellectualism. However the nucleus of Keats' poetry is sensuousness. It is his senses which revealed him the beauty of things, the beauty of universe from the stars of the sky to the flowers of the wood.

Keats' pictorial senses are not vague or suggestive but made definite with a wealth of artistic detail. Every stanza, every line is replete with sensuous beauty. No other poet except Shakespeare could show such a mastery of language and felicity of sensuousness.

Keats' Hellenism in his odes

Keats, as is well known, was not a classical scholar, yet he has been famous for his Hellenism, a term which may be defined as a love of Greek art, literature, culture and way of life. Keats had an inborn love for the Greek spirit,-their Religion of Joy and their religion of Beauty. He once wrote to one of his friends that he never ceased to wonder at 'all that incarnate delight' of the Greek way of life. In fact, he was driven to the world of Greek Beauty because he wanted to escape imaginatively from the harsh realities of his present. It should, however, be noted that 'Keats was a Greek' because he could enter lovingly and imaginatively into the world of the ancients, and not because his knowledge of it was accurate and scholarly. His presentation of Hallas is romantic and not realistic.

Keats' mind was saturated with Greek literature and mythology. He habitually chooses Greek stories for his poetry. Endymion. Hyperion, Lamia, Grecian Urn, Psyche etc,- all have the themes borrowed from the Greeks. The Grecian Urn is a monument of the poet's power of entering imaginatively into another world. We as readers feel that we have been transported entirely to the Hellenic world of beauty, love, festivity and ritual. It is permeated through and through with the Greek spirit. It may also be noted that the 'Ode' form, which he made particularly his own and in which he excels all other English poets, is typically a Greek verse form.

Moreover, there are countless allusions to Greek legends and stories in poems which are not directly based on Greek themes. He frequently refers at all places to Muses, Apollo, Pan, Narcissus, Endymion, Diana, and a number of other classical gods and goddesses. In Ode to Nightingale, we have references to Dryads (That thou, light-winged Dryad of the trees), the goddess Flora (Tasting of Flora and the country green), and Bacchus and his pards (Not charioted by Bacchus and his pards). In Ode on Melancholy, references are made to the river Lethe, goddess Proserpine and Psyche. These allusions are not mere conventional personifications as with other poets; there is a tone of enjoyment in these allusions which shows that Greek mythology had really taken possession of his mind.

The Greek temper of Keats is also revealed particularly in his joy in the Beauty of nature and his zest for an out of door life lived in her midst. Like the Greeks, Keats also takes a sensuous, childlike pleasure in the forms, colours, scents and sounds of nature and sees a god or goddess behind every object and phenomenon of the external world. The following lines can be cited in this regard-

> And haply the Queen –Moon is on her throne, > Cluster'd around by all her starry Fays;

The Greeks had a zest for life in nature and loved the activities of such life; but they also loved the serenity and quiet of pastoral life. Both these aspects are combined vividly in the Ode on a Grecian Urn. For example, the scenario of the Bacchanalian procession consisting of the flute players, the youth singing under the tree, and the lover about to kiss represent the joy of youth and its energy. On the other hand, the picture of the lowing heifer being led to the sacrificial altar represents the charm of a serene and quiet life. In fact, in his worship of Beauty, Keats justifies the remark of Shelley that he was a Greek.

The Hellenic spirit was re-incarnated in Keats. Through his contact with Greek sculptures, he imbibed, as if by instinct, the classical discipline, simplicity and austerity. He was basically a romantic, and in the beginning his art is characterized by the romantic excess. But at times, he could achieve the clearness of outline, the directness and restraint and the austerity and finish of the classics. As Matthew Arnold points out, the last three lines of the Ode on a Grecian Urn, 'is as Greek as anything from Homer or Theocritus'. Similarly the stanza of this Ode beginning, 'Who are those coming to the sacrifice' has been described as having 'the clear radiance of Greek style'.

In his description, Keats often achieves not only clarity, directness and simplicity, but also the happy combination of movement with repose which characterizes Greek art. For example, in the Ode on Melancholy we get;

'Beauty that must die
And Joy, whose hand is ever at his lips bidding adieu'

Keats also has the passion for perfection of the Greeks. He has the epigrammatic terseness and brevity of the Greeks. Phrases like 'drowsy numbness', 'leaden-eyed despair', 'leaf-fringed legends', 'cold pastoral, 'wakeful anguish of the soul' etc bear enough testimony to this. The opening two lines of the Ode on a Grecian Urn have even been called by Rossetti as the 'Pillars of Hercules of the human language'.

However, this Greek note in Keats' poetry should not be exaggerated. He surely has the romantic melancholy, romantic exuberance and the love of colour and pageantry of the romantics. As a matter of fact, he got his knowledge of Greek mythology and literature through the study of the Elizabethans and in the process also imbibed their romanticism. In his poetry, we find a rare combination of classicism with romanticism. As Legoius and Cazamian put it, ' Keats affects the rare union of classical discipline, guided by the examples and precepts of the ancients, with the more intrinsically precious matter, which the artist finds in romanticism'. We may also add that he is not always content with the enjoyment merely of the beauty of form. He often tries to penetrate to the real significance and truth which may lie at the back of formal beauty.

Views on Transience, Permanence, Art, Life, and Beauty in Keats' Odes

Keats is a poet of beauty. But he is not a poet of sensuous and ephemeral beauty. He is a poet of permanent and ever-lasting beauty. As a poet of beauty, Keats considers art as the embodiment of that everlasting beauty. So, to Keats art represents a permanent, everlasting beauty which contrasts the transient human life. Keats' view on art is mainly expressed through the contrast between the human life and art that are represented in the form of urn, song, and autumn.

Keats' most significant views on art are expressed in his "Ode to a Grecian Urn," In this Ode he makes a contrast between human life and the life of the Urn. Keats finds the Urn much superior to human life. As a work of beauty the Urn represents a permanent life.

In "Ode to a Grecian Urn," Keats emphasizes the fact love, beauty and youth are all immortalized in the work of art. The beloved in the Grecian Urn is immortal; she will not lose her beauty.

She cannot fade, though thou hast not thy bliss,
For ever wilt thou love, and she be fair!

The lady's beauty and youth have been made permanent in the Urn which is a wrought piece of art. His final comment about the Grecian Urn is:-

When old age shall this generation waste,
Thou shalt remain, in midst of other woe
Than ours, a friend to man, to whom thou say'st,
"Beauty is truth, truth beauty,"

The poet discovers beauty which is unfading and truth. This beauty is undying in excellent artistic creations. He gets the very taste of eternity in the excellent work of art.

Comparing the transience of life with the permanence of a work of art, 'Ode on a Grecian Urn' asserts the quality of both the real world and the world of art. In 'Ode on a Grecian Urn', Keats actually prefers the immortal nature of art over the mortal nature of human activities in the real world.

Although the urn exists in the real world which is subject to time and change, the life it presents and itself are static and unchanging; thus the bride is "unravished" and as a "foster" child, the urn goes through the "slow time" and not the time of the real world. The figures carved on the urn are not subject to time, though the urn may be changed or affected by slow time.

Keats views on art are also expressed in his "Ode to a Nightingale" as a work of beauty. Once again he makes a contrast between the world of the Nightingale which represents the world of art and the human world. In Keats' "Ode to a Nightingale," he contemplatse the essence of the nightingale and contrasts it with his own worldly state and the nature of mortal life.

In Ode to Nightingale the poet spotlights the beauty and fascinating charm of the bird's song. He simultaneously underscores the mast fleeting nature of human life. Human youth and life itself are quite transient. Human beings grow up, flower up into blossoming youths and then fade and die. This is the nature of all human passions. Human beings do not have permanent beauty and permanent joy. Human life on this earth is ever a stratum of happiness and contentment. Human youth and human happiness soon disappear leaving behind an arena of desolation and dry dreariness. Keats refers to life in this world in the following lines of Ode to a Nightingale.

> The weariness, the fever, and the fret
> Here, where men sit and hear each other groan;
> Where palsy shakes a few, sad, last gray hairs,
> Where youth grows pale, and spectre-thin, and dies;

Here the poet refers to the importance of youth. Man's weariness, his fret, palsy, grey hair, pale youth have been referred I order to show that life is just like a passing show on the earth. Again he says

> Where but to think is to be full of sorrow
> And leaden-eyed despairs,
> Where Beauty cannot keep her lustrous eyes,
> Or new Love pine at them beyond to-morrow.

The poet has drawn the vivid picture of the mortal world. Here beauty fades, love pines, sorrow and despair seize men and to think is to be full of sorrow. Happiness in the earth is just a feeling thing. So, the idea of importance or transience is quite dominant in Keats's poem.

But it is only the aspect of Keats's poetry. He is occupied with the idea of impermanence, it is true. But that is not the only phase. We also represent the idea of permanence. He is searching of unfading beauty and permanence in the world of the Nightingale. Not with the help of intoxicating wine but with the fluttering wings of his imagination he will go to the world of the Nightingale, i.e the shelter of nature where he gets abode of permanence and then he will take refuge in the stratum of permanence. He says

Away! away! for I will fly to thee,
Not charioted by Bacchus and his pards,
But on the viewless wings of Poesy,

Here we see that Keats passing from the world of transience to that of permanence. He discovers unerring permanence in the world of nature which does not change and betray.

According to Keats the Nightingale as a part and parcel of nature is immortal. A bird may die as individual but the species will continue from generation to generation. So, Keats adds:-

Thou wast not born for death, immortal Bird!
No hungry generations tread thee down;
The voice I hear this passing night was heard
In ancient days by emperor and clown:

The song of the Nightingale has immortal delight because it is an integral part of nature and nature does not die. The song of the bird stirs the poet's imagination ad opens the "magic" casement of poetry. This is the theme of permanence as we find in Ode to Nightingale where the poet is transported to imaginative ecstasy.

As a romantic poet Keats imagines a pure and enduring life for all natural objects and natural creatures. In "Ode to autumn" Keats celebrates the season of autumn. Autumn is abstracted and given a universal form. The beauty and the activities of autumn are true for all ages.

The basic tension of the poem "Ode on a Grecian Urn" is between art and the human life. Art though unreal has permanence of beauty and the power to enrapture us through fanciful experiences which are richer than those of artificial life. He clearly portrays the shapes of the Urn which have an eternal life. In "Ode to Nightingale" the speaker wants to share his experience of intensifying to the song of a Nightingale and its effect on his mind. He states the unrestricted, spontaneous happiness of the bird. By simultaneously using figures as personifies of autumn, Keats raises them out of their transient human bodies and eternizes them.

Ecstasy and Disillusionment in Keats' Odes

In his Odes, Keats makes a balance between the flux of human experience and the fixity of art. Keats' poetic imagination changes easily from the living world to the world of dreams, from art to reality, and from a place of ecstasy to a place of disillusionment.

In the poem, "Ode to a Nightingale," written by John Keats, the speaker attempts to use a nightingale as a means of escaping the realities of human life. The speaker wants to share his experience of listening to the song of a Nightingale and its effect on his mind. The time is night, a moon lit night and place is a green woods. There is a path in the woods which ends somewhere in the woods. In this romantic place and time, a Nightingale is "pouring forth" its soul. The song of the Nightingale has a hypnotizing effect on his mind. It appears in the poem that Keats is tempted into the nightingale's world of beauty and perfection. The speaker cherishes a longing to join the world of the bird which he wants to do through at first, country celebrations and secondly through drinks. The speaker visualizes the happy, excited, and ecstatic frenzies which he wants to have in order to join the happy world of the Nightingale.

Away! away! for I will fly to thee,
Not charioted by Bacchus and his pards,
But on the viewless wings of Poesy,
Though the dull brain perplexes and retards:

The speaker also gives the description of his actual journey into the dim-sum woods. But as soon as the speaker in the deep woods he can't see anything in embalmed darkness. He can only guess. In this imaginative forest he finds all the sensual enjoyment of his life. In the darkness of the forest he is surrounded by all the pleasures that he would think to have in the ideal world. There are flowers and fragrance every where and the summer season of woodland takes him to the extremity of joy of living.

The coming musk-rose, full of dewy wine,
The murmurous haunt of flies on summer eves.

At this point the speaker becomes so excited that he wants to die.

Now more than ever seems it rich to die,
To cease upon the midnight with no pain,
While thou art pouring forth thy soul abroad
In such an ecstasy!

But all this ecstasy is followed disillusionment and the speaker comes down to reality. The world of imagination can shelter us for a short time, but it can not give us the solution of the reality of life.

Forlorn! the very word is like a bell
To toll me back from thee to my sole self!
Adieu! the fancy cannot cheat so well
As she is fam'd to do, deceiving elf.

Keats begins his "ode on a Grecian Urn" simply describing the various figures that are curved on its surfaces.

The first scene depicts musicians and lovers in a setting of rustic beauty. The speaker attempts to identify with the characters because to him they represent the timeless perfection only art can capture.

THOU still unravish'd bride of quietness,
Thou foster-child of Silence and slow Time,
Sylvan historian, who canst thus express
A flowery tale more sweetly than our rhyme:

The lovers will always love, though they will never consummate their desire. The musicians will always play beneath trees that will never lose their leaves.

The speaker ends the poem with "heart high-sorrowful." This is because the urn, while beautiful and seemingly eternal, is not life. The lovers, while forever young and happy in the chase, can never engage in the act of fertility that is the basis of life, and the tunes, while beautiful in the abstract, do not play to the "sensual ear" and are in fact "of no tone.

Thy song, nor ever can those trees be bare;
Bold Lover, never, never canst thou kiss,
Though winning near the goal—yet, do not grieve;
She cannot fade, though thou hast not thy bliss,
For ever wilt thou love, and she be fair!

In Ode to Autumn, the act of creation is pictured as a kind of self-harvesting Autumn is a season of ripe fruitfulness. It is the time of the ripening of grapes, apples, gourds, hazelnuts etc.

SEASON of mists and mellow fruitfulness,
Close bosom-friend of the maturing sun;
Conspiring with him how to load and bless
With fruit the vines that round the thatch-eaves run;

It is also the time when bees suck the sweetness from "later flowers" and "make honey." Thus the autumn is pictured as bringing all the fruits of earth to maturity in readiness for harvesting. Despite the coming chill of winter, the late warmth of autumn provides Keats with ample beauty to celebrate: the cottage and its surroundings in the first stanza, the agrarian haunts of the goddess in the second, and the locales of natural creatures in the third. Keats experiences these beauties in a sincere and meaningful way.

But the music of autumn is 'wailful' and "mournful". Also we have in the last stanza the "soft-dying day" after the passing of "hours and hours'. Thus the poem's latent theme of mortality is symbolically dramatized by the passing course of the day. "And gathering swallows twitter in the skies" and "Birds habitually gather in flocks toward nightfall" means that the day is coming to a close. Also, birds gather particularly when they are preparing to fly southwards at the approach of winter.

While barrèd clouds bloom the soft-dying day
And touch the stubble-plains with rosy hue;
Then in a wailful choir the small gnats mourn
Among the river-sallows, borne aloft
Or sinking as the light wind lives or dies;

The sense of coming loss confronts the sorrow underlying the season's creativity. When Autumn's harvest is over, the fields will be bare, the swaths with their "twined flowers" cut down, the cider-press dry, the skies empty. This means that the season too is drawing to a close. A feeling of disillusionment is inevitable because of these suggestions.

From the above discussion we can say that the strain and stress of practical life makes him fly to the world of imagination for the time beings but he thinks of the short coming of the imagery world and finally accepts life as it is.

Keats' Hyperion

Greek Mythology

Greek myths and legends form the richest, most fertile collection of stories in Western culture, excluding the Bible. Yet despite their diversity they tend to share a common outlook on life. The Greeks cherished life and believed in living it to the fullest degree, since death was an inevitable fact. Only a small minority accepted the idea of resurrection after death; to the rest of the Greeks death was a dismal state, whereas life was dangerous, thrilling, and glorious. So the Greeks believed the only answer to death was to carve an imperishable legend for themselves. They pursued fame with astonishing energy in the five centuries from Homer to Alexander the Great. They were a tough, restless, ambitious, hard-living, imaginative race. But their lust for reputation made them touchy about their honor, and so they were also feisty and vengeful. Their myths and stories show all of these traits in abundance.

The Olympian Gods mirrored these Greek qualities, being quarrelsome, unforgiving deities who enjoyed warring, banqueting, and fornicating. They were always depicted in human form with beautiful, powerful bodies. The Greeks admired strength, beauty, and intelligence. And to them man was the measure of all things.

Because of the Greek urge for fame, their mythology produced a wealth of heroes, who tended to be adventurous fighters - bold, experienced, strong, and clever. However, they also had faults that sometimes ruined them: overweening pride, rashness, cruelty, all of which arose from the very source of their successes - ambition.

The legends of tragic dynasties show this same characteristic. Despite their worldly power, the royal families of Crete, Mycenae, Thebes, and Athens were afflicted with faults that rendered them vulnerable to disaster: pride, ruthlessness in getting revenge, stubbornness, and sexual conflict. No race has understood quite as clearly as the Greeks how character is destiny, or how our very achievements can stem from the same source as our shortcomings.

Hyperion was the Titan god of light, one of the sons of Ouranos (Heaven) and Gaia (Earth), and the father of the lights of heaven-Eos the Dawn, Helios the Sun, and Selene the Moon. His wife was Theia, lady of the aither-the shining blue of the sky. Hyperion's name means "watcher from above" or "he who goes above" from the Greek words hyper and iôn.

Hyperion was one of the four Titan brothers who conspired with Kronos in the castration of their father Ouranos. When Sky descended to lie with Earth, Hyperion, Krios, Koios and Iapetos-posted at the four corners of the world--seized hold of their father and held him fast while Kronos castrated him with a sickle. In this myth these four Titanes personify the great pillars which appear in Near-Eastern cosmogonies holding heaven and earth apart, or else the entire cosmos aloft. As the father of the sun and dawn, Hyperion was no doubt regarded as the Titan of the pillar of the east. His brothers Koios, Krios and Iapetos presided respectively over the north, south and west.

The Titanes were eventually deposed by Zeus and cast into the pit of Tartaros. Hesiod describes this as a void located beneath the foundations of all, where earth, sea and sky have their roots. Here the Titanes shift in cosmological terms from being holders of heaven to bearers of the entire cosmos. According to Pindar and Aeschylus (in his lost play Prometheus Unbound) the Titanes were eventually released from the pit through the clemency of Zeus.

Introduction to Hyperion

Hyperion deals with the overthrow of the primeval order of Gods by Jupiter, son of Saturn the old king. There are many versions of the fable in Greek mythology, and there are many sources from which it may have come to Keats. At school he is said to have known the classical dictionary by heart, but his inspiration is more likely to have been due to his later reading of the Elizabethan poets, and their translations of classic story. One thing is certain, that he did not confine himself to any one authority, nor did he consider it necessary to be circumscribed by authorities at all. He used, rather than followed, the Greek fable, dealing freely with it and giving it his own interpretation.

The situation when the poem opens is as Saturn, king of the gods, has been driven from Olympus down into a deep dell, by his son Jupiter, who has seized and used his father's weapon, the thunderbolt. A similar fate has overtaken nearly all his brethren, who are called by Keats Titans and Giants indiscriminately, though in Greek mythology the two races are quite distinct. These Titans are the children of Tellus and Coelus, the earth and sky, thus representing, as it were, the first birth of form and personality from formless nature. Before the separation of earth and sky, Chaos, a confusion of the elements of all things, had reigned supreme. One only of the Titans, Hyperion the sun-god, still keeps his kingdom, and he is about to be superseded by young Apollo, the god of light and song.

In the second book we hear Oceanus and Clymene his daughter tell how both were defeated not by battle or violence, but by the irresistible beauty of their dispossessors; and from this Oceanus deduces 'the eternal law, that first in beauty should be first in might'. He recalls the fact that Saturn himself was not the first ruler, but received his kingdom from his parents, the earth and sky, and he prophesies that progress will continue in the overthrow of Jove by a yet brighter and better order. Enceladus is, however, furious at what he considers a cowardly acceptance of their fate, and urges his brethren to resist.

In Book I we saw Hyperion, though still a god, distressed by portents, and now in Book III we see the rise to divinity of his successor, the young Apollo. The poem breaks off short at the moment of Apollo's metamorphosis, and how Keats intended to complete it we can never know.

It is certain that he originally meant to write an epic in ten books, and the publisher's remark[245:1] at the beginning of the 1820 volume would lead us to think that he was in the same mind when he wrote the poem. This statement, however, must be altogether discounted, as Keats, in his copy of the poems, crossed it right out and wrote above, 'I had no part in this; I was ill at the time.'

Moreover, the last sentence (from 'but' to 'proceeding') he bracketed, writing below, 'This is a lie.'

This, together with other evidence external and internal, has led Dr. de Sélincourt to the conclusion that Keats had modified his plan and, when he was writing the poem, intended to conclude it in four books. Of the probable contents of the one-and-half unwritten books Mr. de Sélincourt writes: 'I conceive that Apollo, now conscious of his divinity, would have gone to Olympus, heard from the lips of Jove of his newly-acquired supremacy, and been called upon by the rebel three to secure the kingdom that awaited him. He would have gone forth to meet Hyperion, who, struck by the power of supreme beauty, would have found resistance impossible. Critics have inclined to take for granted the supposition that an actual battle was contemplated by Keats, but I do not believe that such was, at least, his final intention. In the first place, he had the example of Milton, whom he was studying very closely, to warn him of its dangers; in the second, if Hyperion had been meant to fight he would hardly be represented as already, before the battle, shorn of much of his strength; thus making the victory of Apollo depend upon his enemy's unnatural weakness and not upon his own strength. One may add that a combat would have been completely alien to the whole idea of the poem as Keats conceived it, and as, in fact, it is universally interpreted from the speech of Oceanus in the second book. The resistance of Enceladus and the Giants, themselves rebels against an order already established, would have been dealt with summarily, and the poem would have closed with a description of the new age which had been inaugurated by the triumph of the Olympians, and, in particular, of Apollo the god of light and song.'

The central idea, then, of the poem is that the new age triumphs over the old by virtue of its acknowledged superiority--that intellectual supremacy makes physical force feel its power and yield. Dignity and moral conquest lies, for the conquered, in the capacity to recognize the truth and look upon the inevitable undismayed.

Keats broke the poem off because it was too 'Miltonic', and it is easy to see what he meant. Not only does the treatment of the subject recall that of Paradise Lost, the council of the fallen gods bearing special resemblance to that of the fallen angels in Book II of Milton's epic, but in its style and syntax the influence of Milton is everywhere apparent. It is to be seen in the restraint and concentration of the language, which is in marked contrast to the wordiness of Keats's early work, as well as in the constant use of classical constructions, [247:1] Miltonic inversions [247:2] and repetitions, [247:3] and in occasional reminiscences of actual lines and phrases in Paradise Lost. [247:4]

In Hyperion we see, too, the influence of the study of Greek sculpture upon Keats's mind and art. This study had taught him that the highest beauty is not incompatible with definiteness of form and clearness of detail. To his romantic appreciation of mystery was now added an equal sense of the importance of simplicity, form, and proportion, these being, from its nature, inevitable characteristics of the art of sculpture. So we see that again and again the figures described in Hyperion are like great statues--clear-cut, massive, and motionless. Such are the pictures of Saturn and Thea in Book I, and of each of the group of Titans at the opening of Book II.

Striking too is Keats's very Greek identification of the gods with the powers of Nature which they represent. It is this attitude of mind which has led some people--Shelley and Landor among them--to declare Keats, in spite of his ignorance of the language, the most truly Greek of all English poets. Very beautiful instances of this are the sunset and sunrise in Book I, when the departure of the sun-god and his return to earth are so described that the pictures we see are of an evening and morning sky, an angry sunset, and a grey and misty dawn.

But neither Miltonic nor Greek is Keats's marvellous treatment of nature as he feels, and makes us feel, the magic of its mystery in such a picture as that of the tall oaks

Branch-charmèd by the earnest stars, or of the dismal cirque
Of Druid stones, upon a forlorn moor,
When the chill rain begins at shut of eve,
In dull November, and their chancel vault,
The heaven itself, is blinded throughout night.

This Keats, and Keats alone, could do; and his achievement is unique in throwing all the glamour of romance over a fragment 'sublime as Aeschylus'.

"Hyperion, A Fragment": An Introduction

Date of Composition: - Hyperion was begun by Keats beside his brother's sickbed in September or October, 1818. It is to Hyperion that he refers when he speaks in those days of "plunging into abstract images", and finding a "feverous relief" in the "abstractions" of poetry. These phrases are applicable only to Hyperion. It was finished sometime in April, 1819.

Keats's Original Plan about This Poem: - The subject of Hyperion had long been in Keats's mind, and both in the text and the preface of Endymion he indicated his inten-tion to attempt it. At first he thought of the poem to be written as a "romance", but his plan changed to that of a blank verse epic in ten or twelve books. His purpose was to describe the warfare of the earlier Titanic dynasty with the later Olympian dynasty of the Greek gods; and in particular one episode of that warfare, the dethronement of the sun-god Hyperion and the assumption of his kingdom by Apollo. Hyperion exists in two versions, both incomplete. The second version was a revision of the first, with the addition of a long induction in a new style which makes it into a different poem. The two versions of the poem extend over Keats's greatest creative period. The first version was written mostly before the great Odes, the second mostly after them. As a matter of fact, the period covered by Hyperion is the period of Keats's most intense experience, both of joy and sorrow, in actual life, and of his most rapid development.

The Dethronement of Hyperion, the Proposed Theme: - The theme of the war between the Titans or the earlier generation of gods, and the later Olympians who overthrew them often occurs in the literature which Keats was fond of reading. The specific theme, the dethronement of Hyperion, the old sun-god, by Apollo the new, is Keats's own. Apollo is also the god of poetry, and as Endymion had symbolis of the lover of beauty in the world, so the story of Apollo and Hyperion was perhaps going to symbolise the fate of the poet as creator. Since the poem is unfinished, we cannot know.

The Miltonic Influence: - The design of Hyperion owes much to Milton. The poem opens in the regular epic manner, in the middle of the story. The Titans, like Milton's fallen angels, are already outcasts and have lost their power. Hyperion alone is not yet overthrown, and, like Milton's Satan, he is the one hope of further existence. The open-ing scene is followed by a council to discuss the regaining of the lost dominion, in which Enceladus, like Moloch,[1] pronounces his sentence for open war, and Oceanus, like Belial,[2] stands for more moderate measures. Externally, at least, this is modelled on Paradise Lost, and marks a clear break with the loose and incoherent struc-ure of Endymion.

Keatsian Originality of Style: - In spite of its fragmentary condition, Hyperion remains Keats's most imposing piece of work. According to the publishers, 'the hostile reception given to Endymion discouraged Keats from conti-nuing with the poem. Keats himself said that he gave it up because of the excessive Miltonism of the style. "There were too many Miltonic inversions in it", he wrote to Reynolds. "Miltonic verse cannot be written but in an artful or rather in an artist's humour." The Miltonic influence is certainly obvious in the verse and diction of the first Hyperion as it is in the design. There is, for instance, a constant use of inversions ("stride colossal", "rest divine") typical of Milton's Latinized style. Especially noticeable is the trick of sandwiching a noun between two adjectives ("gold clouds metropolitan"). There are other fragmsnts of classical sentence-structure too:

save what solemn tubes,
Blown by the serious Zephyrs, gave of sweet
And wandering sounds, slow-breathed melodies.

But the poem is hardly Miltonic in any stricter sense. In the matter of rhythm, Keats's blank verse has not the flight of Milton's. "Its periods do not wheel through such stately evolutions to so solemn and far-foreseen close; though it indeed lacks neither power nor music." It is still the verse of Keats, but immensely purged and strengthened by contact with a severer master. Some of the most beautiful images in their delicacy and precision are utterly unlike Milton's generalised verbal grandeur, and indeed could be by nobody but Keats:

. . . .No stir of air was there
Not so much life as on a summer's day
Robs not one light seed from the feather'd grass,
But where the dead leaf fell, there did it rest. (1, 7-10)

Books I and II. The Speeches of Oceanus and Clyniene

The first book of Hyperion gives us a picture of the fallen Titans, with Saturn as the central figure, but Hyperion as the only one who remains even potentially active. The second book shows them in council and the vital part of it is undoubtedly the speech of Oceanus. The sum and substance of his speech is as follows:

My voice is not a bellows unto ire.
Yet listen, ye who will, whilst I bring proof
How ye, perforce, must be content to stoop:
And in this proof much comfort will I give,
If ye will take that comfort in its truth.
We fall by course of Nature's law, not force

Of thunder, or of Jove. (11,176-82)

Saturn was not the first power in the universe, and should not expect to be the last. Chaos and darkness produced light; light brought heaven and earth and life itself into existence; and the Titans were the first-born of life. Just as heaven and earth are more beautiful than chaos and darkness,

So on our heels a fresh perfection treads,
A power more strong in beauty, born of us
And fated to excel us. … (11, 212-15)

The Titans should not grieve over the situation and should not envy their successors

. . . .for 'tis the eternal law,
That first in beauty shall be first in might. (11, 228-29)

The simple Clyniene follows and supports Oceanus by bearing testimony to the beauty of young Apollo's music which she has heard. The lesson of all this is that Hyperion is to be a poem of evolution, of the super-session of lower forms by higher; and that the successors are to prevail because they are superior in beauty.

Apollo, the Subject of Book III: - In the fragment of the third book the interest shifts from the Titans to the young Apollo. Mnemosyne (Memory) alone among the Titans has formed relations with the younger gods. She has watched over the childhood of Apollo, and now she finds him wavering and uncertain of his course. In his talk with her he finds the consciousness of his destiny and assumes his new-found godhead. At this point the poem breaks off.

Reasons of incompleteness: - It seems that what began as an epic poem about a mythological conflict has become a symbolical poem of a different kind. But in the process new difficulties have arisen for the poet. The conventional epic conflict would have afforded a wealth of scenes and incidents. The new scheme, of an evolution in beauty, presents far greater problems. It could hardly be put forth in events and actions, and would not therefore afford material for the ten books originally proposed. Perhaps there were other difficulties as well. The poem remains unfinished because Keats did not know how it was to go on.

Treatment of Greek Things, But Not in a Greek Manner: - Although Keats has been called a Greek, he does not write of Greek things in a Greek manner. The very description of the palace of Hyperion, with its vague, far-dazzling pomps and phantom terrors of coming doom, shows that. Keats is here far in workmanship from the Greek purity and precision of outline, and from definition of individual images. Some of his pictures of Nature, too, show not the simplicity of the Greek, but the complexity of the modern, sentiment of Nature. But Keats shows a thorough grasp of the essential meaning of the war between Titans and Olympians. He illustrates with great beauty and force (in the speech of Oceanus in the second book) that essential meaning : the dethronement of an older and ruder worship by one more advanced and humane, in which ideas of ethics and of arts held a larger place beside ideas of Nature and her brute powers.

Keats's Success in Animating the Colossal Gods: - Again, Keats attains great success in conceiving and animating the colossal shapes of the early gods. He shows a masterly instinct in the choice of comparisons, drawn from Nature by which he tries to make us realise the voices of those gods, with their personalities between the elemental and the human.

A Dramatic Representation of Human Emotions: - Indeed, Hyperion is Keats's most serious and considerable attempt at the dramatic presentation of emotion, because the Titans are conceived in human terms, and their sorrows are human sorrows. There is far greater power, too, of discourse, of argument in verse, than ever before; there is no parallel in Keats's earlier work to the speech of Oceanus.

Sublimity of Book I, and Intensity of Book III: - The second book of Hyperion, relating the council of the dethroned Titans, has neither the sublimity of the first, nor the intensity of the unfinished third. In the first book we have a solemn vision of the fallen Saturn, followed by a resplendent vision of Hyperion threatened in his empire. In the third book we see Apollo undergoing a convulsive change under the afflatus of Mnemosyne, and about to put on the full powers of his godhead. But the third book has a ripeness and controlled power of its own which places it quite on a level with the other two.

One of the Grandest English Poems: - "With a few slips and inequalities, and one or two instances of verbal incorrectness, Hyperion is indeed one of the grandest poems in the English language, and in its grandeur seems one of the easiest and most spontaneous. Keats, however, had never been able to apply himself to it continuously, but only by fits and starts. Partly this was due to the distractions of bereavement, of material anxiety, and of dawning passion amid which it was begun and continued: partly (if we may trust the statement of the publishers) to disappointment at the reception of Endymion; and partly, it is clear, to something not wholly congenial to his powers in the task itself."

Summary of "Hyperion, A Fragment

BOOK ONE

Saturn's Despondency after His Defeat: - The Titans were defeated by the Olympians in a war which had started when the Olympians rebelled against the authority of the Titans who had been ruling the universe ever since their conquest of Chaos and Darkness.

Saturn was the chief of the Titans, while Jove or Jupiter was the supreme leader of the Olympians. The grey-haired Saturn had, after his defeat, taken shelter in a remote and shady place in a valley, where he now sat, quiet as a stone. Perfect silence prevailed around him. He was feeling absolutely listless, arid his right hand lay, nerveless, on the ground, looking like the hand of a dead body. There was no longer the divine rod of authority in his hand. He sat there in a state of deep despondency, with his eyes closed.

A Visit By Thea: - It seemed that no force would be able to wake up Saturn from his trance. But there did come somebody to wake him up. The visitor was goddess Thea, the wife of the sun-god, Hyperion. She too was a member of the defeated party, and she too was grief-stricken. She woke up Saturn from his listlessness and wanted to know how he was feeling. She told him that she had brought no comfort for him and that she was well aware that he had lost all his power and his authority. She told him that he could continue sleeping and that she would sit at his feet and weep.

Thea's Suggestion, Accepted By Saturn: - Saturn opened his eyes and, looking around him, realized that he was now a deposed monarch who had lost all his kingdom. He told Thea that he had not only lost his empire but his identity and his real self also. He asked her if it would be possible for him to regain his empire. He said that, if it had been possible for him to find another chaos somewhere, he would have created another universe out of it, just as another power had originally cre primeval Chaos. In reply, Thea suggested that he should visit his fellow-Titans who had taken refuge at a place to which she could escort him. She wanted that Saturn should rejoin his defeated fellow-Titans and comfort them. Saturn accepted her suggestion, and they both set out on their journey.

The Fears of the Undefeated Hyperion, and His Resolve: - Some of the defeated Titans had been captured by the victorious gods and been put into prisons. A few of the other Titans were wandering about in the world at large in a disconsolate condition. But the majority of them had taken shelter at the particular place where Thea was now taking Saturn. However, there was one Titan who had still not been defeated and who stills held sway over his sphere. He was Hyperion, the god of the sun. But, although Hyperion, who lived in a splendid and radiant palace and who commanded the blazing planet of the sun, was still sovereign in his own kingdom, he had begun to feel mentally disturbed by certain ill-omens which seemed to indicate that even he could not feel secure and that his authority might also be threatened. The ill-omens almost unnerved Hyperion, but he was able to overcome his fear and, gathering all his strength and will-power, he declared that he would use his terrible right arm to infuse terror into the heart of Jove who had rebelled against the authority of Saturn and that he would even succeed in restoring Saturn's throne to Saturn.

Hyperion, Urged By Coelus to Go and Meet the Defeated Titans: - There were still a few hours before the sun was due to rise. Hyperion had already prepared himself to start the day's journey. And, though he was impatient to begin the day, he could not commence his task before the due hour. He therefore lay down to while away the few hours which still remained. Although he had formed a strong resolution to fight against Jove, yet his mind was not at ease. The fear of the danger which threatened his supremacy still weighed upon his mind. In this state of mind he heard a voice whispering into his ears. It was the voice of his aged father, Coelus (or Uranus) who now spoke to him from somewhere in heaven. This is what the aged god, Uranus, said to Hyperion:

"You are the brightest of my children. You were born under mysterious circumstances, and the mystery of your birth was not revealed even to me and to your mother. You as well as your brothers and sisters are all manifestations of that beauty which pervades the whole universe. It is very unfortunate that a civil war has taken place among the gods and goddesses, as a result of which my eldest son, Saturn, has been defeated and dethroned. I was in no position to give any help to him. You, my son, are still retaining your authority and governing your dominion. I want you to go down to the earth and meet Saturn and his fellow-gods to see what help you can give to them. It is a bad sign that, while you have all lived and governed your kingdoms with dignity, you are all now experiencing such emotions as fear, anger, and hope which are the feelings characteristic of mankind and not of gods."

At these words, Hyperion got up and, leaving the planet of the sun in the charge of his father who had spoken to him, plunged noise-lessly into the deep night in order to go down to the earth and meet his fellow-Titans.

BOOK TWO

The Defeated Gods Feeling Miserable: - In the meantime, Saturn and Thea had arrived at the place where most of the defeated Titans had taken refuge in a cave among the rocks. As already pointed out, some of the gods and goddesses were in prison where they were being tortured. These included Coeus, Gyges, Briareus, Typhon, Dolor, and Porhyrion. Some others were wandering about aimlessly in the world. They included Mnemosyne, the goddess of memory; and Phoebs, a daughter of the moon-goddess. Those who had taken shelter in this cave among the rocks included Creus, Iapetus, Cottus, Caf, Enceladus, Phorcus, Ocaanus, Tethys, Clymsne, Trutnis, Ops. These gods and goddessss included also Asia, the daughter of the mountain-god Caf by his union with Tellus. All the gods and goddesses assembled here were in a most wretched and miserable condition because of their removal from their respective high positions of authority in the universe.

Saturn's Address to His Fellow-Gods: - On arriving at this place, Saturn felt even sadder than before. This god, who had once wielded supreme authority in the universe, was now experiencing such distressing emotions as rage, fear, anxiety, remorse, and revenge. And he experienced not only these emotions but also that of despair. It seemed that Fate had robbed him of his divine powers and infected him with the weaknesses and infirmities of human beings. Under the stress of these emotions, Saturn might have collapsed to the ground but, by chance, he met the eyes of Enceladus of whose exceptional strength and might he was fully aware. Seeing anger in Enceladus's eyes, Saturn felt invigorated and strengthened. The presence of Enceladus acted as a great stimulus upon him, and so he shouted to the assembled Titans: "Titans, behold your supreme god". At Saturn's words some of the gods groaned, some got up on their feet, some shouted, some wept, some wailed; but all of them bowed to Saturn reverently. Saturn had now conquered his feelings of fear and despair, and he spoke in a self-confident manner. Addressing his fellow-gods, he said:

"I do not understand why you should feel so dejected. Neither in my own heart nor in the book of wisdom which I have always kept close to myself, am I able to discover any reason why you should have given up all hope. There have been no portents to show that we are a doomed race. Seeing you in this mood of dejection, I do not know what message I should give to you. If I ask you to arise, you will groan because you are in no mood to fight; if I ask you to cringe to the conqueror (Jove) you will still groan because your self-respect will be hurt. What can I then do? Tell me, my brother-gods, how we can wreak vengeance upon the rebellious gods who have won a victory over us. You, Oceanus, are a deep thinker. What advice can you give me?"

Oceanus's Reply: - Saturn here ended his speech. Oceanus now replied to Saturn's question. This is what Oceanus said:

"What I have to say should be a source of comfort to you, provided you can find comfort in what is true. The truth is that we have been defeated not by the power of Jove but in accordance with Nature's law. Great Saturn, you have studied this universe but, having been accustomed to wield unlimited power, you have missed certain small points which lower minds could easily understand. You should realize that, just as you were not the first power to rule the universe, so you are not the last. You are not the beginning, and you are not the end. We all acquired our positions and our authority after the original chaos and the primeval darkness had been conquered. And just as we are fairer than that chaos and that darkness, those who have now become the rulers of the universe are fairer than we are. On our heels a fresh perfection treads, a power more strong in beauty, a power born of us but destined to surpass us just as we surpass the original chaos and the primeval darkness. Besides, it is not a question of conquest; we have not been conquered by Jove and his comrades just as we did not in any sense conquer chaos and darkness; it is just a question of progress which proceeds inevitably according to the law of Nature. We should not resent having been superseded just as the dull soil does not resent the existence of the grand forests which it has itself nourished and fed, and just as a tree does not resent the dove which sits on its branches and sings. We have ourselves begotten those who have now taken our places as the rulers and, in course of time, they too would be ousted by another race because the law of Nature is that "first in beauty should be first in "might". I have been succeeded on my throne by another god

(Neptune) but I am not resentful of him because he is far more impressive in his appearance and far more handsome than I am. I myself bade farewell to my empire in order to make way for him, even though I felt sad to relinquish my authority. Now what I want is that you should understand the principle which is behind our dethronement, and draw comfort from it.”

Clymene’s Account of Her Strange Experience: - None of the gods said anything in response to Oceanus’s speech. The only one who now spoke was the goddess Clymene. She said that she wanted to tell the assembly of the gods an experience which she had gone through in the forest and which had convinced her that the gods who had now come into power after displacing the previous rulers of the universe were really superior to their predecessors. She said that, while singing and playing on a musical instrument on the sea-shore, she had suddenly become conscious of a magic influence which seemed to be coming from an island opposite. She had thereupon thrown away her musical instru-ment and started listening to the music which began to come from the same direction. The music which she heard consisted of a succession of melodious sounds which fell upon her ears one after the other like pearl beads dropping suddenly from their string. She had never heard such music before; and it now made her sick with simultaneous feelings of joy and grief. She was filled with joy because this music was rapturous, and she felt sad because this music was superior to any music which she herself could produce. The feeling of grief proved to be stronger than the feeling of joy and, stopping her ears with her hands, shi fled from that place in order not to hear that music any longer. But a voice, sweeter than all music, followed her, crying: “Apallo! Young Apollo! The morning-bright Apollo!” What Clymene meant by describing this experience of hers was that the music of Apollo, who belonged to the new race of rulers, was far superior to the music which could be produced by the Titans.

Enceladus, Opposed to an Attitude of Passivity and Submission: - While both Oceanus and Clymene had wanted to convince the defeated gods that the best course for them would be to reconcile themselves to their present state, Enceladus the Giant felt deeply annoyed with what these two speakers had said. Hi regarded the dethronement of the Titans as an unbearable humiliation and he therefore suggested that the Titans should not give way to despair but should make a vigorous effort to regain their kingdoms. He said that he would tell the Titans how they could destroy the power of Jove and how they could once again become the proud rulers of their realms. He said that he could not forget the days of peace and tranquility which he had enjoyed during the period of the rule of the Titans, and that he would like those days to return. Enceladus went on to say that one of the Titans, namely Hyperion, had still not been displaced and that even the defeated Titans could therefore hope to regain their lost empires. After expressing these views, Enceladus said that he was happy to note that his words had produced the desired effect on his listeners.

Hyperion’s Arrival to Meet the Defeated Gods: - Just then Hyperion, who had been urged by Coelus (or Uranus) to go down to the earth in order to meet the defeated Titans, arrived at the scene. When Hyperion alighted on a rock near the cave, where the defeated gods were holding their conference, his radiance filled the atmosphere all around. Every gulf, every chasm, every height, and every depth looked bright with the radiance shed by Hyperion. Hyperion looked at the assembled Titans and noted the wretchedness of the dethroned gods who could now, in the light being shed all around by Hyperion, see how miserable they appeared by contrast with him. But Hyperion was in no joyous mood, because the sight of the defeated and miserable gods filled him also with depression. Four of the gods including the fierce Encealdus now got up and advanced to greet Hyperion. Going near him, these four gods shouted the name of Saturn and, in reply, Hyperion answered from the mountain-peak: “Saturn.” Saturn himself at this time was sitting near the mother of all the gods whose face showed no joy on account of the sad fate which had overtaken her progeny.

BOOK THREE

Keats to Sing About Apollo: - At this point Keats deviates from the story of the Titans which he has been narrating and from the role of Hyperion which he has been describing. He thinks of the premature death of his brother Tom and says that he should turn rather to sing about his own sorrow than about the woes of the gods. But he does not then proceed to sing even about his own personal sorrow. He says that he would like to sing about Apollo, "the father of all verse." The thought of Apollo fills him with a great enthusiasm and joy, and he calls upon all Nature to put on fresh glory in order to join him in celebrating the greatness of Apollo who was born on the island of Delos. He announces to all Nature that "Apollo is once more the golden theme" of his verse. Evidently, Keats's purpose now is to take up the theme of the dethronement of Hyperion by Apollo. But Apollo is not yet a god. Keats therefore first takes up the theme of how Apollo became a god.

Apollo's Encounter with an Awful Goddess: - When Hyperion stood radiant in the midst of his grief-stricken fellow-Titans, Apollo left his mother and his twin-sister sleeping in their bower and wandered forth in the morning twilight. Walking through the lilies of the valley at that early hour, when the nightingale had just stopped singing and when there were only a few stars left in the sky, Apollo came to a stop on the banks of a stream and suddenly burst into tears. While he stood there weeping, with his golden bow in his hand, an awful goddess came and stood before him. Apollo was surprised to see this mysterious figure who seemed to have come from nowhere. He then realized that he had always been conscious of the presence of this goddess on this island and that he had often heard the sweep of her garments over the fallen leaves as she walked about in the valley and in the forest. He told the goddess that he had either actually seen her before on this island or had dreamed of her. The goddess replied that he had dreamed of her and that, on waking up from his dream, he had found a golden lyre which she had placed for him by his side. From the strings of that lyre he had produced sweet music which the whole universe had heard with both pain and pleasure, realizing that a new kind of music had come into existence.

The Goddess's Deep Interest in Apollo: - The goddess now asked Apollo why he had been weeping and what it was that had been making him so sad. She told him that she had been keeping a watch upon him during his hours of sleep and during his hours of wakefulness ever since his childhood. She said that she had given up her allegiance to the old gods for his sake and for the sake of the new loveliness which he possessed and the new music which he had originated.

Apollo's "Aching Ignorance": - Thereupon Apollo suddenly realized who this goddess was. He said that her name had suddenly occurred to him and that she must be Mnemosyne. Then he said that his sorrow, which had made him shed tears, was not a mystery to her and that she knew everything about him. He went on to say that there were certain things which he did not understand. He wanted the goddess Mnemosyne to clear his doubts about certain matters. He wanted to know the nature of the stars, the identity of the power behind the forces of Nature, the divinity who ruled the universe, and the reason why he was often overtaken by a melancholy which was so deep as to have a numbing effect on his limbs. He asked her to tell him why he often listened to the sounds of the elements "in fearless yet in aching ignorance."

The Deification of Apollo, Or Keats's Emergence as a True Poet: -

Mnemosyne remained silent. Apollo's mind was now suddenly illumined by a new discovery. He said that he could read a wonderful lesson in the goddess's silent face. "Knowledge enormous makes a god of me", he said. Then he told her what he could read in her face. Her face had brought to him a sudden awareness of "names, deeds, old legends, dire events, rebellions, majesties, sovereign voices, agonies, creations and destroyings." This new awareness, he said, was like a wine or an elixir which seemed to deify him and make him immortal. As he said these words, keeping his eyes steadfast on Mnemosyne, he experienced wild convulsions which shook his whole body. He underwent an agonizing experience. The agony which he felt was akin to the agony of death. While he was going through this painful ordeal, Mnemosyne kept her arms upraised like one who was making a prophecy. At last Apollo shrieked with joy and ecstasy, and from all his limbs came a glory which showed that he had become a god. Apollo had died into life. Apollo the mortal was dead bat Apollo the god was born. In other words, Apollo had risen to great heights of poetry and music by his contact with Mnemosyne who symbolized all human experience, all experience which mankind had had in the past and an awareness of which is a necessary part of the equipment of a poet. (Mnemosyne represents not only the past of mankind but also the present and even the future. The deification of Apollo means that Keats himself feels that he has become a true poet because of his realization that a keen and sensitive awareness of the reality of all human experience is essential if a poet wants to write true poetry).

Critical Appreciation of "Hyperion"

It is a commonplace of Keats criticism to present the poet as struggling against both a debilitating sense of his own immaturity and the wider public perception of him as 'immature'. Keats's doleful suspicion that he was merely a 'weaver-boy' in the eyes of reviewers and other 'literary fashionables' was confirmed by Byron's caustic reference this 'pass a bed' poetry, and by John Gibson Lockhart's conclusion that Keats was only 'a boy of pretty abilities'.

In 1820, the Guardian ironically praised his 'juvenile industry', while the London Magazine condemned his 'boyish petulance'. Throughout his poetic career, Keats contended with reviewers who configured him as 'effeminate' or 'callow', and who routinely exhorted him to 'grow up'. But while Keats's relationship with immaturity and 'juvenile industry' may have been fraught, it was by no means wholly disabling. Marjorie Levinson has shown with customary dexterity how Keats used his cultural marginality, stylistic vulgarity, and 'adolescent' sexuality to subvert authoritarian values extolled by' so distant guardians of public taste' like Lockhart and J. W. Croker. Indeed, Keats's work often teeters self-consciously on the edge of puerility, such 'teeterings' becoming the condition for contestations of various kinds.

In the prevailing callous critical atmosphere, Keats continued to prove himself the greatest of his contemporaries. Though he was never admitted in his lifetime, yet his approach towards fine or poor creations was par excellence. His assortment and denunciation of poetic process was from a full-grown mind. Famous fragmentary poem "Hyperion" seems to have afforded Keats less satisfaction than any other of his works. It was printed, as the "Advertisement" shows, at his Publishers' desire, "and contrary to the wish of the author." Still later, he "re-cast it into the shape of a Vision, which remains equally unfinished."

"I have given up Hyperion," Keats writes from Winchester, Sep. 22, 1819 "there were too many Miltonic inversions in it—Miltonic verse cannot be written but in an artful, or rather, artist's humour. I wish to give myself up to other sensations. English ought to be kept up."

This phrase apparently refers to the mood in which he had just written those noble lines to Autumn, which we put, with Lamia, and five or six more pieces, amongst his maturest work; the work wherein art touches its genuine triumph in concealing itself: the work which, in matter and manner alike, embodies his most essential, his most intimate, genius. And, in the remarks, which follow, the poet clearly shows a consciousness that in Hyperion the "artist's humour "was too prevalent: "the false beauty, proceeding from art," blended with "the true voice of feeling." Keats, criticizing here for the last time his own work, touches on the note, which is most sensible in his poetry, as it is that which lay the deepest in his own nature. Almost more than passion for beauty, although, indeed it is, rather, itself the fine flower of beauty, tenderness, almost passing into tremulousness, seems his characteristic. Here and there, whilst he was little more than a boy, we hear this note in excess.

But Keats, in both the qualities just named, true child of Spenser, has also the manliness of nature, the sanity of sentiment, which underlie everywhere that river of gold, which ripples through the Faerie Queene. Beyond any of his great compeers during the last two centuries, (if we may here venture thus to sum up the imperfect criticisms on his genius which are offered in these notes), Keats had inherited, not only as Man but as Poet, or rather, as Poet because he was so as Man, the inspiration and the magnanimity of the great age of our Muses; —more than any, he is true English-Elizabethan: Had the years of Milton been destined for him, of him, more than of any other it might have been prophesied, fortunate.

Despite the marvellous grandeur of its execution, the judgment of Keats upon this work appears to be thoroughly well founded. After an introduction worthy to be compared with what the Propylaea of the Acropolis at Athens must have been, at once in severe majesty and in refinement of execution, the interest of the story rapidly and irremediably falls off. It is, truly, to take a phrase from the Preface to Endymion, "too late a day." The attempt to revivify an ancient myth, —as distinguished from an ancient story of human life, —however alluring, however illustrated by poets of genius, seems essentially impossible.

It is for the details, not for the whole, that we read Hyperion, or Prometheus Unbound, or the German Iphigeneia. Like the great majority of post-classical verse in classical languages, those modern myths are but exercises, (and, as such, with their value to the writer), on a splendid scale.

The story of which "Hyperion" tells the beginning is, in fact, far too remote, too alien from the modern world: it has neither any definite symbolical meaning, nor any of that "soft humanity" which underlies the wild magic of his other works, and has rendered possible a picture, true not only to Corinth two thousand years ago, but to all-time. Yet, with such strange vital force has he penetrated into the Titan world, and all but given the reality of life to the old shadows before him, that, had this miracle been possible, we may fairly say that Keats would have worked it.

The author was, hence, right in giving up "Hyperion". Yet, by a singular irony of literary fate, "Hyperion" was the first of his poems, which seems to have reached fame beyond his own English circle of admirers. Byron, in a passage often quoted, placed its sublimity on a level with Aeschylus. But the criticisms, which it called forth from Shelley, are the most noteworthy. In Nov. 1820 we find him writing that he has received "a volume of poems by Keats; in other respects insignificant enough, but containing the fragment of a poem called "Hyperion".... It is certainly an astonishing piece of writing. "Nor was this Shelley's first impression only; for on 15 Feb. 1821 he returns to Keats: "His other poems are worth little; but, if the Hyperion be not grand poetry, none has been produced by our contemporaries."

If we remember the masterpieces contained in the precious little book of 1820, it may be reasonably held that even the political antagonists of Keats and his friends could hardly have exceeded these criticisms in blind prosaic injustice. So may one great poet, and he, snow-pure from taint of envy or malice, misunderstand and misestimate another!

Hyperion", An Epic of Beauty's Triumph

First in Beauty Should Be First in Might: - The fragmentary epic, Hyperion, is concerned chiefly with beauty. A war in heaven was the basis for the narrative which Keats had planned to write. An older race of gods known as the Titans had been overthrown by the younger Olympians.

Hyperion, the sun-god, after whom the poem was named, had been visualized by Keats as the champion of the Titan cause because he was the only one of them yet undefeated when the poem begins. The main action of the poem would almost certainly have been the overthrow and supersession of Hyperion by the Olympian Apollo. The fundamental theme, then, is the war which had taken place between two classes of gods. From the outset we find ourselves in the company of the defeated Titans, experiencing their bitter sorrow and asking their questions; and the centrality of beauty is asserted precisely here, because the only theatrical answer to the question why the older gods have suffered at the hands of the younger gods is that beauty should triumph and that in the present case it has actually triumphed. The victorious Olympians are more beautiful than the Titans; there is no more to be said on this point because "it is the eternal law that first in beauty should be first in might." This one statement made by Oceanus not only puts beauty at the centre of the poem but interweaves it with pain by denning a metaphysic of suffering out of beauty's triumph. To the riddle of the defeat of the Titans, the solution is that the less beautiful must be superseded and pushed into the background. In this poem Keats simultaneously vindicates the beautiful and gives his explanation of the pain and suffering in this world. In his view the pain and suffering of the world are the price of beauty's victory. The survival of the fittest is the tune to which creation dances; this constitutes the world's outward drama and equally its inner sense. The greater or the fitter is one who is the more beautiful because Nature's law is that first in beauty should be first in might.

The Problem of Suffering and Pain: - The poem opens with a striking picture of Saturn sitting still and silent after his defeat. He is joined by the goddess Thea (who was the wife of Hyperion, the sun-god). She rouses Saturn from his stupor in order to stress his total discomfiture and to say that she has to offer no explanation of these recent events and that she has no comfort to offer either. "I have no comfort for thee, no, not one", she pointedly says. In reply, Saturn asks her if his feeble shape is really his and if his voice is really his. In other words, through Saturn's questioning, Keats raises the problem of human suffering (even though the questioner is a god). Thea only understands that disaster has befallen the Titans. Saturn only understands the pain of defeat. Both of them want to understand more; and Keats now sends them together to that sad place where Cybele and the bruised Titans sat in mourning. Some of the defeated Titans are then named and described, where after Saturn proceeds to address them. His speech goes deeper still into the sheer puzzle of pain. He puts it thus:

Not in my own sad breast,
Which is its own great judge and searcher out,
Can I find reason why ye should be thus: (II, 129-31)

At the end of his speech he turns to Oceanus whose "severe content", which is the result of thought and musing, has surprised him and from whom he now seeks guidance.

Stoic Resignation to the Truth: - It is Oceanus who, in his reply to Saturn's question, urges his fellow-gods to see their Titanic woes as part of a process called beauty's triumph. Whether the process justifies the pain involved is not easy to decide. Oceanus proclaims his message to be "the pain of truth"; but at the same time he asserts that those who take his message to be painful are foolish. The dominant note of the speech of Oceanus is Stoic resignation to the truth rather than welcome of it. He concludes with the following advice:

Receive this truth, and let it be your balm.

But there is no suggestion that pain can be transformed into something else. In other words, pain and suffering remain pain and suffering, and cannot undergo any mystic transformation. All that Oceanus can say is that the defeated gods have to suffer but that they are suffering in a good cause. So his mandate is that the sufferers must achieve calm and tranquility.

The Superior Beauty of the New Sea-God and of the New God of Music: -

Oceanus cites his own individual defeat as an illustration of the general principle which he has just laid down. He refers to the new Olympian god who has overthrown him. He speaks about the new god of the sea in ardent terms, praising the beauty and the glow of the new god. Oceanus was so impressed by the new god that he voluntarily relinquished his position as the sovereign of his empire and came away from his headquarters, so to speak. Following Oceanus, the goddess Clymene expresses her own sense of bewilderment but then goes on to speak of Apollo in the same eloquent and glowing terms in which Oceanus had spoken about his successor. Says she:

A voice came sweeter, sweeter than all tune,
And still it cried, "Apollo ! Young Apollo!"
I fled, it follow'd me, and cried "Apollo"! (II, 292-94)

Thus the reference to Apollo emphasizes a singing voice of the utmost beauty. And the beauty is, of course, the point, because the final triumph of beauty will be the triumph of Apollo; and in this way Oceanus's assertion of the eternal law of Nature will be vindicated. No doubt, Enceladus, who speaks after Clymene, rejects both her opinion and the view of Oceanus. Enceladus describes Oceanus as "over-wise" and he describes Clymene as "over-foolish". Enceladus speaks in a militant tone, and he relies on Hyperion to come to the rescue of the defeated Titans. But the event described in Book III, in which Apollo achieves his deification, clearly shows that Enceladus's defiance and militancy would come to nothing, if the poem had been continued, it would have described the conflict between Hyperion and the new god Apollo, and it would have described the triumph of the latter who is more beautiful by virtue of his music and melody the like of which had never before been heard in the universe.

Major Themes in Hyperion

Human Sufferings in Hyperion/ "the agonies, the strife of human hearts" in Hyperion

Hyperion" is an uncompleted epic poem by John Keats. It is based on the Titans and Olympians, and tells of the despair of the former after their fall to the latter. Keats wrote the poem for about one year, when he gave it up as having "too many Miltonic inversions." He was also nursing his brother Tom, who died in January of 1819 of tuberculosis. Hyperion relates the fall of the Titans, elemental energies of the world, and their replacement by newer gods. The Olympian gods, having superior knowledge and an understanding of humanity's suffering, are the natural successors to the Titans.

Keats's epic begins after the battle between the Titans and the Olympian gods, with the Titans already fallen. Hyperion, the sun god, is the Titans' only hope for further resistance. The epic's narrative, divided into three sections, concentrates on the dethronement of Hyperion and the ascension to power of Apollo, god of sun and poetry. Book I presents Saturn fallen and about to be replaced and Hyperion threatened within his empire. The succeeding events reveals the aftermath of the situation and the Titan's acceptance of defeat after Oceanus' speech. In Hyperion, the quality of Keats's blank verse reached new heights, particularly in the opening scene between Thea and the fallen Saturn:

> "Deep in the shady sadness of a vale,
> ... Sat gray-hair'd Saturn, quiet as a stone"

Many themes introduced in the Hyperion are identifiable as those associated with Romanticism. Hyperion, which marks the exchange of the old powers for the new, addresses ideas about poetry, beauty, knowledge, and experience. Hyperion's dominant themes address the nature of poetry and its relationship to humanity and the sublimity of human suffering the knowledge gained through it. The narrative suggests consideration of progress, particularly toward enlightenment and depictions of beauty, even as it evokes classical ideals found in Greek mythology. Visual and verbal representations, in the use of language and of Greek sculptural forms, contribute to this exploration. Through his representation of gods, Keats's commentary on Romantic opposites includes the real and ideal, history versus myth, finite versus infinite. The theme of truth is also prevalent. The speech of Oceanus and the ascension of Apollo both point to Hyperion's concern with truth and its relationship with beauty, knowledge, and suffering. Truth is closely associated with knowledge and both are acquired through pain, which results from the understanding and acceptance of change and impermanence. However painful, truth is pure and beautiful, and what is beautiful is eternal. It is this honourable truth that the human spirit strives to attain. That is why Keats calls Hyperion:

> "the agonies, the strife of human hearts"

The poem is tragic with most of the qualities of a tragedy. Oceanus is working as a chorus giving the poem's moral and working as a mediator. Keats says: All I hope is that I may not lose interest in human affairs. In his later poetry, the realm of Flora and Old Pan are gone. His early poems were sensuous, but later he became aware of human sufferings. He thought that poetry of escape is not the real poetry. Real poetry deals with human beings. The function of poetry according to Keats is a friend to soothe the cares of man and lift up his thought. In the poems, gods have been given human qualities symbolizing sufferings of man. Gods are huge and Titanic, but have been given human characteristics effectively and realistically. Saturn's misery, Thea's stature all perfect human as exemplified in the line, 'I have no comfort for thee, no, not one'. Keats has humanized the gods to reveal human sufferings as further in Saturn's speech:

> "Who had power
> To make me desolate? Whence came the strength?"

For Saturn, dethronement is a question of identity as Napoleon or any human being, may be Nawaz Sharif or Musharraf, and could have felt. Thea's reassurance to Saturn is a typical human activity. The suffering of Titans is the collected suffering of humanity at large. Hyperion is a militant whose spirit is dampened by danger. So Keats, unlike other poems, has human concern in this poem. The Confidence with Saturn reminds us of Duke in "My Last Duchess" by Browning as "I gave commands and all smiles stopped". Saturn is like Milton's Satan who doesn't want to establish his own kingdom for sovereignty as much as to take revenge on God. So the gods are all humanized. This is also visible in the Hyperion's apprehensions about his dethronement and mock-determinations.

> "I will advance a terrible right arm
> Shall scare that infant thunderer, rebel Jove"

He has seen certain omens which indicate that his downfall may be imminent. Human beings feel apprehensive when they hear a dog howling or an owl screeching; and this god is feeling apprehensive because the wings of eagles darkened his palace and because the neighing of steeds has been heard which had nev gods or wondering men". The omens are different no doubt, but Hyperion's reaction to the omens is the same as that of human beings is. And just as a human being might still resolve to fight against a coming danger, so Hyperion too says that he will use his terrible right arm. He feels most restless to think of the fate which might overtake him. But his restlessness is human restlessness under the pressure of a coming danger. Just as a wealthy man is afraid lest he should become bankrupt, so Hyperion is afraid lest he should lose his ‵‵lucent empire". Just as a wealthy man is afraid lest he should be deprived of all his gains, so Hyperion is afraid lest he should lose "the blaze, the splendour, and the symmetry". Hyperion is at this time like a fish out of water. Ha would like to begin the day sooner than usual, but the laws of Nature do not permit him to do that. He picks up courage only when his father whispers to him from somewhere in heaven and urges him to go and join his fellow-Titans on the earth; another human activity.

Keats suffered from the two experiences of entirely different nature: imagination and reality. It is evident, then, that Keats was grappling with the problem of human suffering and with a human dilemma. He even suggests the simple formula: What cannot be cured must be endured. Human beings should face the facts squarely and calmly, and such a calm acceptance of realities shows not a defeatist mentality but a manly or even a divine frame of mind. Having arrived at this stage in his thinking, Keats went on to write the great odes in which his human concerns find a full utterance. Keats has like Apollo, acquired the tragic vision and become a great poet. Had he lived longer, he would have written even greater poetry and it would have been a poetry marked by profound thought, intense emotion, and a portrayal of the stern realities of human life.

"Hyperion is a veritable gallery of studies in pain" and "what Keats achieves above all in Hyperion is the sublimation of suffering." What is your opinion?

Keats is a poet of suffering and pain. Throughout his poetry feelings of suffering is the prominent feature. In spite this we cannot call Keats a poet of sadness. We find a strange tranquility and calm in Keats' poetry even when he tells the story of loss, pain and suffering. Keats seems to accept as something integral and inevitable for human existence.

When we say that Hyperion is the veritable gallery of pain, we that we find only pain in the poem and nothing else. Actually Hyperion like all other masterpieces written by Keats gives the impression of a gallery with having different picture, the most important being those of Saturn, Thea, Hyperion and Nature. All these pictures are embodiment of pain, though in quite different ways.

When we say that achievement of Keats in Hyperion is the sublimation of suffering, we mean that suffering has been described with so much beauty that they appear to be sublime and inevitable to human existence , and, therefore, integral part of life.

The poem deals with the theme of change. It is the law of nature that new things replace the old things but this change is always painful. Keats has captured this pain with such blend of objectivity and subjectivity that he has succeeded in making sufferin

Keats is Hyperion is surely a tail of pain and suffering. This is tale of loss and of suffering which emanates from loss. Actually the poem deals with the fall of Titans at the hand of Olympians. From the very beginning the feelings of pain dominate and the sadness and anguish which Saturn feels after his defeat by Jove has been dramatized and portrayed with such poignancy and pathos that loss appears to be personal.

The poem opens when Saturn has already fallen and is deprived of all the powers he previously enjoyed. His condition and torture finds expression in very powerful and moving lines.

Deep in the shady sadness of a vale
Far sunken from the healthy breath if morn,
Far from the fiery noon, and eve's one star,
Sat grey-haired Saturn, quiet as stone,

This sad story continues and each line tells something more about anguish and torture which mind and soul of Saturn was undergoing.

…………Upon the sodden ground
His old right hand lay nerveless, listless, dead,
Unsceptred; and his realmless were closed;
While his bowed head seemed listening to the Earth,
His ancient mother for some comfort yet.

Saturn is not the only person the anguish and pain of his soul whose soul and mind is depicted in Book 1 of Hyperion. Thea and Hyperion also have their share of pain and suffering with Saturn. Consider the following lines which Keats has written for Thea when she comes meet defeated Saturn:

But O! how unlike marble was that face,
How beautiful, if sorrow had not made
Sorrow more beautiful than Beauty's self.

All the conversation which takes place between Thea and Saturn is full of pain. Every word, every line and every thought seems to dwelling on pain and suffering of both the God and The Goddess.

Saturn look up! –though wherefore, the poor old king?
I have no comfort for thee, no not one.

Now let us try to look the pain and its intensity in some of the speeches of Saturn. He speaks the following words to Thea when listens to Thea's speech.

Thea, I feel thee ere I see thy face
Look up, and let me say our doom in it

The whole speech of Saturn is soaked with the pain and torture which soul suffers. The following lines reveal the torture of his soul:

—————————-I have left

My strong identity, my real self,
Somewhere between the throne, and where I sit
Here on this spot of earth.
Thea! Thea! Thea! Where is Saturn?

We find the same pain and its permanent presence even Keats introduce Hyperion. Though Hyperion is still on his throne and consoles himself with the thought that he can restore Saturn to his Throne by defeating Jove, his anguish and pain is perceivable in every description Keats has used to reveal the mind and soul of the great God.

I cannot see-but darkness, death and darkness.
Even here, into my centre of repose,
The shady vision comes to domineer,
Insult, and blind, stifle my pomp-

When we study further this poem, finally we come to believe that Hyperion is no one but the poet himself Hyperion's story the story of the poet himself. And this subjective element in the poem which makes every verse of the poem drenched in sadness and pain.

What makes suffering sublime in Keats is not difficult to understand. Keats, as an artist knew what is common to him is common to all human being and expressing this poetry will lend sublimity to his thought and expression and this is what Keats so frequently did in his poetry and in which he always succeeded.

Death, loss, cravings for love, creation of beauty with realization that beauty does not remain forever though it is truth and love of life have stood first during the creative concerns of the poet. And very nature of these things brings pain in human life because they not forever and realization that they cannot remain forever bring sublimation in the suffering which human being under while they hanker after the above mentioned things. Keats' Hyperion is the artist expression of what Keats considered true of human life. On the surface he seems to be telling the story of Gods and Goddess having no relation the lives of the mortals but actually he tells the story of human beings living on the earth.

The Greek Note in Keats's Poetry

The Greek Spirit in Keats's Poetry: - Shelley expressed the opinion that "Keats was a Greek". Indeed, Keats was unmistakably a representative of Greek thought, in a sense in which Wordsworth and Coleridge and even Shelley were not. The Greek spirit came to Keats through literature, through sculpture, and through an innate tendency, and it is under Hellenic influence as a rule that he gives of his best.

Keats's Inborn, Temperamental "Greekness": - The inborn, temperamental "Greekness" of Keats's mind is to be seen in his love of beauty. To him, as to the Greeks, the expression of beauty is the ideal of all art. And for him, as for them, beauty is not exclusively material nor spiritual, nor intellectual, but is the fullest development of all that goes to make up human perfection.

His Personification of the Forces of Nature: -Keats is a Greek, too, in his manner of personifying the forces of Nature. His Autumn is a divinity in human shape: she does all kinds of work, and directs every operation of harvest. This is a typical attitude of the Greek. The Pan of Greek myth was more than half human. Whoever wandered into the lonely places of the wood might expect to hear his pipe or even to catch a glimpse of his hairy hands and puck-nosed face; and the Pan of Keats's ode is half-human, too, as he sits by the riverside or wanders in the evenings in the meadows. Keats has "contrived to talk about the gods much as they might have been supposed to speak". The world of Greek paganism lives again in his verse, with all its frank sensuousness and joy of life, and with all its mysticism. Keats looks back and lives again in the time

When holy were the haunted forest boughs,
Holy the air, the water, and the fire. (Ode to Psyche)

His Interest in Greek Mythology: - Towards the creations of Greek mythology Keats was attracted by an overmastering delight in their beauty, and a natural sympathy with the phase of imagination that created them. "He possessed the Greek instinct for personifying the powers of Nature in clearly defined imaginary shapes endowed with human beauty and half-human faculties. Especially he shows himself possessed and fancy-bound by the mythology, as well as by the physical enchantment, of the moon. Never was bard in youth/so literally moon-struck. Not only had the charm of the myth of the love of the moon-goddess for Endymion interwoven itself in his being with his natural sensibility to the physical and spiritual spell of moonlight; hut deeper and more abstract meanings than its own had gathered about the story in his mind. The divine vision which haunts Endymion in dreams is for Keats symbolical of Beauty itself, and it is the passion of the human soul for beauty which he attempts, more or less consciously, to shadow forth in the quest of the shepherd-prince after his love."

His Main Themes Drawn from Greek Myths, Art, and Literature: - Greek myth, and to a smaller extent Greek art and literature, provide either his main themes or numerous allusions. Keats's boyish enthusiasm had been nourished by his Elizabethan reading, by Leigh Hunt, by the Elgin Marbles, and by Wordsworth. One reason for Keats's high regard for The Excursion would be the account in the fourth book of the Greek religion of Nature and its imaginative expression in myth. Classical myth had been a very rich element in Renaissance poetry from Spenser to Milton, but had been blighted by Augustan rationalism. It revived with the romantic religion of Nature and the imagination. Wordsworth's sonnet "The World Is Too Much With Us" shows the attraction of classical myth for Wordsworth. Wordsworth here points out that the Greeks, who saw Proteus rising from the sea and heard old Triton blow his horn, were nearer religion than Christian Englishmen bent upon making money and with no eye or ear for Nature. Keats's Sleep and Poetry contains echoes of Wordsworth's sonnet.

No First Hand Knowledge of Greek Literature: - Keats had no first-hand knowledge of Greek literature. He derived his knowledge of translations and books of reference like Chapman's translation of Homer, and Lempriere's Classical Dictionary. His sonnet on Seeing the Elgin Marbles reveals the important influence exerted on him by Greek sculpture. According to a critic, Hyperion is in poetry what the Elgin Marbles are in sculpture. The calm grandeur of Greek art, its majesty and symmetry and simplicity, its economy of ornament and subordination of parts to the whole, came to Keats through his knowledge of these marbles. This influence is most obvious in the two odes, On Indolence and On a Grecian Urn.

His Limitations as a "Greek" : - But Keats has his limitations as a Greek. He does not write of Greek things in a Greek manner. Something indeed in Hyperion—at least in its first two books—he caught from Paradise Lost of the high restraint and calm which was common to the Greeks and Milton. But his palace of Hyperion, with its vague, far-dazzling pomps and phantom-terrors of coming doom, shows how far he is in workmanship from the Greek purity and precision of outline, and firm definition of individual images. Similarly one of the most characteristic images[1] of Nature from this poem shows not the simplicity of the Greek, but the complexity of the modern, sentiment of Nature, with its concourse of metaphors and epithets. Keats produces here every effect which a forest-scene by starlight can have upon the mind: the pre-eminence of the oaks among the other trees, their aspect of human venerableness, their verdure unseen in the darkness, the sense of their stillness and suspended life, etc.

The Absence of Certain Greek Elements from His Poetry: - The rooted artistic instincts of the Greeks were absent from Keats's nature and temperament. He did not have the Greek instinct of selection and simplification, or of a rejection of all beauties except the vital and the essential. He did not have the capacity to deal with his material in such a way that the main masses might stand out unconfused, in just proportions and with outlines perfectly clear. And like his aims and his gifts, he was in his workmanship essentially romantic, Gothic, English. At the time when he wrote Endymion, he believed that poetry should surprise by a fine excess, and the manner in which Keats deals with the Greek story of Endymion, is as far from being a Greek or classical manner as possible.

Sidney Colvin's Analysis of Keats's Hellenism: - "But though Keats sees the Greek world from afar, he sees it truly. The Greek touch is not his, but in his own rich and decorated English way he writes with a sure insight into the vital meaning of Greek ideas. For the story of the war of Titans and Olympians he had nothing to guide him except the information that he got from classical dictionaries. But as to the essential meaning of that warfare and its result, it could not possibly be understood more truly, or illustrated with more beauty and force, than by Keats in the speech of Oceanus in the Second Book. In the dethronement of an older and ruder worship by one more advanced and humane, in which idea of ethics and of arts held a larger place beside ideas of Nature and her brute powers—this idea has fully been brought out. Again, in conceiving and animating the colossal shapes of early gods, Keats shows a masterly instinct. This is clear from his choice of comparisons, drawn from the vast inarticulate sounds of Nature, by widen he seeks to make us realise their voices.

Hyperion as an Epic

Characteristics of an Epic Poem: - An epic is a long narrative poem with a lofty theme treated in a lofty style. An epic generally deals with the mighty deeds of heroes, be they men or gods or both. An epic Is always written in the same metre throughout. The subject of an epic poem may be some well-known legend or some momentous sequence of historical events. An epic poem portrays characters on a grand scale. An epic is written in a grand style. An epic has a grand underlying idea. Thus grandeur is the keynote of an epic poem. Some of the best-known epic poems in western literature are the Iliad and the Odyssey by Homer, and the Divine Comedy by Dante. (In Indian literature the Ramayana and the Mahabharata are outstanding examples of epic poetry recognized by the whole world).

The Subject of Keats's Epic Poem "Hyperion": - Keats intended his Hyperion to be an epic poem. It was originally meant to be an epic in ten or twelve books. Keats's purpose was to describe the warfare of the earlier Titanic dynasty with the later Olympian dynasty of Greek gods and, in particular, one episode of that warfare, namely the dethronement of the sun-god Hyperion by a younger god called Apollo. The theme of the war between the Titans and the Olympians who overthrew the former often occurs in the literature which Keats was fond of reading. The specific theme, namely the dethronement of Hyperion, the old sun-god, by Apollo, the new god, is Keats's own. Apollo is also the god of poetry, and so the story of Apollo and Hyperion was perhaps going to symbolize the fate of the poet as a creator. Since the poem is unfinished, we cannot be sure. In any case, it is obvious that Keats's poem has a lofty theme.

Very Little Action in This Epic Poem: - An epic poem abounds in heroic actions. However, there is a dearth of action in Hyperion. The reason for this dearth is that, when the poem begins, the Titans have already been defeated by the Olympians. In other words, the main action of the story has already taken place. Perhaps, if Keats had continued with the poem, he would have narrated some of the major episodes in the warfare retros-pectively. But as the poem stands, there is some talk of heroic action, especially by Enceladus and Hyperion himself, but there is actually little of such action in the poem. (The material for the poem has been drawn from Greek mythology, a knowledge of which was derived by Keats from various sources.)

The Characters in The Poem: Saturn: -As already indicated, an epic poem has an exalted theme treated in an exalted style, but the portrayal of characters is perhaps even more important. The characters must be heroic beings. They may be men or gods, or both. Hyperion deals only with gods. There is, to be sure, one human being: namely Apollo, but he has a divine origin; and, what is more, he is deified in the poem, thus becoming a. god (who will challenge the sovereignty of Hyperion). The leading characters in Keats's poem are Saturn, Thea, Hyperion, Oceanus, Enceladus, Clymene, Mnemosyne, and Apollo. Keats's portrayal of these characters is certainly very impressive, even though most of the gods including a few from this list are suffering from a deep depression of spirits on account of the defeat which they have suffered at the hands of the Olympians. We meet Saturn in the very opening lines where he is hardly depicted as a heroic figure. Saturn is described as sitting in a valley, silent and motionless, with "his old right hand" lying on the ground "nerveless, listless, .dead, and unsceptred". Subsequently also he produces as impression, more of weakness and helplessness than of heroism. In reply to Thea's speech, for defeat of the Titans in language which arouses our sympathy rather than admiration. Later still, we find him experiencing all those emotions which would become a human being more than an immortal god who had been the chief ruler of the universe. The ex-ruler of the universe is described as experiencing such emotions as grief, rage, fear, anxiety, but most of all despair. It seems that Fate has poured a mortal oil upon his head and deprived him of his god-like qualities and attributes. In spite of all this, the figure of Saturn does create an impression of hugeness and vastness. His very lament over the loss of his empire conveys to us some idea of his past glory.

Character-Portrayal: Thea: - The portrayal of Thea produces a slightly more favourable impression. Her very size and stature give rise to a feeling of awe in our hearts. The tall Amazon, we are told, would have looked like a pigmy by the side of this goddess. Thea would have seized Achilles by the hair and twisted his neck. She could have, with one finger, brought to a stop the ever-revolving Ixion's wheel. Her face was as large as that of Memphian Sphinx pedestalled in an Egyptian palace. Her face could be called beautiful if the expression of sorrow on it had not seemed to be even more beautiful than the face. She has one hand upon her heart as if she were feeling a cruel pain even though she is an immortal.

Character-Portrayal: Oceanus: -Of Oceanus we are not given any physical description, but he emerges as one of the most impressive figures in the poem. He is a sage and a philosopher. The defeat of the Titans has not made him despondent. He has been able to reconcile himself to the defeat by his cogitation, contemplation, and musing, so that there is an expression of "severe content" on his face. He tries his utmost to provide comfort to the grief-stricken gods and goddesses by his philosophy. His discourse is one of the grandest passages in the whole poem. It is, indeed, a memorable exhortation, pregnant with wisdom. His heroism lies in this capacity to explain and justify the defeat which the Titans have suffered at the hands of the younger gods. It is his great intellect and his deep wisdom which make a hero of him in our eyes.

Character-Portrayal: Enceladus: - Enceladus is another striking character in the poem. He was once tame and mild like an ox grazing calmly in a pasture. But at this time he is tiger-passioned, lion-thoughted, and wroth. In his imagination he is hurling mountains at his opponents in the second war which is yet to come. Oceanus's exhortation produces no effect at all on this fearless giant. He dismisses the counsel offered by Oceanus as of no account at all. He addresses Oceanus as "thou, sham monarch of the waves", and reminds him of the scalding which Oceanus had received during the war. Enceladus's view is that the Titans must not lose heart because of their defeat but should get ready to fight again in order "to stifle that puny essence in its tent" (that is, to destroy the power of Jove who, in the eyes of Enceladus, is a puny or insignificant being as compared to the older gods). Enceladus's defiance reminds us of Satan's in Paradise Lost.

Character-Portrayal: Clymene: -Another character who wins our sympathy and even our admiration is Clymene. She is a modest goddess who speaks somewhat shyly and timidly but who strikes us as an admirable being by virtue of her sensitive and artistic temperament. She is fond of singing and playing on musical instruments. When she suddenly hears a new kinds of music, which comes to her from an island in t feels enchanted and bewitched. Although she tries to run away from that music, she is chased by a voice which keeps shouting the name of Apollo. Evidently, Clymene has felt completely overwhelmed by the sweetness of this new music the like of which had never been heard before.

Character-Portrayal: Mnemosyne: - Mnemosyne is another unforgettable character. It is she who confers godhood on Apollo. She has appeared to him in a dream, and she had placed by his side a golden lyre from the strings of which he was able to produce unprecedented music. It is by looking at her face that Apollo undergoes a transformation and "dies into life." In her face he reads a wondrous lesson; there he reads names, deeds, gray legends, dire events, rebellions, majesties, sovran voices, creations and destroyings, all at once. She personifies the past, the present, and even the future. She is undoubtedly a grand figure in the poem.

Character-Portrayal: Hyperion: - However, it is the portrayal of Hyperion which stirs in us feelings of awe, terror, admiration, and sympathy. Keats devotes plenty of space to a portrayal of Hyperion. Hyperion still retains his sovereignty, his rule, and his majesty. Blazing Hyperion sits on his "orbed fire", inhaling the incense sent up from man to the sun's god. He paces from hill to hill with "stride colossal". Entering his palace, he gives a roar which scares away the Hours. On the flares from vault to vault till he reaches the gate of the central dome where he stamps his foot fiercely. And yet, despite all this show of strength, the great sun-god is experiencing fear and apprehension lest he too should be dethroned. However, he takes heart when Father Uranus speaks to him in a whisper from heaven, urging him to rise above his fears and to go down to the earth in order to give whatever comfort and help he can to the defeated Titans. If Keats had continued the poem, he would have surely depicted Hyperion in action against Apollo, waging a mighty though losing battle against the younger god.

A Grand Idea Behind the Poem: Evolutionary Progress: - There is thus no doubt at all that the characters in this poem have been drawn on a grand scale and are worthy of an epic. We then come to the idea behind the poem. As already pointed out, this idea too is grand. In fact, there are two grand ideas behind the poem. One is to be found in the speech of Oceanus who urges the defeated Titans to accept their defeat with a good grace. He explains to them that evolution is the law of nature, and that no one can govern the universe for all time. He says that just as chaos and darkness had given way to light and life, and just as Heaven and Earth had been conquered by Saturn and his fellow-Titans, so the Titans must now accept their dethronement by the Olympians as an essential and inevitable part of the scheme of things. Saturn was not the first and he cannot be the last of powers. "So on our heels a fresh perfection treads", he says. Those who have conquered the Titans will themselves be conquered one day by some other gods. We may define the principle underlying the speech of Oceanus as evolutionary progress or as revolutionary development (coup d'etat). We can also regard his speech as advocating the ideal of beauty. Perhaps the most important lines in this speech are:

for 'tis the eternal law
That first in beauty should be first in might.

From this point of view Hyperion may be regarded as an epic of

The Other Grand Idea: A Knowledge of the Past: - The other grand of idea underlying this poem is that a poet can attain the height of his powers only if he comes into close contact with the stern and stark realities of human life. A poet must not live in an ivory tower. Apollo has been experiencing a vague sorrow. His sorrow has been a source of great perplexity to him because he cannot understand what is tormenting him. There are several questions which he puts to Mnemosyne, and he receives an answer simply by looking at her face more closely. From her face he derives enormous knowledge which makes a god of him. What is this knowledge which he obtains? This is knowledge of the entire history of mankind. Apollo's attaining this knowledge means that he has become fully acquainted with the sorrows, sufferings, agonies, and the tumults of the life of mankind. It is his acquisition of this knowledge which transforms Apollo into a god. In symbolic terms, the transformation of Apollo into a god means that the poet Keats has attained ripeness and maturity. So far Keats had only been theoretically talking about the strife and the agonies of the human heart; but now he has come into a direct contact with those aspects, of human life. Like Apollo, Keats now "dies into life".

Certain Other Features of an Epic in "Hyperion" : - Then there are certain other features of this poem which give it the character of an epic. There is an invocation to the Muse at the beginning of Book III. Invocations are generally a part of the machinery of an epic poem. Then there is a long passage in which the various gods and goddesses are named and briefly described and individualized. This passage reminds us of the catalogue of warships in Homer's Iliad. The description of the fallen Titans in this poem reminds us of the description of the fallen angels in Milton's Paradise Lost. The conference of the Titans is akin to the conference of the angels in that poem. Enceladus, like Moloch in Paradise Lost, urges open war; while Oceanus, like Belial in Paradise Lost, stands for more moderate measures. And there are several other points of contact between this poem and Paradise Lost. Besides, Keats's poem moves within all the three worlds. The fallen Titans are hiding in a cave, that is, in the under-world; Hyperion is described as still ruling his planet of the sun in the sky; while Apollo is described as dwelling on an island in this world.

Epic Similes: - Another important feature of Hyperion is the use of epic similes by Keats. A famous simile is the one found in the passage which describes the tall oak trees dreaming all night without a stir. Thea's words to Saturn came and went like a gust of wind blowing suddenly through those oak trees which are regarded by the poet as "green-robed senators of mighty robes". Another epic smile is found in the passage where the noise heard from the immortals when a god proceeds to make a speech is compared to "the roar of bleak-grown pines".

In Praise of "Hyperion": -Hyperion has received some glowing tributes from poets and critics. Byron said: ''Hyperion seems actually inspired by the Titans and is as sublime as Aeschylus." Shelley said: "If Hyperion be not grand poetry, none has been produced by our contemporaries." Cazamian writes: "Hyperion is an epic poem in which Keats, competing with Milton on a footing of equality, set out to relate the celestial revolutions of pagan mythology, as did Milton the Christian cycle of a paradise lost and regained. Scarcely outlined as it is, already arresting by the vastness of conception which it promises by its visions of a gigantic and primitive world, this work stands out in wondrous majesty." Another critic describes it as "one of the grandest pc language and in its grandeur one of the most spontaneous". According to yet another critic "no English poem of any" length since Milton—complete or fragmentary—begins with a more majestic sureness of phrase than Hyperion."

A Fault of Structure: - All this does not, however, mean that Hyperion is a perfect poem. It suffers from several imperfections and faults. In the first place, there is a fault in the structure. The first two books of the poem certainly form one compact unit. Here the poet sticks to the main line of the story. There is no digression, and no deviation from the chief concern of the poem. Every single line is relevant to the theme. But Book III marks a sudden and unexpected departure from the subject, thus giving a jolt to our minds. Book III has not been integrated with the first two books of the poem as it stands. Of course, if Keats have gone on with the poem and completed it, Book III would too have fallen into its proper place. In that case, Keats would have picked up the thread of the story where he left off at the end of Book II and, after describing some of the main episodes of the war between the Titans and the Olympians retrospectively, he would have depicted the conflict between Hyperion and the newly-deified Apollo, leading to Hyperion's defeat. But as it is, the reader cannot see any connection between the first two books and the third. There is thus a discontinuity.

Too much of the Miltonic Influence, Another Fault: - Another fault of the poem is an excess of the Miltonic influence. The Miltonic influence is certainly not altogether a fault because it is responsible for much of the majesty and grandeur of the poem; but too much of the Miltonic influence is certainly a flaw. Keats himself realized this and said that he had abandoned the poem because there were too many Miltonic inversions in it and because he could not write in Milton's artful humour.

Lack of Action: - There is a lack of action in the poem. An epic deals with mighty deeds. But no mighty deeds are performed in Hyperion as the poem stands. The mighty deeds lie either in the past or in the future but none in the present poem. There are certainly some dramatic situations such as Clymene's experience and Apollo's deification, but no heroic actions. This too is a weakness in the poem. Besides, the epic strain of the first two books gives way to a lyrical note in the third. This too is a flaw.

Other Faults, As Pointed Out by a Critic: - At least one critic raises certain fundamental objections to the poem. According to him, the poem begins with a premature sense of an ending. The poem emerges into a scene of inaction, immobility, and silence. From the very beginning, then, Keats's epic threatens to collapse under an impossible contradiction. How can a narrative move beyond its origin when that origin is itself both beginng and end. This critic also says that Keats portrays Saturn merely as a great fragment. "Farest on forest" hung above Saturn's head; Saturn's old right hand lay nerveless and listless; Saturn's realmless eyes were closed; and Saturn's head was bowed. Saturn is thus a thing of fragments: parts of him are magnified, but never, the whole. This critic further says that the state of spechlessness depicted at the beginning of the poem extends to the Titans themselves. The poem produces an impression not of an Aeschylean sublimity of style but the sublime immobility of death. However, it is not possible for us to agree with much of this criticism.

The Theme of Hyperion

The Subject of the Epic: the War between the Gods: - Although Hyperion is an incomplete poem and was therefore described as a fragment, yet the idea behind it emerges clearly as we go through it. The subject which Keats chose for his poem was the war between the Titans and the Olympians, and the victory of the latter over the former.

If the poem had been completed, Keats would almost certainly have described retrospectively some of the main episodes in the war which has ended when the poem begins. After describing the course of the war, he would have gone on to pick up the thread of the narrative from the point where Apollo is trans-formed into a god. Then would have come the crux of the whole saga, namely an encounter between Hyperion and Apollo, and the triumph of the latter. As it stands, the first two books of the epic describe the state of affairs after the war between the two classes of the gods has ended in the defeat of the Titans, with the exception of Hyperion who still retains his sovereignty over his realm of the sun. The Titans are feeling very despondent and are on the verge of total despair, with exception of Encladus who is still in a defiant mood.

Oceanus, Asked For His Views: - The chief of the Titans, namely Saturn, is feeling even more grief-stricken than the others. Hyperion's wife Thea comes to him and concurs with him so far as his bleak view of the situation is concerned. Satan laments the loss of the power and authority, which he says, he had always exercised in 3 benevolent manner so as to keep his subject happy. Thea takes him to the den where the other Titans sit or lie in a despondent state. There Saturn makes a speech to his fellow-gods, expressing his puzzlement over the defeat which they have suffered. At the end of his speech he turns to' Oceanus, the "sophist and sage", and asks him for help and guidance in the present situation. Saturn has perceived an expression of "severe content" on the face of Oceanus; and this makes him think that Oceanus may be able to throw some light on the problem which is baffling Saturn.

The Underlying Idea of the Poem, Stated by Oceanus: - It is the speech which Oceanus makes in reply to Saturn's question that contains the underlying idea of the whole poem. This underlying idea is that things can never stand still in this universe and that change and development are the law of Nature. According to Oceanus, progressive change must always take place (whether by evolution or by revolution). That is why we may say that the concept of evolutionary progress is the theme of the poem or that Keats is here writing an epic of the revolutionary idea. Oceanus makes some very significant and memorable remarks, his object being not to incite the gods against the victorious ones but to make it possible for them to reconcile themselves to their defeat.

Saturn, Not the Beginning nor the End: - Oceanus tells the gods that the proper course for them to follow now is to be contented with their lot and to accept it even if means a loss of dignity. He says that he would be able to provide much comfort to them by his arguments provided they are willing to draw comfort from the facts as they are. He says that the Titans have fallen from their high positions as a result of the operation of the law of Nature and not because of the destructive thunderbolts of Jove. He tells Saturn in particular that, having been the supreme ruler of the universe and having held a position far above the others, he had missed the small point which minds of a lower order would fully perceive. According to Oceanus, Saturn has missed th wisdom and truth. Oceanus says that Saturn should realize that just as he was not the first ruler of the universe so he cannot be the last ruler. Saturn could not have remained the ruler of the universe forever. "Thou art not the beginning nor the end," Oceanus tells him. Originally chaos and darkness had prevailed in the universe. From the chaos and darkness had come light, and with light had come life. It was at this point that the first gods, Heaven and Earth, came into being. Then Saturn was born, the first issue of the union of Heaven and Earth. Then all the rest of the race of Titans and the race of Giants followed, so that they all found themselves to be the rulers of the various beautiful kingdoms. Oceanus points out to his fellow-gods that they should not be depressed by the loss of their kingdoms, because the real height of supremacy lies in the ability to look facts in the face in a spirit of complete calmless:

And to envisage circumstance, all calm,
That is the top of sovereignty.

First in Beauty Should Be First in Might: - Oceanus, countinuing his discourse, says that the Titans who were born of the union of Heaven and Earth had surpassed their parents in beauty, in compactness, in symmetry, in will-power, in the freedom of action, in the spirit of comradeship, and in a thousand other ways. And just as they had surpassed their parents, so the next generation of gods, led by Jove, had surpassed the Titans:

So on our heels a fresh perfection treads,
A power more strong in beauty, born of us
And fated to excel us,………

Oceanus says that the Titans had to be succeeded by a power more beautiful and more strong than the Titans, even though that power had been begotten by the Titans themselves. The law governing the universe according to Oceanus is that "first in beauty should be first in might." According to this law, the Olympians (Jove and his comrades) would in course of time be dethroned by another race which would be more beautiful and therefore more strong. Oceanus then cites his own ease, saying that the new god of the sea possesses greater glory than Oceanus and has such a glow of beauty in his eyes that Oceanus had voluntarily surrendered his empire to him and departed thence to come to this den to meet his fellow-Titans. Oceanus ends his exhortation by saying to his fellow-Titans: "Receive the truth and let it be your balm."

Keats's Message in the Fragmentary Epic, Expressed Fully: - Now, this is the truth which Keats wants also us to recognize and accept. Change, flux, ferment, development, evolution, revolution—these are inevitable. Change may come steadily or change may come in the form of the French Revolution or the Russian Evolution; but change must come. Change may take place peacefully or change may come through conflict and war; but come it must. Mankind should remain prepared for change: slow and steady, or violent and swift. And change in this universe has always been progressive. Saturn claims that his rule was a benevolent one. Speaking to Thea, he deplores the fact that he would no longer be able to exercise his benign influence on the planets, on the winds and seas, and on the life of mankind. He deplores the fact that he would no longer able to perform those acts by means of which used to give an outlet to his love for mankind as well as for the forces of Nature. He deplores the fact that he has lost his "strong identity" and his "real self". He says that he would try to re-establish himself as the chief ruler of the universe. But, in the light of Oceanus's discourse which comes later in the poem, we feel sure that Saturn's reasoning is fallacious. His rule must have been benign, as he says. But what makes him think that his successor would not prove even more benign or that his successor would not do greater good to the universe than Saturn himself done? The continuity of Saturn's rule would have meant stagnation. There is no end to the good that can be done to mankind, and there is no end to the evolutionary process so far as the universe as a whole is concerned. This is the valuable lesson which we are expected to draw from Keats's poem as it stands. The narrative about the war between the defeated gods and the victorious ones, and especially the encounter between Hyperion .and Apollo, is certainly not complete; but Keats's message is complete, though the poem is a fragment.

Oceanus's View Reinforced by Clymene's Experience: - The lesson urged by Oceanus is reinforced by Clymens's account of her strange experience. She had suddenly heard a new kind of music which had enchanted her. The new "blissful golden melody" which she had suddenly heard had made her "sick with joy and grief at once". She had felt joyous because of the repturous notes of music which she had heard, but she had felt sad at the thought that her own music had been superseded by this new music. She had fled from the spot but had been chased by a sweet voice which kept uttering the name of Apollo. Clymene's experience implies that a new musician has appeared on the scene and will now dethrone the existing deity governing the realm of music. This again is a case of evolutionary or revolutionary change. Clymene herself is reconciled to this change, but gods like Enceladus are not.

Enceladus's Militancy, Unjustified: - Enceladus refers to Oceanus as "over-wise" and to Clymene as "over-foolish". Enceladus is still in a defiant mood, and in his imagination is hurling mountains upon his enemies. Enceladus speaks scornfully about Oceanus, calling him "thou sham monarch of the waves." Enceladus is burning with the fire of revenge. He is not only sorry because the Titans have lost their realms but he is even more sorry at the loss of those days of peace and "slumberous calm" which the Titans used to enjoy during Saturn's reign. Enceladus argues that Hyperion is still undefeated, and that there is still a hope for the Titans to win a victory over the Olympians-and to re-establish themselves as the rulers of the universe. The point here is that Enceladus's whole approach is wrong because Enceladus has not been able to grasp the truth contained in the speech of Oceanus. Enceladus is an uncompromising militant. He would learn his lesson only when Hyperion too is overthrown.

An Epic of Beauty's Triumph: The Meaning of Beauty: - One other point that deserves attention in connection with the theme of this poem is that beauty is Oceanus's criterion of superiority. The eternal law, according to Oceanus, is that "first in beauty should be first in might." now, we can understand the idea of evolutionary progress and we can understand also the revolutionary idea; but it is somewhat difficult to understand the concept of the progressive change brought about by superior beauty. Science teaches us the theory of evolution. This biological theory needs no explanation. We can also understand evolutionaty development or revolutionary changes in the political, social, and cultural life of mankind. History provides countless exampl changes. In fact, changes of this kind are taking place before our very eyes. But what does Oceanus or Keats mean by saying that first in beauty should be first in might? Well, this poem is not a scientific discourse. Keats wants us to look at the evolutionary development or progress with the eyes of a poet and not with the eyes of a scientist. For Keats, beauty was the supreme consideration. Beauty was the supreme power in his eyes. Beauty was a magnificent obsession with him. "A thing of beauty is a joy for ever", he had written. Later he was to write:

Beauty is Truth, Truth Beauty,—that is all
Ye know on earth, and all ye need to know.

Of course, beauty does not merely mean physical attractiveness. For the mature Keats, beauty came to be identified with truth. Beauty has thus intellectual and philosophical connotations in Keats's eyes, Truth implies all the facts of life in the aggregate, all the accumulated knowledge and wisdom of all mankind. It is only a man with a vast vision who can accept the entire range of the life of the universe, including the life of mankind, and who can be said to have a capacity to appreciate beauty. Interpreted thus, Oceanus's criterion of beauty does not conflict basically with the scientific view of evolution. Thus considered, Keats's poem becomes an epic of beauty's triumph. Keats's approach to the whole issue is aesthetic, as is con-finned by the experience of Clymene who represents the artistic temperament.

The Relevance of Apollo's Deification in Book III: - A discussion of the theme' of the Hyperion cannot end here. There is something more to it. While the first two books form a compact unit, Book III marks an abrupt transition which mars the structure of the poem. Book III contains an account of the experience by which Apollo was transformed into a god. Now, if Keats had been able to complete the poem, this particular episode would have fallen into place. After describing the process of Apollo's deification, Keats would have gone on to describe a second war between the Titans (with Hyperion and Enceladus at their head) and the Olympians (with Jove as their leader). The central episode in this second conflict would have been an encounter between Hyperion and Apollo in which Apollo would have won, not by the force of arms but by the sheer power of his enchanting music. Perhaps, Hyperion, overwhelmed by that music, would have surrendered as readily to his opponent as Oceanus had previously surrendered to Neptune. But the poem breaks off at the point where Apollo has been transfigured and deified.

A Second Theme of the Poem: The Symbolism of Apollo's Deification: -The process by which Apollo becomes a god is itself significant because here we have, in additions to its obvious meaning, a symbolic description by Keats of Keats's own emergence as a mature poet. In symbolic terms, Apollo is Keats himself. Apollo has been feeling afflicated by a vague grief and has often wept because of this grief. When he comes into contact with Mnemosyne, he experiences a strange exhiliration and asks her several questions regarding the nature of this universe and the divinity who controls the powers of Nature. He speaks to her of his "aching ignorance". Mnemosyne makes no reply. Apollo thereupon suddenly discovers a wonderful meaning in the expression of her silent face. Her face proves to be a source of infinite knowledge to him and he says that this new knowledge which he has derived from her face mak become a god. He reads in her face names, deeds, gray legends, dire events, rebellions, majesties, sovran voices, agonies, creations and destroyings. Thereupon he is shaken by convulsions and tortured by an indescribable agony. He experiences the agony of a dying man but in the very moment of his death he is reborn. He dies into life, and he is reborn as a celestial being. Apollo has become a god. In symbolic terms, Keats the poet has attained matarity and the ripeness of his poetic powers. Keats has acquired "the lore of good and ill" and, leaving the world of Flora and old Pan far behind, he has passed to the nobler world of human suffering and human strife. Now he will write truer and higher poetry than before (and the great odes were a specimen of that poetry). It is to be noted that Mnemosyne's face contains all life, past, present, and even to come. She is the eternal existence of the universe, as it were. She belongs to the old order, and also to the new, for she is immanent and ever-lasting. She is a mirror of all the essential facts of life—"agonies, creations and destroyings." And of her Keats had dreamed. She was "the vast idea" that had come to him that night as he slept on Leighs Hunt's sofa. She had become the "might abstract idea of beauty in all things"; and Keats had struggled through "purgatory blind" for a vision of her, face to face. Now he had achieved what he sought, and "knowledge enormous mode a god of him" through the pain of a death and a second birth. Keats has become a true poet through a comprehension of history and change human suffering.

A Complete Poem in One Sense: - Thus Hyperion is a complete poem so far as its basic themes are concerned. What is not complete is the story of the conflict between Hyperion and Apollo.

Hedda Gabler

Life and Works of Henrik Ibsen

Ibsen, born Henrik Johan Ibsen in 1828 in Skien, Norway, was the eldest of five children after the early death of an older brother. His father, Knud Ibsen, a product of a long line of sea captains, had been born in 1797 in Skein and married Marichen Cornelia Martie Altenburg, a German daughter of a merchant, in 1825. Though Ibsen later reported that Skein was a pleasant place during his youth, his own childhood was not particularly happy. Described as an unsociable child, his sense of isolation was increased at the age of sixteen when his father's business was found to be in such disrepair that everything had to be sold to meet his creditors. On top of this, a rumour, to which young Ibsen was privy, began to be circulated that Henrik was the illegitimate son of another man. This fear (never proved) manifested itself in a theme of illegitimate offspring in Ibsen's later work. After Knud's business was possessed, all that remained of the family's former wealth was a dilapidated farmhouse at the outskirts of Skein.

At the farmhouse, Ibsen began to attend a small middle-class school where he cultivated a talent for painting, if nothing else. In 1843, at the age of fifteen, Ibsen was confirmed and taken from school. Though he had declared his interest in becoming a painter, Ibsen was apprenticed to an apothecary shortly before his sixteenth birthday.

Leaving his family, Ibsen travelled to Grimstad, a small, isolated town, to begin his apprenticeship where he studied with the hopes of gaining admissions to the University to study medicine. (He also fathered an illegitimate son by the servant of the apothecary.)Despite his unhappy lot, Grimstad is where Ibsen began to write in earnest. Inspired by the revolution of 1848 that was being felt throughout Europe, Ibsen wrote satire and elegant poetry. At the age of twenty-one, Ibsen left Grimstad for the capitol. While in Christiania (now Oslo), Ibsen passed his exams but opted not to pursue his education, instead turning to playwriting and journalism. It was here that he penned his first play, Cataline. Ibsen also spent time analysing and criticizing modern Norwegian literature.

Still poor, Ibsen gladly accepted a contract to write for and help manage the newly constituted National Theatre in Bergen in 1851. Untrained and largely uneducated, Ibsen learned much from his time at the theatre, producing such works as St. John's Night. The majority of his writings of this period were based on folksongs, folklore, and history. In1858, Ibsen moved back to Christiania to become the creative director of the city's Norwegian Theatre.

That same year, Ibsen married Suzannah Thoresen, with whom he fathered a child named Sigurd Ibsen. Though his plays suggest otherwise, Ibsen revered the state of marriage, believing that it was possible for two people to travel through life as perfect, happy equals. During this period, Ibsen also developed a daily routine from which he would not deviate until his first stroke in 1901: he would rise, consume a small breakfast, take a long walk, write for five hours, eat dinner, and finish the night off with entertainment or in bed. Despite this routine, Ibsen found his life in Bergen difficult. Luckily, in 1864, his frien him money that they had collected, allowing him to move to Italy. He was to spend the next twenty-seven years living in Italy and Germany. During this time abroad, he authored a number of successful works, including Brand (1866) and Peer Gynt (1867).

Ibsen moved to Dresden in 1868 and then Munich in 1875. It was in Munich, in 1879that Ibsen wrote his ground-breaking play, A Doll's House. He pursued his interest in realistic drama for the next decade, earning international acclaim; many of his works were published in translation and performed throughout Europe. Ibsen eventually turned to a new style of writing, abandoning his interest in realism for a series of so-called symbolic dramas. He completed his last work in exile, Hedda Gabbler, in 1890.

After being away from Norway for twenty-seven years, Ibsen and Suzanna returned in 1891. Shortly afterwards, he finished writing The Master Builder and then took a short break. In late 1893, in need of moist air to help cure her recurring gout, Suzannah left for southern Italy. While his wife was away, Ibsen found a companion in a young female pianist, Hildur Andersen, with whom he spent a great deal of time and corresponded with even after Suzannah¹s return. Ibsen's relationship with Andersen was characteristic of his larger interest in the younger generation; he was famous for seeking out their ideas and encouraging their writing. After suffering a series of strokes, Ibsen died in 1906 at the age of seventy-eight after having been unable to write for the last few years of his life.

The Rebel: - In a letter to George Brandes, shortly after the Paris Commune, Henrik Ibsen wrote concerning the State and political liberty:

> "The State is the curse of the individual. How has the national strength of Prussia been purchased? By the sinking of the individual in a political and geographical formula..... The State must go! That will be a revolution that will find me on its side. Undermine the idea of the State, set up in its place spontaneous action, and the idea that spiritual relationship is the only thing that makes for unity, and you will start the elements of a liberty which will be something worth possessing."

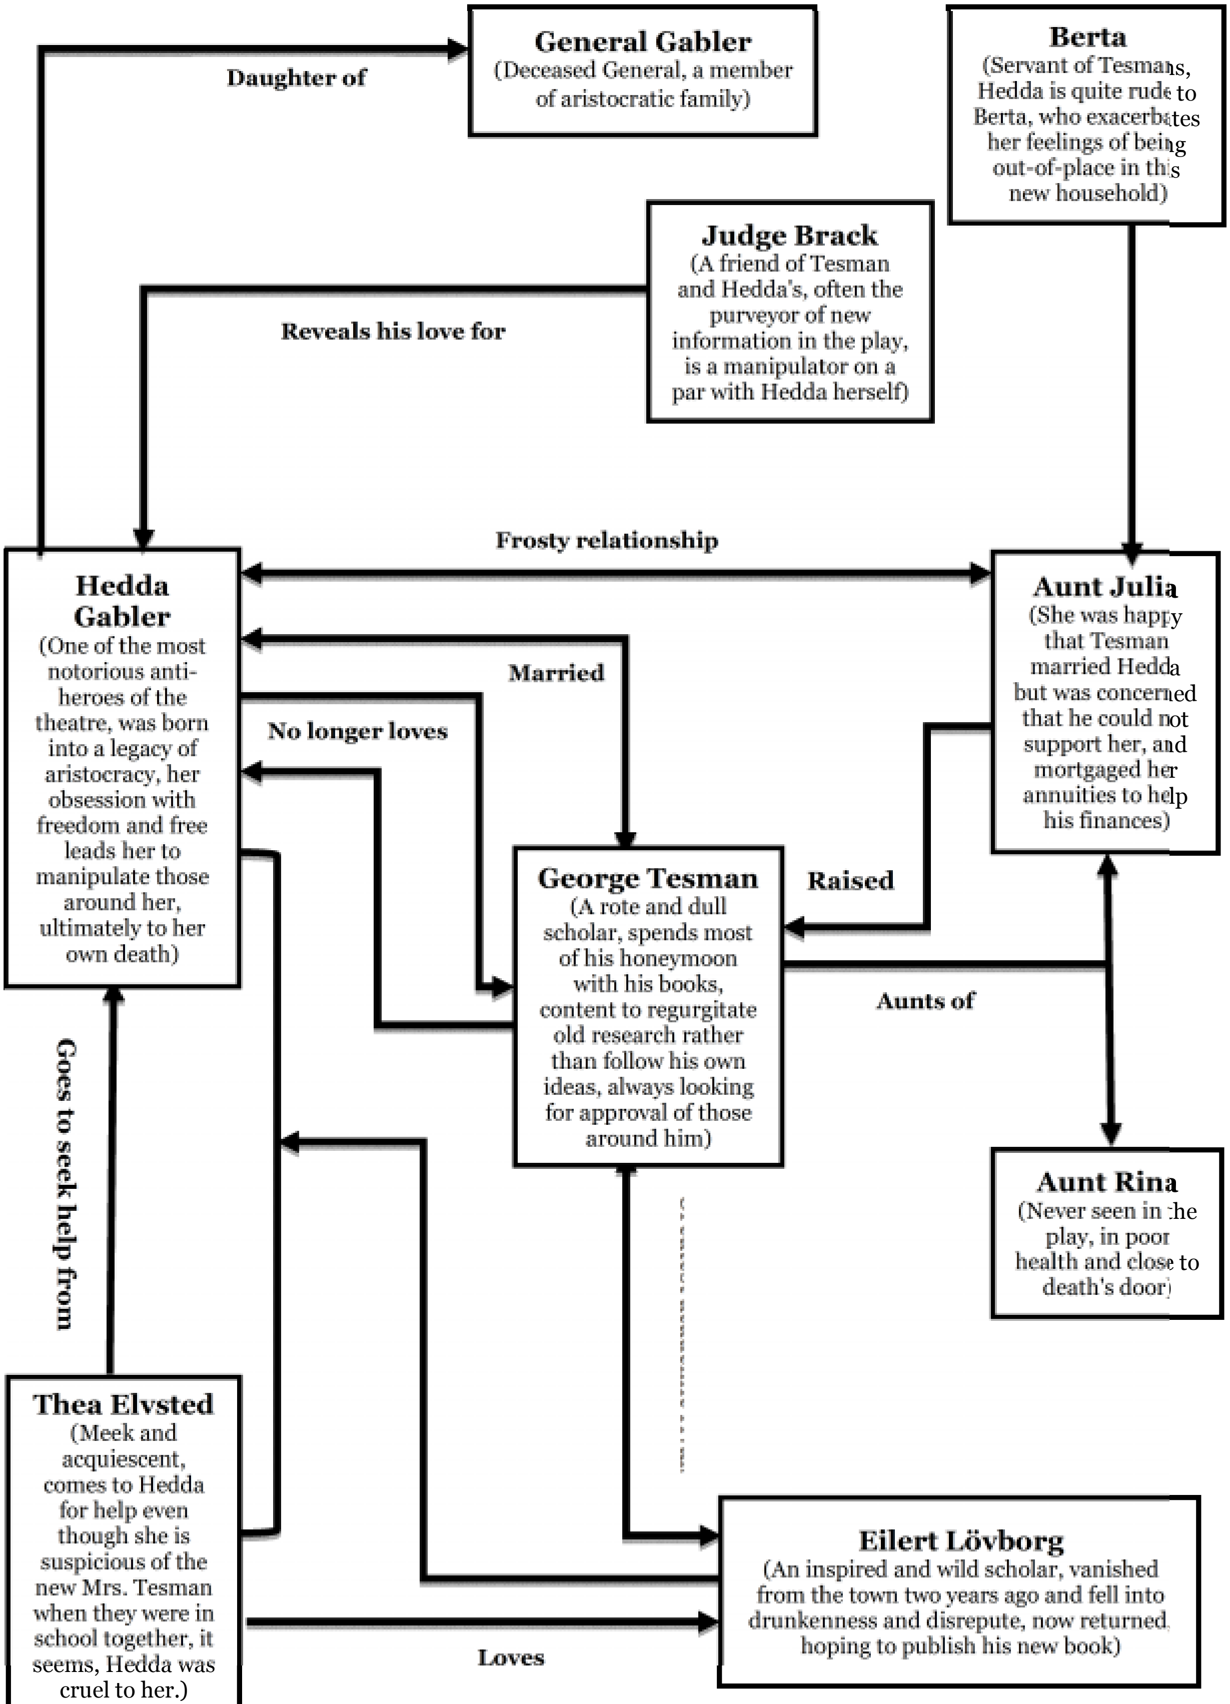
The State was not the only bête noire of Henrik Ibsen. Every other institution that, like the State, rests upon a lie was an iniquity to him. Uncompromising demolisher of all false idols and dynamiter of all social shams and hypocrisy, Ibsen consistently strove to uproot every stone of our social structure. Above all did he thunder his fiery indictment against the four cardinal sins of modern society: the Lie inherent in our social arrangements; Sacrifice and Duty, the twin curses that fetter the spirit of man; the narrow-mindedness and pettiness of Provincialism, that stifles all growth; and the Lack of Joy and Purpose in Work which turns life into a vale of misery and tears.



Father of Modern Drama: - Henrik Ibsen, Norwegian playwright from the 19th Century, has been called the "Father of Modern Drama." This title, exclusively given to him is arguably not an understatement; the playwright's personal and public life significantly influenced his dramatic plays containing various political, religious, and historical messages. Like Shakespeare, Ibsen tried to incorporate as much prose writing into his plays as possible without losing the story's focal point. Shakespeare's work convinced Ibsen that serious drama must strive towards a psychological truth and form its foundation on the characters and conflicts of mankind. Ibsen tried to incorporate social and psychological problems in realistic contemporary settings in his plays; each play dealing with th called a "problem play."(Henrik Ibsen Essay) While living in Norway for much of his youth, Ibsen experienced the horrors of poverty, loneliness, and disgrace of himself, his family, and his country. Aside from the negative aspects of his childhood, he was fortunate to experience the joys of literature, transition from boy to man, and the importance of friendship. Every main detail surrounding Ibsen's life is somehow intertwined within his literary works.

In A Doll's House (1879), a family experiences severe financial problems after Norah Helmer, a young wife, secretly borrows an inordinate amount of money to send her husband to a warmer climate, and improve his health after becoming seriously ill. She keeps this expenditure a secret from her husband knowing he would be furious. To pay back the person she borrowed the money from, she saves as much money as possible by purchasing the poorest quality items for herself. (Ibsen, 1-96)

Not only did Ibsen write about various families' financial problems, he also wrote about illegitimate children. An example of this can be found in one of Ibsen's most successful and well-known plays, The Wild Duck (1884). In this play, Gregers Werle, a young man returns to the house of his wealthy and cynical father, Hakon Werle. The two have not seen or spoken to each other in seventeen years. The reason Gregers visits his father is because Hakon is getting married, and Gregers rightfully opposes the marriage. While on his visit, Gregers meets up with an old friend, Hialmar Ekdal. He [Gregers] learns his father arranged for his former mistress, Gina, to marry Hialmar. Hilamer does not know that his wife was the former mistress of Hakon Werle. Hialmar and Gina have a daughter together, Hedvig, and later in the play, Hilamer discovers the truth behind the former love affair between Gina and Hakon. He questions if Hedvig is his legitimate daughter. Hialmer shuts himself up from his family, and distraught Hedvig shoots herself with an old hunting pistol. (Ibsen, 1-384)

Ibsen's superior plays have distinguished him as one of the greatest playwrights of all time next to other notable playwrights like Aristophanes, Voltaire, and even Shakespeare. Ibsen's "problem plays" have helped people reexamine the world around them, and fix the problems that menace society.

Character Map of Hedda Gabler

Summary and Analysis of Act I

Summary

After a six-months wedding trip, the bride and groom have returned home. Aunt Julia, George's aunt, arrives to welcome them the following morning. As the curtain rises, the motherly old lady enters the well-furnished living room. She hands a bouquet of flowers to Bertha, the servant, who places them among the others which decorate the room at every corner. The aunt and the maid converse about the newlyweds, remarking with wonder and pride that the orphan nephew Miss Tesman raised is now a professor married to General Gabler's daughter.

At this point George enters, greeting his aunt with warmth and affection. She inquires about the honeymoon, expecting to hear details of the romantic journey the young couple took touring southern Europe. Instead, George delightedly recalls his tours through the archives and the collections of various libraries in order to gather research materials for his intended book, "The Domestic Industries of Brabant during the Middle Ages." His aunt, still curious, asks if George has "anything special" to tell her, if he has "any expectations," but George merely answers that he expects to be appointed a professor. Aunt Julia mentions George's former colleague Eilert Lövborg. Despite publishing a recent book, she says, Lövborg has fallen a victim to his own misguided excesses. She is glad that her nephew's abilities will no longer be eclipsed by Lövborg's.

This brilliant but undisciplined young man was in love with Hedda some years ago, and they were close comrades. Confessing to her all his extravagant dissipations, his ambitions, the young man exposed his soul to this sheltered girl who was fascinated by a knowledge of life forbidden to her. When the friendship became serious, Hedda threatened Lövborg with her pistol, and he disappeared from her life from that moment on. George has no knowledge of his wife's former relationship with his friend.

The brief mention of Lövborg prefaces Hedda Gabler's entrance. She is tall and lovely, about twenty-eight years old, and responds coldly to the warmth of Miss Tesman's greeting. She is obviously bored by George's relatives and shows no interest when her husband exclaims with pleasure over the pair of his old slippers Aunt Julia has brought him. Embroidered by Rina, the invalid sister of Miss Tesman, the slippers recall for George cherished memories of his childhood.

Hedda abruptly changes the subject, complaining that the servant has thrown her old bonnet on one of the chairs. The hat, however, belongs to Aunt Julia, who has just purchased it in honor of George's bride. To overcome the embarrassment, George hastily admires the bonnet, then bids his aunt admire Hedda's splendid appearance and to note how she has filled out from the journey. Angry, Hedda insists she looks the same as always, but Miss Tesman is enraptured at the implied pregnancy. Emotionally, she blesses Hedda Tesman "for George's sake." Promising to call each day, she takes her leave.

The maid announces an unexpected caller, a younger schoolmate of Hedda and a former acquaintance of George. Nervous and shy, Thea Elvsted explains the purpose of her visit. For the past year, Eilert Lövborg has lived in her house as tutor to her husband's children. The writer's conduct this past year has been irreproachable, Thea says, and he has managed to complete his successful new book while at the Elvsteds' without once succumbing to temptation. Now that Lövborg has left their village, she is worried, for he has already remained a week "in this terrible town" without sending news of his whereabouts. Thea begs the Tesmans to receive him kindly if Eilert should visit them. Eager to extend hospitality to his former friend, George goes to write a letter of invitation.

Left alone with Thea, Hedda aggressively questions the reluctant younger woman, promising that they shall be close friends and address one another as "du." Thea admits that her marriage is not a happy one. She has nothing in common with her elderly husband, who married her because it is cheaper to keep a wife rather than a housekeeper to look after the children.

Gaining confidence, Thea tells Hedda how a great friendship grew between Lövborg and herself until she gained an influence over him. "He never wrote anything without my assistance," she proudly declares; sharing Lövborg's work was the happiest time she has known all her life. The relationship means so much to her that Thea has run away from home in order to live where Eilert Lövborg lives.

Yet her happiness is insecure, she tells Hedda. Although Lövborg had mentioned it only once, a woman's shadow stands between them. Hedda intently leans forward, eager to hear more. All that Lövborg said, Thea replies, is that this woman threatened to shoot him with a pistol when they parted. Mrs. Elvsted has heard about a red-haired singer whom Eilert used to visit, and she is especially worried now that this woman is in town again.

The maid announces Judge Brack, a family friend who has arranged George's affairs so that he could borrow money for his wedding trip and the villa that Hedda had set her heart on. A handsome moustached gentleman, carefully groomed and youthfully dressed, enters. About forty-five years old, Brack is very smooth in manner and bows gracefully when he and Thea are introduced.

Judge talks with George about his debts while Hedda sees her guest to the door. When she returns, Brack announces his bad news: because Lövborg's book has been received so well, the writer might favourably compete for George's promised professorship. George is thunderstruck, but Hedda shrugs indifferently. "There will be a sort of sporting interest in that," she says, and her husband apologizes for being unable to provide the necessities she expected: a livened footman, a saddle horse, means for "going out into society." After Brack leaves, Hedda concludes wearily, "I shall have one thing at least to kill time with in the meanwhile — my pistols, George." She crosses to the next room, smiling coldly at her startled husband. "General Gabler's pistols!" she adds mockingly, and the curtain rings down.

Analysis

This first act, besides introducing characters, acquaints the audience with Hedda Gabler's surroundings in her new life as Mrs. Tesman. Brought up as a general's daughter accustomed to travel in aristocratic social circles, Hedda must confront her future as a housewife in a middle-class household. The fact that she is pregnant reinforces her potential role as homemaker. The nature of her doom is underscored by the character of Miss Juliana Tesman, who represents the older generation of domestic womanhood who has devoted her life to the care of others.

George Tesman, good natured and sentimental, assumes that the duty of a husband is merely to satisfy the domestic requirements of his wife so that she can be happy in the confines of her home. With this in mind, he agrees that they shall keep an open house — in Hedda's chosen home — and maintain the luxuries important to proper entertaining. Believing that a woman naturally falls into household routines once she is married, George has no further insight into Hedda's temperament. George's research into the "domestic industries of medieval Brabant" is an ironic symbol of his conservative, simple-minded views of married life, as well as a symbol that indicates his inability to encompass other than material details.

As to his heroine, Ibsen establishes her main symptoms of disaffection with life: a profound emotional coldness, an incapacity to interest herself in anything besides social pleasures, and a destructive desire to control the lives of others. Hedda cannot respond to the warmth of Aunt Julia, she cannot abide the idea of expecting a child, and was totally bored during her wedding trip.

To further express her emotional sterility, Ibsen shows how Hedda is unable to reciprocate in a relationship. Like a young child, she can only receive without knowing how to give in return. Without reciprocating, she accepts George's love and support; by pretending friendship, she learns all about Thea's personal life yet reveals no confidences of her own. Later on, when Lövborg recalls his previous relationship with Hedda, he describes how she extracted detailed confessions from him yet withheld her own self-revelations. This intense, almost morbid interest in the lives of others is another aspect of her empty emotional life. At the same time that investigating and analysing other people's lives is one way for Hedda to gain some understanding of her own unsatisfied nature, she reveals her personal frigidity and adolescent self-centeredness.

This first act also demonstrates a pathological quality in Hedda's personality. Cruelly insulting Aunt Julia by complaining that it is the servant's bonnet lying in the chair, Hedda tries to undermine Miss Tesman's sense of worth. Compelling Thea to reveal her innermost feelings, she seems to search for Mrs. Elvsted's weaknesses so she can later use this knowledge for her own selfish purposes. Having established that his heroine is emotionally empty yet eager to learn how other people face life's experiences, Ibsen shows how the imperious and unsubmissive Hedda tries to destroy the personal values of those whose satisfactions she cannot attain.

Summary and Analysis of Act II

Summary

As the curtain rises, Hedda is busy loading one of her pistols. There is nothing else to do besides shoot, she tells Judge Brack, who has come to see George. As they chat, Hedda tells him how bored she was during her wedding trip. She complains that her husband, with his everlasting talk about medieval civilization, is also boring. She is glad that Brack is a lively conversationalist who is "not at all a specialist." Her visitor wonders why Hedda accepted George in the first place. "My day was done," she sighs. "I had positively danced myself tired.

my dear judge." Besides, among all her suitors, George, "who is correctness itself," was the one who offered marriage and a promising economic future; she saw no reason to refuse his proposal.

Brack, having himself been one of Hedda's admirers, admits that he never considered marriage. He enjoys being their family friend, he says, adding, "especially a friend of the mistress of the house." Very smoothly, he suggests that Hedda accept him as a third party in her domestic circle, for a "triangular friendship" will be convenient to all concerned. Hedda would then be able to enjoy the companionship of one who is not "a specialist," and Brack's relation with George would continue as before. Hedda agrees without committing herself.

At this moment, George enters. He has just visited his invalid Aunt Rina, who is very sick, and he has brought some books, including the recent publication by Eilert Lövborg. Although George expects to attend Brack's bachelor party this evening, he says he is eager to begin reading Lövborg's book and will come downstairs when it is time to leave. Hedda and the judge are free to continue their conversation.

Brack cannot understand why she is constantly bored; isn't she mistress of the very house she had set her heart on? She never liked this villa, replies Hedda. The matter came up when George escorted her home from a party one evening. As a pretext for conversation with the shy historian, Hedda relates, she pretended great interest in the villa they were just passing. This sham enthusiasm provided the first bond of sympathy between herself and George; from this followed the courtship, engagement, and eventual marriage.

Brack observes that she requires a vocation as a relief from boredom. Hedda confesses she would like to try and push George into politics, but now that they have such meagre finances this is impossible. Having the responsibility of a child would give her life an objective, Brack ventures. "No responsibilities for me," Hedda retorts angrily, and the judge remarks that her instincts are very unlike those of ordinary women. She despairs her purposeless life. "I often think there is only one thing in the world I have any turn for," Hedda observes darkly, " — boring myself to death."

George, dressed for the dinner, comes to ask if Lövborg left any message. Don't expect him to join the party, Hedda says; he shall spend the evening with herself and Thea. At this moment, Lövborg enters. When they discuss his latest book, the writer denies its virtues, saying it is just a sop he threw to the critics. "This is the real book," he says drawing a packet from his coat, "the book I have put my true self into." Dealing with the "civilizing forces of the future," the manuscript excites George's curiosity and he is eager for Lövborg to read aloud from it. George is further delighted when his friend promises not to compete with him for the professorship. The only interest Lövborg has in making his scheduled lecture tour, he tells George, is to accomplish a "moral victory." Refusing to drink a glass of punch with Brack and George, Lövborg joins Hedda, and she shows him the photograph album of their wedding journey. While she impersonally points out dull landscapes, Lövborg reminds her of the time when they were close comrades and he exposed all his secret thoughts to her. Her interest was not motivated by love, she admits, but by curiosity to learn about the outside world. "Comradeship in the thirst of life" could have continued even when they became serious lovers, Lövborg pursues. He regrets that she did not shoot him down as she threatened, for he still finds her lovely and fascinating. I was afraid of a scandal, replies Hedda, and adds, "The fact that I dared not shoot you down — that was not my most arr evening." Lövborg is filled with emotion. "Ah, Hedda! Hedda Gabler!" he murmurs. "Now I begin to see a hidden reason beneath our comradeship! You and I! After all, then, it was your craving for life — " and he understands that she was afraid to give herself in love.

Mrs. Elvsted appears, and as they sit down together, Lövborg exclaims how courageous and lovely and inspiring Thea has been for him. When Lövborg refuses her offer of punch, Hedda subtly taunts him for feeling insecure about his temperance vow. She says that George and Brack also noticed his lack of self-confidence. Again Lövborg refuses to drink, and Hedda turns smilingly to Thea. "You see," she says, "he is as firm as a rock." Thea needn't have run to her house, distracted with fear and worry about her friend's will power. Deeply injured at this lack of trust, Lövborg downs two cocktails in vengeance. Then he announces that he will, after all, join George and Brack at this evening's dinner party.

Hedda assures them she will entertain Mrs. Elvsted until the writer returns to escort her home. When the men go out, Hedda comforts the agitated Thea. He will return at ten o'clock, she tells her friend. "I can see him already — flushed and fearless — with vine leaves in his hair." As the curtain falls, the victorious Hedda draws Thea, limp with exhaustion and anxiety, into the dining room for tea.

Analysis

In this act, Hedda fully expresses her desire to have power over someone. Frustrated at being unable to push her husband into a political career, incapable of maternal feelings, Hedda strives to compete with Thea for her influence over Lövborg. Having restored his liberty, she now looks forward to Eilert's fulfilling her romantic image of him as the incarnation of "the joy of life": he shall return "flushed and fearless with vine leaves in his hair!" That she has at once destroyed Thea's life work and Lövborg's morale is unimportant to Hedda; she merely wishes to have proof of her own worth by having power over someone.

At the same time that her craving for life distinguishes Hedda from "ordinary women," she shows, in this act, her deep commitment to the same bourgeois ethics which chain a woman to her domestic duties. Expressing to the judge that she accepted George Tesman because he "is correctness itself," Hedda implicitly rejects Brack's proposition of a domestic triangle: such a scandalous relationship would be repugnant to her. The judge, not recognizing that Hedda maintains such strict conventions, believes she has accepted his frank proposal.

Eilert Lövborg, however, shows more insight into Hedda's nature. When he accuses her of cowardice, he recognizes that she was too much a conformist to love an erratic and unconventional personality. Nevertheless, at the time of their youthful friendship, Hedda expressed her "craving for life" by being fascinated by Eilert's intensity and brilliance; extracting detailed confessions from him was her way of vicariously experiencing a liberated and excessive way of life she was too afraid to live for herself.

Summary and Analysis of Act III

Summary

It is 7:00 the next morning. The ladies have been fitfully dozing during their night watch, and Hedda now sends Thea off for a good nap, promising to wake her when Lövborg arrives. When George appears, Hedda is wide awake and listens eagerly as he tells her of Lövborg's extravagant behaviour at the party. He was so drunk that he even dropped his manuscript without noticing, and George picked it up. George praises his friend's book, admitting he feels envious for being himself unable to accomplish such brilliant work. Hedda demands the packet of papers, saying she would like to keep it awhile and read the manuscript.

At this moment, George receives a telegram that his Aunt Rina is close to death. He rushes out, barely greeting Brack, who has just arrived. The judge describes the rest of Eilert's activities. After the party, Lövborg landed at another soiree given by the red-haired singer, Diana. Accusing her of robbing him, he caused such a disturbance that the police were called; to make matters worse, Lövborg resisted arrest by assaulting one of the officers.

Expecting Lövborg to seek Hedda's home as a refuge where he can meet with Mrs. Elvsted, Brack warns Hedda that he will resist any intrusion into the triangle; he wants nothing to threaten his free passage in and out of the Tesman residence. Hedda smiles mockingly at the implied threat. In other words, she calls to him as he goes, "you want to be the one cock in the basket."

When left alone, she takes the manuscript from the desk but replaces it hastily at Lövborg's approach. Thea Elvsted emerges to greet the dishevelled writer. He has come, he sorrowfully says, to say their ways must part; from now on she must live her life without him. Thea implores him to allow her to experience her crowning satisfaction: to be with him when the book appears. There will be no book, he answers, for he destroyed the manuscript. It is as if he "killed a little child," she says in despair, and because the "child" belonged to her too, he had no right to destroy it. Thea can do nothing but return home, facing a life without any future, without any further meaning.

Alone with Hedda, Lövborg declares he is unable to try to rebuild his life. Worse than destroying the manuscript, which he had in his keeping like his own child, he just lost it during this night of "debauchery and riotness," he tells Hedda. Having so deeply failed Mrs. Elvsted, he has no future and will "only try and make an end of it all — the sooner the better." "Eilert Lövborg — listen to me," Hedda commands. She takes one of her pistols from its case and hands it to him. "Will you not try to — to do it beautifully?" she whispers. Thrusting the gun into his breast pocket, Lövborg leaves her.

Hedda, once more alone, takes the packet of papers from her desk. Sitting by the stove, she thrusts some pages into the fire. "Now I am burning your child, Thea!" she breathes. Peeling off papers, she hands them, one by one, into the flames until the entire manuscript is consumed. "Your child and Eilert Lövborg's," says Hedda with satisfaction. "I am burning — I am burning your child!"

Analysis

In this act, Hedda has confronted another frustration. Instead of seeing the awaited Lövborg rise to his full stature as a liberated artist victoriously imbued with life's joy, she views a demoralized reveller who ruined the evening in a drunken orgy, facing, in addition, a possible jail sentence for assaulting a police officer.

Now that Thea has left the scene, however, she has one further chance of retaining her influence over Lövborg so that he will provide her with an act of "courage and freedom." Offering him the pistol, Hedda imagines that he will end his life bravely and romantically to accord with her favourite images of beauty enhanced by violence and death. Furthermore, the packet of papers she possesses represents a material hold she still has on Lövborg's destiny. By destroying the manuscript she had no share in creating or realizing, Hedda also kills the child she was unable to bear for Lövborg. By destroying that work of others which she should have accomplished herself, Hedda also destroys those constant reminders of her own inadequacies. Symbolically denying the life works of others, Hedda affirms her own unsatisfied sense of worth.

Summary and Analysis of Act IV

Summary

It is later in the evening. Miss Tesman enters, dressed in mourning. Hedda greets her, expressing regret for Rina's death. Aunt Julia plans to fill the gap in her life by finding someone to care for. Because it is necessary to live for someone, she says, she will seek an occupant for Rina's little room — some invalid in want of nursing.

After Julia leaves, George comes back, asking Hedda for the manuscript; he fears Lövborg might do himself injury before he can return it. Coolly, Hedda tells him she burned the papers. She wanted no one to put her husband "in the shade," she tells the delighted George, who never heard Hedda express her love for him.

Thea suddenly appears, apologizing for the intrusion. Having heard that Lövborg is in the hospital, she asks if they have further news of his condition. Brack, newly arrived, tells them that Lövborg wounded himself in the breast. "Not in the temple?" Hedda quickly inquires.

While Thea makes an effort to control herself, Hedda breaks the silence, declaring that there is beauty in this suicide, for Eilert has made up his account with life. "He has had the courage to do the one right thing," she affirms.

George expresses regret that Lövborg has left the world without bequeathing it "the book that would have immortalized his name." Mrs. Elvsted fumbles in her dress pocket. Producing many scraps of paper — "all the loose notes he used to dictate from" — she suggests that they might reconstruct the book. George is delighted. Having spent his career organizing other people's manuscripts, he is eager to dedicate himself to putting together Lövborg's notes. Forgetful of everything but the papers spread on the table before them, Thea and George begin the task.

Hedda languidly reclines in the armchair, Judge Brack at her side. It gives her a new feeling of freedom, she tells her admirer, to know that a "deed of deliberate courage is still possible in this world — a deed of spontaneous beauty." Brack dispels her illusions, informing her of the true circumstances of Lövborg's death, which he did not disclose to Thea. Lövborg did not die voluntarily, he tells the astonished Hedda. The police discovered the body in Diana's boudoir: Lövborg had forced his way into the singer's apartment, talking wildly about a "lost child." While they struggled, the pistol in his breast pocket discharged itself, and he died from a bullet wound in his bowels.

Her shocked face is disfigured by an expression of loathing and despair. "Oh, what a curse is it that makes everything I touch turn ludicrous and mean?" she cries out. Brack remains unperturbed. One more disagreeable aspect remains, he says, for Lövborg must have stolen the pistol. Hedda passionately denies this, and Brack nods. He says that if someone were to identify the pistol, she herself would be drawn into the scandal. "So I am in your power, Judge Brack," says Hedda. "You have me at your beck and call from this time forward." Leaning closer, he assures her that he shall not "abuse his advantage."

Hedda stands behind Mrs. Elvsted, passing her hands affectionately through her friend's hair. "Here you are, Thea, sitting with George — just as you used to sit with Eilert Lövborg," and she asks whether she can inspire George as well as she used to inspire Eilert. Intently working, her husband exclaims that he begins to feel inspired by Thea and asks his wife to return to Judge Brack. "Is there nothing I can do to help you two?" asks Hedda. "No, nothing in the world," George answers without looking up.

He suggests to Thea that she rent the room in Aunt Julia's apartment; without disturbing Hedda, they can meet there every evening to work on the manuscript. "But how am I to get through the evenings out here?" Hedda calls from the back room. George assures her that the judge shall look in on her every now and then. Brack gaily adds that he shall visit "every blessed evening," and that "we shall get on capitally together, we two!" Loud and clear, Hedda answers, "Yes, don't you flatter yourself we will, Judge Brack. Now that you are the one cock in the basket — " A shot rings out. George, Mrs. Elvsted, and Brack discover Hedda stretched lifeless on the sofa; she has shot herself in the temple.

Analysis

Going beyond the destruction that Hedda began in the previous acts, circumstances depicted in the final scene destroy the life's work of each other character. Julia's sister dies, leaving the old aunt with no one to care for; George relinquishes his work on medieval Brabant; Thea has definitely lost Lövborg; and Hedda confronts profound disillusion when she learns of Eilert's ignoble death.

The secondary characters, however, all find vocational rebirth as they confront their ruined life purposes. Thea, having saved Lövborg's notes, begins, with George Tesman, to conceive a new "child"; the professor so expert at assembling other people's manuscripts can dedicate his abilities to reconstruct his dead friend's brilliant ideas; and Julia can again care for her beloved nephew now that Hedda is gone.

Hedda alone faces a life without a future. Deprived of her satisfaction at the beauty of Eilert's suicide, she learns that she was in fact responsible for the abhorrent manner of Lövborg's death. Her ideal of freedom, courage, and beauty turns into a loathsome reality. Judge Brack applies the final vulgar touch to a situation that Hedda already finds repulsive; he alone can inform the police of the facts that would implicate her in a shocking scandal. The conventional Hedda must either succumb to Brack's power or face a public inquiry. Now that even her husband has no further need of her, no one depends upon Hedda at this point. On the other hand, she is unwillingly enthralled by the ruthless Brack. Deprived of freedom, Hedda faces either "boring herself to death" or committing a valiant suicide.

Hedda Gabler: The Historical, Social and Cultural Context

Hedda Gabler is not an easy character to get to know. At first reading she seems a bitter personality portrayed in an old-fashioned script set in an out-outmoded and foreign society. How could a woman in 102-year-old play possibly be understandable or relevant to the late-twentieth-century student? However, upon further examination, Hedda Gabler‛s fictional reality not only offers us the opportunity to observe the art and social concerns of Ibsen's day, but extends to us a paradigm by which we may compare and evaluate the principles of our day.

In approaching this play, it is important to recall that Hedda was written as a theatrical work in the realm of contemporary realism, not as a historical curio. While the differences of culture and period now put a certain distance between ourselves and the subject, Ibsen was most emphatic that his characters were representative of actual human beings. Hedda marked a return to the theatrical style which we term "realism," a method of playwriting in which the internal motivations of the personalities in the play are explored within a specific social context.

Norway was not so remote that it was unaffected by the feminist debate of the Victorian age. While in 1871 Denmark led the Scandinavian countries in initiating an organization for improving women's status, by the 1880s Norway had established a woman's rights movement of its own. Growing economic pressures made it increasingly difficult for the middle-class family to provide for unmarried daughters in the home, but both prejudice and legislation barred women from either meaningful education or dignified employment. Some change was soon forthcoming; women were admitted to the University of Christiania (Oslo) in 1882, and 1884 saw the founding of Norsk Kvinnesaksforening (Norwegian Women's Movement Association), a pioneering liberation coalition that remains active to this day. That same year Ibsen himself presented a petition to the government demanding that married women be granted the right to earnings and property.

Victorian attitudes were slower to change. While the lower class woman had for some time been allowed to work in the factories, concessions had never been made in the home. Men did not assist with domestic responsibilities, leaving the women their "natural" duties in keeping the house and raising the children. This order of affairs had support in the nineteenth century Darwinian sciences, medical and social experts alike taught that cultural, physiological, and psychological differences between genders were caused by evolutionary forces. The belief was that "women's individual evolution was arrested earlier than men's to permit the conservation of their energies for reproduction" . Women were considered biologically more intuitive, self-sacrificing, and tender then men, and thus naturally disposed to choose marriage and motherhood, any other choice was considered tragic. Even the arts of the day perpetuated this "ideology of domesticity":

The "angel in the house," sexually passive and refined, whose responsibility it was to oversee the provision of a sanctuary of well-ordered comfort and peace, became the literary ideal for middle-class women. In all classes of society, hearth and home acquired the significance of religious symbolism.

Steven Mintz explains in A Prison of Expectations that a woman was expected to maintain a "walled garden" of a home, a place where her husband could find refuge and be purified from his encounters with the harsh realities of his ruthless business world, and a place where the innocence of her children could be protected. A wife was thought able to maintain this refuge because of her special virtues of femininity…"Women, by their very natures, were intended to purify the sphere of family and home" (Boswell 33).

The realm of womanly affairs, both literary and social, included motherhood. A mother was accountable for the health, manners and morals of her children. She was to be conscientious in training her daughters to assume future angelic duties. In addition to passing along the complex body taboos designed to defend purity from earthly animal passions, the middle-to-upper- class mother was to drill her girls in the niceties of the intricate feminine social duties that marked her place in the pecking order of bourgeois society. An unfortunate error in either discipline could destroy the young woman's reputation, and bar her from the polite circles that were her only outlets. Mothers were not as responsible for the daughters' intellectual education:

Schooling was often seen as of secondary importance to the influence of the home in the education of middle-class girls….The more prosperous families might send their daughters to expensive and select boarding schools for a while; the less wealthy were more likely to patronize small homely "academies" which aimed to foster those same ideals of bourgeois that were nurtured in the middle-class home. An examination of the curriculum (both formal and informal) of the majority of girls' boarding schools of the period will show that social values and objectives took precedence over academic goals: girls were educated with their marriage prospects and the ideal of the "cultivated homemaker" in mind.

Keeping in mind the ultimate goal of a "good marriage," both parents and schools tended to strongly discourage bookishness, vocational aspirations, and other unfeminine behavior. Instead, young women of all classes "expected to look after their families and hoped above all for a 'good' husband; that is, a good provider" (Lewis 11). Such would be the education that Hedda and Thea received both in society and at the school where they were classmates.

Viewed in the context of Ibsen's era, Hedda becomes the embodiment of the identity crisis facing the middle-class woman during that transitional time. Raised by a privileged father in the unlanded Norwegian upper-class, Hedda is seasoned in freedoms more typical of males of the period, including experience with rough horsemanship and guns. Her guns, however, are not tools but mementos and dangerous toys. She has been granted masculine leisure and tastes, but not corresponding responsibilities or a useful education. She can never be the son that the Victorian General would have wanted.

Neither can she be her mother's daughter. Significantly, Hedda's mother is completely absent from the narrative, whether destroyed by the loss of the old values, the coming of the new, or merely by childbirth, the reason is unknown. The system designed to transmit traditional values has broken down. There is no one to teach Hedda the specifics of the feminine codes in behavior or etiquette. The only inheritance which may have come from her mother is a shabby old piano, a possession she both values and disdains. She will not discard it, but neither will she put it on public display as she will the pistols and the portrait of her father.

Hedda seems reluctant to face either the passing of the old ways or the changes she faces in marrying Tesman. She dislikes the smell of the decaying potpourri, and spends her time reminiscing and re-enacting portions of her past relationship with Lövborg. Having out of necessity achieved her destiny of a respectable marriage, she sees no hope for the future of that union. Sighing over September, she seems to have somehow missed her own summer: "Hedda is not unripe, but rather is like an all-too-early decayed Autumn, as she returns to the narrow perspectives of a child and its playful self-seeking".

Certainly she does not look forward to the birth of the child whose presence in her womb propels her inevitably towards a future of either death in childbed, or life as a mother (which, in her childhood situation, also meant absence or death). She has no alternative. By temperament and upbringing she is as unsuited for Thea's work as she is for Diana's. As a female, she can only covet parasite Judge Brack's male prerogatives. While she professes a desire to control destiny and make some real difference in a life, she sees no value in wife and motherhood, so vicariously participates in the romance of Lövborg's dissipations. Endowed with a taste for the trappings of wealth (such as servants and expensive clothes), and ambitious to make her mark in social circles, she lacks both the social training and the inherited money to advance beyond her bourgeois desires. She clings to the fading glories of her fame as the dashing Miss Gabler and seethes in impotent jealousy.

Discontented as she is, Hedda's suicide is still unexpected. One explanation of the violent act can be discovered in the Ibsen's own pattern of playwriting, shaped in part by the world that shaped the playwright. As Charles Lyons explains in Hedda Gabler: Gender, Role, and World,

The dramatic character, Hedda, is not determined merely by the social restrictions imposed upon the female at the end of the nineteenth century as that world is represented by the social dynamics of the play; the character is also configured by the social dynamics of Ibsen's basic sexual paradigm, a sexual paradigm that voices the male-dominated sexual ideology of Ibsen's moment in history mediated through the idiosyncrasies of his own psyche.

Conscious as he was of the changing world around him, Ibsen could not help be influenced by the literary constructs that in part framed his developing intellect. Hedda, as well as Thea, may be seen as children of those literary constructions. According to the prevailing literature, if a woman was unable to succeed as an angel, she must be dealt with as a monster. And Ibsen not only attacked such a notion, in some ways, he can be seen as perpetuating it.

In Hedda Gabler, wife Hedda becomes just such a death-giving fiend. Masculinized out of her angelhood, she turns her powers to malevolent manipulation, pitching family members against each other, dominating her friends, burning the fruits of Lövborg's labours before driving him to emasculate himself, and finally murdering her own child. Unlike most of Ibsen's heroines, she makes no real self-discovery and achieves no growth. Her suicide accomplishes nothing. Is Thea, therefore, the real heroine of the play? She is the one with the courage to ignore respectability, to change her life and leave her passionless marriage in pursuit of the man she loves. It would seem that Thea is as deserving the death sentence as surely as Hedda. Thea's abandonment of her role as step-mother can be construed as a drive to actually fulfil her destiny as the snow-white angel. It is her purity that ha it is her presence that has so inspired him to write his masterpiece; the book is acknowledged as Lövborg's and Thea's sexless "Brain child." Thea, of course, did none of the actual writing, as the ingrained belief of the Medieval, Romantic, and Victorian eras was in the actual "sonship" of the written text. According to that belief, an author literally fathered, with his female muse, a posterity of "brain children." The power to create was thus exclusively male, and women attempting to write were considered presumptuous, freakish, unnatural, and subject to various health problems.

Thea accomplished her angelic potential while actually in the Elvsted home, surviving in a dual marriage as she kept house and raised one man's children while supporting another man with her love and inspiration. When that double-husband divided, and Thea was forced to divide her devotions and chose to leave the home, disaster ensued. She could neither keep Lövborg from falling back into evil ways, nor protect their literary child. In fact, Lövborg blamed her distrust of him for driving him back to drink. Thea could only redeem herself by offering to sacrifice herself in resurrecting Lövborg's book. The play seems to suggest that she will additionally serve Tesman as a far superior replacement for Hedda. Once Hedda is destroyed, and Thea suitably paired Tesman, literary moral order will once again be restored. Hedda Gabler is not only a fascinating play in itself, but it also serves as a reminder of a blind spot in our own day.

Major Themes

Individual vs. Group: - Hedda is preoccupied with self-determination - the idea that she can dictate the course of her own life, no matter how much societal pressure may try to move her along a different course. And yet, as the play moves on, we see just how much a victim Hedda is of the "group": she married a man she didn't love simply because her "time ran out"; will have children simply because she is supposed to; and ultimately destroys herself because she fears being thrust into the spotlight of a public scandal. What Hedda discovers is that an individual has no power in the face of a group unless they can manipulate that group - something that she continually fails to do.

Self-Liberation vs. Self-Renunciation: - Hedda believes that the power to determine when and how one dies is the ultimate freedom, and is perhaps the only real control that an individual has in life. At first, she attempts to prove this vicariously by encouraging Lovborg to have a "beautiful death" - she gives him one of her pistols, essentially pulling all the strings that might make him veer towards suicide. However, when Lovborg dies from an unintended shot to the groin, Hedda realizes that the beautiful death is still a fantasy - and she can only bring it to life for herself. When she does, Brack exclaims, in the last, highly charged line of the play, "No one does that!"

Anti-tragedy vs. Tragedy: - While Hedda Gabler has the structure of a classical tragedy, and perhaps the trappings of it, there is also the argument that Hedda is the anti-tragedy. As Caroline W. Mayerson writes, "Hedda is incapable of making the distinction between an exhibitionistic gesture which inflates the ego, and the tragic death, in which the ego is sublimated in order that the values of life may be extended and reborn. Her inability to perceive the difference between melodrama and tragedy accounts for the disparity between Hedda's presumptive view of her own suicide and our evaluation of its significance." In other words, while Hedda declares that it is a beautiful death that she seeks, and a beautiful death that offers the individual liberation from the mundane trivialities of society, upon her own death, we see only the futility of it, the smallness of it. Ultimately, Hedda's death seems to have served no purpose except as a selfish proclamation of principles pushed too far.

Sex vs. Sterility: - The "notorious" female character in dramatic works of literature is frequently a firebrand, fully in control of her sexuality and conscious of her power over men. Hedda, however, seems terribly afraid of her own sexuality - she nearly kills Lovborg when he gets too close to her, rebuffs Brack's suggestion that she would jump out of her marriage to Tesman, even though she seems to have little interest in her new husband, and ultimately shows little concern for her own soon-to-be-born child. Indeed, as the play goes on, we wonder how Hedda ever got pregnant at all - she's as mystified by her condition as the audience, and refuses to even discuss or acknowledge it. This one possibility of fecundity - of proving her worth as a "woman" - is decisively ignored and thus implicitly refused.

Wild Nature vs. Tamed Assimilation: - One of the more compelling themes in Hedda Gabler involves how an individual is groomed to cope with the stifling pressures of society, and whether they maintain the trappings of their "wild" self or succumb completely to a community's norms. Hedda is obviously torn between the two (see "Individual vs. Group"), but right before shooting herself, she plays a "wild piano piece", as if to claim her soul before burying it. Meanwhile, Tesman is at odds with Lovborg: the former can only regurgitate other people's tried-and-tested ideas, while the latter is an untamed genius who simply writes down his thoughts and theories and finds them met with acclaim. Tesman, however, is too afraid to ever indulge his own original thoughts, and so dedicates his life to reconstructing Lovborg's ideas and taking credit for them.

"Old Woman" vs. "New Woman": - At the time Ibsen wrote Hedda Gabler, the term "New Woman" had emerged to describe "women who were pushing against the limits which society imposed on women." While the New Woman sought self-determination and freedom, as well as equality with males and a true understanding of female sexuality, the Old Woman believed in self-sacrifice, a woman's duty to her husband, and sexuality only in terms of childbearing. Hedda is a model case of a "New Woman" who ultimately finds no satisfaction in liberation. This is not to say that Ibsen by any stretch of the imagination intends Hedda Gabler as a critique of the New Woman; to the contrary, he is offering a critique of the resistance against it.

Motivation vs. Boredom: - One of the great questions of Hedda Gabler is whether Hedda's actions are inspired by genuine principles, or whether she is motivated entirely by boredom. If we examine the above theme of Old Woman vs. New Woman, it is possible to interpret her character as a New Woman shoved into Old Woman trappings, and who thus naturally gravitates towards pushing limits, pulling strings, and manipulating others in the hopes of freeing herself. She is a New Woman, then, looking for her place in life. However, Hedda continuously finds that her efforts only leave her even more bored. At one point, she even tells Tesman that her only talent in life is "boring herself to death" - an eerie prophecy of the events to come.

Women in Hedda Gabler

Modern criticism of Hedda Gabler rests on the idea that a male dominated society repressed and limited Hedda's brilliance. Ibsen studied the repressed conditions of women in many of his plays; however his own view of women was limited by his "celebration of their primary role as the nurturing mothers whose mission is to educate the young." No wonder there is no solution for Hedda but suicide. She clearly would never make a good mother, and there was nothing else for such a woman to do unless she could nurture a man's genius, as Thea did. Nurturing genius, however, was clearly not Hedda's gift. General Gabler's pistols were, finally, the only option for his daughter. Hedda Gabler is set about thirty years earlier than when it was written. Clurman writes that:

> It was a period, Ibsen once remarked, when women were not allowed to play any role apart from marriage and motherhood. The "protection" they enjoyed separated them from the realities of life. Hedda shuns everything painful and ugly; she cannot tolerate the sight of sickness or death. She is already pregnant when the play opens, but mention of it is abhorrent to her….Small wonder then that she admits that all she is good for is boring herself to death.

And yet Thea breaks out of this sheltered life. Hedda is a victim, but she is also a coward. Both George Tesman and Eilert Lövborg develop their identities through their professions. They compete for fame and position through training, effort and intellect. Hedda, however, has no profession, nor does she care about anything. She has no interest in what Eilert writes, only in his potential fame and glamour, and in his rivalry with her husband. She can only compete with Thea for control of a man, not to develop a personal identity. Worse, Hedda's control is destructive, while Thea's is healing and creative. Hedda married George Tesman to establish a social life as the wife of a professor; she wanted to control Eilert Lövborg destructively to rival Thea's constructive control as the inspiring force behind his genius.

Hedda's only stable identity is as General Gabler's daughter. She has no life of her own, no projects of her own. Although she envies Eilert Lövborg's freedom and wildness, she shows no interest at all in the content of his writing, nor is she willing to risk scandal personally. She cooperates, in short, with the extremely limited role offered by her social condition. Both the play and Hedda herself are limited to what can be said and done around a lady.

The respectable Judge Brack is obviously familiar with Mademoiselle Danielle, the prostitute in whose rooms Eilert died. Further, Brack tries to use his knowledge that Eilert used Hedda's revolver to blackmail Hedda into having an adulterous affair with him. Brack has evidently enjoyed a series of such adulterous relationships with other respectable women. Even the respectable, scandal-fearing Hedda, is clearly fascinated by hearing about the disreputable goings-on at Mademoiselle Danielle's.

Hedda's fascination with the forbidden male world of freedom and excess draws her to both Lövborg and Brack, and finally leads to her destruction. Her gender, class, and loathing of everything ugly limit what she is able or willing to hear about the outside world. Events are reported to the house, but only in terms acceptable to Hedda. Such restraint is imposed by society, as well as by Hedda's wishes.

Her lack of knowledge of the outside world probably is a major factor in her romantic idealization of Lövborg's wildness and lack of self-control. She has never sordid surroundings; she only heard his stories about his escapades and imagines him carousing as a Dionysian god with vine-leaves in his hair instead of as a stumbling drunk frequenting brothels. Hedda does not even understand the concept of Dionysius correctly. She just is aware of the carousing and freedom of the god, not of his creative inspiration and potential for creating social cohesion.

Her questioning of Lövborg years earlier showed her desire for information about this forbidden male world. But, ultimately, Hedda is determined not to break the taboos of her society and when she felt she had to choose between Lövborg and following the rules, she chose the rules and a loveless marriage to Tesman.

Ultimately, Hedda never does understand the creative genius which Thea is able to nurture in Eilert Lövborg. Hedda romanticizes his weaknesses, confusing his lack of self-control with god-like courage. She idealizes his death as noble instead of a sordid accident, and when she is trapped by Brack’s blackmail, she chooses the coward’s way out—suicide—to escape from a situation largely of her own making.

To conclude, we can say that Hedda is a creature of the nineteenth century, and that her romantic ignorance of what matters and what is real would not occur today. However, it would be foolish to deny that there are plenty of people, now and always, who dislike the petty limitations of real life and take refuge in their fantasies, confusing rebellion with creativity, self-indulgence with freedom and destruction with fulfilment.

Symbolism in Hedda Gabler

Introduction: - Repeated images and symbols are frequently used in dramas to contribute to the development of the themes. The repetition of a certain image in the context of the play attaches metaphorical significance to a physical object. "Hedda Gabler," a play written by Henrik Ibsen contains many such elements, all of which further the critical analysis of the constraint exerted by a patriarchal, bourgeois society of nineteenth century Norway on a woman who "thirsts for life." The resulting struggle between her inner desires for freedom and her own conformist attitudes has corrupted her perception of the meaning of life.

Symbolic importance of Setting: - The setting of "Hedda Gabler," which remains unchanged through the play, is significant symbolically as it demonstrates the domestic cage into which Hedda, as a woman and wife, had been cast. The dark, sombre colours of the drawing room presents the "monotonous landscape" that constitutes her prison, relieved by a glass door that looks out onto "autumn foliage." Through the entire play, the audience is visually reminded of the symbolic representation of the spiritual barrenness of the house, which opens out to deteriorating life - "all yellow and withered," nearing the season of death. This casts ominous overtones on the actions of the characters in this setting.

Origin of the House: - In addition to this effect is the origins of the house itself, revealed through dialogue that it had once belonged to the late Mr Falk, a cabinet minister. This draws the concept of class stratification into the society of the time and the class-consciousness that is ingrained into every member. That the house "reminds one of the departed" symbolises the decline of the power of the aristocracy in the 1890's, taken over by the stoical bourgeoisie. Hedda, once a former member of the higher classes, has been forced to marry down into a lower class, which she speaks contemptibly of. She finds her life to be one without purpose besides "boring herself to death" and that middle class morality has effectively eliminated whatever social power she once had as General Gabler's daughter - in effect, a "lady."

The Glass Door: - Hedda’s frustration at her powerlessness and dependence on an obtuse scholar is best represented by the repeated image of her "looking out the glass door." The glass door, in itself, presents only a tenuous, easily breakable barrier between her entrapment and the outside world. She longs for freedom, to catch a "glimpse of a world that one wasn't allowed to know about" but this transparent barrier confines Hedda. The image of her "walking nervously" across the enclosed, claustrophobic space of the drawing room to look out or "tap nervously" on the glass door stresses that the society in general has imprisoned her due to its restrictive definition of femininity.

General Gabler’s Role: - Hedda struggles against the role of subservient wife and loving mother. She received masculine upbringing and the strong father figure that dominates her sub-conscious. Both these are symbolized by the portrait of General Gabler which peers imposingly from the inner room, representative of Hedda's sub-conscious, to dominate the entire stage setting. Though she never once mentions her father, it is obvious that her craving for power and alignment with male desires are stemmed from him. Hence, Hedda's character and life seem to be wholly determined through this strong connection with a military past, which emphasizes conformity and discipline. There lies the chief reason as to her mortal fear of scandal - "I never jump out." She, then, is also a woman trapped by her past.

Pistols: - The pistols, giver to her by her father, are symbols of masculine power and aggression. They give Hedda the power of life and death, one she uses to the detriment of others around her in the selfish desire to give meaning to her life. They inspired momentary fear in Judge Brack in his first visit to Hedda, his unsavoury intentions indicated by his using the back way. More importantly, they are the instruments through which Hedda can exert her control over another "human being's fate," Lovborg's - not to life but to death, which has to "shimmer with spontaneous beauty." The idea of beauty in suicide reveals the distorted ideals that Hedda holds. Ironically, the pistol also brings about her downfall as it was used as the medium through which Brack could bring her under his control.

Committing Suicide: - Towards the end, as the illusion of her power over another is shattered, shown by her disgust in response to Lovborg's accidental death, she reaches out to the final illusion wherein she commits an act, which she deems courageous. In her distorted ideals, shooting herself through the temple with the pistol was necessary for her to gain freedom but it in itself is also an act derived from her past. Committing suicide by shooting oneself through the temple is glorified and deemed the highest form of honour in the military code when all is lost. The act could also be romantically beautified - an idea again taken from her father's influence. Hedda has finally retreated deep into her inner sanctum, where, in the presence of the General, allowed the past to ultimately reclaim her life.

Easy Chair: -Objects in the room presents a host of repeated images, most important of which are the easy chair and the stove. The easy chair connotes a throne, that is, the seat of power. The power play in the interactions of the characters is conveyed through possession of this seat. Originally, Hedda is the one who sits in it, connoting the fact that she holds the power although it is restricted to the domestic sphere. She is the stronger figure in her relationship with Tesman as he serves her like a loyal, admiring subject - "It's so jolly waiting on you, Hedda." Further, when Brack first comes to call in Act 1, her act reaching out her hand]" seem to indicate her regal aura she held his audience from the throne.

Shifts in power as the play progresses can be demonstrated through the easy chair. On Brack's later visit, Hedda is again sitting on the chair but Brack grasps the back of it, leaning over her to claim proprietorship and hence, control of her. At the end, the stage direction - "[in the easy chair, calling out gaily]" shows that Brack, through manipulative methods, has seized the throne and now holds power over Hedda. Deposed and powerless, Hedda is driven to suicide. The dramatic shift in power leads to her inevitable demise.

Stove: - The other object, the stove, holds fire and is symbolic of destructiveness, a character trait most associated with Hedda. She is most often seen to be incessantly moving and standing by it besides the glass door. Thea's negative to Berte's offer to raise the fire is contrasted with Hedda's desire to refuel it, contrasting creation and destruction which both characters are respective embodiments of. The scene where Hedda maniacally burns the manuscript in the stove shows the true extent of her malice and selfishness. The development of Hedda's somewhat twisted psychology is near completion through the stove as a symbolic device.

Manuscript: - The manuscript is referred to symbolically as a child, the product of creation, love and inspiration between Thea and Lovborg. With the personification of an inanimate object to an innocent child, the last straw of condemnation against Hedda's malignant act is thrown. The deliberate, cold-blooded murder of a child is inexcusable despite the social repression of her independence and sterility of her spirit, which have led her to such a crime.

Burning of Manuscript: - What utterly appals the reader in the burning of the manuscript is that Hedda has destroyed Lovborg's "vision of the future," his hope of spiritual redemption and realization of his Bohemian ideals. Eilert Lövborg, through his words to Hedda, is frantic - "devil knows what hands it's fallen into" as he sees his loss of the manuscript to be worse than killing a child. This is because, with the act of killing, one knows for certain that a child is dead. But with its loss, its fate is uncertain, the future is precarious and all hopes are lost.

Women’s Hair: - Description of the characters' physical appearances present continuous images through the play; notably, the description of the women's' hair. The fact that Hedda's hair is "not noticeably abundant" signifies her lack of spiritual substance, her incapability to experience depth of emotion and her fear of commitment and responsibility, especially such pertaining to motherhood. In this instance, she is revealed to be an unconventional woman who despises her own femaleness. On the other hand, Thea is a woman very much in touch with her feminine side, her hair being "remarkably fair… exceptionally thick and wavy." Her hair highlights her femininity and she is capable of love, serving to inspire Lovborg and to contribute to the creation of their spiritual child.

Basically, these explicit descriptions show that Hedda and Thea are the antithesis of each other. Both characters are composed of contradictions. Though Hedda is obviously the stronger of the two, as she forcefully pushes, pulls and corners Thea into difficult situations, she paradoxically admits that she is a "coward at heart." This indicates that it is because of the fear of scandal that dictates her life, that she has sought to control someone else's life to satiate her need for revenge against society.

Thea on the other hand, though shown to be weaker than Hedda and compliant to the progress of events, has demonstrated great bravery in defying society by leaving a loveless, miserable marriage. In this aspect, she is unconventional in the context of the time. It is in the quality that she is willing to sacrifice a stable and respectable position in society to pursue what Lovborg offers, that the audience is positioned to admire her.

"Vine leaves in the hair": - It is a repeated image made by Hedda in relation to her former lover. It is a symbol of victory, heroism and conquest. Hedda wants this of Lovborg because she desires to vicariously witness his success and empowerment. Her self-centred nature is highlighted as whatever emotion she feels for him is ruthlessly pushed aside in the view that he promises her personal power. The image is also reminiscent of Dionysus, the Greek god of wine, fertility and pleasure. Excessive behaviour is freedom to Hedda's corrupted view, just as beauty exists in death only through suicide.

Conclusion: - Hedda's "passion for life" and "hunger for freedom" have been stunted by conformity to a patriarchal society that marginalises women. Her response to this disempowerment is to seek her sense of power through destructive means. Such a portrait of a woman, her fiendish desires and her somewhat convoluted psychological state cannot be adequately developed without these symbols and repeated images. Each has a set part to play in this tragedy to draw the strings of the protagonist's inevitable death close.

Significance of the Title of the Play

Trace the influences of General Gabler on the life and psychology of Hedda/ the play "Hedda Gabler" is also called "General Gabler's daughter", for what it stands for?/ why Hedda likes to be called Hedda Gabler, while she is Hedda Tesman on the stage?/ 'Hedda perishes in the clash between repressive masculine society of the era and freewill'. Give a satisfying answer./Hedda is the cold, emotionless product of a disapproving and domineering society and father, comment.

Henrik Ibsen's Hedda Gabler is not truly indicative of his vast body of work: the protagonist is female and the play is a character study. Oddly enough, though, Hedda does not evolve or progress throughout the entirety of the work. Rather, she remains a cold and manipulative woman. When this fact is realised, the only task is discovering why Hedda continues as a flat character that is restrained from gaining the status of a hero. Truthfully, there are many variables that shape Hedda's life. Nonetheless, two factors in particular stand out—her father, General Gabler, and the repressive, masculine society of the era.

It is fitting that the title of the play is Hedda's maiden name, Hedda Gabler, for the play is to a large extent about the formerly aristocratic Hedda's inability to adjust to the bourgeois life into which she has married. Her tragedy lies not only in her own suicide but in her desire that Eilert should have a "beautiful" suicide: she hopes that life can be beautiful, can measure up to a certain standard, regardless of practicalities like professional success or failure. She is amused by how much Tesman worries about making a living.

This aristocratic privileging of "aesthetic" matters causes Hedda to feel very unsympathetic to Tesman. She doesn't allow him to use the word "we" to describe the two of them. It also allows her to feel little guilt when "cheating on" him, if only on an emotional level, with Eilert and Judge. Her values, based on an aesthetic standard rather than the moral standard to which her husband conforms, are beyond Tasman's control or even his understanding; as a result, he cannot predict her actions. At the same time, however, Hedda's apparent pregnancy draws attention to the tragic nature of her quest. She continually denies the inevitable.

The rest of the male characters are more or less in love with Hedda, perhaps because of her almost decadent sense of beauty. Brack wants to establish a private relationship with her, parallel to her relationship with Tesman, and Eilert dearly hopes that she shares his "passion for life." She finds both of these ideas silly, openly rejecting Eilert's notion and teasing Brack by saying that he wants to be "the cock of the walk. "Even Mrs. Elvsted feels intimidated by Hedda. Because of this popularity, she is the most powerful character. She toys with others because she can find no solace or entertainment in life. Indeed, Hedda's power is so far-reaching that her own self-destruction leads almost inevitably to the destruction of the other characters' lives.

Although Ibsen does not directly address certain influences of surroundings overhead, he succeeds in conveying their critical significance. A common underlying theme in Ibsen's work is the linking of death and music. And, as one might have deduced, this premise is employed in Hedda Gabler. Moreover, the ever-present piano, belonging to the late General Gabler, symbolises Hedda's past freedom, prior to marrying George Tesman, as the "General's daughter." A more obvious example of General Gabler's influence over Hedda is the large portrait of him that dominates the "inner" room. In fact, as Ibsen initially describes the single set, he momentarily focuses on the presence of the portrait of the "handsome, elderly man in a General's uniform".

With this description, the reader is made aware of the General's presence, even after his death. Arguably, the most significant influence the General has over Hedda is the fact that Hedda is unable to rid herself of her "Hedda Gabler" identity. It is extremely odd to be known by a name that is, in effect, a product of the past, as Hedda has recently become "Hedda Tesman." Throughout the play, Hedda is referred to as "Hedda Gabler," or, more simply, "General Gabler's daughter." This fact is also indicative of the kind of "facelessness" that women of the era were often subject to.

Yet another aspect of the General's rearing of Hedda is her unusual fascination with his pistols. This fascination is one of the first given clues that Hedda was raised as a boy would have been. The mere possibility of Hedda being raised as a male is sufficient evidence to explain her underlying disdain at being a woman—unable to express herself as a man would. Instead, Hedda simply "contents herself with negative behaviour instead of constructive action". Since she cannot express herself outright, she amuses herself by manipulating others. The most compelling episode of Hedda's perfected brand of manipulation is the role she plays in the death of Eilert Lövborg, a former love. Despite the fact that Eilert is the only person who can evoke true passion in her, Hedda feels the need to destroy him, purely for the purpose of "having the power to mould a human destiny". Since she is unable to directly control anyone or anything, Hedda chooses to rebel against the society that shapes her and obliterate one of its future leaders.

Needless to say, the Victorian era of literature and society did not offer a profusion of opportunities for young women. This fact is made abundantly clear in Hedda Gabler. Despite the fact that society stifles Hedda, it is not the only factor that restra independence, as well as expressing herself. In reality, Hedda's own cowardice generously contributes to her inescapable end. But, of course, the root of her cowardice is her former life involving her father, General Gabler.

Even though Hedda takes pleasure in creating scandal, however, she is deathly frightened of being associated with it. One such incidence involves Thea Elvsted, Hedda's long- forgotten schoolmate, explaining to Hedda her current, scandalous situation concerning Eilert Lövborg, who is Thea's stepchildren's tutor. Specifically, Thea is rebelling against the conventions of society and pursuing Lövborg. Hedda, constantly aware of scandal, responds in a predictable manner: "But what do you think people will say of you, Thea?" This scene is the first of many that reveals Hedda's inability to disregard society and scandal and live the life she has never dared to live. Indeed, the sole reason that Hedda marries George Tesman is due to the fact that he is the only one of her suitors that expresses an interest in marriage. Once again, Hedda's fear of society's ideals for women forces her to compromise her thoughts and desires, thereby causing her to feel jealous and trapped.

Ellis Fermor encompasses the real fact when he opines: "It (Hedda's mind) has merely gone round and round the cage she has built for herself, looking for a way to escape". In other words, Hedda has come to the realization that there is no way out of her "place" in society, as well as life. She will never be any man's equal or a "real "person.

Also, much like the rest of society, Tesman views Hedda as an object, a collectible. Finally, due to the circumstances imposed upon her by Norwegian society, Hedda responds with the one act of courage she has managed to muster in her short, meaningless life—she kills herself with her father's pistol. While Hedda is considerably responsible for her cowardice and her failure to sufficiently express herself, the way in which she was raised, as well as the society in which she lives, both play major roles in the shaping of her character. If it were not for her extenuating circumstances, as well as her solitary act of courage, one can only speculate what she might have come to represent in contemporary feminist literature. However, literature is not founded on speculation and guesswork; it is based on visible feelings, emotions, and actions. With this in mind, one is forced to recognize what Hedda truly represents: the cold, emotionless product of a disapproving and domineering society and father.

Major Social Issues in "Hedda Gabler"

"Hedda Gabler" as a social parable / The role and character of women in the play/"Hedda Gabler" exposes the shams and hypocrisy of Victorian age/ Hedda faces the tragedy because of her conceit in social class.

It has been suggested that Hedda Gabler is a drama about the individual psyche – a mere character study. It has even been written that Hedda Gabler "presents no social theme". On the contrary, we find social issues and themes abundant in this work. The character of Hedda Gabler centres on society and social issues. Her high social rank is indicated from the beginning, as Miss Tesman says of Hedda, "General Gabler's daughter. What a life she had in the general's day!" Upon Hedda's first appearance, she makes many snobbish remarks. First, she turns up her nose at George's special handmade slippers. Later she insults Aunt Julie's new hat, pretending to mistake it for the maid's. Hedda seems to abhor everything about George Tesman and his bourgeoisie existence. She demands much more class than he has been able to provide her, for she was the beautiful, charming daughter of General Gabler and deserved nothing but the finest.

As the character of Hedda Gabler develops, the reader learns that she has only married George Tesman because her father's passing away left her no significant financial resources, nothing but a respectable heritage. She tells Brack of her decision to marry Tesman:

> "I really had danced myself out, Judge. My time was up. ... And George Tesman-- he is after all a thoroughly acceptable choice. ... There's every chance that in time he could still make a name for himself. ...It was certainly more than my other admirers were willing to do for me, Judge".

Hedda needed someone to support her financially, and George Tesman was the only decent man to propose to her. She was forced to cross beneath her social class and marry this commoner in the hopes that he would make a name for himself as a professor .As for love everlasting, Hedda disgustedly comments to Judge Brack, "Ugh -- don't use that syrupy word!" Rather than having become a happy newlywed who has found truelove, according to Shipley "Hedda is trapped in a marriage of convenience".

Hedda was raised a lady of the upper class, and as such she regards her beauty with high esteem. This is, in part, the reason she vehemently denies the pregnancy for so long. A pregnancy will force her to gain weight and lose her lovely womanly figure. Hedda has grown accustomed to her many admirers; therefore, Hedda is perturbed and embarrassed when George says to Aunt Julie, "But have you noticed how plump and buxom she's grown? How much she's filled out on the trip?”, "I'm exactly as I was when I left," insists an annoyed Hedda. To Hedda, pregnancy is a despicable curse. It will make her unattractive, and she will no longer be the talk of the town. For a lady who has been forced to depend on her beauty to attract a suitable husband after the general's death, this is a crushing threat.

In Act II, Judge Brack gently suggests to Hedda that a child might relieve her from the mundane existence she has been enduring with Tesman. Calling motherhood her “most solemn responsibility," Judge Brack delicately hints that she will be having a child within the year. "Be quiet! You'll never see me like that!" she exclaims. "I have no talent for such things, Judge. I won't have responsibilities!". Judge Brack has reminded Hedda of what she already knew -- the pregnancy. Her fear of becoming undesirable resurfaces, and she explodes in anger and denial.

Even in death, Hedda cherishes beauty. In discussing the planned suicide with Eilert, she instructs him, "Eilert Lovborg -- listen to me. Couldn't you arrange that – that it's done beautifully?". She then reminds him twice more in the following lines to take his life beautifully. Still, upon his death he is shot in the stomach at a brothel, not at all as beautifully as Hedda had intended. In the final lines of the play, Hedda finally gets the beautiful ending she romanticizes. She takes her own life, shooting herself in the temple, as she lies stretched out on the sofa, beautifully.

Further evidence of Hedda's social class is found in her conversation with Mrs. Elvsted. After Mrs. Elvsted reluctantly admits that she has left her husband in search of Eilert Lovborg, the astonished Hedda replies, "But my dearest girl -- that you could dare to do such a thing!" Hedda continues, "But what do you think people will say about you, Th act is unimaginable. The entire town will be gossiping about Thea Elvsted, the sheriff's wife, and her affair with Eilert Lovborg. Mrs. Elvsted's reputation will be permanently tarnished. For Hedda, this would be a nightmare. She has been highly regarded by everyone and showered with attention from all the men. In fact, as General Gabler's lovely daughter, Hedda has been a major object of interest for the townspeople for quite some time. A renowned modern critic Setterquist opines "Hedda fears scandal above all". She cannot begin to fathom how Thea could risk losing her honour. "Brought up as a 'lady', she was required at all times to conduct herself correctly".

Thea, on the other hand, is of a lower social ranking and hasn't much of a name to lose. She is able to follow her heart, and she explains, "God knows they'll say what they please. I only did what I had to do."

Additional proof that Hedda fears scandal can be found in her private conversation with Judge Brack after Lovborg's suicide. He warns Hedda that if counsel were to discover that the pistol was hers, there would be a scandal. "A scandal, yes - the kind you're so deathly afraid of. Naturally, you'd appear in court... You'll have to answer the question: Why did you give Eilert Lovborg the pistol? And what conclusions will people draw from the fact that you did give it to him?". Her heart sinks, as Hedda realizes that Judge Brack is right. She understands that she is helpless against his blackmailing and no longer free, and in desperation she takes her own life.

Despite the clear distinctions between the social classes of the three women of the play -- Hedda Gabler, Thea Elvsted, and Mademoiselle Diana -- their sexual situations are remarkably similar. As women, they must all flaunt their sexuality to survive in a male dominated society. Hedda is, of course, an upper class lady. She does not strive towards her individual morality for any reason other than to maintain an impeccable reputation. Scandals and rumours are her worst enemy. Rather than allow herself to fall from her high social standing, she accepts the proposal of her only prospect – George Tesman. She marries him and thus must sleep with him, not out of love, but merely out of necessity. Hedda uses her sexuality to attract Tesman who will provide an adequate means of support for her. She remains faithful to him only in order to maintain her reputation, for she feels no moral obligation to be loyal to him.

Similarly, Thea Elvsted was a middle class girl. She accepted a job as a governess to Mr. Elvsted, and when his wife died he married her. There was a large age difference, and she says of him, "I just can't stand him! We haven't a single thought in common. Nothing at all -- he and I". Thea did not love Mr. Elvsted any more than Hedda loved Tesman. She, too, married for financial support. Since Thea did not have such a great reputation to uphold around town, however, she had the freedom to have a sexual affair. That is just what she did with Eilert Lovborg. Eventually, she left Mr. Elvsted in hopes of using her sexuality to secure a loving marriage with a better prospect, Mr. Lovborg. Unfortunately, her plan was unsuccessful and the reader must wonder in what way she will manage to support herself now.

Finally, there is the character Diana, a singer and prostitute. Just as Thea and Hedda, Diana must offer her sexuality as a means of support in a male-dominated world. Rather than finding a husband to support her, Diana has found the most freedom. In becoming a prostitute, she sells her body to men without becoming trapped in a marriage full of regret. While Diana has her freedom, however, she has attained it in a socially unacceptable manner and is thus at the bottom of the social order.

Lastly, the tile itself represents the social theme of the drama. In using the name Hedda Gabler, despite her marriage to George Tesman, Ibsen has conveyed to the reader the importance of social class. Hedda prefers to identify herself as the daughter of General Gabler, not the wife of George Tesman. Throughout the play she rejects Tesman and his middle class lifestyles, clinging to the honourable past with which her father provided her. This identity as the daughter of the noble General Gabler is strongly implied in the title, Hedda Gabler.

In considering the many implications of the social issues as explained above, it cannot be denied that the very theme of Hedda Gabler centres on social issues. "Hedda Gabler is ...indirectly a social parable".

Naturalism in Hedda Gabler

Naturalism is a term applied generally to literature which attempts accurately to imitate nature. Hence, it is often used as synonymous with realism. More commonly, it used to express a specific kind of realism, which is the slavish attempt to produce details from life without selection. Thus, it is sometimes referred to as photographic realism. In French literature, the term 'naturalism' is used for a school of nineteenth-century novelists including Flaubert, Zola, and the brothers Goncourt. They attempted to approach life in a scientific manner, recording external appearances only, but recording them with the all-seeing patience of the scientist. Therefore, they revealed the seamy aspects of life which Victorian England had been studiously ignoring. Henrik Ibsen was a great playwright of the 19th century, and played a large role in the evolution of modern day naturalism/ realism. The setting, detailed stage direction and character description are parts of the naturalistic style. These elements are found greatly in Ibsen's works, especially Hedda Gabler.

Ibsen is Norwegian, so his play is a translated one. He is the father of naturalism. Realism is a close-movement to naturalism. In this play, we have a painting, the hero stands and a forest behind him and a living room, chairs and tables. Everything is common. All of this is the beginning of the naturalistic movement which comes, in the second half of the century. Naturalism takes its roots from earlier drama. It is taken from the Bourgeois drama. In naturalistic drama, there are no soliloquies. The audience should interpret everything in it.

The influence of Ibsen on drama makes him one of the main founders of Naturalism. That is, he changes the whole concept of drama from being escapist to expressing social and psychological problems. Ibsen's interest is in social problems from which thesis plays takes its ideas, but his plays were said to have been written to reinforce the feminine movement. Yet, he did not believe in institutions and any political parties or social campaigns. His main focus was on the individual and presenting real life characters and their psychological depth.. His focus was not on the social environment, but on the individual and its interaction with social life. He had faith in human beings like many naturalists; he was interested in the influence of the environment and heredity and how these two interact to shape the character of individual. He studied psychological motivation and their internal conflict as well as the conflict between what society expects them to do and their inclinations.

The Naturalistic Setting and Stage Direction : - The first element of naturalism that the audience comes across is the setting. The description of the setting is typical of a middle-class living room. Within this setting, there is the symbolic use of certain Stage props, stage images and metaphors. The stage props are the items which are used as parts of the decoration. They have symbolic significance. They also connote implied meaning which are related to the theme and characters. The stage props are considered to be as element of naturalistic drama which is employed to serve the dramatic idea. One of the stage props is the pistols which belong to her father. Hedda likes practicing shooting because it is related to her social upbringing. She has been brought up by her father who has been a military man. He has taught her to use pistols and ride horses. Thus, she has been brought up to have masculine qualities. She has tendency to rebel against the accepted traditional role of woman. Moreover, the pistols are considered to be an instrument of destruction. She has sadistic nature. Playing with pistols shows her inner desire to be in the world of men. They are symbol of her denied sexuality. The audience has to look at the pistol as a symbol of suicide. She gives a pistol to Lovborg to kill himself. This shows that it is a means of destruction. They symbolize violence as Hedda kills herself by using them in the encl. Another stage prop is her father's portrait which is a symbol of' his masculine and harsh qualities. The picture reminds the reader of the General's strong influence on Hedda's character. Hedda is always seen looking to this picture. He is a military man, so Hedda's upbringing has been affected by his profession. Also, the piano is always associated with the upper classes. It is an item of luxury and not everyone can afford buying it. It belongs to Hedda who is an aristocratic lady. Hedda wants to buy a new one which suits the furniture instead of hers. This tells us about her spending habits; she is spendthrift. There is a reference to a glass-door because she always looks out of it. She looks at life from a directive transparent glass door and this tells us about her character. Hedda always stands beside that door. This reflects her desire to free herself from the chains of her marital life and social rules. She longs for freedom. She wants to get rid of the life of entrapment in Tesman house. The glass door is her only means to look at the outer world. She is not adventurous and she watches life, but she doesn't take the initiative or a step in controlling her life. She is not happy when she looks out of the glass door. The stage figurative image of the autumn and the falling leaves express Hedda's inner feelings. It is like a death wish; she is depressed to the extent that she wishes death. Furthermore, the manuscript has a symbolic significance. It stands for the product of the relationship and cooperation between Lovborg and Mrs Elvsted. Mrs Elvsted has external great effort to help Lovborg in writing this manuscript. Therefore, she considers the manuscript to be her baby. Hedda is jealous of Mrs Elvsted; therefore, she plans to destroy the product of the relationship between Mrs Elvsted and Lovborg. She burns the manuscript. The stove is another stage prop. It represents destruction and danger as it contains fire and heat. Fire is always related to Hedda who has destructive motives. She is' going to burn manuscript of Lovborg in order to destroy the fruit of Lovborg and Thea collaboration. This reflects her jealousy and malice. She is motivated by her jealousy to burn the manuscript. Thus, both fire and Hedda has destructive effects.

Naturalistic Division of Acts: - this play does not follow the classical division of the play into five acts. According to Naturalism, this seems to be artificial because in life things happen naturally. What is important is the complication itself. The first act is the exposition and the complication at the same time. The audience gets hints of financial and psychological conflicts and problems from the very beginning. Here, there are two different life styles. There is a warm, intimate and affable relationship between Berta and Miss Tesman as if they are friends. There is not the servant-mistress relationship. Those who belong to the Bourgeois class can discuss the problems with their servants. There is not this pride and formality. Yet, the aristocrats do not even express their problems openly in front of their servants. There were barriers between the different social classes.

Psychological Realism: - In Ibsen's plays, there are no moral lessons. His plays are open-ended and developed into psychological realism. This affects the dialogue and the use of language. His late plays, including Hedda Gabler, are characterized by dramatic shorthand. The language is deceptively simple; it hides more than it shows. Ibsen neither comments on the play nor on his characters. His only comment is that this play is not a thesis one, a part of a social propaganda or a study of the psychology of a criminal. There is not any soliloquy, and the audience is always kept in speculations. The audience has to understand the qualities of the character from the way in which he interacts with the others and from his gestures and facial expressions. The audience tries to get clues that can help analysing the psychology of the characters. The character towards the end analyses itself. Thus, readers should not take everything as face value.

Naturalistic Characters: - Ibsen's characters are very real characters. He focuses on character depth, so he emphasizes characterization and motivity of characters. He is concerned about how they are revealed through their actions and contact with objects around them. You can think of naturalism as an extreme form of realism. They are different interpretation of characters. Characters are to hide something to understand. They are very difficult to understand. Characters avoid the topic they talk about. This is called dramatic short hand. It is a dialogue with a lot of missing words and sentences. This is part of realistic speech. The reader has to guess the missing parts. Ibsen is very objective in portraying Hedda's character and this is part of Naturalism. This play is a very objective portrait of Hedda. Ibsen doesn’t pass a specific judgment on her. The character of Hedda is a complex one, and there is more demand on the part of the audience to judge her and know her motivations behind the actions she does in the play. The social problems on the social background do not concern the audience, but what concerns them is the study of the character and her psychology and motivation. She seems to have many social problems regarding her identity and her role as a woman.

Tesman is an intellectual and academic person. This appears when he comes on stage carrying a suitcase full of books. He is carelessly dressed; he does not care very much about his appearance. This is not his concern; his major concern is studying, reading and collecting books. This is the only thing he is excited about. He is a book worm and even in his honey moon he used to collect books and read them. This quality has both a positive and a negative side. He is a boring and stuffy person. He is thirty-three years old and has a cheerful round face. He wears spectacles and has fair hair and beard. In literature, the fair haired person, whether a man or a woman, is not sexually or physically attractive and is not passionate as well. He is rather stout and not the stereotype of a sportive person. He kept visiting libraries and doing books even in his honeymoon. This means that he is not affectionate at all.

Naturalistic Conflict: - Ibsen also shows the conflict between the individual inclinations and social obligations which is part of the naturalism ideology. Ibsen reveals social conformity imposes certain life style and confinement on people of different social classes, but Ibsen shows that the individuals are sometimes forced by the society to lead a kind of life that they hate in order to, keep the social appearance or prestige. Hedda has married Tesman because he is respectable a person. She is talking about the social role imposed upon her.

A Critique of Character of Hedda Gabler

Hedda enjoys both masculine and feminine traits in her being, which make her entire personality confusing and enigmatic. How can you explain the view?/Hedda Gabler is unique and rebellious, why does she behave so confusingly?/ In "Hedda Gabler" we have reversal of gender role, what purpose it serves in the plot of the play?/Describe the clash of Victorian moralities in Hedda Gabler's: why Hedda is lusty for power?

Henrik Ibsen portrays a microcosm of nineteenth century Norwegian society in his play Hedda Gabler. Hedda, the protagonist, exhibits a mixture of masculine and feminine traits due to her unique upbringing under General Gabler and the social mores imposed upon her. However, although this society venerates General Gabler because of his military status, his daughter Hedda is not tolerated due to her non-conformity to the accepted gender stereotypes.

Hedda's gender-inverted marriage to Jorgen Tesman, her desire for power and her use of General Gabler's pistols are unacceptable in her society and motif of "One doesn't do such a thing!" that is alluded to during the play and expounded upon Hedda's death that shows that Hedda's uncertain stance between masculine and feminine gender roles and their associated traits is not tolerated by her society. Ibsen employs a reversal of traditional gender roles within Hedda and Jorgen Tesman's marriage to emphasise Hedda's masculine traits. Hedda displays no emotion or affection towards her husband Jorgen. This appearance of indifference is a trait that is usually common to men:

> Tesman: "My old morning shoes. My slippers look!...I missed them dreadfully. Now you should see them, Hedda."
> Hedda: "No thanks, it really doesn't interest me".

In another gender role reversal, Hedda displays a financial awareness, which her husband, Jorgen does not possess. Although Brack corresponds with Tesman about his honeymoon travels, he corresponds with Hedda concerning the financial matters. This is a role that is usually reserved for men. Hedda does not only display traits, which are definitively masculine, or feminine, she also objects to and often defies the conventions established for her gender by society. She rejects references to her pregnancy as a reminder of her gender:

> Tesman: "Have you noticed how plump (Hedda's) grown, and how well she is? How much she's filled out on our travels?"
> Hedda: "Oh be quiet!"

Hedda is reminded not only of her feminine role of mother and nurturer here, but also as wife and "appendage" to Tesman: "And to think is was you who carried off Hedda Gabler! The lovely Hedda Gabler! now that you have got the wife your heart was set on." As a woman of the haute bourgeoisie, Hedda is "sought after" and "always had so many admirers" and has been "acquired" by Tesman as hide wife. Hedda resents the gender conventions that dictate that she now "belongs" to the Tesman family - a situation that would not occur were she a man:

> Tesman: "Only it seems to me now that you belong to the family..."
> Hedda: "Well, I really don't know..."

Although these traits displayed by Hedda are masculine, they are not those, which her society cannot tolerate. To entertain herself in her "boring" marriage she plays with her father's, General Gabler's, pistols:

Hedda: "Sometimes I think I only have a talent for one thing...boring myself to death!" "I still have one thing to kill time with. My pistols, Jorgen. General Gabler's pistols"

> Jorgen: "For goodness' sake! Hedda darling! Don't touch those dangerous things! For my sake, Hedda!"

These pistols are a symbol of masculinity and are associated with war, a pastime that women are excluded from other than in the nurturing role of nurses and are thus not tolerated by society. Tesman implores Hedda to cease playing with them, but even his "superior" position, as her husband does not dissuade Hedda, who is found to be playing with them by Brack at the beginning of act two. Brack also reminds Hedda of the inappropriate nature of her "entertainment" and physically takes the pistols away from Hedda.

> Hedda: "I'm going to shoot you sir!"
> Brack: "No, no, no! Now stop this nonsense!" taking the pistol gently out of her hand. If you don't mind, my dear lady.... Because we're not going to play that game anymore today."

As a parallel to Hedda's masculine game of playing with General Gabler's pistols, Hedda plays the traditionally female role of a "minx" with Brack.

> Hedda: "Doesn't it feel like a whole eternity since we last talked to each other?"
> Brack: "Not like this, between ourselves? Alone together, you mean?"
> Hedda: "Yes, more or less that"
> Brack: "Here was I, every blessed day, wishing to goodness you were home again"

Hedda: "And there was I, the whole time, wishing exactly the same" At the beginning of act two, Hedda encourages Brack's flirtation with her by telling him the true nature of her marriage to Tesman that it is a marriage of convenience:

> Brack: "But, tell me...I don't quite see why, in that case...er..."
> Hedda: "Why Jorgen and I ever made a match of it, you mean? "I had simply danced myself out, my dear sir. My time was up."

Brack is emboldened by Hedda's seeming availability and pursues the notion of a "triangular relationship" with Hedda. Not only does Hedda's "coquettish" behaviour towards Brack exhibits the feminine side of her nature, it also demonstrates that in some instances she conforms to society's expectations of females. Hedda's reference to "(her) time (being) up" shows the socially accepted view that women must marry, because they are not venerated as spinsters.

By conforming to this aspect of her society's mores and marrying before she becomes a socially unacceptable spinster, Hedda demonstrates that she is undeniably female and accepts this. Hedda's constantly seeks power over those people she comes in contact with. As a woman, she has no control over society at large, and thus seeks to infl she comes into contact with in an emulation of her father's socially venerated role as a general. Hedda pretends to have been friends with Thea in order to solicit her confidence:

Thea: "But that's the last thing in the world I wanted to talk about!"
Hedda: "Not to me, dear? After all, we were at school together.
"Thea: "Yes, but you were a class above me. How dreadfully frightened of you I was in those days!"

Once Hedda learns of Thea's misgivings about Lovborg's newfound resolve, she uses it to destroy their "comradeship".

Hedda: "Now you see for yourself! There's not the slightest need for you to go about in this deadly anxiety..." Lovborg: "So it was deadly anxiety ...on my behalf."
Thea: "Softly and in misery] Oh, Hedda! How could you?"
Lovborg: "So this was my comrade's absolute faith in me."

Hedda then manipulates Lovborg, by challenging his masculinity, into going to Brack's bachelor party and resuming his drunken ways of old. Hedda's "reward" for this is to find that Lovborg's manuscript, his and Thea's "child" falls into her hands, where she burns it, thus destroying the child and alto the relationship, both of which Hedda was jealous of. Similarly, Hedda seeks to push her husband, Jorgen, into politics: "(I was wondering) whether I could get my husband to go into politics..." This would raise Hedda's social standing and allow her to attain and maintain power. Hedda's manipulation of people in order to attain power is a trait that is stereotypically predominant in men.

The society of nineteenth century Norway venerates the image of submissive, static passive and pure women. Roles of power are normally allocated to men in such a society. The society in Hedda Gabler demonstrates its intolerance of Hedda's masculine behaviour by contributing to her death. Hedda is found to be playing with her pistols in Act II by Brack. After disgracing himself and returning to his "immoral" ways at Hedda's behest, Lovborg is manipulated by Hedda into "taking his life beautifully" and she gives him one of General Gabler's pistols. However Lovborg dies from an accidental wound to the stomach rather than a patrician death from a bullet to the head and Brack, utilising his position of power within the judicial system, sees the pistol that he accidentally killed himself with. Recognising it as being General Gabler's pistol, he returns to Hedda to stake his claim. Hedda refuses to be in the power of Brack, she had been "heartily thankful that (he had) no power over (her)" however, her fear is realised as Brack attempts to force his way into a "triangular relationship" with Hedda (and Tesman)in return for not exposing the scandal that she had provided Lovborg with the instrument of his death. Hedda is "as fearful of scandal as all that" and takes her life, ironically avoiding the scandal surrounding Lovborg's death and yet causing a scandal concerning her own. Hedda's masculine preference for the pistols to any feminine task of housekeeping and her fear of scandal due to not conforming with society's accepted gender roles leads her to kill herself, thus demonstrating that things which "one doesn't do" are not tolerated by her society of nineteenth century Norway.

Mrs Elvsted as a foil to Hedda

Difference of Class and Life: - In Hedda Gabler, both Hedda and Mrs Elvsted represents two distinctive approaches to life and belong to two different social classes. Through the representation of both characters, Ibsen shows a variety of different reactions towards social obligations and conventions. That is, he introduces Mrs Elvsted as a foil to Hedda, putting her attitudes towards life and beliefs in contrast with Hedda's stress their distinguished personal qualities.

Physical Difference: - Physically, Hedda and Mrs Elvsted looks different to some extent. Hedda looks the particular feminine beauty and charm. Her pale and opaque complexion shows that she is introvert. She seems as if she wears a mask which conceals her feelings. Her evasive manner does not really show what lies in her mind. Also, her steel-gray eye expresses a cold, unruffled repose. That is, Hedda is not very affable and impenetrable in sight. Her features, impression and dress shows that she is an aristocratic lady. In contrast with Hedda, Mrs Elvsted has more pretty features than Hedda. Her eyes are attractive, but gives an inquiry expression showing her curiosity. While Hedda hair is neat and attractive without being conspicuous, thus confirming her outwardly as a model of social appropriateness, Mrs Elvsted's hair is excessive in every respect. It has an unusual colour almost flaxen and is unusually abundant and wavy. It is hair of that kind that does not conform to any social norms. Hedda recalls Mrs Elvsted as "the girls with the irritating hair, that she was always showing off." Hedda's envy of her spontaneity and non-conformity finds its clearest expression in her threat to burn her hair off.

Social Stats: - Regarding their social milieu, Hedda is dependent while Mrs Elvsted is independent and capable of work. Hedda has been given upper-class upbringing to be dependent on men, based on the assumption that she will never have to support herself. This is why she accepts Tesman's proposal. On the other hand, Thea enters the scene as a daughter of the lower middle class who is obliged to work to provide her requirement. She has worked as a governess in the house of a magistrate. This is seen through her dress which is not in the latest fashion.

Difference in Behaviour: - Both Hedda and Mrs Elvsted also differ in their degree of formality and subtlety. Hedda is very formal and artificial in her behaviour. She opposes intimacy and informality due to the morals and traditions of her social class. She offends and embarrasses Mrs Tesman when she meets her coldly. She shows that Miss Tesman has visited them very early. When Tesman asks her to come and see the slippers she rejects his demand aloofly. She is indifferent to his hobbies and interests. It has been threatening for her to share a special intimacy with Lovborg, so she breaks off their relationship, and threatens to shoot him with her father's pistols. On the other hand, Mrs Elvsted is spontaneous and emotional. She loves Lovborg and exerts great effort to attract him to her. She pursues him to keep herself close to her lover. While Hedda is reserved and shrewd Mrs Elvsted is spontaneous and simple-minded. Hedda wants to realise the truth of Mrs Elvsted and Lovborg's relationship. She acts the role of an interrogator who questions Mrs Elvsted and manages to extract a confession from her that she is in love with Lovborg. It is clear that Hedda is a smarter than Mrs Elvsted who is easily manipulated by Hedda and submits to her authority.

Influence on Lovborg: - Both Hedda and Mrs Elvsted have different influence on Lovborg. On the one hand, Hedda represents Lovborg's muse, and she likes to be his hidden source of inspiration. When he comes to her house, she manipulates him to prove that she still has authority over him. She offers him a glass of punch, but he refuses. The manhood in the presence of Thea till he becomes nervous and drinks two glasses. She manages to break the bond of trust between him and Thea. On the other hand, Mrs Elvsted tries to reclaim Lovborg to make him give up his bohemian manner and misconduct. She is worried about his health, conduct and integrity, and encourages him to write his book. The manuscript is the fruit of her cooperation with Lovborg. Hedda considers Lovborg to be her idol of which she is so confident. Yet, Thea is aware of his human weakness and afraid that he may fall into temptation.

Marriage: - The marriages of Thea and Hedda have an obvious parallel, but the contrast is in the methods they take to dissolve them. Like Hedda, Thea has made a loveless marriage, a marriage of convenience. Both are fed up with their husband's neglect. However, Thea asserts her individuality, renounces a distasteful marriage, and gain freedom. Unlike Hedda, she has no fear of gossip and scandal. "I have done nothing, but what I had to do," she says simply when speaking of having left her husband. Any struggle between these two women, one simple but action-minded, the other intelligent but incapable of action, must result in defeat for Hedda. Thea is labelled by Lovborg as "stupid", but she recognizes her individual rights and acts accordingly.

Conclusion: - Mrs Elvsted is set up, thematically and descriptively, in contrast to Hedda. Thea has abundant, curly golden hair versus Hedda's sparse brown hair. She has willingness to ignore conventional standard for the man she loves versus Hedda's inability either to love or to ignore conventions. Thea is conspicuously successful in the areas where Hedda fails. Generally, she is seen as the "good woman" opposed to Hedda's evil.

Role and Character of Judge Brack

To what extant Judge Brack is responsible for the tragedy of Hedda?

Brack is a judge of relatively inferior rank. He is a friend of both Tesman and Hedda, and he visits their house regularly. He has connections around the city, and is often the first to give Tesman information about alterations in the possibility of his professorship. He seems to enjoy meddling in other people's affairs. He is a worldly and cynical man. On certain occasions he seems to represent the whole society of the time, his opportunism, meanness, and blackmailing and lusty love aspiration make him an epitome of society.

Brack strikes as a very immoral man from the very beginning, due to the aplenty advances he made towards Hedda. He had always subtlety hinted that he thought that Hedda might like “a new responsibility” and most importantly, that he will “fight for the end, for the “triangle” to be “fortified and defended by mutual consent.”

To flirt with an unwed lady is one thing. But to be thoroughly suggestive of certain immoral acts to a legally wed lady would seem to be a moral crime. A crime, which would deem Brack as an immoral judge, which is juxtaposition in the phrase itself. The depraved misdeed was too much to expect from a judge, much less to say the way that he had insinuated himself into the household of a married couple.

Brack’s manipulative nature can perhaps be considered the most powerful tool that he has, to be able to control people at his beck and call. The way he withholds his information, only to disseminate it at an 'appropriate' time, when it will hit the victim the hardest, shows how well he can play the psychological game. He was apparently so good at calculating his steps that he was able to have Hedda exclaim with pain that she is "in your powers, Mr. Brack. From now on, I'm at your mercy." He played his last hand of the pack very well, henceforth gaining control over Hedda almost at once, after we have seen her authoritative throughout the plot. The unexpected twist of events, definitely illustrates an element of surprise for the reader.

Nothing much can be mentioned or commented about Brack, except that he seems to be a guru at the game at which both he and Hedda seemed to be indulged in. His callous ways together with his tricky language have caused the one all mighty Hedda to fall prey to him, exposing the extent of his scheming nature to the reader. It certainly allows the reader to realize his true nature and to confirm the suspicions of Brack's ulterior motives.

The presence of Brack alone is enough to allow Tesman appear trivial and ridiculous. His language as compared to Tesman seemed to have many underlying meanings, while Tesman's, for an academic, seems rather superficial. Tesman, being a worrywart, starts to fret like a young lady when informed that his appointment might not come. He "clasps his hands together" and "flings his arms about" asking his "dearest Hedda, how can you (she) take it all so calmly." Brack on the other hand, being the surely and confident self tries to comfort him by telling him that he will "most probably get it" but "only after a bit of competition". Brack's calm composure and surely words certainly outweigh Tesman's unnecessary gestures and fretful language. The vulnerability of Tesman and Hedda's marriage has also clearly been brought out by the intrusion of Brack. The fact that Hedda would "clasp her hand at the back of her neck, lean back in the chair and look at him" indicates how comfortable she feels with Brack. The stichomythia in their speeches also brings out the level of intimacy the both of them share as seen by the quote "Brack: A trusted and sympathetic friend…Hedda: …who can converse on all manners of lively topics… Brack:… and who's not in the least academic" It shows how well they complement each other, finishing each other's thoughts as though they were in a relationship themselves. As Hedda could easily pour out her woes to a man other than her husband gives an indication of how sterile her marriage with Tesman was. So unfruitful that they had absolutely no proper communications between husband and wife that Hedda was glad to have a friend who could converse with her.

Hedda Gabler: A Modern Tragedy

Henrik Ibsen's Hedda Gabler is a definitive look at social conditions involving women at the turn of the Century. His title character is a complex individual who is driven to destruction by her great desires. Hedda epitomizes women of that time period by their dependency on social convention, and she is motivated to do so many things but unfortunately is without the courage to act upon them.

There are many elements used by Ibsen to depict a tragic hero, and therefore a tragic play. For example, the reader sees a specific worldview, a main character of noble birth, and both concepts of the hamartia and peripetia which are vital to the tragic plot. This raises the question of whether this work can be considered a tragedy. Critics have continuously debated this issue, even since it was written in 1890. Many thought the character of Hedda to be too unrealistic, thus the play melodramatic rather than tragic. However, through the elements mentioned above and by using literary techniques such as symbolism and irony, Ibsen succeeds in creating this timeless tragedy.

Dependency between Genders: - Firstly, Ibsen creates a specific worldview to his audience, and he does this by suggesting a mirror dependency between genders. The male characters in this play are dependent on women, and the women are dependent on social conventions. Jorgen Tesman, Hedda's vacant minded husband is dependent on his Aunt Juliane whereas Hedda is constantly restrained by her reliance on her 'what would other think/say' mentality. The female characters of this play are dependent on the fact that others depend on them, and Rina is a striking symbol of this very fact. She symbolizes the vulnerability of everyman being the invalid that she is thus projecting Ibsen's idea that everybody is dependant in some way. This viewpoint is extremely accurate in describing women's roles in European society in both the 1800's and present day. Men are generally viewed as the bread winners, who come home after a hard day at work expecting to be taken care of by their wives. Women on the other hand, are expected to be seen and not heard, keeping both the house and family name intact.

The Character of Hedda: - Secondly, the author has created a character of noble birth, another important characteristic of a tragic play. Evidence of Hedda's nobility is found in the conversation between Aunt Julie and the servant Bertha. Julie is reminiscing about Hedda riding by with her father, obviously an important general of some kind. There is a portrait of General Gabler that hangs above the sofa, and the reference to the guns that he has left his daughter represent something with a much deeper meaning. The guns are kept in the back room along with the piano and writing desk, every outlet of energy for her. This symbolizes the entrapment that Hedda feels in marrying a man that is perhaps in a lower social class, and it is this background that leads directly to her hamartia, rather the decision that leads her to a tragic end and perhaps one of the more important factors in categorizing this play as a tragedy.

Hedda's Rash Judgments: - Hedda makes quite a few rash judgments throughout the course of this play so it is difficult to pinpoint which one to be the most detrimental. There is her decision to hold on to Eilert Lövborg's manuscript, to give him the gun that would be the cause of his accidental death, and the final, fatal choice to end her life. However, none of these errors in judgment seem as harsh as one that the audience doesn't even witness, that being her marriage to Tesman. Hedda was nearing her thirtieth birthday and felt pressured to get married, so she entered into a union with a man she didn't love. She thought he was destined for greatness in his becoming a professor, but has merely set herself up for disappointment when she sees his true nature. As a result we see the entrapment that Hedda feels, a feeling that leads to her demise.

Use of Peripetia: - Lastly, the audience sees the use of peripetia, the concept that suggests that the progression of a tragic character will lead them to a reversal: that they get what they want, but what they want is destructive. This is perhaps central to this play, for it is this that truly defines Hedda Gabler as a tragic character. Hedda's motivation in this play is to control somebody's destiny, and preferably male. Hedda wants to live vicariously through Lövborg, and so to some extent she does get what she wants, but the outcome is disastrous. The moment that Hedda has control of Eilert is when she gives him the gun encouraging him to kill himself, without coming out and saying so. This is what clinches Lövborg for he feels that he is no longer useful, exemplifying his dependence on women. Th obvious when Brack tells her that Eilert has been accidentally killed and the audience sees that Hedda truly is a destructive character. This reversal is extremely ironic in terms that she wanted Lövborg to be a real man (as opposed to her husband who behaves according to his infantile dependency) and at the end we discover that Lövborg dies due to an injury that robs him of his every manliness.

Conclusion: - The complexities of Hedda and the rest of characters in this play are all puppets of Ibsen's view and mentality. He creates a vivid picture of a woman who is socially tortured beyond her control, and she eventually is led to the tragic end of what was presumably a tragic life. Through his literary techniques and tragic elements, Ibsen creates a tragic masterpiece of his time, and one that could well be applied to this time. She portrays women in society so afraid of social scandal, and she was willing to avoid one at all costs. This is another example of irony because during that time women like Hedda did not commit suicide, and therefore in choosing to end her life she creates something to talk about. This is ironic for the simple fact that her death arose out of a situation that she so desperately tried to avoid.

Hedda Gabler: Reversal of Traditional Gender Roles

"The play Hedda Gabler is the product of a mind deeply preoccupied with the nature of power, particularly the power of one mind to influence and impose itself upon others".

Henrik Ibsen portrays a microcosm of nineteenth century Norwegian society in his play Hedda Gabler. Hedda, the protagonist, exhibits a mixture of masculine and feminine traits due to her unique upbringing under General Gabler and the social mores imposed upon her. However, although this society venerates General Gabler because of his military status, his daughter Hedda is not tolerated due to her non-conformity to the accepted gender stereotypes.

Hedda's gender-inverted marriage to Jorgen Tesman, her desire for power and her use of General Gabler's pistols are unacceptable in her society and motif of "One doesn't do such a thing!" that is alluded to during the play and expounded upon Hedda's death that shows that Hedda's uncertain stance between masculine and feminine gender roles and their associated traits is not tolerated by her society.

Ibsen employs a reversal of traditional gender roles within Hedda and Jorgen Tesman's marriage to emphasize Hedda's masculine traits. Hedda displays no emotion or affection towards her husband Jorgen. This appearance of indifference is a trait that is usually common to men:

> Tesman: My old morning shoes. My slippers look!…I missed them dreadfully. Now you should see them, Hedda.
> Hedda: No thanks, it really doesn't interest me.

In another gender role reversal, Hedda displays a financial awareness, which her husband, Jorgen does not possess. Although Brack corresponds with Tesman about his honeymoon travels, he corresponds with Hedda concerning the financial matters. This is a role that is usually reserved for men.

Hedda does not only display traits, which are definitively masculine, or feminine, she also objects to and often defies the conventions established for her gender by society. She rejects references to her pregnancy as a reminder of her gender:

> Tesman: Have you noticed how plump (Hedda's) grown, and how well she is? How much she's filled out on our travels?
> Hedda: Oh be quiet!

Hedda is reminded not only of her feminine role of mother and nurturer here, but also as wife and "appendage" to Tesman. As a woman of the haute bourgeoisie, Hedda is "sought after" and "always had so many admirers" and has been "acquired" by Tesman as his wife. Hedda resents the gender conventions that dictate that she now "belongs" to the Tesman family – a situation that would not occur were she a man.

> Tesman: Only it seems to me now that you belong to the family…
> Hedda: Well, I really don't know…

Although these traits displayed by Hedda are masculine, they are not those, which her society cannot tolerate. To entertain herself in her "boring" marriage she plays with her father, General Gabler's pistols.

> Hedda: Sometimes I think I only have a talent for one thing…boring myself to death! I still have one thing to kill time with. My pistols, Jorgen. General Gabler's pistols.
> Tesman: For goodness' sake! Hedda darling! Don't touch those dangerous things! For my sake, Hedda!

These pistols are a symbol of masculinity and are associated with war, a pastime which women are excluded from other than in the nurturing role of nurses and are thus not tolerated by society. Tesman implores Hedda to cease playing with them, but even his "superior" position as her husband does not dissuade Hedda, who is found to be playing with them by Brack at the beginning of act two. Brack also reminds Hedda of the inappropriate nature of her "entertainment" and physically takes the pistols away from Hedda.

> Hedda: I'm going to shoot you sir!
> Brack: No, no, no!…Now stop this nonsense! (taking the pistol gently out of her hand). If you don't mind, my dear lady.…Because we're not going to play that game any more today.

As a parallel to Hedda's masculine game of playing with General Gabler's pistols, Hedda plays the traditionally female role of a "minx" with Brack.

> Hedda: Doesn't it feel like a whole eternity since we last talked to each other?
> Brack: Not like this, between ourselves? Alone together, you mean?
> Hedda: Yes, more or less that.
> Brack: Here was I, every blessed day, wishing to goodness you were home again.
> Hedda: And there was I, the whole time, wishing exactly the same.

At the beginning of act two, Hedda encourages Brack's flirtation with her by telling him the true nature of her marriage to Tesman that it is a marriage of convenience:

Brack: But, tell me…I don't quite see why, in that case…er…

Hedda: Why Jorgen and I ever made a match of it, you mean? I had simply danced myself out, my dear sir. My time was up.

Brack is emboldened by Hedda's seeming availability and pursues the notion of a "triangular relationship" with Hedda. Not only does Hedda's "coquettish" behaviour towards Brack exhibits the feminine side of her nature, it also demonstrates that in some instances she conforms to society's expectations of females. Hedda's reference to "(her) time (being) up" shows the socially accepted view that women must marry, because they are not venerated as spinsters. By conforming to this aspect of her society's mores and marrying before she becomes a socially unacceptable spinster, Hedda demonstrates that she is undeniably female and accepts this.

Hedda constantly seeks power over those people she comes in contact with. As a woman, she has no control over society at large, and thus seeks to influence the characters she comes into contact with in an emulation of her father's socially venerated role as a general. Hedda pretends to have been friends with Thea in order to solicit her confidence:

Thea: But that's the last thing in the world I wanted to talk about!

Hedda: Not to me, dear? After all, we were at school together.

Thea: Yes, but you were a class above me. How dreadfully frightened of you I was in those days!

Once Hedda learns of Thea's misgivings about Lövborg's newfound resolve, she uses it to destroy their "comradeship".

Hedda: Now you see for yourself! There's not the slightest need for you to go about in this deadly anxiety…

Lövborg: So it was deadly anxiety …on my behalf.

Thea: (softly and in misery) Oh, Hedda! How could you!

Lövborg: So this was my comrade's absolute faith in me.

Hedda then manipulates Lövborg, by challenging his masculinity, into going to Brack's bachelor party and resuming his drunken ways. Hedda's "reward" for this is to find that Lövborg's manuscript, his and Thea's "child" falls into her hands, where she burns it, thus destroying the child and also the relationship, both of which Hedda was jealous of.

Similarly, Hedda seeks to push her husband, Jorgen, into politics: "(I was wondering) whether I could get my husband to go into politics…" This would raise Hedda's social standing and allow her to attain and maintain power. Hedda's manipulation of people in order to attain power is a trait that is stereotypically predominant in men. The society of nineteenth century Norway venerates the image of submissive, static passive and pure women. Roles of power are normally allocated to men in such a society.

The society in Hedda Gabler demonstrates its intolerance of Hedda's masculine behavior by contributing to her death. Hedda is found to be playing with her pistols in act two by Brack. After disgracing himself and returning to his "immoral" ways at Hedda manipulated by Hedda into "taking his life beautifully" and she gives him one of General Gabler's pistols. However Lövborg dies from an accidental wound to the stomach rather than a patrician death from a bullet to the head and Brack, utilizing his position of power within the judicial system, sees the pistol that he accidentally killed himself with. Recognizing it as being General Gabler's pistol, he returns to Hedda to stake his claim. Hedda refuses to be in the power of Brack, she had been "heartily thankful that (he had) no power over (her)" however, her fear is realized as Brack attempts to force his way into a "triangular relationship" with Hedda (and Tesman) in return for not exposing the scandal that she had provided Lövborg with the instrument of his death. Hedda is "as fearful of scandal as all that" and takes her life, ironically avoiding the scandal surrounding Lövborg's death and yet causing a scandal concerning her own. Hedda's masculine preference for the pistols to any feminine task of housekeeping and her fear of scandal due to not conforming with society's accepted gender roles leads her to kill herself, thus demonstrating that things which "one doesn't do" are not tolerated by her society of nineteenth century Norway.

Hedda's Suicide : A Reasonable Act?

In the late nineteenth century, the forces of capitalism and colonialism that shaped European society were veiled in doubt by the evolution of several new ways of thinking. In France, the beginnings of the impressionist movement reformed art, drama and literature by questioning the long-standing tradition of realism.

In central Europe, Sigmund Freud's revolutionary science of psychoanalysis gained momentum; changing the way people related to each other and paving the way for surrealist art and progress of alternative thinking. Finally, Karl Marx's promotion of social systems which were alternative to the dominant capitalism of the time raised peoples' awareness of the severe injustices their new way of living had created.

It was in this social milieu that Henrik Ibsen turned for a final time to write a play with a particular social agenda. In his effort to comment on events around him and assess the impact of society's new ideologies on a specific echelon of society, Hedda Gabler was born.

The title of the play is the maiden name of its protagonist. The audience is invited into Hedda's new home in Norway shortly after she has returned from honeymoon with George Tesman, a scholar of Middle Ages history. In the introductory conversation between George and their maid, Bertha, we are introduced to Hedda's upbringing which is to play a crucial role in events to come. With the renowned General Gabler as a parent, Hedda was conditioned for a life of independence, entertainment and decadence. After her father dies and her life of horseback riding comes to an end, Hedda slowly realises that her society will not let her live in the way she would like.

As a bourgeoisie woman, taking up a job is both awkward and very difficult for Hedda. Hedda has little choice: she must marry if she wants to have any chance of supporting the extravagant way of living to which she had become accustomed.

In George Tesman, Hedda found both the perfect solution of her situation and the inevitable curse of boredom and discontentment. George, brought up by his Aunts, is as conventional and colourless as his name suggests. His conversation is trite, and he is completely oblivious to the subtlety; failing to notice Aunt Julie's suggestive questions about Hedda's pregnancy. He is dedicated to his studies, having spent his honeymoon researching "marvellous old documents that nobody knew existed".

It would have been very dangerous for Hedda to pass up George's offer of marriage. With Lövborg and Brack, two men with whom she had relationships in the past, indisposed, doing so would have squandered her opportunity to live comfortably in marriage. Hedda realizes the merit in marrying a man who is to soon become a professor, and feels scared of approaching age and loneliness. Her decision, however, is guided predominantly by the structure of her patriarchal society which dictates that she must depend completely on men and on marriage for her future happiness.

It is with her marriage to George that Hedda's life of monotony and boredom increasingly strains her personality and livelihood. She declares: "Sometimes I think I only have a talent for one thing… boring myself to death!" and becomes obsessed with the task of finding interest and beauty in her life. The tragedy of Hedda Gabler begins when Hedda is unable to discover these qualities in her own life. She cannot have the fulfilment of a profession - the interest in another world of studies, colleagues and relationships. As an uninfluential member of society, she is not challenged intellectually or socially. Living under a monarch and as a woman in a patriarchal society, she can have no influence on the future of her community. With European countries establishing colonies throughout the world, Hedda realizes the inexorable domination of her society and feels a helpless victim of its hegemony.

To find the interest and beauty she desires, Hedda must turn to others. In her earlier life, she made use of Lövborg to satisfy herself. Often described as Hedda's alter ego, Lövborg had an intense relationship with Hedda during childhood. Hedda was attracted by the "style and Romantic secrecy" and ended the relationship when it threatened to become physical. In a revealing dialogue with Lövborg, Hedda exposes her profound desire for fascination and intrigue in an otherwise uninteresting life:

The reasons for Hedda's suicide are fairly clear, she realised she could not live in a middle-class environment under the threat of Brack revealing the fact that she gave the pistol to Lovborg whilst her husband is wrapped up in a project which does not involve her and it is clear that he is not going to provide her with the attention or standard of living which she was hoping for. Her first environment, materialistic and prestigious, led her to choose her second environment purely on material values. She soon found that she could not move from one environment to the other, and with the added problem of people within her environment who reminded her of her own failings, she simply found she could not cope. It is clear that in another environment, probably a more wealthy one and one in which she received more attention, she could have been happier.

Hedda Gabler: Triangulations between Characters

Relationships are developed throughout the play and it is the breakdown in the relationships with Hedda that lead to the dramatic closure of the play. Hedda initiates one of the triangulations in an attempt to "have power over a human being's fate". Judge Brack creates the second an unsuccessful parallel to Hedda's own power advancing creation. Jorgen Tesman and Thea Elvsted form the last triangulation in an attempt to rebirth Eilert's manuscript.

The first triangular relationship is between Hedda Gabler, Eilert Lövborg and Thea Elvsted. Hedda created this relationship, controlling it by relying heavily on her influence over Eilert. Hedda's power over Eilert are hinted at when Hedda says "So I, poor thing have no power over you at all?" and Eilert replies "Not where that's concerned" Suggesting that Hedda does have power over him in other areas. Tension arises when Hedda becomes jealous of his newfound success without her, she also wishes she was his inspiration.

The relationship between Hedda and Thea is hostile on Hedda's part because Hedda is jealous of Thea, wishing to be the Red headed, pistol wielding "woman standing between Eilert Lövborg and me (Thea)." Hedda is jealous of Thea's beauty, threatening to "... burn it off (Thea's hair)", and her influence over Eilert and his work. The only way Hedda can control Thea is by controlling Eilert and due to Thea's loyalty and devotion consequently control Thea. Thea and Eilert appear to be the perfect combination but tension arises between them as a result of Hedda burning their 'child'.

The second triangulation is created by Judge Brack. It involves Hedda, Jorgen Tesman and Judge Brack. In this triangle, Brack tries unsuccessfully to play a role parallel to Hedda's in the previous triangle. Brack and Hedda are from the same social circle, giving Brack an advantage over Jorgen with Hedda, making him acceptable to her more readily as a result. Jorgen is indebted to Brack but no conflict occurs between these two characters for two reasons: Brack is not looking for a commitment to Hedda and Jorgen is blinded by naiveté. The relationship Brack is working towards is purely plutonic, Hedda tempts him but is unwilling to commit to this relationship. Hedda keeps the sexual tension high and doesn't end her relationship with Brack completely because she believes that as long as she can keep him interested, and at the same time not submit to him, she can stay on top of the power struggle with Brack and manipulate him as well.

The final triangle was mutually formed between Jorgen and Thea to rebirth the 'child' of Eilert and Thea. This triangle includes Jorgen, Thea and Hedda. Hedda is jealous of Thea's Influence over Jorgen and is angry because she is gradually losing her power over Jorgen because of Thea's influence. Hedda and Jorgen obviously had a marriage purely for convenience. Jorgen is not intimate; on his honeymoon he was "rummaging in libraries" and "copying out old parchments". Hedda also denies any feelings for Jorgen refusing the word love saying "don't use that sentimental word", and telling Aunt Juille to "be Quiet" when she mentions anything referring to the baby that links Jorgen and Hedda.

Up until Act Four all of these triangles were controlled by Hedda. Hedda controls the first triangle by controlling Eilert and using alcohol on him to maintain superiority over Thea by lowering Eilert's social standing. Hedda controls the second triangle by not allowing Brack the relationship he yearns for. The third relationship is not active until the end of Act Four. The dramatic closure of the play is not caused by the triangles themselves but the breakdown of Hedda's power base as a result of the conflicts between Hedda and the other characters. After Hedda's prompting "do it beautifully"

Eilert commits suicide. Immediately Hedda is unable to control the first triangle, Eilert is dead and Thea is released from the power hold Hedda had over her. Without the first triangle, Hedda turns to the second for her control, but is shocked when she discovers that Brack knows it was her gun that killed Eilert. Brack abuses his power and uses the information to try to blackmail Hedda into the relationship he has been pushing for. Hed sexual relationship, nor can she refuse, Brack has won the fight for power supremacy in his triangle. Thea and Jorgen decide to recreate the manuscript together, Hedda loses power over Jorgen and the third triangle.

Hedda decides to solve her problem of no power by shooting herself in the temple. Hedda says "I want, for once in my life, to have power over a human being's fate." Hedda still has control over her unborn child's life. Ironically, by killing herself, Hedda destroys the baby and her potential power over it. By killing the baby Hedda, also destroys the link between herself and Jorgen the only person who could/would have saved her. In the destruction of her baby she destroys her future; people will remember Eilert because of his 'child' but there is nothing left to remember Hedda by. The dramatic closure is caused by the destruction of Hedda's power base in the form of triangular relationships; this destruction is caused by her own manipulation of the triangles.

Do you find it so incredible that a young girl, given the chance in secret, should want to be allowed a glimpse into a forbidden world of whose existence she is supposed to be ignorant?

Society demands that Hedda be ignorant of the forbidden world she so desires, and it is because of this suffocation that Hedda's actions become perverted. One outlet for her new boredom is playing with her father's guns – one of few pastimes that seem to give her any satisfaction. After George remarks that they will be unable to afford a riding horse or a butler, Hedda confirms: "…at least I have one thing left to amuse myself with… my pistols, George."

After George and Brack vehemently try to dissuade Hedda from playing with the pistols, we realize that their society considers it inappropriate for a woman to indulge in interests of this nature. Ibsen highlights Hedda's perversion by reversing the gender roles of the married couple. Hedda's horse riding and playing with guns are seen as masculine activities; and she speaks of the financial situation of the family, a role usually reserved for men. Most significantly, she scorns at the thought of being pregnant and rejects the role of childbearing that women would traditionally embrace. "Be quiet! You'll never see me like that!"

Instead, Hedda embraces opportunities to find gratification through people around her. When Brack asks if she could not find a goal to work towards in her life, she responds by suggesting she could get Tesman into politics. At that point, we realise that her idea of finding fulfilment has become completely misguided. Hedda considers the contest between Lövborg and George for the professorship "like a kind of championship match." To Thea Elvsted, she comments: "For once in my life, I want to have power over a human being."

When Judge Brack comes to hold power over Hedda through his knowledge of the burnt manuscript, her quest appears a complete failure. The reality is that, in her society, it is impossible for a woman to hold power over anyone else except through the manipulation of others.

In Lövborg, Hedda sees the opportunity to witness beauty. She envisages Lövborg dying beautifully, "with a crown of vine leaves in his hair, burning and unashamed." She encourages his suicide, handing him a pistol with which to commit the act. Jealous of Lövborg's relationship with Thea and anxious to ensure he will carry out the "beautiful" act, Hedda burns Lövborg's manuscript, the symbol of his relationship with Thea and the product of Thea's inspiration of Lövborg that Hedda envies.

When carrying out these acts, Hedda is continually afraid of scandal. She worries enormously about how society will perceive her actions; an additional pressure with which she has to cope. Her fear of public scrutiny is demonstrated when she questions Thea: "But what do you think people will say?"

Ibsen makes use of the set in Hedda Gabler to illustrate the sum of these pressures on the protagonist. The Tesman's residence is "decorated in dark colours" to create a sombre, melancholy mood. It is full of heavy wood furniture, and is covered with thick carpets. The set is symbolic of the life to which Hedda has committed herself – the death of her extravagant way of living and the start of a life of boredom. In the first two acts, the set is full of sinister bouquets of flowers which Hedda considers oppressive rather than refreshing as we would expect: "The room needs some fresh air. All these flowers!"

Judge Brack describes the smell of the residence as "a bequest from the late Mrs. Falk" – the smell of death already hangs over the characters, and, as the motif of death continues with the passing away of Aunt Rina and the obscure death of Lövborg, we realize that a climax as a result of the pressures placed on the protagonist is inevitable.

It is a culmination of these pressures that forces Hedda to suicide. In the final acts of the play, each one of these pressures grows to new proportions – the ungraceful death of Eilert and George's plan to dedicate his life to the restoration of Lövborg's book place added stress on Hedda. The event which finally impels Hedda to take her own life, though, is the thought of Brack having power over her through his blackmail involving the manuscript and the added grievance of knowing that she would have to spend every evening with the man. Brack ironically remarks: "We'll have great times here together, the two of us!"

Hedda plays a wild tune which is almost as out of place in a household that is mourning as she is out of place in society, and ends her life beautifully with a shot to the temple.

Judge Brack's concluding comment, "But good God! People don't do such things!" establishes the conventionality and rigidity of his contemporary society. In the context of a society which placed significant pressures on women by denying them the life they desired, the outcome is not predictable. In Hedda's case, a combination of pressures from her society and circumstances surrounding her upbringing lead to a perversion of her every action. Her suicide, then, is reasonable because the alternative would have been for Hedda to lead an unsatisfying life, continually restraining her behavior in fear of scandal.

In the late twentieth century, Hedda's life may have been very different. The rise of materialism, technology and a culture of instant satisfaction have contributed to make contemporary society very different from that of the late nineteenth century. Hedda would have been able to develop a career, have a say in the future of her community and would have had suitable channels through which she could satisfy her desire fo in life. Hedda Gabler is an outstanding example of the power of drama to illustrate the relationship between society and its members. Ibsen's timeless reminder of how ordinary lives can be tainted by outside influences makes Hedda Gabler's reasonable suicide a significant one in the study of literature.

Waiting for Godot

Life and Works of Samuel Beckett

Samuel Beckett was born near Dublin, Ireland, on April 13, 1906 into a Protestant, middle class home. His father was a quantity surveyor and his mother worked as a nurse. At the age of 14, he was sent to the same school that Oscar Wilde attended.

Beckett is known to have commented, "I had little talent for happiness." This was evidenced by his frequent bouts of depression, even as a young man. He often stayed in bed until late in the afternoon and hated long conversations. As a young poet, he apparently rejected he advances of James Joyce's daughter and then commented that he did not have feelings that were human. This sense of depression would show up in much of his writing, especially in Waiting for Godot where it is a struggle to get through life.

Samuel Beckett moved to Paris in 1926 and met James Joyce. He soon respected the older writer so much that at the age of 23, he wrote an essay defending Joyce's magnum opus to the public. In 1927, one year later, he won his first literary prize for his poem entitled "Whoroscope." The essay was about the philosopher Descartes meditating on the subject of time and about the transience of life. Beckett then completed a study of Proust that eventually led him to believe that habit was the "cancer of time." At this point Beckett left his post at Trinity College and travelled.

Beckett journeyed through Ireland, France, England, and Germany and continued to write poems and stories. It is likely that he met up with many of the tramps and vagabonds who later emerged in his writing, such as the two tramps Estragon and Vladimir in Waiting for Godot. On his travels through Paris Beckett would always visit with Joyce for long periods.

Beckett permanently made Paris his home in 1937. Shortly after moving there, he was stabbed in the street by a man who had begged him for money. He had to recover from a perforated lung in the hospital. Beckett then went to visit his assailant, who remained in prison. When Beckett demanded to know why the man had attacked him, he replied "Je ne sais pas, Monsieur." This attitude about life comes across in several of the author's later writings.

During World War II, Beckett joined the underground movement in Paris to resist the Germans. He remained in the resistance until 1942 when several members of his group were arrested. Beckett was forced to flee with his French-born wife to the unoccupied zone. He only returned in 1945 after Paris was liberated from the Germans. He soon reached the pinnacle of his writing career, producing Waiting for Godot, Eleutheria, Endgame, the novels Malloy, Malone Dies, The Unnamable, and Mercier et Camier, two books of short stories, and a book of criticism.

Samuel Beckett's first play was Eleutheria, it involved a young man's efforts to cut himself loose from his family and social obligations. This has often been compared to Beckett's own search for freedom. Beckett's great success came on January 5,1953, when Waiting for Godot premiered at the Theatre de Babylon. Although critics labelled the play "the strange little play in which 'nothing happens," it gradually became a success as reports of it spread through word of mouth. It eventually ran for four hundred performances at the Theatre de Babylone and was heralded with critical praise from dramatists such as Tennessee Williams, Jean Anouilh, Thornton Wilder, and William Saroyan. Saroyan even remarked that, "It will make it easier for me and everyone else to write freely in the theatre". An interesting production of "Waiting for Godot" took place when some actors from the San Francisco Actor's Workshop performed the play at the San Quentin penitentiary for over fourteen hundred convicts in 1957. The prisoners immediately identified with both Vladimir and Estragon about the pains of waiting for life to end, and the struggle of the daily existence. The production was perhaps the most Royal Court Theatre in London.

All of Beckett's major works were written in French. He believed that French forced him to be more disciplined and to use the language more wisely. However, Waiting for Godot was eventually translated into the English by Beckett himself.

Samuel Beckett also became one of the first Absurdist playwrights to win international fame. His works have been translated into over twenty languages. In 1969 he received the Nobel Prize for Literature, one of the few times this century that almost everyone agreed the recipient deserved it. He continued to write until his death in 1989, but towards the end he remarked that each word seemed to him "an unnecessary stain on silence and nothingness.

The Theatre of the Absurd

Absurdity is the condition or state in which human beings exist in a meaningless, irrational universe wherein people's lives have no purpose or meaning. 'The Theatre of the Absurd' is a term coined by the critic Martin Esslin for the work of a number of playwrights, mostly written in the 1950s and 1960s. The term is derived from an essay by the French philosopher Albert Camus. In his 'Myth of Sisyphus', written in 1942, he first defined the human situation as basically meaningless and absurd. The 'absurd' plays by Samuel Beckett, Arthur Adamov, Eugene Ionesco, Jean Genet, Harold Pinter and others all share the view that man inhabits a universe with which he is out of key. Its meaning is indecipherable and his place within it is without purpose. He is bewildered, troubled and obscurely threatened.

The origins of the Theatre of the Absurd are rooted in the avant-garde experiments in art of the 1920s and 1930s. At the same time, it was undoubtedly strongly influenced by the traumatic experience of the horrors of the Second World War, which showed the total impermanence of any values, shook the validity of any conventions and highlighted the precariousness of human life and its fundamental meaninglessness and arbitrariness. The trauma of living from 1945 under threat of nuclear annihilation also seems to have been an important factor in the rise of the new theatre.

At the same time, the Theatre of the Absurd also seems to have been a reaction to the disappearance of the religious dimension form contemporary life. The Absurd Theatre can be seen as an attempt to restore the importance of myth and ritual to our age, by making man aware of the ultimate realities of his condition, by instilling in him again the lost sense of cosmic wonder and primeval anguish. The Absurd Theatre hopes to achieve this by shocking man out of an existence that has become trite, mechanical and complacent. It is felt that there is mystical experience in confronting the limits of human condition.

As a result, absurd plays assumed a highly unusual, innovative form, directly aiming to startle the viewer, shaking him out of this comfortable, conventional life of everyday concerns. In the meaningless and Godless post-Second-World-War world, it was no longer possible to keep using such traditional art forms and standards that had ceased being convincing and lost their validity. The Theatre of the Absurd openly rebelled against conventional theatre. Indeed, it was anti-theatre. It was surreal, illogical, conflictless and plotless. The dialogue seemed total gobbledygook. Not unexpectedly, the Theatre of the Absurd first met with incomprehension and rejection.

One of the most important aspects of absurd drama was its distrust of language as a means of communication. Language had become a vehicle of conventionalised, stereotyped, meaningless exchanges. Words failed to express the essence of human experience, not being able to penetrate beyond its surface. The Theatre of the Absurd constituted first and foremost an onslaught on language, showing it as a very unreliable and insufficient tool of communication. Absurd drama uses conventionalised speech, clichés, slogans and technical jargon, which is distorts, parodies and breaks down. By ridiculing conventionalised and stereotyped speech patterns, the Theatre of the Absurd tries to make people aware of the possibility of going beyond everyday speech conventions and communicating more authentically. Conventionalised speech acts as a barrier between ourselves and what the world is really about: in order to come into direct contact with natural reality, it is necessary to discredit and discard the false crutches of conventionalised language. Objects are much more important than language in absurd theatre: what happens transcends what is being said about it. It is the hidden, implied meaning of words that assume primary importance in absurd theatre, over and above what is being actually said. The Theatre of the Absurd strove to communicate an undissolved totality of perception - hence it had to go beyond language.

Absurd drama subverts logic. It relishes the unexpected and the logically impossible. According to Sigmund Freud, there is a feeling of freedom we can enjoy when we are able to abandon the straitjacket of logic. In trying to burst the bounds of logic and language the absurd theatre is trying to shatter the enclosing walls of the human condition itself. Our individual identity is defined by language, having a name is the source of our separateness - the loss of logical language brings us towards a unity with living things. In being illogical, the absurd theatre is anti-rationalist: it negates rationalism because it feels that rationalist thought, like language, only deals with the superficial aspects of things. Nonsense, on the other hand, opens up a glimpse of the infinite. It offers intoxicating freedom brings one into contact with the essence of life and is a source of marvellous comedy.

There is no dramatic conflict in the absurd plays. Dramatic conflicts, clashes of personalities and powers belong to a world where a rigid, accepted hierarchy of values forms a permanent establishment. Such conflicts, however, lose their meaning in a situation where the establishment and outward reality have become meaningless. However perform, this only underlines the fact that nothing happens to change their existence. Absurd dramas are lyrical statements, very much like music: they communicate an atmosphere, an experience of archetypal human situations. The Absurd Theatre is a theatre of situation, as against the more conventional theatre of sequential events. It presents a pattern of poetic images. In doing this, it uses visual elements, movement, light. Unlike conventional theatre, where language rules supreme, in the Absurd Theatre language is only one of many components of its multidimensional poetic imagery.

Existentialism

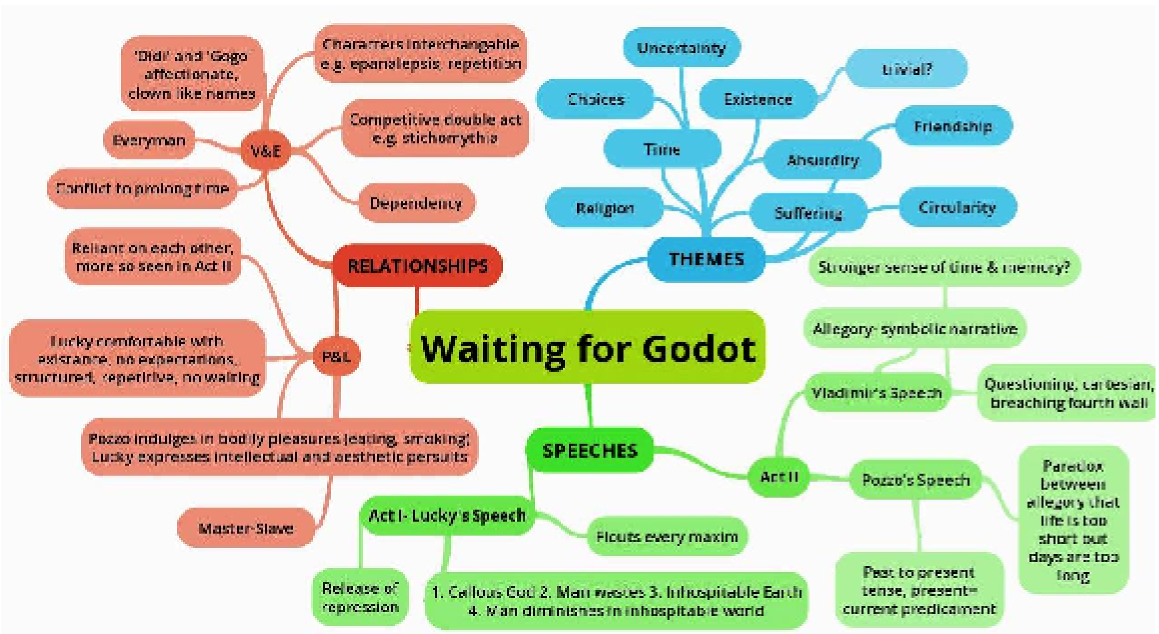
Existentialism is "the philosophy that is centered upon the analysis of existence and of the way human beings find themselves existing in the world". Existentialism ponders the questions: Why do we exist? Why is there suffering? Why do we die?

It is the "dilemma of modern humanity" -"What do I know about man's destiny? I could tell you more about radishes." The Theatre of the Absurd presents an existentialist point of view of the world and reality, and forces the audience to "consider the meaning of their existence in a world where there appears to be no true order or meaning". Driven by the basis of existentialism, it expands the role of philosophy and metaphor in theatrical drama.

Existentialism sprung out directly after the Great Depression and World War Two, a period of despair and hopelessness. It seeks to find and define meaning and identity in a world of chaos and meaninglessness. Existentialism became popular during the Second World War in France, and just after it. French playwrights have often used the stage to express their views, and these views came to surface even during a Nazi occupation. Bernard Shaw got his play Saint Joan past the German censors because it appeared to be very Anti-British. French audiences however immediately understood the real meaning of the play, and replaced the British with the Germans. Those sorts of hidden meanings were common throughout the period so that plays would be able to pass censorship.

Waiting for Godot : Character List

Estragon: - Estragon is one of the two protagonists. He is a bum and sleeps in a ditch where he is beaten each night. He has no memory beyond what is immediately said to him, and relies on Vladimir to remember for him. Estragon is impatient and constantly wants to leave Vladimir, but is restrained from leaving by the fact that he needs Vladimir. It is Estragon's idea for the bums to pass their time by hanging themselves. Estragon has been compared to a body without an intellect, which therefore needs Vladimir to provide the intellect.



Vladimir: - Vladimir is one of the two protagonists. He is a bum like Estragon, but retains a memory of most events. However, he is often unsure whether his memory is playing tricks on him. Vladimir is friends with Estragon because Estragon provides him with the chance to remember past events. Vladimir is the one who makes Estragon wait with him for Mr. Godot's imminent arrival throughout the play. Vladimir has been compared to the intellect which provides for the body, represented by Estragon.

Lucky: - Lucky is the slave of Pozzo. He is tied to Pozzo via a rope around his neck and he carries Pozzo's bags. Lucky is only allowed to speak twice during the entire play, but his long monologue is filled with incomplete ideas. He is silenced only by the other characters who fight with him to take of his hat. Lucky appears as a mute in the second act.

Pozzo: - Pozzo is the master who rules over Lucky. He stops and talks to the two bums in order to have some company. In the second act Pozzo is blind and requires their help. He, like Estragon, cannot remember people he has met. His transformation between the acts may represent the passage of time.

The boy: - The boy is a servant of Mr. Godot. He plays an identical role in both acts by coming to inform Vladimir and Estragon the Mr. Godot will not be able to make it that night, but will surely come the next day. The boy never remembers having met Vladimir and Estragon before. He has a brother who is mentioned but who never appears.

Godot: - The man for whom Vladimir and Estragon wait unendingly. Godot never appears in the play. His name and character are often thought to refer to God.

Waiting for Godot : Summary

Act I

The setting is in the evening on a country road with a single tree present. Estragon is trying to pull off his boot, but without success. Vladimir enters and greets Estragon, who informs him that he has spent the night in a ditch where he was beaten. With supreme effort Estragon succeeds in pulling off his boot. He then looks inside it to see if there is anything there while Vladimir does the same with his hat.

Vladimir mentions the two thieves who were crucified next to Christ. He asks Estragon if he knows the Gospels. Estragon gives a short description of the maps of the Holy Land at which point Vladimir tells him he should have been a poet. Estragon points to his tattered clothes and says he was. Vladimir continues with his narrative about the two thieves in order to pass the time.

Estragon wants to leave but Vladimir forces him to stay because they are both waiting for Godot to arrive. Neither of the two bums knows when Godot will appear, or even if they are at the right place. Later it is revealed that they do not even know what they originally asked Godot for.

Estragon gets bored of waiting and suggests that they pass the time by hanging themselves from the tree. They both like the idea but cannot decide who should go first. They are afraid that if one of them dies the other might be left alone. In the end they decide it is safer to wait until Godot arrives.

Estragon asks Vladimir whether they still have rights. Vladimir indicates that they got rid of them. He then fears that he hears something, but it turns out to be imaginary noises. Vladimir soon gives Estragon a carrot to eat.

Pozzo and Lucky arrive. Lucky has a rope tied around his neck and is carrying a stool, a basket, a bag and a greatcoat. Pozzo carries a whip which he uses to control Lucky. Estragon immediately confuses Pozzo with Godot which gets Pozzo upset.

Pozzo spends several minutes ordering Lucky around. Lucky is completely silent and obeys like a machine. Pozzo has Lucky put down the stool and open the basket of food which contains chicken. Pozzo then eats the chicken and throws away the bones. Lucky stands in a stooped posture holding the bags after each command has been completed and appears to be falling asleep.

Estragon and Vladimir go to inspect Lucky who intrigues them. They ask why he never puts his bags down. Pozzo will not tell them, so Estragon proceeds to ask if he can have the chicken bones that Pozzo has been throwing away. Pozzo tells him that they technically belong to Lucky. When they ask Lucky if he wants them, he does not reply, so Estragon is given the bones.

Pozzo eventually tells them why Lucky hold the bags the entire time. He thinks it is because Lucky is afraid of being given away. While Pozzo tells them why Lucky continues to carry his bags, Lucky starts to weep. Estragon goes to wipe away the tears but receives a terrible kick in the shin.

Pozzo then tells them that he and Lucky have been together nearly sixty years. Vladimir is appalled at the treatment of Lucky who appears to be such a faithful servant. Pozzo explains that he cannot bear it any longer because Lucky is such a burden. Later Vladimir yells at Lucky that it is appalling the way he treats such a good master.

Pozzo then gives an oratory about the night sky. He asks them how it was and they tell him it was quite a good speech. Pozzo is ecstatic at the encouragement and offers to do something for them. Estragon immediately asks for ten francs but Vladimir tells him to be silent. Pozzo offers to have Lucky dance and then think for them.

Lucky dances for them and when asked for an encore repeats the entire dance step for step. Estragon is unimpressed but almost falls trying to imitate it. They then make Lucky think. What follows is an outpouring of religious and political doctrine which always starts ideas but never brings them to completion. The three men finally wrestle Lucky to the ground and yank off his hat at which point he stops speaking. His last word is, "unfinished."

The men then spend some effort trying to get Lucky to wake up again. He finally reawakens when the bags are placed in his hand. Pozzo gets up to leave and he and Lucky depart the scene. Vladimir and Estragon return to their seats and continue waiting for Godot.

A young boy arrives having been sent by Mr. Godot. Estragon is outraged that it took him so long to arrive and scares him. Vladimir cut him off and asks the boy if he remembers him. The boy says this is his first time coming to meet them and that Mr. Godot will not be able to come today but perhaps tomorrow. The boy is sent away with the instructions to tell Mr. Godot that he has seen them. Both Estragon and Vladimir discuss past events and then decide to depart for the night. Neither of them moves from his seat.

Act II

The setting is the next day at the same time. Estragon's boots and Lucky's hat are still on the stage. Vladimir enters and starts to sing until Estragon shows up barefoot. Estragon is upset that Vladimir was singing and happy even though he was not there. Both admit that they feel better when alone but convince themselves they are happy when together. They are still waiting for Godot.

Estragon and Vladimir poetically talk about "all the dead voices" they hear. They are haunted by voices in the sounds of nature, especially of the leaves rustling. Vladimir shouts at Estragon to help him not hear the voices anymore. Estragon tries and finally decides that they should ask each other questions. They manage to talk for a short while.

Estragon has forgotten everything that took place the day before. He has forgotten all about Pozzo and Lucky as well as the fact that he wanted to hang himself from the tree. He cannot remember his boots and thinks they must be someone else's. For some reason they fit him now when he tries them on. The tree has sprouted leaves since the night before and Estragon comments that it must be spring. But when Vladimir looks at Estragon's shin, it is still pussy and bleeding from where Lucky kicked him.

Soon they are done talking and try to find another topic for discussion. Vladimir finds Lucky's hat and tries it on. He and Estragon spend a while trading hats until Vladimir throws his own hat on the ground and asks how he looks. They then decide to play at being Pozzo and Lucky, but to no avail. Estragon leaves only to immediately return panting. He says that they are coming. Vladimir thinks that it must be Godot who is coming to save them. He then becomes afraid and tries to hide Estragon behind the tree, which is too small to hide him.

The conversation then degenerates into abusive phrases. Estragon says, "That's the idea, let's abuse each other." They continue to hurl insults at one another until Estragon calls Vladimir a critic. They embrace and continue waiting.

Pozzo and Lucky enter but this time Pozzo is blind and Lucky is mute. Lucky stops when he sees the two men. Pozzo crashes into him and they both fall helplessly in a heap on the ground. Vladimir is overjoyed that reinforcements have arrived to help with the waiting. Estragon again thinks that Godot has arrived.

Vladimir and Estragon discuss the merits of helping Pozzo get off the ground where he has fallen. When Vladimir asks how many other men spend their time in waiting, Estragon replies that it is billions. Pozzo in desperation offers to pay for help by offering a hundred francs. Estragon says that it is not enough. Vladimir does not want to pick up Pozzo because then he and Estragon would be alone again. Finally he goes over and tries to pick him up but is unable to. Estragon decides to leave but decides to stay when Vladimir convinces him to help first and then leave.

While trying to help Pozzo, both Vladimir and Estragon fall and cannot get up. When Pozzo talks again Vladimir kicks him violently to make him shut up. Vladimir and Estragon finally get up, and Pozzo resumes calling for help. They go and help him up. Pozzo asks who they are and what time it is. They cannot answer his questions.

Estragon goes to wake up Lucky. He kicks him and starts hurling abuses until he again hurts his foot. Estragon sits back down and tries to take off his boot. Vladimir tells Pozzo his friend is hurt.

Vladimir then asks Pozzo to make Lucky dance or think for them again. Pozzo tells him that Lucky is mute. When Vladimir asks since when, Pozzo gets into a rage. He tells them to stop harassing him with their time questions since he has no notion of it. He then helps Lucky up and they leave.

Vladimir reflects upon the fact that there is no truth and that by tomorrow he will know nothing of what has just passed. There is no way of confirming his memories since Estragon always forgets everything that happens to him.

The boy arrives again but does not remember meeting Estragon or Vladimir. He tells them it is his first time coming to meet them. The conversation is identical in that Mr. Godot will once again not be able to come but will be sure to arrive tomorrow. Vladimir demands that the boy be sure to remember that he saw him. Vladimir yells, "You're sure you saw me, you won't come and tell me to-morrow that you never saw me!"

The two bums decide to leave but cannot go far since they need to wait for Godot. They look at the tree and contemplate hanging themselves. Estragon takes off his belt but it breaks when they pull on it. His trousers fall down. Vladimir says that they will hang themselves tomorrow unless Godot comes to save them. He tells Estragon to put on his trousers. They decide to leave but again do not move.

Waiting For Godot : Analysis

If there is an absurdity play that has caught the imagination and the admiration of people all over the world then it "Waiting For Godot" written by Samuel Beckett. Beckett had written this in French and he translated it into English as well. It is considered as an important play in the English language. Since there are many loose ends there are many interpretations, the most famous being that he adapted Sigmund Freud's theory into this play. There are two main characters Vladimir and Estragon and they are joined by another two Pozzo and Lucky. Then little boys come in as messengers.

Pozzo and Lucky

All through the play Vladimir and Estragon wait for Godot. Why they wait for him or who he is, is never revealed. The audience has the liberty to come to any kind of conclusion or interpretation. The conversation and action of these two friends are unrelated for most part. There is no rhyme or reason for what is happening; a play that is completely different. Vladimir and Estragon seem to be inseparable friends and they together wait for Godot. While they wait they discuss thieves in the Gospel, they suddenly doubt if they are waiting at the correct place and the correct time.

Suddenly they hear a sound and they huddle together waiting for something to happen. Pozzo and Lucky come on to the stage and Vladimir and Estragon think it is Godot but Pozzo says he is not Godot and then witness how Pozzo treats Lucky, his servant. He is leashed and is treated as an animal. Vladimir reacts strongly to this but soon retreats. He changes his opinion very fast. Estragon eyes the chicken Pozzo is eating and wants the bone but does not get it because Lucky always gets to eat the bone.

First Day Comes To an End

Pozzo, they realize is going to the market to sell Lucky and hearing this Lucky cries as he does not want to leave his master. They then get to see Lucky dance and think. Vladimir and Estragon is not impressed with the dance and to think Lucky has to put the thinking hat. Once the hat is put on Lucky who was silent till then goes to speak gibberish and it goes on non-stop. All the three push him down, take off his hat and trample it to get him to stop talking. Then Pozzo decides to leave but he cannot. So like a runner he goes to the other end of the stage and kick starts from and dashes along the stage driving Lucky also out of the stage.

After they depart Vladimir and Estragon remember that they are waiting for Godot. A boy enters and tells them that Godot asked to pass on the information that he would be coming tomorrow to the same place. They try to get some information about Godot from the boy but they get to know nothing. It becomes dark. Estragon does not want to go but Vladimir thinks each should go separately but finally they go together.

The Wait Continues

The second act opens to the next day but there are trees on the leaves and Vladimir is singing happily. Both are happier without each other but cannot part ways and go. When Vladimir says that things have changed from the previous day, Estragon does not remember the previous day. Vladimir talks about Pozzo and Lucky but Estragon cannot recollect what happened the previous day. He even forgets that had left his boots behind and Vladimir has to show him where his boots were kept. Vladimir confirms that they are in the right place by seeing Lucky's hat.

So many absurd things happen on stage and they are still waiting for Godot and they hear a sound again. It is Pozzo and Lucky again, but this time Pozzo is blind and after some interaction they leave. Pozzo also does not remember having met the previous day. When they request Lucky to sing or recite Pozzo tells Lucky is dumb and they leave the stage. A boy appears and tells them that Godot will come the next day and again the two are left waiting for Godot.

Imagery a Plenty

The 'waiting' which is shown throughout the play is likened to man's perennial waiting for one or the other desired object. Estragon is complaining and sleeping most of the time; Vladimir is also complaining. Man is always complaining and most of the time there is no action on his part to better the situation. Many have likened this drama to Freudian theory of Id, ego and super ego. Estragon represents id, Vladimir ego and Godot super ego.

Id which is the baser nature in man only thinks of physical pleasures and Estragon desires to eat the bone, the carrot; is sleeping all the time and complaining of pains. Ego is slightly elevated but thinks he is the one who is in control of the situation. Vladimir is the one who directs Estragon and he is completely dependent on Vladimir. The super ego control both and that is Godot. Godot is not perceived, yet, all the while they are waiting for Godot and are invisibly controlled by him, the super ego.

All through the play one cannot bring in one sequence of thought. Everything is unrelated and even seems crazy. It can be this style of writing that has made this play so popular. The language is crisp and there are no sermons or value additions to it. This play has touched people interested in theatre all over the world and many small theatre groups have experimented with this play. Stage direction is very simple as it is the same scene in both the acts, the props are simple. Sound and light effects are also to the minimum and this makes this play an easy one to stage. The simplicity in the stage direction coupled with the absurdity of the play must have made this play very popular with theatre lovers.

The Circular Structure of Waiting for Godot

"But what does it all mean?" is the most frequent statement heard after one has seen or finished reading a play from the Theatre of the Absurd movement. Beckett's plays were among the earliest and, therefore, created a great deal of confusion among the early critics.

No definite conclusion or resolution can ever be offered to Waiting for Godot because the play is essentially circular and repetitive in nature. A traditional play, has an introduction of' the characters and the exposition; then, there is a statement of the problem of the play in relationship to its settings and characters. (In Waiting for Godot, we never know where the play takes place, except that it is set on "a country road.") Furthermore, in a traditional play, the characters are developed, and gradually we come to see the dramatist's world view; the play then rises to a climax, and there is a conclusion. This type of development is called a linear development. In the plays of the Theatre of the Absurd, the structure is often exactly the opposite. We have, instead, a circular structure, and most aspects of this drama support this circular structure in one way or another.

The setting is the same, and the time is the same in both acts. Each act begins early in the morning, just as the tramps are awakening, and both acts close with the moon having risen. The action takes place in exactly the same landscape — a lonely, isolated road with one single tree. (In the second act, there are some leaves on the tree, but from the viewpoint of the audience, the setting is exactly the same.) We are never told where this road is located; all we know is that the action of the play unfolds on this lonely road. Thus, from Act I to Act II, there is no difference in either the setting or in the time and, thus, instead of a progression of time within an identifiable setting, we have a repetition in the second act of the same things that we saw and heard in the first act.

More important than the repetition of setting and time, however, is the repetition of the actions. To repeat, in addition to the basic structure of actions indicated earlier — that is:

Vladimir and Estragon Alone
Arrival of Pozzo and Lucky
Vladimir and Estragon Alone
Arrival of Boy Messenger
Vladimir and Estragon Alone

there are many lesser actions that are repeated in both acts. At the beginning of each act, for example, several identical concerns should be noted. Among these is the emphasis on Estragon's boots. Also, too, Vladimir, when first noticing Estragon, uses virtually the same words: "So there you are again" in Act I and "There you are again" in Act II. At the beginning of both acts, the first discussion concerns a beating that Estragon received just prior to their meeting. At the beginning of both acts, Vladimir and Estragon emphasize repeatedly that they are there to wait for Godot. In the endings of both acts, Vladimir and Estragon discuss the possibility of hanging themselves, and in both endings they decide to bring some good strong rope with them the next day so that they can indeed hang themselves. In addition, both acts end with the same words, voiced differently:

ACT I:
Estragon: Well, shall we go?
Vladimir: Yes, let's go.
ACT II:
Vladimir: Well? Shall we go?
Estragon: Yes, let's go.

And the stage directions following these lines are exactly the same in each case: "They do not move."

With the arrival of Pozzo and Lucky in each act, we notice that even though their physical appearance has theoretically changed, outwardly they seem the same; they are still tied together on an endless journey to an unknown place to rendezvous with a nameless person.

Likewise, the Boy Messenger, while theoretically different, brings the exact same message: Mr. Godot will not come today, but he will surely come tomorrow.

Vladimir's difficulties with urination and his suffering are discussed in each act as a contrast to the suffering of Estragon because of' his boots. In addition, the subject of eating, involving carrots, radishes, and turnips, becomes a central image in each act, and the tramps' involvement with hats, their multiple insults, and their reconciling embraces — these and many more lesser matters are found repeatedly in both acts.

Finally, and most important, there are the larger concepts: first, the suffering of the tramps; second, their attempts, however futile, to pass time; third, their attempts to part, and, ultimately, their incessant waiting for Godot — all these make the two acts clearly repetitive, circular in structure, and the fact that these repetitions are so obvious in the play is Beckett's manner of breaking away from the traditional play and of asserting the uniqueness of his own circular structure.

Lucky's Dance and Speech

Lucky's dance is merely a clumsy shuffling, which is a complete disappointment to Vladimir and Estragon. Thus they decide to have Lucky think. They give him his hat, and after protesting Pozzo's brutality, they arrange themselves for Lucky's performance of thinking. It takes the form of a long, seemingly incoherent speech. The speech is delivered as a set piece, yet it is anything but a set piece. Under different directors, this scene can be variously played. For example, Lucky most often speaks directly to the audience with the other characters at his back, while Vladimir and Estragon become more and more agitated as the speech progresses. Often Vladimir and Estragon run forward and try to stop Lucky from continuing his speech. As they try to stop Lucky, he delivers his oration in rapid-fire shouts. At times, Pozzo pulls on Lucky's rope, making it even more difficult for him to continue with his speech. The frenzied activity on the stage, the rapid delivery of the speech, and the jerking of the rope make it virtually impossible to tell anything at all about the speech and, consequently, emphasize the metaphysical absurdity of the entire performance. Lucky's speech is an incoherent jumble of words which seems to upset Vladimir and Estragon, for sporadically both rise to protest some element of the speech. Therefore, the speech does communicate something to the two tramps or else they would not know to protest. The form of the speech is that of a scholarly, theological address, beginning "Given the existence . . . of a personal God," but it is actually a parody of this kind of address since the nonsensical and the absurd elements are in the foreground and the meaningful aspects of it are totally obscured, as is the God whom Lucky discusses. Here, we have a combination of the use of scholastic, theological terminology along with the absurd and the nonsensical. For example, the use of qua (a Latin term meaning "in the function or capacity of") is common in such scholarly addresses, but Lucky's repetition of the term as quaquaquaqua creates an absurd, derisive sound, as though God is being ridiculed by a quacking or squawking sound. Furthermore, the speech is filled with various academic sounding words, some real words like aphasia (a loss of speech; here it refers to the fact that God from his divine heights now has divine aphasia or a divine silence) and some words like apathia or athambia which do not exist (even though apathia is closely aligned to apathy and thus becomes another oblique comment on the apathy of God in the universe). Other absurd terms are used throughout the speech, and there is also a frequent use of words which sound obscene, interspersed throughout the speech. As an example, the names of the scholars Fartov and Belcher are obviously created for their vulgarity.

Therefore, the speech is filled with more nonsense than sense — more that is illogical than that which is logical. If, however, we remove the illogical modifiers, irrelevancies, and incomprehensible statements and place them to the side, the essence of the speech is as follows:

The Essence of Lucky's Speech

"Given [acknowledging] the existence . . . of a personal God ...
[who exists] outside [of] time . . .

[and] who . . .
loves us dearly . . .
and [who] suffers . . .
with those who . . .
are plunged in torment . . .
it is established beyond all doubt . . .
that man . . .
that man . . .
for reasons unknown . . .
for reasons unknown . . .
for reasons unknown . . .
[our] labors abandoned left unfinished . . .
abandoned unfinished . . .

Lucky's speech is an attempt, however futile, to make a statement about man and God. Reduced to its essence, the speech is basically as follows:

acknowledging the existence of a personal God, one who exists outside of time and who loves us dearly and who suffers with those who are plunged into torment, it is established beyond all doubt that man, for reasons unknown, has left his labours abandoned, unfinished.

It is significant that the speech ends at this point because man can make certain assumptions about God and create certain hypotheses about God, but man can never come to a logical conclusion about God. One must finish a discourse about God, as Lucky did, by repeating "for reasons unknown . . . for reasons unknown . . . for reasons unknown . . . ." And equally important is the fact that any statement made about God is, by its nature, lost in a maze of irrelevance, absurdity, and incoherence — without an ending. Therefore, man's final comment about God can amount to nothing more than a bit of garbled noise which contains no coherent statement and no conclusion. Furthermore, Lucky's utterances are stopped only after he is physically overpowered by the others.

After the speech, Pozzo tiles to revive Lucky, who is emotionally exhausted, completely enervated by his speech. After great difficulty, Pozzo gets Lucky up, and amid protracted adieus, he begins to go, albeit he begins to go the wrong way. Pozzo's inability to leave suggests man's reliance upon others and his natural instinct to cling to someone else. But with one final adieu, Pozzo and Lucky depart.

Waiting for Godot : Various Interpretations

A Puzzling Play: - Waiting for Godot is a very puzzling play. Its essential meaning is not quite clear, with the result that different critics have approached it differently and interpreted it in various ways. Unfortunately Beckett himself did not throw much light on the meaning of the play. Under the circumstances each one of us is left to respond to the play in his own way. Each member of the audience is free to pick up the echoes to which he is most attuned. It is noteworthy also that the play has had a widespread appeal and has found acceptance with not only intellectuals but also with average theatre-goers. There is something in the play for almost everybody.

A Picture of Human Attempts to Fiddle through Life: - According to one interpretation of the play, the two tramps are two parts of a person or of a community seen subjectively, with Vladimir representing the more spiritual part and Estragon the animal; and Pozzo and Lucky make up a person or a community viewed objectively, Pozzo being the exploiter and the user of ideas, Lucky the exploited and the creator of ideas. In other words, we suffer with Estragon and Vladimir, their fears, their hopes, their hatreds, and their loves; but we view Pozzo and Lucky through the eyes of the tramps and therefore see in them only the social surface of life. Thus these four characters add up to a picture of humanity at large, and the play is, more than anything else, about the attempts of human beings to fiddle their way through life, setting up a wall of hopes and pretences between themselves and despair. Godot symbolises the greatest of these hopes, namely that there is some point to existence, that we are keeping some mysterious appointment on earth, and are therefore not random scraps of life. It does not matter much who Godot is because the play is not about Godot but, as its title states, about the waiting for him. The play is about life on earth, not hereafter.

A Picture of the Pointlessness of Human Life: - Different from this somewhat positive approach is another which is entirely negative. According to this other interpretation, the play is a fable about a kind of life that has no longer any point. The dramatist wishes to convey to us that life is devoid of action and that human beings have been pulled out of the world and have no longer anything to do with it. The two heroes, or anti-heroes, are merely alive, but no longer living in the world. The world has become empty for them. Where a world no longer exists, there can no longer be a possibility of a collision with the world. In our world today many people have begun increasingly to feel that they live in a world in which they do not or cannot act but are simply acted upon. The play seeks to capture the mood of such people and has therefore a more or less general application. The two tramps are dimly aware of the want of action in their lives and of the pointlessness of their existence. It is another matter that they still want to go on in life. The majority of people in today's world do not after all give up living when their life becomes pointless. The tramps are waiting for nothing in particular. They have even to remind each other of the fact that they are waiting and of what they are waiting for. Thus actually they are not waiting for anything. We need not make much fuss about who or what the expected Godot is. Godot is nothing but a name for the fact that the life which goes on pointlessly is wrongly interpreted to mean waiting for something. May be, the tramps are totally unaware of the pointlessness of their existence, though there are indications to show at least a dim awareness.

A Presentation of the Ordeal of Waiting, Ignorance, Impotence & Boredom: - A more convincing interpretation of the play is that it presents the l futile waiting, the act of waiting as an essential, characteristic aspect of the human condition. Most often people wait for something which does not materialise just as Godot does not materialise. A man may vainly wait for a job, or promotion, or the return of a long-lost child or friend, or a love-letter, or a reunion with a divorced wife, and so on. Vladimir and Estragon by their waiting indefinitely and without any tangible result thus symbolise the millions of human beings who wait for something or other without attaining it. In this sense to the play has a general validity. But the ordeal of waiting is not the only subject of the play. The two tramps do not know who or what Godot is; nor are they sure that they are waiting at the right place or on the right day, or what could happen if they stopped waiting. In other words, the two tramps are lacking in the essential knowledge; they are ignorant. Being ignorant they cannot act and so they are impotent also. Thus the tramps produce in us a sense of baffled helplessness which we experience when forced to remain in a situation which we do not understand and over which we have no control. All that they do is to seek ways to pass the time in the situation in which they find themselves. They tell stories, sing songs, play verbal games, and pretend to be Pozzo and Lucky, do physical exercises. But all these activities are mere stop-gaps serving only to pass the time. Here then we have the very essence of boredom. Thus the play represents not just waiting but also ignorance, impotence, and boredom. Vladimir and Estragon have travelled far towards total nihilism, though they have not fully achieved it. They are in a place and in a mental state in which nothing happens and time stands still. If Godot comes, a new factor may be introduced into their existence, whereas if they leave they will certainly miss him. Their waiting therefore contains an element of vague hope.

The Problem of How to Get through Life: - Beckett had the habit of repeating the same themes and images and even characters from work to work in order perhaps to emphasise the nature of the world as he saw it. In his works, whoever the characters and whatever the situations, there is nothing beyond habit, boredom, forgetfulness and suffering. This is why the many and elaborate interpretations that have been offered of this play seem superfluous. Pozzo and Lucky, for instance, have variously been described as body and intellect, master and slave, capitalist and proletarian, coloniser and colonised, Cain and Abel, sadist and masochist, even Joyce and Beckett. But essentially and more simply, they represent one way of getting through life with someone else, just as Vladimir and Estragon more sympathetically represent another way of doing so. The mysterious Godot is just some diminutive god like all the other little gods—some divine, some political, some intellectual, some personal—for whom men wait, hopefully and in fear, to solve their problems and bring point to their pointless lives, and for whose sake they sacrifice the only real gift they have, namely their free will. When Estragon asks whether he and Vladimir have lost their rights, Vladimir replies that they have got rid of them (the rights). Waiting for Godot is thus the fullest statement of the problem that troubled Beckett. The problem is: how do you get through life? Beckett's answer is simple and depressing: we get through life by force of habit, by going on inspite of boredom and pain, by talking, by not listening to the "silence", absurdly and without hope. The two tramps in this play, with their boredom, their fear of pain, their shreds of love and hate, are a surprisingly effective version of the whole human condition—a condition for which action is no answer, chiefly because there is no obvious action to be taken: "Nothing to be done." In other words Beckett comes to a nihilistic conclusion. The play also conveys the idea that our everyday existence is nothing but playing of games, clown-like, without real consequence, springing solely from the vain hope that it will make time pass. Our daily activities are similar to Estragon's meaningless action in taking off his shoes and putting them on.

The Religious Theme: - Some critics have found a religious meaning in the play and it is not difficult to see why. Vladimir raises, and seriously too, the issue of human salvation early in the play. He feels worried at the thought that one of the two thieves was damned. Estragon has all his life compared himself to Christ and says rather enviously that "they crucified (him) quickly." The tramps wait for Godot who may represent God, and their persistence in waiting for Godot shows their faith in God. The mutual attachment of the two tramps Vladimir and Estragon and Vladimir's protective attitude towards his friend have been interpreted as Christian virtues. Pozzo is being mistaken for Godot to begin with may also be linked with this religious interpretation. However, it is difficult to read in the play a consistent and elaborate religious allegory.

Disintegration and Regression of Man: - Among the depressing interpretations of the play is yet another. According to this interpretation, the play represents a disintegration of human beings, the climax in the play occurring when all the four characters fall to the ground upon one another, creating a formless mass from which Vladimir's voice emerges, saying: "We are men!" Nothing escapes the destructive force of this regression: neither speech—torn to pieces in the rhetoric of Pozzo's monologue on twilight—nor thought, which is undermined and destroyed by a whole series of absurd reasonings as well as by such passages as the incoherent speech delivered by Lucky. Lucky's speech effectively represents the regression of man's thinking intelligence.

The Nullity of Human Achievement: - One critic urges us not to feel perplexed by the play's meaning. Beckett, he tells us, is no didactic writer concerned to communicate a "message" in dramatic form. Even the many Christian echoes in the play do not add up to any coherent religions statement, but rather to a meditation upon a world governed by no other divinity than some sort of malignant fate, a world in which man waits and hopes for something to give value to his life and distract him from the absurdity of his death. Waiting for Godot is a meditative rhapsody on the nullity of human attainment.

A Suggestion of the German Occupation of France: - According to yet another view, the world represented in this play resembles France occupied by the Germans during World War II when Beckett lived first in the occupied zone and then escaped to the unoccupied region. Thus viewed, the play reminds us of the French Resistance organized by underground workers. How much waiting must have gone on in that bleak world! How many times must Resistance organisers have kept appointments with many who did not turn up and who may have had good reasons for not turning up ! We can imagine why the arrival of Pozzo would have an unnerving effect on those who waited. Pozzo could be a Gestapo official clumsily disguised. The German occupation of France should not of course be regarded as the "key" to the play; the play simply suggests the German occupation and thus acquires a certain historical value.

Minor Themes: - Into this wonderfully suggestive and subtle play, Beckett incorporates such minor themes as the inadequacy of human language as a means of communication and the illusory nature of such concepts as past and future.

Different Meanings for Different People: - In approaching Beckett we must give up asking what any of his plays is intended to mean. Beckett himself, when asked what a play of his meant, replied: "If I could tell you in a sentence I wouldn't have written the play." Waiting for Godot means different things for different people.

"Waiting for Godot" : An Absurd Play

Absurdist Drama: - Samuel Beckett's Waiting for Godot is thought to initiate a theatrical tradition called absurd drama. But like any other artistic puzzles, the theatre of the absurd cannot be reduced to a single bottom line. It cannot be defined in a single word or by a particular theory. In order to understand the rise, characteristics and popularity of the absurd drama we must look back to the events that took place during the first half of the 20th century in the worlds of politics, literature, philosophy and religion. The early 20th century witnessed two World Wars. In literature it gave birth to two recognizable literary styles: modernism and post-modernism. In philosophy the rise of existentialism was the most important event and the world also saw the decline of men's faith in religion. All these happenings paved the way for the theatrical tradition the absurd drama which in fact was a reflection the age.

The term was coined by the critic Martin Esslin, who made it the title of a 1962 book on the subject. Esslin saw the work of these playwrights as giving artistic articulation to Albert Camus' philosophy that life is inherently without meaning, as illustrated in his work The Myth of Sisyphus. The group of the playwrights whose works came to be known as the absurd plays include Samuel Beckett, Eugene Ionescoe, Jean Genet, Edward Albee and Harold Pinter. These writers flout all the standards by which drama has been judged for many centuries. As playwrights they share some theatrical techniques and philosophic ideas. In their plays there is no particular attention spent developing a recognizable plot, no detailed characterization, and no readily definable theme. This bizarre rejection of any recognizable pattern or development gave birth to the term Literature of the Absurd. Philosophically almost all of them share the existentialist philosophy of absurdity and nothingness.

Beckett's Waiting for Godot largely deals with the absurd tradition. The play is without any plot, character, dialogue and setting in the traditional sense.

Absurd Setting: - The setting of the play creates the absurdist mood. A desolate country road, a ditch, and a leafless tree make up the barren, otherworldly landscape whose only occupants are two homeless men who bumble and shuffle in a vaudevillian manner. They are in rags, bowler hats, and apparently oversized boots--a very comic introduction to a very bizarre play. There is a surplus of symbolism and thematic suggestion in this setting. The landscape is a symbol of a barren and fruitless civilization or life. There is nothing to be done and there appears to be no place better to depart. The tree, usually a symbol of life with its blossoms and fruit or its suggestion of spring, is apparently dead and lifeless. But it is also the place to which they believe this Godot has asked them to come. This could mean Godot wants the men to feel the infertility of their life. At the same time, it could simply mean they have found the wrong tree.

The setting of the play reminds us the post-war condition of the world which brought about uncertainties, despair, and new challenges to the all of mankind. A pess with sadism and tangible violence, as a rich dividend of the aftermath of wars. It is as if the poignancy and calamities of the wars found sharp reflections in Beckett's Waiting for Godot.

Absurd Plot: -. In the traditional sense a plot should concentrate on a single motivated action and is also expected to have a beginning, a middle and a neatly tied-up ending. But it's almost impossible to provide a conventional plot summary of Waiting for Godot, which has often been described as a play in which nothing happens. It is formless and not constructed on any structural principles. It has no Aristotelian beginning, middle and end. It starts at an arbitrary point and seem to end just as arbitrarily. Beckett, like other dramatists working in this mode, is not trying to "tell a story." He's not offering any easily identifiable solutions to carefully observed problems; there's little by way of moralizing and no obvious "message." The pattern of the play might best be described as circular. The circularity of Waiting for Godot is highly unconventional.

Absurd Characters: - As per as the portrayal of characters is concerned the play also fits into the absurd tradition. A well-made play is expected to present characters that are well-observed and convincingly motivated. But in the play we five characters who are not very recognizable human beings and don't engage themselves in a motivated action. Two tramps, Vladimir (Didi) and Estragon (Gogo), are waiting by a tree on a country road for Godot, whom they have never met and who may not even exist. They argue, make up, contemplate suicide, discuss passages from the Bible, and encounter Pozzo and Lucky, a master and slave. Near the end of the first act, a young boy comes with a message from Mr. Godot that he will not come today but will come tomorrow. In the second act, the action of the first act is essentially repeated, with a few changes: the tree now has leaves, Pozzo is blind and has Lucky on a shorter leash. Once again the boy comes and tells them Mr. Godot will not come today; he insists he has never met them before. The play concludes with a famous exchange:

Vladimir: Well, shall we go?
Estragon: Yes, let's go.
They do not move,

Absurd Dialogue: - In the traditional play is expected to entertain the audience with logically built, witty dialogue. But in this play, like any other absurd play, the dialogue seems to have degenerated into meaningless babble. The dialogues the characters exchange are meaningless banalities. They use language to feel the emptiness between them, to conceal the fact that they have no desire to talk to each other anything at all.

Theme of Absurdity: - The absurd plays deal with the themes of existentialism, especially the existentialist theme of absurdity. The absurd playwrights tried to translate the contemporary existentialist philosophy into the drama. The absurd playwrights also tried to portray the distressful condition of the humans. In Waiting for Godot the human condition is shown as a dismal and distressful state. The derelict man struggles to live or rather exist, in a hostile and uncaring world. A sense of stagnancy and bareness captivates man, and whenever he tries to assert himself, he is curbed. In Beckett's words, human life is the endurance and tolerance to "the boredom of living" "replaced by the suffering of being." These phrases speak volumes of a philosophy born out of the harsh human realities. Vladimir and Estragon are blissfully and painfully oblivious to their own condition. They go about repeating their actions every day unmindful of the monotony and captivity. They also do not a question or brood over their own actions and the motives underlying their actions. The "compressed vacuum" in their lives is constantly disregarded. The idea that God or fate or some Supreme Being with control toys with the lives of men is startlingly clear. Every moment of every day, mankind waits for some sign from God that his suffering will end. And every day, God does not arrive.

So many times in the play, a possibility is suggested then immediately undercut by its unhappy opposite. This technique is used by Beckett to relay his theme that life is uncertain and unpredictable at its best, unfortunate and unending at its worst. To further state this theme, Estragon asserts that "There's no lack of void" in life. It is actually of little importance where they were the previous day, as everywhere every day the same empty vacuum envelops them. Absence, emptiness, nothingness, and unresolved mysteries are central features in the play.

Thus the play "Waiting for Godot" contains almost all the elements of an absurd play. The play depicts the irrationalism of life in a grotesquely comic and non-consequential fashion with the element of "metaphysical alienation and tragic anguish." It was first written in French and called En attendant Godot. The author himself translated the play into English in 1954. The uniqueness of the play compelled the audiences to flock to the theatres for a spectacularly continuous four hundred performances. At the time, there were two distinct opinions about the play; some called it a hoax and others called it a masterpiece. Nevertheless, Waiting for Godot has claimed its place in literary history as a masterpiece that changed the face of twentieth century drama.

"Waiting For Godot": Existentialism

Samuel Beckett's Waiting for Godot is a play that presents conflict between living by religious and spiritual beliefs, and living by an existential philosophy, which asserts that it is up to the individual to discover the meaning of life through personal experience in the earthly world.

Waiting for Godot is a comprehensive study in existentialism. The play in its own right contains many existentialist themes and concepts which are relayed to the audience through the actions and thoughts of the main characters. The main existentialist theme which Beckett deals with is that death is the only eventual possibility. He uses the almost religious action of waiting and turns it on its head. He does this by reducing the action to a fruitless exercise. Vladimir and Estragon are in fact waiting for nothing. I think that Beckett strongly questions the notion of religion in "Waiting for Godot". He uses certain religious symbols such as the tree, which is one of the very few props visible on the stage.

The tree is very religious. It is believed that the tree represents life and death in a cyclical fashion. Also waiting is a central part of the play. Waiting can be interpreted as a religious activity. Waiting can be directly linked to faith. Many people of the catholic faith believe that they are on this earth waiting to go to heaven i.e. the afterlife. I think that Beckett hits out at this notion. He does this by showing that nothing happens at the end of Vladimir and Estragon's waiting. The title, waiting for Godot, is very clever. It can be, and has been read as waiting for god. It would appear, on first glance that Vladimir and Estragon are indeed waiting for god, or a godlike figure.

> "But that is not the question. Why are we here, that is the question. And we are blessed in this, that we happen to know the answer. Yes, in this immense confusion one thing alone is clear. We are waiting for Godot to come."

We are never made aware as to whom Godot actually is. Is his character cloaked in mystery or, does Godot simply not exist? We the audience, along with the central characters, have never seen Godot. We are too simply to believe in this mysterious figure. I think that Beckett plays on the concept of faith excellently here. He demands faith from everybody and in the last scene he destroys this faith. He strongly communicates his message, there is no afterlife and we are merely waiting on this earth for one thing only, death. Beckett, as an existentialist writer, is very aware of his mortality and this echoes throughout his works, especially waiting for Godot. The title can also be read as waiting for nothing, as the elusive Godot does not make an appearance.

Beckett, as an existentialist writer, is not overly religious. It would be a mistake in opinion to relate his writing to religion. I feel that Beckett is criticising people's blind faith. Vladimir and Estragon are waiting for nothing in the play. I feel that Beckett is trying to convey this message in his drama. He is ambiguous in his writing. I think he does this to be more accessible so he can spread his core existentialist concepts. He inserts false religious symbols and metaphors in waiting for Godot and once he has baited the religious readers he bombards them with existentialist concepts. This in my opinion is a de-conversion of religion as he tries to strip the reader's faith away. Beckett sees God to be a joke just as Godot is a joke. The waiting is nothing more than the delayed inevitability that they are waiting for nothing, but their own inevitable death. Godot is nothing, and thus god is nothing. This ties in with the existentialist view that death is the only inevitable outcome in life.

> "Let us not waste our time in idle discourse! Let us do something, while we have the chance! It is not every day that we are needed. But at this place, at this moment of time, all mankind is us, whether we like it or not. Let us make the most of it, before it is too late!"

Beckett writing exists freshly in the wake of the world war. Morality is a key concept in Waiting for Godot. In life, morality is passed down from god. Beckett questions morality. Can morality exist without god? It is clear war and its destructive capability caused many people to question their morality. The losing of Pozzo's watch is a very significant scene to the play. We see how one character, Pozzo, is bound to the constraints and rules of time. Time itself can be seen as a great symbol and a metaphor for death. Beckett refers to time through the character of Pozzo. He shows the audience how they are mortal and that everyone's days are numbered. Pozzo's fear of time may be linked to the existentialist themes of this play. Pozzo is well aware of his mortality. The watch marks his ageing and with each tic he is moving closer to his death. He is bound to this and it is a faith he cannot escape. The watch is a constant reminder of this. When the watch is lost Pozzo is free from all anxieties. He no longer is bound to time or no longer recognises his own mortality, even though it still exists and is ever present. When the watch is lost time becomes redundant. Time becomes nothing, just as Godot is nothing. This is another test of faith laid down by Beckett. It is an experiment to see if something which is not present can still exist. Through the on stage characters, he shows us that this is not entirely possible. Time is banished from the physical world of which they inhabit. The banishment of time is an important symbol. Beckett shows us that it is possible to remove a belief system, even one as controlling as time. We see that even time is just another concept thought up by somebody else.

In conclusion we can say that Godot has some physical presence in the play. Godot is the tree. The tree is the central prop in the play. But it could be would argue that Godot is the central prop. Vladimir and Estragon were not waiting by the tree for Godot, but were waiting alongside Godot unknown's to themselves. Godot is in front of everyone from the start. The tree on stage is dead. Godot is also dead. Godot in my opinion is faith. Estragon and Vladimir have faith throughout the play even though they are waiting by a symbol which declares faith to be dead. This is great irony. Beckett is trying to say that people will always have faith even when they are bombarded with signs that there is no God. This may relate to the World War. Beckett fought in the war and witnessed the devastation caused by it. The war copper-fastened Beckett's belief that there is no god as there was no divine intervention to stop the bloodshed. The war itself was a great symbol, like the tree in waiting for Godot, to show that faith is dead and god does not exist. But people are blind to the obvious.

"Waiting for Godot" : Significance of the Title

Wailing for Godot is a multi-sided play with significant title. Its meanings and implications are complex. It is possible to look upon it as a clever farce or view it as a tragic exposition of human predicament. Its themes have certain topicality but at the same time, they possess a timeless validity and universality. It is an existentialistic play but at the same time mocks at the attitude of existentialism. It seems to have some religious implications even though it seems of be questioning profoundly the Christian concept of salvation and grace.

The title "Waiting for Godot," suggests waiting for a mysterious stranger who has obvious symbolic dimensions and implication. Godot may be a representative, in Beckett's contemporary term of some authority, who has promised protection to the tramps. He may be regarded as a symbol of the hope of the ordinary French citizen in French under German occupation or he may be considered as the link in Resistance French Movement with Estragon and Vladimir two resistance workers who have been told to contact him. Obviously their men can come only when the coast is absolutely clear, or waiting for Godot may be a symbol of waiting for a Divine Saviour.

The significance of the title can also be explored in another way, as the fundamental imagery of "Waiting for Godot" is Christian for the depth of experience which Backett is probing; there is no other source of imagery for him to draw on. His heroes are two tramps who have come from nowhere in particular and have nowhere particular to go, their life is in a state of apparently fruitless expectation. They receive messages, through a little boy, from local landowner, Godot, who always is going to come in person tomorrow, but never do come, Their attitude towards Godot is partly one of hope, partly of fear, The orthodoxy of this symbolism from a Christian point of view is obvious, The tramps with their rags and misery represent the fallen state of marl The squalor of their Surrounding, their lock of a state in the world represents the idea that there in this world we can build no conducive state to live in.

The ambiguity of their attitude towards Godot Their mingled hope and fear and the doubtful tone of the boy's messages represent the state of tension and uncertainty in which an average Christian must live in this world, avoiding presumption and also avoiding despair, Yet the two tramps Didi and Gogo, as they call each other, represent something far higher than the other two characters in the play, the masterful and ridiculous Pozzo and his terrifying slave Lucky, Didi and Gogo stand for the contemplative life and Lucky and Pozzo stand for the life of practical action taken mistakenly, as an end in it.

As for as view of Godot as a Divine Saviour is concerned, it is strengthened by they did not request Godot to do anything definite for them, all they did, was to make a sort of vague or supplication to him. Vladimir says more than once that if Godot comes they would be saved, The resemblance of "God" is too clear to be missed, Moreover, they are also afraid of him, when Estragon suggests that they might drop Godot, Vladimir reminds him that he would punish them if they do that.

Thus Godot may be God, terrible and white beard, as conceived in the Old Testament The tramps waiting for him may thus be the representatives of human beings who must keep each other's company, quarrelling and foolish talking, until they find a rope to hang themselves, or until final night make the act of waiting unnecessary. Being poor and unprovided they are typical specimens of common, anti-hemic humanity. The tramps like Pozzo and Lucky also seem to symbolize human regression, that is to say, the deterioration or "backward evolution" in human. In this way the title "Waiting for Godot" is applicable to act of Christianity.

As regards the relevance of the title of the play to the German occupation of France, we observe two men waiting for another name, which may not be his real name. A ravaged and blasted landscape, a world that was once ampler and more open, but it is permeated with pointlessness now, mysterious dispensers of beating and tile anxiety of the two who wait their anxiety to be as inconspicuous as possible in a strange environment. All this reminds the reader and the audience of France occupied by the Gennens, in which its author spent the war years. It indicates how much useless waiting must have gone on that bleak world. As such the monotonous waiting is likely to create uncertainty and loss of hope. The tramps in the play are sitting in a similar condition of mind.

This view suggests that "Waiting for Godot" is a play about a mysterious world where two men wait. Only a fraction of human race had experienced the German occupation of France and only of fraction of that fraction waited for some Godot.

Nevertheless, the title of the play is also suggestive of the meaninglessness of life. The way the two tramps pass time his real name is indicative of the boredom and triviality of human activities, the lack of significance in life and the constant suffering which are the results of this existence. It also brings out the hollowness and insincerity of most social intercourse. Estragon and Vladimir question each other, contradict each other abuse each other and reconcile each other without any serious meanings or intention. All these devices are employed to one end - to the end of making their waiting for Godot less unbearable. Estragon takes off his boots, gropes inside them, and shakes them out expecting something to fall out of them, but nothing happens. Vladimir does the same with hat with the same result. The very essence of boredom and triviality is concentrated in the scene in which Estragon and Vladimir repeatedly put on and take off the three hats their own and Lucky. It is utter lack of meanings which derives Estragon and Vladimir to the thoughts of suicide but the world of the play is one in which no significant action is permitted, ther not within their reach. "Waiting for Godot" is so to speak, a play about the philosophy, which underscores that. Man feels upon being confronted with the fact of existence; thereby confirming the suitability of the title.

The Breakdown of Language as a Theme

The Breakdown of Language: - Beckett's plays are concerned with expressing the difficulty of finding meaning in a world subject to change. His use of language probes the limitations of language both as a means of communication and as a vehicle for the expression of valid statements, an instrument of thought.

His use of the dramatic medium shows that he has tried to find means of expression beyond language. On the stage one can dispense with words altogether (for instance, in his mime-plays), or at least one can reveal the reality behind the words, as when the actions of the characters contradict their verbal expression. "Let's go", say the two tramps at the end of each Act of Waiting for Godot, but the stage directions inform us that "they don't move". On the stage language can be put into such a relationship with action that facts behind the language can be revealed. Hence the importance of mine, knockabout comedy, and silence in Beckett's plays—Krapp's eating of bananas, the pratfalls of Vladimir and Estragon, the variety turn with Lucky's hat, Clov's immobility at the close of Endgame, which puts his verbally expressed desire to leave in question. Beckett's use of the stage is an attempt to reduce the gap between the limitations of language and the sense of the human situation he seeks to express in spite of his strong feeling that words are inadequate to formulate it. The concreteness and three dimensional nature of the stage can be used to add new resources to language as an instrument of thought and exploration of being. Language in Beckett's plays serves to express the break-down of language. Where there is no certainty, there can be no definite meanings—and the impossibility of ever attaining certainty is one of the main themes of Beckett's plays. Godot's promises are vague and uncertain. In Endgame, Hamm asks, "We're not beginning to mean something?" Clov merely laughs and says: "Mean something! You and I mean something!"

Language Ineffective as a Means of Communication: - Ten different modes of the breakdown (or disintegration) of language have been noted in Waiting for Godot. They range from simple misunderstandings and double-entendres to monologues (as signs of inability to communicate), cliches, repetitions of synonyms, inability to find the right words, and telegraphic style (loss of grammatical structure, communication by shouted commands) to Lucky's farrago of chaotic nonsense and the dropping of punctuation marks, such as question marks, as an indication that language has lost its function as a means of communication, that questions have turned into statements not really requiring an answer. A whole list of passages drawn up by a critic from Waiting for Godot shows that the assertions made by one of the characters are gradually qualified, weakened, and hedged in with reservations until they are completely taken back. In a meaningless universe, it is always foolhardy to make a positive statement.

The Breakdown of Dialogue: - But more important than any merely formal signs of the disintegration of language and meaning in Beckett's plays is the nature of the dialogue itself, which again and again breaks down because no truly logical discussion or exchange of thoughts occurs in it either through loss of meaning of single words or th characters to remember what has just been said. In a purposeless world that has lost its ultimate objectives, dialogue, like all action, becomes a mere game to pass the time.

Devaluation of Language: - Beckett's use of language is thus designed to devalue language as a vehicle of conceptual thought or as an instrument for the communication of ready-made answers to the problems of the human condition. And yet his continued use of language must, paradoxically, be regarded as an attempt to communicate the incommunicable. Such an undertaking attacks the cheap, and facile complacency of the view that to name a problem is to solve it or that the world can be mastered by neat classification and formulations.

Beckett, a Great Master of Language: - Beckett's entire work can be seen as a search for the reality that lies behind mere reasoning in conceptual terms. He may have devalued language as an instrument for the communication of ultimate truths, but he has shown himself a great master of language as an artistic medium. He has moulded words into a superb instrument for his purpose. In the theatre he has been able to add a new dimension to language—the counterpoint of action, concrete, many-faceted, not to be explained away, but making a direct impact on an audience. In Beckett's theatre it is possible to bypass the stage of conceptual thinking altogether, as an abstract painting bypasses the stage of the recognition of natural objects. In Waiting for Godot and Endgame, plays drained of character, plot, and meaningful dialogue, Beckett has shown that such a seemingly impossible feat can in fact be accomplished.

Waiting for Godot : Religious Significance

St. Augustine's Remark

When asked about the theme of Waiting for Godot, Beckett is reported to have referred to the following sentence in the writings of St. Augustine "Do not despair: one of the thieves was saved. Do not presume: one of the thieves was damned."

Theme of the Uncertainty of Salvation: - The theme of the two thieves on the cross, the theme of the uncertainty of the hope of salvation and the chance bestowal of divine grace, does indeed pervade the whole play. Vladimir states it right at the beginnings, when he says: "One of the thieves was saved. It's a reasonable percentage." Later he enlarges on the subject. One of the two thieves is supposed to have been saved and the other damned, says Vladimir. But he asks why only one of the four Evangelists speaks of a thief being saved. Of the other three Evangelists, two do not mention any thieves at all, and the third says that both of them abused Christ. In other words, there is a fifty-fifty chance of salvation but, as only one out of four witnesses (the Evangelists) reports it, the chances are considerably reduced. As Vladimir points out, it is a curious fact that everybody seems to believe that one witness: "It is the only version they know." Estragon, whose attitude has been one of scepticism throughout, merely comments "People are bloody ignorant apes."

The Chance Remarks Made By the Two Thieves: - It is the shape of the idea that fascinated Beckett. Out of all the evildoers, out of all the millions and millions of criminals that have been, executed in the course of history, only two had the chance of salvation in so unique a manner. One happened to make a hostile remark; he was happened to contradict that hostile remark; and he was saved. How easily could the roles have been reversed! These, after all, were not well-considered judgments, but chance exclamations uttered at a moment of supreme suffering and stress. As Pozzo says about Lucky:

"Remark that I might easily have been in his shoes and he in mine.
If chance had not willed it otherwise.
To each one his due."

Godot's Unpredictability in Bestowing Grace: - Godot himself is unpredictable in bestowing kindness and punishment. The boy who is his messenger looks after the goats, and Godot treats him well. But the boy's brother, who looks after the sheep, is beaten by Godot. "And why doesn't he beat you?" asks Vladimir. "I don't know, sir," the boy replies. The parallel to Cain and Abel is evident: there too the Lord's grace fell on one rather than on the other without any rational explanation. Here Godot also acts contrary to Jesus Christ at the Last Judgment: "And he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left." But if Godot's kindness is bestowed as a matter of pure chance, his coming is not a source of pure joy; it can also mean damnation. When in Act II Estragon believes Godot to be approaching, his first thought is that he is accursed and as Vladimir triumphantly exclaims:

"It's Godot! At last! Let's go and meet him,"

Estragon runs away, shouting:

"I'm in hell."

Two Divisions of Mankind: - The chance bestowal of grace, which human beings cannot comprehend, divides mankind into those who will be saved and those who will be damned. When in Act II, Pozzo and Lucky return, and the two tramps try to identify them, Estragon calls out: "Abel! Abel!" Pozzo immediately responds. But when Estragon calls out: "Cain! Cain!" Pozzo responds again. "He's all humanity," concludes Estragon.

Pozzo's Effort to Attain Salvation: - There is even a suggestion that Pozzo's activity is concerned with his frantic attempt to draw that fifty-fifty chance of salvation upon himself. In Act I, Pozzo is on his way to sell Lucky at the fair. The French version of the play, however, specifies that it is the Market of the Holy Saviour to which he is taking Lucky. Is Pozzo trying to sell Lucky to redeem himself? Is he trying to divert the fifty-fifty chance of redemption from Lucky to Pozzo? He certainly complains that Lucky is causing him great pain, that he is killing him with his mere presence—perhaps because his mere presence reminds Pozzo that it might be Lucky who will be redeemed. When Lucky gives his famous demonstration of his thinking, the thin thread of sense that underlies the opening lines seems to be concerned with the accidental nature of salvation: "Given the existence of a personal God outside time without extension who from the heights of divine apathia, divine athambia, divine aphasia, loves us dearly with some exception for reasons unknown and suffers with those who are plunged in torment…." Here we have a description of a personal God, with his divine apathy, his speechlessness ("aphasia"), and his lack of the capacity for terror or amazement ("athambia"), in other words, a God who does not communicate with us, cannot feel for us, and condemns us for reasons unknown.

Pozzo's Failure: - When Pozzo and Lucky reappear the next day, Pozzo blind and Lucky dumb, no more is heard of the fair. Pozzo has failed to sell Lucky; his blindness in thinking that he could thus influence the action of grace has been made evident in concrete physical form.

A Religious or Christian Play: - Waiting for Godot then seems to be concerned with the hope of salvation through the workings of grace. And this view supports the belief that it is a Christian or a religious play. Vladimir's and Estragon's "waiting" might be explained as signifying their steadfast faith and hope, while Vladimir's kindness to his friend, and the two tramps' mutual interdependence might be seen as symbols of Christian charity.

Evidence Against this Conclusion: - But these religious interpretations overlook a number of essential features of the play. These features arc the play's constant stress on the uncertainty of the appointment with Godot; Godot's unreliability and irrationality, and the repeated demonstration of the futility of the hopes pinned on him. The act of waiting for Godot is shown as essentially absurd and therefore devoid of any religious significance.

Thought of Suicide: - There is one feature of the play that leads us to assume that there is a better solution to the tramps' predicament, a solution which the tramps themselves consider preferable to waiting for Godot. That solution is suicide. "We should have thought of it when the world was young, in the nineties", says Vladimir at the outset. Suicide remains their favourite solution, unattainable owing to their own incompetence and their lack of the practical tools to achieve it.

Not Tied to Godot: - Estragon, far less convinced of Godot's promises than Vladimir, is anxious to reassure himself that they are not "tied" to Godot. Vladimir gives him the necessary assurance: "Tied to Godot! What an idea! No question of it. For the moment". When, later, Vladimir falls into a sort of complacency about their waiting, Estragon immediately punctures it. And Vladimir is quite ready to admit that they are waiting only from irrational habit.

The Tramps' Faith: - In support of the Christian interpretation, it might be argued that Vladimir and Estragon, who are waiting for Godot, are shown as clearly superior to Pozzo and Lucky, who have no appointment, no objective, and are wholly egocentric, wholly wrapped up in their sado-masochistic relationship. It is their faith that puts the two tramps on a higher plane. It is evident that Pozzo is overconfident and self-centred. "Do I look like a man that can be made to suffer"? he boasts. Even when he gives a melancholy and moving description of the sunset and the sudden failings of the night, we know he does not believe the night will ever fall on him; he is not concerned with the meaning of what he recites, but only with its effect on his listeners. Hence he is taken completely unawares when night does fall on him and he goes blind. Likewise Lucky, in accepting Pozzo as his master and in teaching him his ideas, seems to have been naively convinced of the power of reason, beauty, and truth. Estragon and Vladimir are clearly superior to both Pozzo and Lucky—not because they pin their faith on Godot but because they are less naive. They do not believe in action, wealth, or reason. They are aware that all we do in this life is as nothing when seen against the senseless action of time, which is in itself an illusion. They are aware that suicide would be the best solution. They are thus superior to Pozzo and Lucky because they are less self-centred and have fewer illusions. The hope, the habit of hoping, that Go all is the last illusion that keeps Vladimir and Estragon from facing the human condition in the harsh light of fully conscious awareness. For a brief moment, Vladimir is aware of the full horror of the human condition: "The air is full of our cries……At me too someone is looking……" But the routine of waiting, which has become a habit, prevents an awareness of the full reality of being.

The Dead Voices: - Vladimir's and Estragon's pastimes are designed to stop them from thinking. "We're in no danger of thinking any more….Thinking is not the worst……What is terrible is to have thought", says Vladimir. Vladimir and Estragon talk incessantly because they wish to hear the "dead voices" which explore the mysteries of being and the self to the limits of anguish and suffering. The long silence that follows the cross-talk about those voices is broken by Vladimir in "anguish", with the cry "Say anything at all!"

Conclusion: - The hope of salvation may be merely an evasion of the suffering and anguish that spring from facing the reality of the human condition. But this does not invalidate the religious implications of the play. It is possible, however, to believe either that the play visualizes the possibility of salvation or that it negates such a possibility. Which alternative a reader adopts will depend upon his mental make-up because each reader will respond to the play in his own way.

"Waiting for Godot": Realism

"Waiting for Godot" occupies a prominent place in the annals of English literature for highlighting the basic truths of human beings belonging to any age or religion. The play can be interpreted by various ways. It is a play in which fact and fancy, illusion and reality are mingled together. In "Waiting for Godot" man's sufferings, whether physical or metaphysical, are shown in such a way that we feel them as our own suffering. The play is a mirror of our age because it shows the inner hollowness, helplessness and meaninglessness of modern man's life. The theme of the play has a universal appeal. The tramps represent all humanity. Their sufferings are the sufferings of all human beings; no matter in which country they live in or what religious beliefs they have. They reflect modern man's loneliness, absurdity, forgetfulness, and illusions, waiting condition, deferred hope, physical suffering, mental anguish, death wish and isolation. The main subject of the play is waiting and the act of waiting is an essential aspect of the human condition. Vladimir says:

We're waiting for Godot.

And the sentence is repeated in the course of the play like a refrain. It is not clear in the play who or what Godot is. The tramps themselves have only a vague idea of who Godot is. They wait for him in a state of ignorance or helplessness. The play thus depicts waiting, ignorance and boredom and all these things are directly experienced by us in life, wait is essential – the offer of a job, the possibility of promotion, the return of a long-lost friend, a love letter etc. Thus we discover a common ground between ourselves and the two tramps who are waiting for Godot.

The play highlights the theme of habit, boredom and "the suffering of being". The play is a fable about a kind of life that has no longer any point. Godot may stand for God. Or for a mythical human being or for a meaning of life or for death but the play i stagnant life. The heroes or anti-heroes are merely alive but a life without action and purpose. In our world millions of people do not act but are acted. The tramps, in spite of their inaction and pointlessness of their existence, still want to go on. The millions of people today do not give up living when their life becomes pointless. Thus the plight of two tramps is no different than that of an average man and that's why people are able to respond to the play. It is not without reason that Estragon suggests hanging as a remedy. Under the condition in which we live, most of us have subconsciously thought of hanging ourselves. The mood of despair is not limited but has become a general attitude of the people.

Lucky and Pozzo represent master slave relationship through centuries. The pathetic and miserable condition of Lucky represents the exploited class of all ages and Pozzo the exploiter. Pozzo is a capitalist of our times who suck the blood of the poor and then throw them away like the peel of banana. But even then both the classes are interdependent upon each other.

The play is valid for all those who can assimilate the general anguish into their particular experience and thus translate it into their own terms. "Nothing to be done" is the main dilemma of our life. In spite of having got marvellous progress in all fields of life, man is still in confusion and perplexity of mind. His moral scruples prevent him doing something wrong but at the same time his worldly lust incites him to do the same wrong. Beckett makes us realize that man is the main cause of the sufferings of man. The contrast between the relationships of the two pairs of characters becomes an important clue for the understanding of the play and produces certain echoes in us.

In nutshell we may say "Waiting for Godot" is a mirror in which everyone can see his own face because Vladimir and Estragon's problems of everyman. We are all waiting for the reality of our existence. Every day we turn the page of our life with this hope that perhaps today the reality will out but in the end we still remain unknown. That's why the play touches the apex of appreciation by an audience of prisoners at San Quentin in the USA because they were confronted with their own experience of time, waiting, hope and despair. Thus the play is a mirror of our times and there is enough in the play, which can be called the echo of our own mind and heart.

Waiting For Godot : A Tragi-Comedy

Tragic-comedy is a play which claims a plot apt for tragedy but which ends happily like a comedy. The action is serious in theme and subject matter and tone also sometimes but it seems to be a tragic catastrophe until an unexpected turn in events brings out the happy ending. The characters of a tragic-comedy are noble but they are involved in improbabilities. In such a play tragic and comic elements are mixed up together. Fletcher, in his "Preface to the Faithful Shepherdess", defines a tragic-comedy as:

> "A tragic-comedy is not so called in respect to mirth and killing, but in respect it wants death which is enough to make it no tragedy. Shakespeare's 'Cymbeline' and 'The Winter's Tale' may also be categorized as tragic-comedy."

The English edition of "Waiting for Godot", published in 1956 describes the play as a "tragic-comedy" in two acts. There are many dialogues, gestures, situations and actions that are stuff of pure comedy. All musical devices are employed to create laughter in such a tragic situation of waiting. The total atmosphere of the play is very akin to dark-comedy. For example, Vladimir is determined not to hear Estragon's nightmare. The latter pleads with him in vain to hear him, saying that there is nobody else to whom he may communicate his private nightmares.

The audience burst out in laughter when they see Estragon putting off and on his boots. Vladimir's game with his hat appears as if this is happening in a circus. Vladimir is suffering from prostrate problem. Vladimir's way of walking with stiff and short strides is as funny as Estragon's limping on the stage. Estragon's gestures of encouraging Vladimir to urinate off-stage are farcical. The comedy in this play at certain times gives the impression of Vaudeville. There are many dialogues:

Estragon: Let's go.
Vladimir: We can not.
Estragon: Why not?
Vladimir: We are waiting for Godot.
(They do not move.)

These dialogues occur like a comic paradigm in the play.

Estragon and Vladimir put on and take off each other's hat as well as that of lucky again and again. It shows that in the world of tramps, there is no place of significant actions. The most farcical situation in the play is the one where the tramps are testing the strength of the cord with which they wish to hang themselves. The cord breaks under the strain. One cannot have an uninhabited laugh at the situation for there is also something deeply uncomfortable.

"Waiting for Godot" has several moments of anguish and despair. Someone beats Estragon daily.

Estragon: Beat me? Certainly they beat me.

Estragon's feet and Vladimir's kidneys are also taken to be granted. The tramps resent that they should be asked whether it still hurts. It goes without saying that it hurts all the time. When Vladimir asks Estragon whether his boots are hurting him, he responds:

"Hurts! He wants to know if it hurts!"

A little later Estragon asks Vladimir about his kidney trouble and the latter replies in the same words:

"Hurts! He wants to know if it hurts!"

In fact his trouble is so bad that it does not even permit him to laugh. Life lies all bleak and barren before them and that only valid comment on it is the one with which the play opens, "Nothing to be done". Theirs is a world of negation in which inactivity is the safest course; as Estragon says:

"Do not let us do anything, it's safer".

The tramps are living at the barest level of existence. Carrot, turnips and radishes are all they have to eat. Estragon's remarks show tragedy and helplessness:

"Nothing happens, nobody comes, nobody goes, it's awful."

The situation of Lucky is quite pathetic, especially in view of his glorious past, as Pozzo describes it. His speech tells us that in his sonar moments Lucky must have brooded deeply over the anguish of the human situation. The anguish breaks in his incoherent harangue:

> "… the flames, the tears the stones so blue so calm alas alas on on the skull the skull the skull the skull in Connemara in spite of the tennis the labours abandoned left unfinished graver still abode of stones in a word I resume alas alas abandoned unfinished the skull the skull in Connemara in spite of the tennis the skull alas the stones Cunard (melee, final vociferations) tennis … the stones … so calm …Cunard … unfinished …"

The comedy in "Waiting for Godot" at once turns into tragedy when the audience thinks about the helplessness of tramps. Estragon and Vladimir are waiting for someone who never comes. In order to pass time they indulge in irrelevant, meaningless activity. The element of force fades away and miserable condition of man looms large in our imagination. Their life can be compared with that of a prisoner for whom there is no escape, even suicide is impossible. Every activity is a mockery of human existence.

The changing of farce into absurdity brings a lot of tragic sentiment in the play. Estragon's nakedness is a picture of 'man's miserable condition'. The absurd living is a major source of tragedy. The source is the situation of pointless waiting of Estragon and Vladimir. They do not know who Godot is. They are sure neither about the time nor about the place of their appointment. They even do not know what will happen if they stop waiting? Lack of essential knowledge makes them totally impotent and powerless. They are glued to a situation. Nothing is certain all they can say is "Nothing to be done".

The total effect of this co-mingling of tragic and comic suggests that Samuel Beckett's is a realistic dramatist who looks at life from a position of a pessimist and an optimist. The form of tragic-comedy is highly suitable to this vision of life. The climax of Beckett's tragic-comedy is the role of Lucky. He is wearing servant's vest while holding his master's overcoat, a basket and a stool. His neck is tied with one end of the rope. His appearance is not only fantastic but grotesque also. The moment we realize that he is a half-wit; he becomes an image of man's misery. We are all the more sorry for Lucky when it is revealed that Pozzo has learnt all the beautiful things of life from lucky. But now Pozzo is taking the same person to sell in a fair. The relationship of a ringmaster and his trained animal, changes into a relationship of an owner and a slave. It is an exploitation of a man by a man who stops the audience from bursting out into laughter. Comedy has been checked by tragic element or sentiments, while the effect of tragedy has been mitigated by farce created through characters, dialogues, gestures and actions.

We can sum up with the remarks of Sean O' Casey,

> "Beckett is a clever writer, for within him there is no hazard of hope; no desire for it; nothing in it but a lust for despair and a crying of woe, not in a wilderness, but in a garden."

Waiting for Godot as a Christian religious play

Samuel Beckett speaks little in Waiting for Godot, yet manages to invites colossal critical discourses. Meaning in its traditional sense dissolves gaseously in Beckett's works, yet each performance or reading of the play gives birth to a new meaning. As William Mueller has observed:

> "The human predicament described in Beckett's first play is that of man living on the Saturday after the Friday of the crucifixion, and not really knowing if all hope is dead or if the next day will bring the life which has been promised."

Sixty years have passed since the first production of En Attendant Godot in Théâtre de Babylone, but the various attempts so far made to analyse Waiting for Godot as a Christian drama with biblical allegory somewhat relied on the Mueller motif.

Biblical allusions, allegories and images in Waiting for Godot

Waiting for Godot abounds in religious allusions. Christianity is introduced as early in the play as Vladimir asks whether Estragon have read the Bible or not. The nondescript tree too can have multiple interpretations, but ecclesiastical scholars love to see it as an image of the Cross. Moreover, notwithstanding Beckett's refusal of any godliness in Godot, we thoroughly feel that the absent protagonist appears to be a messiah for the two tramps.

Yet another religious interpretation of Waiting for Godot is encouraged by the correlation of Lucky's idea of God having white beard, and the boy's identical description of Godot. The never ending waiting also reflects the basic biblical idea of Christ's return on the Doomsday, putting an end to all sufferings, the sufferings of Vladimir and Estragon. In fact, what helps Didi and Gogo sustain their existence amidst eternal barrenness is their faith, that Godot will surely come, tomorrow if not today, and harmonize all the disorders.

Once, Gogo compared himself to Christ. It seems more than a distant coincidence the he ironically mirrors the last few days of Christ. Estragon spent the night in a ditch, so did Christ in a cave after his death. Also, having heard about Estragon being beaten up, Vladimir reaches out to embrace him like loving Veronica. Also, Pozzo examines the cuts on Estragon's leg as he wakes up, thus re-enacting the Apostle's examination of Christ's wounds after his rising.

The most prominent biblical reference in Samuel Beckett's play, however, is the crucifixion myth. Vladimir ambiguously reminds Estragon that one of the two thieves was saved; and later when the Boy says that Godot spares him but beats his brother we immediately recall the crucifixion discourse. Only, there is a reversal of the biblical allegory of the sheep being rewarded and the goats damned. Crucifixion is also conveyed through the tree, the tramps' attempt to hang themselves from it, the skull in Lucky's speech and so fo

Act Two is yet another symbol of crucifixion. Vladimir's feeding Estragon on carrot is reminiscent of Jesus feeding a crowd of five thousand on meagre foods. The tree for Estragon seems "more like a bush", thus invoking Exodus's picture of Moses on Mount Sinai. These references are apparently disconnected, but the overall tone they create tempts the recipient more and more into a religious interpretation.

Beckett's problematization of religious elements in Waiting for Godot

Beckett, nevertheless, problematizes whatever religious element exists in the Waiting for Godot. We never find an answer to Vladimir's shocking question that why the other thief was not saved and why only one of the four saints narrated the incident. Our faith is at once destabilized; we calculate like Vladimir the percentage of redemption in a divine gambling. Just as religious bias has often slowed down human civilisation, and bigotry hindered human liberation, here the tramps' faith on Godot stops the linear timeline and prevents them from going away. It is religious faith once again that led the entire mankind to inaction:

"Estragon: Don't let's do anything. It's safer.
Vladimir: Let's wait and see what he says."

Faith is once again undermined as Estragon and Vladimir talk over the certainty of Godot's offerings:

"Estragon: A kind of prayer.
Vladimir: Precisely.
Estragon: A vague supplication.
Vladimir: Exactly.
Estragon: And what did he reply?
Vladimir: That he'd see."

There are also oblique hints to the Christian practice of confession. Estragon is least interested in Vladimir's discourse on crucifixion; and when Estragon wants to share a nightmare and thus get relief, Vladimir adamantly refuses to hear him.

In his first appearance Pozzo enters with all the embellishments of a false prophet, and initially Vladimir and Estragon mistake him as Godot. Can he be seen as Godot's alter ego, the religious oppressiveness? Pozzo whips Lucky, burdens him with sandbags, leads him by a rope and tells him when to act. At the extreme, Lucky can speak only when Pozzo gives him his hat and allows him to. Was Beckett suggesting through this the controlling nature of the Church?

The importance of messengers does not end with Pozzo and Lucky. Godot's errand-boy resembles Christ as God's messenger, and both meet similar mistreatment at their recipients. The Boy reinforces this allusion by telling that his master spares him but beats his brother, a relationship recalling Cain, Abel and their Lord. Ironically, the names Cain and Abel are later explicitly mentioned in the text.

Waiting for Godot thus abounds in biblical allegories, advocating more and more for a religious interpretation. Still, considering it only as a dramatised Christian allegory will be an oversimplification. Like Beckett, his play as well as his characters are n specific theory or interpretation. Viewing Waiting for Godot as a Christian play may be a way to approach it, but surely not the only one.

"Waiting for Godot" : Significance of Time

"Waiting For Godot" is dramatization of modern enigmas in a comical way.

"Waiting for Godot" appears as depthless play, "Nothing happens, no one comes, No one goes, and it is awful". However beneath its surface absurdity, there lie layer of meanings, presenting a coarse picture of human life. The play is composed of multiple themes. It has become a classic and provides the critics much to speculate on, when Beckett was asked who is Godot,? He replied, "If I knew, I would have said so in the play".

"Waiting for Godot", concerned with the hope of salvation through the working of grace has been considered as Christian or religious play. G.S. Erase is of the opinion that this is a modern morality play on permanent Christian theme; he mentions the play in the same breath as every man and the Pilgrim's progress. The tramps wait for Godot who may represent God and their persistence in waiting for Godot shows their faith in God. The mutual attachment of two tramps and Vladimir's protective attitude towards his friend has been interpreted as Christian virtue. When Beckett was asked about the theme of Waiting for Godot, he sometimes referred to a passage in the writing of St Augustine, "Do not despair-one of the thieves was saved. 00 not presume-one of the thieves was damned".

However the theme of two thieves on the cross, the theme of uncertainty of hope of salvation and the fortuitousness of the bestowal of grace do indeed seems to be an insignificant observation. Godot is nothing but a name for the fact that the life which goes on pointlessly is wrongly interpreted to mean "Waiting for Godot".

Disintegration and regression of man is another depressing interpretation of the paly. The play represents the disintegration of human beings, the climax in the play occurs when all the four characters fall to the ground upon one another, creating of formless mass from which Vladimir's voice emerges saying, "we are men". Nothing escapes the destructive force of this regression neither speech- torn to piece in the rhetoric of Pizza's monologue on twilight-nor thought-which is undetermined and destroyed by a whole series of absurd reasoning as well as by such passages as the incoherent speech delivered by Lucky. Luck's speech effectively represents the regression of man's thinking intelligence.

According to yet another view, the world represented in this play resembles France occupied by German during World War Il, when Beckett lived first in the occupied zone and then escaped to the unoccupied region, The play reminds us of the French Resistance organized by underground workers. How much waiting have gone in that bleak world. How many times must Resistance organizers have kept appointments with many who did not turn up? We can imagine why the arrival of Pozzo would have an unnerving effect on those who waited. Pozzo could be a Gestapo official clumsily disguised. The German occupation of France pervades the whole play. Godot himself is unpredictable on bestowing kindness and punishment. The parallel to Lane and Abel is evid bestowal of grace, which passes human, understanding, divides mankind into those that will be saved and those that will be damned.

But these interpretations, says Martin Esslin seem to overlook a number of essential features of the play- its constant stress on the essential uncertainty and the repeated demonstration of the futility of hopes pinned on him. According to this, whether Godot is meant to suggest his intervention as supernatural or whether he stands for a mythical human being, his exact nature is of secondary importance. So "the subject of the play is not Godot but waiting ... and Godot simply represents the objectives of our, waiting-and event, a thing, a person death". The play is a picture of the antics of man as he tries to distract himself until Godot comes. The two tramps, thus, while away their time in a succession of never ending games. In the very opening of the play, Estragon and Vladimir agree "Nothing to be alone". The only alternative left is, therefore, to wait for Godot Estragon, as time and again to be reminded of this fact:

"Let's go we can't Why not
We, re waiting for Godot
Ah"

Having nothing to do they childishly engage in playing games? Both of them take off shake and peer inside their boot and hat.

Waiting is to experience the action of time, which is constant change. Yet the ceaseless activity of time is self-defeating, purposeless and therefore null and void. The more things change, the more they are the same. Pozzo exclaims in his final great outburst, "Have you not done formatting me with your accursed time?" They give birth astride to grave, the light gleams an instant, then its night once again.

Still Vladimir and Estragon live in hope and wait for Godot whose coming will bring the flow of lime to a stop. Towards the end of the play when Vladimir is about to realize, he has been dreaming and must wake up and face the world as it is, Godot's messenger arrives, kinds his hopes and plunges him back into the passivity to waiting.

The play is also considered to be a fable about a kind of life that has no longer any hope that is the meaninglessness of life. The way by, the two tramps pass time is indicative of the boredom and triviality of human activities. The lack of significance in life and the constant suffering which existence is, the two tramps are dimly aware of the want of action in their lives but they still want to go on. Majority of people in today's world do not give up living when their life becomes pointless. The tramps are waiting for nothing in particular. They have even to remind each other of the fact that they are waiting and of what they are waiting for. Thus actually they are not waiting for anything. It should not of course be regarded as the "Key to the play".

Another theme is that, suffering is an inseparable part of human condition. Vladimir cannot even laugh without suffering. Estragon's feet make life a long torture for him. They have nowhere to rest their heads. This suffering pervades the episode of Lucky and Pozzo 100. Lucky gives expression to the human condition by dancing what he styles the "Dance of the Net". In Act-II both Lucky and Pozzo have suffered great physical affliction. The most is that suffering is both purposeless and without the co

the end.

The theme of exploitation is only implicit in the main story but it is explicit in the episode of Pozzo and Lucky. The Net, in whim Lucky believes himself to be caught, is an economic one. The exploited become so demoralized that are unable to offer any resistance to the exploiters. Pozzo states that it was just once that Lucky failed to obey his command. Even when Pozzo has become blinded, Lucky does not have the guts to free himself from his enslavement.

Into this wonderfully suggestive and subtle play Beckett incorporates such minor themes as the inadequacy of human language as a mean of communication and the illusory nature of such concepts as part and future.

It is thus peculiar richness of a play like "Waiting for Godot" that it opens vistas to so many perspectives. It is an existentialist play at the same time, it also mocks at the attitudes of existentialism. It seems to have some religious implications even though it seems to question profoundly the Christian conception of salvation and grace. It is open to philosophical religious and psychological interpretation, yet about all, it is a poem on time, and the mysteries of existence. It is the paradox of change and stability.

"Who is Godot in " Waiting for Godot"

Ever since its first production "Godot" has been a puzzle for critics. In 1958 Beckett was asked to explain Godot's character. The dramatist promptly replied, "If I know I would have said so in the play". This is to say in other words that Godot could be interpreted in many ways. To whatever extent we stretch our imagination it is never clear who he is? The majority of the critics are, however, of the view that Godot is God whom human being asks for help when they are helpless and miserable.

What we learn from the play is that Godot has made a promise to Vladimir that he would see him and Estragon near a tree on a country road. In compliance Vladimir and Estragon are waiting for Godot's arrival. They have a faint hope that Godot might bring same change in their lives. It is ironic that they do not know exactly what they would ask him for? Vladimir says, "Too nothing definite". Godot did not promise anything to him.

He is in absurd situation. The question arises, when the tramps know that Godot will not bring any change in their lives, then why do they wait for him? The answer is simple, Estragon and Vladimir wait for him as a mother of habit exactly in the manner as human beings think that some superpower can rescue them from the terrible situation in which the,' find themselves.

The play clearly shows that Godot has his own limitations. Before making a firm promise to the tramps, he has to consult his family, friends, agents, correspondents, books and bank accounts. From these details, the impression, which we get, is that Godot is either a bureaucrat or a minister. If Godot is God, then he is a bureaucrat God that is quite whimsical. Moreover, he has no sense of justice. He beats the shepherd boy for nothing. Lucky in his famous speech refers to personal God of men who is, of course, incapable of fairness. It means that God is not a time judge, because he rewards one with grace but punishes the other for nothing. If this interpretation is true, one thing becomes clear that "Waiting for Godot" is a satire on Christian concept of hope and salvation, But this critical judgment cannot be supported by further proof. Thus, the connection between God and Godot is immaterial, Certainly there is little resemblance between the two. Another interpretation of Godot is that he is a symbol of power and authority.

This can be confirmed from the dialogues of Vladimir and Estragon when Pozzo appears on the scene with a whip in his hand, they take him for Godot later on, and they themselves reject their assumption. At this point in the play another description makes us to imagine 'Godot' as God. The boy informs that Godot has white beard and has mastery over goats and sheep. According to biblical connotation human beings are the flock of God to whom people normally turn when they are in trouble. But the play is a tragedy in which no one comes to their rescue.

Godot can be interpreted in still another way, His arrival can be identified with prosperity and happiness. As no change occurs and nobody comes, this interpretation is also undependable. Psychologically, Godot could be unconscious of man. He is as inaccessible as the sub-conscious of man, But the physical descriptions with clear-cur features such as white beard do not support this meaning. Of course, it is highly illogical to gather our impression of Godot and show him to have any similarity or resemblance.

According to some critics, Godot's failure to come is bitter comment of the second coming of Christ. This meaning is also purely fanciful because the act of waiting is essentially an obscure act. The purpose of waiting has never been defined by Beckett.

In finale, we can reassert our first contention that Godot is an enigma, a mystery, and a puzzle.

Waiting for Godot : Nothing Happens Twice

There is nothing done in it; no development is to be found: and there is no beginning and no end." Discuss this view.

When Waiting for Godot was first presented on the stage, it offered to theatre audiences an experience unknown before. It was a new kind of play, a play which broke entirely fresh ground. It was a wholly unconventional dramatic composition. It was unconventional in respect of its character-portrayal as well as its plot-construction. It was unconventional also in not depicting any dramatic conflict in the accepted sense of the word. In fact, there was an all-round deficiency of action, characterization and emotion in this play. And yet the play proved immensely popular, and its popularity has never declined.

The critic who said that Waiting for Godot was play in which "nothing happens, twice", was not far wrong. The keynote to this play is to be found in the memorable words which Estragon utters with regard to his life and the life of his friend, Vladimir, Those words are: "nothing happens, nobody comes, nobody goes, it's awful!" Because of the strange paucity of action and situation in the play, a critic in sheer desperation has remarked that practically nothing happens in it:

"There is nothing done in it; no development is to be formed; and there is no beginning and no end." Indeed, the entire action boils down to this.

On a country road, near a tree, two tramps, Estragon and Vladimir, idle away their time waiting for Godot. One takes off his boots, and the other talks of the Gospels. One eats carrot with the other offers. They have nothing substantial to say each other. They address each other by two diminutives, Gogo and Didi. They cannot go away because they are waiting for someone called Godot. Eventually a boy arrives with a message that Godot will not come this evening but surely tomorrow. The two trams decide to go way and come back again the next day. But they do not move and the curtain falls. Earlier, two other characters, a cruel master called Pozzo and his half- crazy slave called Lucky, incomprehensible speech made up of disconnected fragments. In Act II the waiting goes on; Pozzo and Lucky pass by once more, but the master I now blind and the slave is dumb. The master and the slave stumble and fall and are helped on their way by the tramps. The same boy comes back with the same message-namely that Godot will not come this evening but that he will come on the following day. Everything remains as it was in the beginning. The two tramps would like to hang themselves, but they have not got a suitable rope. They decide to go away and come back again the next day. But they do not move and the curtain falls.

Waiting for Godot is a play made up out of nothingness. The spectator or the reader is fascinated by the strangeness of what he witnesses, hoping for a turn in the situation or a solution, which never comes. They paly holds the audience from the beginning to the end, and that audience remains riveted to the two tramps who do nothing and say practically nothing. The two tramps are incapable of anything more than mere beginnings of impulses, desires, thoughts, moods, memories, and impressions. Everything that arises in them sinks back into forgetfulness before it arrives anywhere. They both live, to a large extent, in a twilight-state and though one of them, Vladimir, is more aware than his companion, complete physical listlessness prevails throughout. Their incapacity to live or to end life (and this is the opening and concluding theme of the play) is intimately linked with their love of helplessness and of which-dreams. They are full of frustrations and resentments, and they cling to each other with a mixture of inter-dependence and affection.

There had been in the pasts some attempts to do away with theatrical conventions regarding action on the stage. But this play marks a sort of climax. No dramatist had ever taken so great a risk before, because what this play deals with is the essential, without any beating about the bush, the means employed to deal with it being the minimum conceivable.

Waiting for Godot does not tell a story; it explores a static situation. Act II precisely repeats the pattern of Act I. Act I ends thus:

Estragon: Well, shall we go?
Vladimir: Yes, let's go
(They do not move)

Act II ends with the same lines of dialogue, but spoken by the same characters in reversed order. No dramatist had ever taken such an extreme position. Not only have conventions been done away with, but even some necessary information form the reader. According to the conventional view, a play was to have a certain plot necessitating certain situations and actions, and characters who performed those actions and who were caught up in the tangles of the plot. But Waiting for Godot hardly offers a plot. It is as if we were watching a sort of regression beyond nothing. The little we are given to begin with soon disintegrates like Pozzo, who comes back bereft of sight, dragged by Lucky bereft of speech. "This is becoming really insignificant," says one of the two tramps at this point. ""' Not enough," replies the other. This answer is followed by a long silence. From beginning to end the dialogue seems to be dying.

At various stages one or the other of the two tramps suggests something to pass the time-making conversation, repenting, hanging themselves, telling stories, abusing one another, playing at Pozzo and Lucky. But each time the attempt fails; after a few uncertain exchanges they peter out, give up, admit failure. The words "we're waiting for Godot" occur again and again like a refrain But it is a senseless and tiresome refrain; it has no theatrical values; it represents neither hope nor longing. A typical situation in the play is Pozzo and Lucky falling down, followed by the two tramps, and all of them lying or the ground in a helpless heap, from which one tramp's face emerges to pronounce: "we are men."

Waiting for Godot is based on Beckett's dual obsession with journey and stasis. No doubt a number of adjustments are made during the interval between the two Acts: Pozzo goes blind and Lucky becomes dumb; the tree puts forth some leaves, Estragon's boots are changed, and Lucky gets a new hat. These changes serve to show that something is still taking its course in time. The tree's movement from winter to spring apparently in a Single night is not something believable. The tree moves fast in relation to the tramps, reminding us that objective time proceeds, indifferent to their anguish. But otherwise there is very little movement. Sentences remain unfinished: stories are interrupted (for example, that of the English man in the brothel); Lucky is not allowed to complete his terrible speech; thoughts, like the speculation on the two thieves, do not reach a conclusion; actions, like the two attempts of the tramps to hang themselves, do not take complete shape; indeed thoughts and actions fade... into a helpless uncertainty, contusion and silence. All the devices of the tramps to pass their time eventually collapse into nothing.

No one in the theatre had, before Beckett, dealt with the experience of ignorance and impotence. Nor could anyone do so as long as the dramatist and the public thought along the traditional lines of a well-made play with a strong story involving conflict, character-development, and a final solution. Impotence cannot produce action, and without action there can be neither conflict nor solution. Movement would, therefore, be clearly impossible under these circumstances. But, according to the traditional view, a static drama was a contradiction in terms. Beckett solved the difficulty by substituting situation for story, and direct impact of logical, indirect description. But he did more than solve on particular artistic problem, He created in effect the whole new concept of drama much as the Impressionists created a whole new concept of painting.

Thus, to a very large extent, Beckett has stripped down action, situation, emotion, and characterization. It may be noted, however, that the stripping down process can go much further as Beckett himself went on to prove in Endgame and Happy Days. The extreme, in this respect, is reached in Beckett's play. How It Is in characters crawl painfully along face downward in the mud and communicate by jabs with a tin-opener. Compared to any of these, Vladimir and Estragon are highly articulate persons possessing a sharp sensitivity. It is to be noted, also that despite the .paucity of incident, the play achieves, with conspicuous success, Its purpose of communicating the experience of waiting, of boredom, of helplessness, of impotence, and of ignorance to the audience.

Human Relationships in Waiting for Godot

In 'Waiting for Godot' we have the two major relationships which mainly constitute the central theme of the drama. Inspite of Vladimir-Estragon relationship and Puzzo-Lucky relationship we have in this play the absent Godot's relationship with these characters and with his servant boy. We have to judge how these relationships form the fabric of the drama.

Vladimir and Estragon are the two main figures of the play. Estragon seems to be a cowardly person who suffers from nightmarish visions. So he needs the care and guardianship of his friend and really cannot do anything without him. Vladimir on the other hand is certainly more intelligent and more alert than Estragon. But inspite of that he is more or less a pathetic character finding himself quite himself and feeling compelled indefinitely to wait for Godot who is likely to bring about a change in the present situation but whose arrival seems to be very doubtful. Both Estragon and Vladimir represent the ordeal of waiting. They also represent ignorance, helplessness, impotence and boredom. They do not have the essential knowledge; they do not know who exactly Godot is; they do not know what Godot will do for them; they do not know what would happen if they stopped waiting for Godot. They are forced to resort to various devices to pass time but each attempt sizzles out. This passing of the time is a mutual obsession with the two men. Nothingness is what these tramps are fighting against, and nothingness is the reason why they keep talking. The condition of the two helpless individuals is the condition of everyman.

Vladimir-Estragon relationship symbolizes a relationship of naturalistic. Occasionally the two tramps talk of parting but never take the suggestion seriously. They illustrate the bond of understanding. They are full of frustration and resentment, but they cling to each other with a mixture of interdependence and affection deriving comfort from calling each other by the childish names 'Gogo' and 'Didi'. Again they are incapable of anything more than mere beginnings of impulse, desires, thoughts, moods, memories and impressions. Vladimir compares their proud past with their gloomy present now and then.

Vladimir and Estragon are the distinct individuals and Estragon are the distinct individuals having different characters, attitudes and temperaments. They are alive in a non-world. In spite of their inaction and pointlessness of their existence these two men still want to go on like millions of people who want to go even when their life becomes pointless.

The theme of the disintegration and regression is mainly symbolized by Puzzo-Lucky relationship. Puzzo and Lucky symbolize the relationship between capital and labour or between wealth and the artist. Some critics tell us that Puzzo is no other than Godot himself. According to this view Godot is God and Puzzo is, therefore, God. Some critics also are of the view that while Puzzo and Lucky may be body and intellect, master and slave, capitalist and proletariat, colonizer and colonized, cain and Abel, sadist and inasochist, Joyce and Beckett they represent essentially and more simply one way of getting through life with someone else. Just as Vladimir and Estragon, more sympathically another way of doing so.

The relationship between Pozzo and Lucky is reflected in the physical bond that holds them together—the link of the rope. The relationship between them is that of dominant and the dominating, though in the second act it takes on the aspect that of the dumb leading the blind. The relationship also represents the exploitation of the social life where Pozzo is one of the haves, dinning on chicken and wine, while Lucky is the have-not to whom he throws the gnawed bones. The drudgery and inhuman treatment have reduced Lucky to the level of an animal. Lucky has to bear all sorts of bags and baggage. But he is not treated as a man. So he is below the level of animals, rather a mere machine in some respect.

Lucky and Puzzo create a metaphor of society. Although Pozzo and Lucky present an obvious and sharp contrast to each other. They have one thing in common—They are both driven by a desperate attempt to avoid panic which would ruin them if they lost their belief. It becomes more and more evident in the course of the play that Lucky believes that his safety his only with the pattern of a mutual sadomasochistic relationship between them. Moreover, Pozzo-Lucky pair may be compared to the collective pseudo-ego.

One critic is of the view that Pozzo represents mankind and Lucky represents Christ. If this view is accepted what takes place before the tramps is the reacting of the Redemption. Another possible interpretation is that Pozzo represents the psychological aspect of human personality and Lucky the spiritual which is in time brutalized by the treatment.

Moreover, Godot seems to be some sort of medieval land-lord. He has agents and correspondents working for him; he has a shepherd who rears the sheep and a goatherd who rears the goats. Actually Godot is capricious in his relationship, he beats the one but loves the other. The tramps are afraid of Godot, so is the boy. Thus Godot rules through fear.

Thus, these three inter-relationships are very much significant from the dramatic point of view. The tramps' waiting symbolizes humanity's vain hope of salvation. Moreover, the meaninglessness and the helplessness which are the main issues of the drama are focused by these relations.

Waiting for Godot : Theme of Waiting

A Situation Having a General Human Application: - The two key words in the title are "waiting" and "Godot". What Godot exactly means has been the subject of much controversy. It has been suggested that Godot is a weakened or diminutive form of the word "God." Godot may therefore suggest the intervention of a supernatural agency. Or perhaps Godot stands for a mythical human being whose arrival is expected to change the situation. We may presume, too, that both these possibilities (a supernatural agency and a supposed human being) may be implied through the use of the name "Godot". Furthermore, although Godot fails to appear in the play, he is as real a character as any of those whom we actually see. However, the subject of the play is not Godot; the subject is "waiting", the act of waiting as an essential characteristic aspect of the human condition. Throughout their lives, human beings always wait for something; and Godot simply represents the objective of their waiting—an event, a thing, a person, death. Beckett has thus depicted in this play a situation which has a general human application.

A Direct Presentation of Waiting, Ignorance, Impotence and Boredom: - At first sight this play does not appear to have any particular relationship with the human predicament. For instance, we feel hardly any inclination to identify ourselves with the two garrulous tramps who are indifferent to all the concerns of civilised life. Godot sounds as if he might have some significance; but he does not even appear on the stage. However, soon we are made to realise that Vladimir and Estragon are waiting and that their waiting is of a particular kind. Although they may say that they are waiting for Godot, they cannot say who or what Godot is, nor can they be sure that they are waiting at the right place or on the right day, or what would happen when Godot comes, or what would happen if they stopped waiting. They have no watches, no time-tables, and there is no one from whom they can get much information. They cannot get the essential knowledge, and they are ignorant. Without the essential knowledge they cannot act, and so they are impotent. They produce in us a sense of baffled helplessness which we experience when forced to remain in a situation which we do not understand and over which we have no control. All that they do is to seek ways to pass the time in the situation in which they find themselves. They tell stories, sing songs, play verbal games, and pretend to be Pozzo and Lucky, do physical exercises. But all these activities are mere stop-gaps serving only to pass the time. They understand this perfectly. "Come on, Gogo," pleads Didi, breaking off a rejection on the two thieves crucified with Christ, "return the ball, can't you, once in a way?" and Estragon does. As Estragon says later, "We don't manage too badly, eh Didi, between, the two of us…….We always find something, eh Didi, to give us the impression we exist" Here we have the very essence of boredom—actions repeated long after the reason for them has been forgotten, and talk purposeless in itself but valuable as a way to kill time. We could appropriately say that the play is not about Godot or even about waiting; the play puts "waiting" on the stage. The play is waiting, ignorance, impotence, boredom, all these having been made visible on the stage before us. As a critic says, Beckett in his dramas does not write about things but presents the things themselves. In other words, a play by Beckett is a direct expression or presentation of the thing itself as distinct from any description of it or statement about it. In the waiting of the two tramps we, the audience, recognise our own experience. We may never have waited by a tree on a deserted country road for a distant acquaintance to keep his appointment, but we have certainly experienced other situations in which we have waited and waited. We may have waited and waited for a communication offering a job, or for the arrival of a train, or for a love-letter, or for something to turn up. In other words we can discover a common ground between ourselves and the two tramps who are waiting for Godot. We feel with them and with millions of others who have known ignorance, impotence, and boredom. Here is then the recognisable significance of the play and it is this which accounts for the play's widespread appeal.

The Mood of Vain Expectancy: - Vladimir and Estragon have travelled far towards total nihilism, but they have not fully achieved it. They still retain enough remnants of hope to be tormented by despair. And in place of hope as a dynamic, they have expectancy. This is the main motif of the play, spelt out in the title which in an earlier version was implied: Waiting. The two tramps are in a place and in a mental state in which nothing happened and time stands still. Their main preoccupation is to pass the time as well as they can until night comes and they can go. They realise the futility of their exercises and filling up the hours with pointless activity. In this sense their waiting is mechanical; it is the same thing as not moving. In another sense, it is an obligation. They have to remain where they are, though they resent doing so and would like to leave. This might be called a moral obligation, since it involves the possibilities of punishment and reward. If Godot comes, a new factor may be introduced into their existence, whereas if they leave they will certainly miss him. Their waiting therefore contains a certain element of hope, no matter how cynical they may be about it. This mood of expectancy has also a universal validity, because whenever we wait we are expectant even though we are almost certain that our waiting will not be rewarded.

"Waiting" and The Flow of Time: - It is in the act of waiting that we experience the flow of time in its purest, most evident form. When we are active, we tend to forget the passage of time; but if we are waiting passively, we are confronted with the action of time itself. Being subject to the flux of time, human beings are, at no single moment, identical with themselves. We can never be sure that the human beings we meet are the same today as they were yesterday. When Pozzo and Lucky first appear, neither Vladimir nor Estragon seems to recognise them; Estragon even takes Pozzo for Godot. But after they have gone, Vladimir comments that they have changed since their last appearance. Estragon insists that he did not know them while Vladimir insists: "We know them, I tell you. You forget everything." In Act II, when Pozzo and Lucky re-appear, cruelly deformed by the action of time, the tramps again have their doubts whether these are the same people whom they met on the previous day. Nor does Pozzo remember them. Here, then, is another aspect of "waiting" which is conveyed to us: the act of waiting makes us experience the flow of time. To wait means to experience the action of time, which is constant change. And yet, as nothing real ever happens, that change is in itself an illusion. The more things change, the more they are the same. That is the terrible stability of the world. "The tears of the world are a constant quantity," says Pozzo, "For each one who begins to weep somewhere else another stops." One day is like another, and when we die, we might never have existed. As Pozzo exclaims in his great final outburst:

> "Have you not done tormenting me with your accursed time? They give birth astride of a grave, the light gleams an instant, then it's night once more."

Still Vladimir and Estragon live in hope: they wait for Godot whose coming will bring the flow of time to a stop. Godot represents to the two tramps, peace and rest from waiting. They are hoping to be saved from the fleetingness and instability of the illusion of time, and to find peace and permanence outside it. Then they will no longer be tramps or homeless wanderers, but will have arrived home.

Themes of Habit and "The Suffering of Being" : - Waiting for Godot is a dramatization of the themes of habit, boredom, and "the suffering of being". Habit is a great deadener, says Vladimir; and, by the time he says so, he and Estragon have had about ninety, minutes on the stage to prove it. It is the sound of their own voices that re-assures the two tramps of their own existence, of which they are not otherwise always certain because the evidence of their senses is so dubious. The tramps have another reason also to keep talking. They are drowning out those voices that assail them in the silence, just as they assailed nearly all Beckett's heroes in the novels.

The Pointlessness of Existence: - This play is a parable, Godot may stand for God, or for a mythical human being, or for the meaning of life, or for death, or for something else. The play is a fable about a kind of life that has no longer any point. This fable is a representation of stagnant life. It is a fable that suffers from a lack of cohesion because a lack of cohesion is its very subject-matter. This fable does not relate an action because the action it relates is life without action. This fable offers no story, because it describes man eliminated from, and deprived of history. The characters in this play have been pulled out of the world, and they no longer have anything to do with it. The world has become empty for them. The two heroes, or anti-heroes, are merely alive, but no longer living in a world. And this concept is carried through with a merciless consequence. Where a world no longer exists, there can no longer be a possibility of a collision with the world. In our world today millions of people have begun increasingly to feel that they live in a world in which they do not act but are acted upon. The two tramps, inspite of their inaction and the pointlessness of their existence, still want to go on. The millions of people today do not after all give up living when their life becomes pointless. The tramps are waiting for nothing in particular. They even have to remind each other of the very fact that they are waiting and of what they are waiting for. Thus, actually they are not waiting for anything. But, exposed as they are to the daily continuation of their existence, they cannot help concluding that they must be waiting. And, exposed to their continued waiting, they cannot help assuming that they are waiting for something. It is meaningless to ask who or what the expected Godot is. Godot is nothing but the name for the fact that the life which goes on pointlessly is wrongly interpreted to mean waiting, or as waiting for something. What appears to be a positive attitude of the two tramps amounts to a double negation: their existence is pointless and they are incapable of recognising the pointlessness of their existence. (Beckett himself said that he was not so much concerned with Godot as with waiting).

Waiting for Godot : Man's Battle with Himself

Although it appears on the surface that Samuel Beckett's Waiting for Godot is a tragicomedy about two rather pitiful vagrants and their brief encounter with another pair of sad and confused men. In fact Beckett was writing about man's battle with himself.

Estragon, whose main concern is releasing his sore feet from the constraints of their smelly, tight boots, takes life on the chin. He seems to believe that all one needs to do is go passively along with whatever life happens to put in our way and it will all sort itself out eventually. Why waste our time trying to mould life to the way we would like it to be? Why fight the inevitable? If 'they' are intent on giving us a beating, we might as well let them. It will come to an end and we may get away with less of a beating if we don't fight back: we can then relax again - until the next time. If, while allowing life to do its worst we die, that's okay too.

Vladimir, on the other hand, wants more. He keeps hoping something will happen to make his life more agreeable. He hopes Godot will provide an answer; any answer. Vladimir can't understand why Estragon is so carefree acute; about allowing himself to be beaten and humiliated.

Vladimir is the side of us that expects life to provide our answers. The side that looks to others for help in recognising the treasures we are sure are there just waiting for us to embrace them.

Neither Vladimir nor Estragon is too fond of life to dismiss the idea of ending it by hanging from a nearby tree - but they both know it won't really happen. It's simply a way of passing the time: a sort of 'I Spy' - I spy with my little eye, a tree for hanging ourselves on - the way we sometimes dwell on our problems because, paradoxically, we enjoy feeling sorry for ourselves.

Vladimir needs Estragon but the feeling isn't reciprocated, though Estragon is happy enough to spend time with Vladimir. We need to convince ourselves that we are worthwhile. We search our conscience for affirmations of our reason for being. If we don't care what happens to us, we have no need for a close association with our conscience. Vladimir and Estragon were each other's consciences.

When Pozzo and Lucky appear on the scene, Vladimir sees another chance for a way out of the doldrums. Could Pozzo be Godot? No? Ah well, he still may be a welcome diversion while they continue to wait.

Pozzo uses Lucky while he has something to offer but as soon as he has run out of whatever Pozzo needed from him, Lucky loses his appeal and is allowed to slip backwards into abject misery; good only as a beast of burden to be sold to the highest bidder.

Vladimir and Estragon feel sorry for Lucky but do nothing to help him, especially when it seems being helped is something Lucky no longer believes in nor wants. It's easier to believe Lucky is simply someone who has lost his sense of reason and might as well be left alone. Lucky's plight is put in the Too Hard basket.

Often we see only what we can use in a person rather than seeing the person himself. When we grow weary of someone who no longer appeals to us or can no longer provide us with what we need, they become a burden. We become blind to the things that once attracted us to them and can no longer hear their pleas to be loved and needed.

On a larger scale, once we stop caring about our fellow man, we become blind to the problems of the world and the oppressed can lose the ability to speak to us.

Time, as Dylan Thomas said, passes. Was it yesterday? Was it last year? When did Vladimir and Estragon last wait here for Godot? When did they last see Pozzo and Lucky? Does it matter? In the scheme of things, what is a day; or a year, or a lifetime?

Man lives his life waiting. He waits to be born, he waits to become a man, he waits to become successful, he waits to find true love, he waits to find peace; he waits to die.

While he waits, he considers. Faced with many decisions, man argues with himself about which path to take. Should he, like Vladimir, keep hoping tomorrow will bring the answers? Should he, like Estragon, forget about looking for answers? Forget the questions. Should he let life unfold around him and simply 'go with the flow'?

If those around him are suffering, if they are under threat, should he try to help? If he does and he receives a kick in the shins for his trouble, should he give up and let someone else deal with it or should he pick up the handkerchief and try again to wipe the brow of the oppressed?

Waiting for Godot is man waiting for life to unravel its mysteries. It is man and his conscience. It is man's inhumanity towards man. It is the question of meaning. Is there a meaning? Are we right to look for answers or should we go blindly forward while we can, pausing only to give our feet an airing, because the answers, like Godot, will never come and nothing we think or do will make any difference.

Important quotes from the text

"The tears of the world are a constant quantity. For each one who begins to weep somewhere else another stops. The same is true of the laugh. Let us not then speak ill of our generation, it is not any unhappier than its predecessors. Let us not speak well of it either. Let us not speak of it at all. It is true the population has increased."

Waiting For Godot : Role of Chance

The purpose of life is something mystic, that us, humans, have always seeked, yet don't really know how to find. What is our reason to live? The fact we can't explain it, leads us to believe it's because of a force greater then ours. There are lots of different names to call it. God. Fate. We don't know what the meaning of life is, and there's noone we can ask. This feeling can be pretty depressing in itself, and Waiting for Godot focuses on this feeling and on the way people try to find something to live for

The play basically says that our lives rely on chance entirely, and because of it, they are meaningless, and thats the reason why people rely on unknown forces guiding them through life. And the interesting part is, that even the sources, that should justify the fact that there are greater powers in the universe then we can comprehend, say that human existence has a lot to do with chance. This is clearified when a story from the bible about two thieves is mentioned. „One of the two thiefes was rescued. Thats a reasonable percentage." (Beckett, 8) Percentage represents that chance involved in human life, and the fact that that our fate relies on chance shows that randomness is an important factor in ones life. Beckett uses this quote from the Bible to show, that even a sacred text that has been an a help for thousands of years acknowledges the existence of chance. One of the two thieves. Thats 50%. A 50% chance for salvation, and we have absolutely no control regarding this chance.

The fact that God (if he exists) stays silent, makes the chaos even bigger. The situation that God lets life work like this, makes him guilty. The people's belief in God is explainable though, because it makes them believe that there's a reason to live. As Pascal, a french philisopher said (he was a believer by the way), there's nothing to lose, because if it turns out God doesnt exist, then people wouldnt care for anything anyway, but if it turns out he does, at least you were on the safe side all the way. But God's silence is the main thing that keeps the characters in hopelessness, and makes this work of art a tragedy, even though the characters act comically. Either God doesnt exist, or he just doesnt care. And this statement tells that there's no divine involvment in life.

The world in Waiting for Godot is one without any meaning, which shows that chaos and hopelessness are the leading forces of the world. The events in the Vladimir and Estragon are at the same place every day, waiting for Godot, doing the same activites over and over again to pass time. This shows the chaotic's world effects on the characters. As Einstein says: „The sign of going mad is doing something over and over again, and expecting different results."

We don't know the time cycle the events transpire in. Time is a very intersting aspect in this play. It exists, but the reasons for this are not entirely clear, because the present, the past, the future, these things don't mean anything in this world. Time is a mess. A very good symbolization of the fact that things are still happening though, are Pozzo and Lucky. They are completely different in Act I and Act II. (Pozzo is healthy/blind, Lucky is able to speak/mute). Beckett uses the change in the situation of Lucky and Pozzo to show that time, and therefore, life, is meaningless.

Humans try to be distracted from this fact. Vladimir and Estragon both try to stay cheerful in the play, and try to pass time with pointless activites. Doing this, they act comical, which adds a humorous aspect to the play. "The positive attitude of the two tramps thus amounts to a double negation: their inability to recognize the senselessness of their position" (Andres, 143-144).

Vladimir and Estragon do various things to get distracted from the endless wait. Discussing mundane topics, sleeping, and sometimes contemplating suicide. They do this because they try to ignore the fact that they are waiting for a figure, which is part of their imagination, and might never even come.

They are waiting for Godot, and they think his arrival will be a salvation to all their problems. They probably know this is only a wish that might never come true, but at least they have something to look forward to. The only other alternative is death, and although they think about it, they don't have the courage to do it. In the end all a human can do are pointless actions, or to perish.

They do these pointless actions because they hope relief will come in a form of an outside force. Godot symbolizes this force, and although he likely doesn't exist, he at least gives their lives a meaning.By waiting, they achieve at least a bit of meaning. Vladimir, while contemplating whether or not to help Pozzo in Act II, declares, "What are we doing here, that is the question. And we are blessed in this, that we happen to know the answer. Yes, in this immense confusion one thing alone is clear. We are waiting for Godot to come-" (Beckett, 51)

Even though salvation is an illusion, it's needed to be able to handle life, and that humans have to rely on „Godots" to live. It's not clear whether Godot is real or not. This is shown by the fact that in both acts, they mistake Pozzo for Godot. That means they have never seen Godot before.The only contact they have with him is the messenger boy he sends everyday, telling them that Godot will come the next day. When Vladimir finally realises that Godot in fact will never come, great depression overcomes him. Vladimir realizes that he has no choice but to put up with the illusion, and go on. There's no point. But there's no other option.

"All of these characters go on, but in the old ruts, and only by retreating into patterns of thought that have already been thoroughly discredited. In the universe of this play, 'on' leads nowhere" (Webb, 41).

"Waiting for Godot" is all about how the world is based on chance, and the fact that a world based on chance can't have a real time sequence, and is therefore pointless, which makes life pointless too. Realizing this, humans will create distractions and diversions, in the form of patterns and reliance on divine forces, to provide them a purpose to live.

In my opinion this book is a very good demonstration of the big questions every human has to face in their lifetime.

Seeing Myself in Waiting for Godot

Some people wondered why in high school my favorite book was Waiting for Godot, a drama described on the title page as "a two-act play in which nothing happens twice." In fact, my liking a play that does not portray a series of connected incidents telling a story but instead presents a pattern of images showing bewildered people in an incomprehensible universe initially baffled me too, as my partiality was more felt than thought. But then I read a piece by the critic Martin Esslin, who articulated my feelings. He wrote in "The Search for the Self" that throughout our lives we always wait for something, and Godot simply represents the objective of our waiting—an event, a thing, a person, death. It is in the act of waiting that we experience the flow of time in its purest most evident form. (31)

I realized that I was seventeen in high school passively waiting for something amazing to happen to me just like Vladimir and Estragon. I also realized that experiencing time flowing by unproductively was not for me regardless of how "pure" that experience might be. At several points in the play, Estragon states that he wants to leave, but Vladimir always responds, "We can't . . . we're waiting for Godot" (8). Neither one knows why the wait nor who Godot is or looks like, and they both admit, when asked by Pozzo why they mistook him for Godot, that "we hardly know him at all" (20). Yet, they wait for him instead of looking within themselves for meaning in their lives. They even turn to close-at-hand sources about them to provide reasons for their wait: from inside a hat or a boot (8). But, as Lucky points out, the "reasons [are] unknown" and always will be (28). Therefore, their external search is pointless to give life meaning. Or put another way, Vladimir and Estragon wait endlessly for life to begin.

As simple as it is, I see myself in them, waiting for someone or something to bring me meaning, to guide me, to spark my life. The existentialist ideas behind much of Waiting for Godot cut to the quick, as I, too, struggle through life trying to achieve some sort of purposeful meaning (Bryce). Like everyone else, I am a victim of waiting and going nowhere fast. As embarrassing as it is to me now, in high school, I ached as I searched to fill an empty part of me with love or true friendship, and at last I found him! But rather than acting on what I felt for him, I sat there and waited, hoping that he would notice me, the perfect soul mate. I did everything I could to draw attention, all those silly girl things like wearing tons of make up, dressing in cute outfits, and trying new hair styles. Only, I never made the effort to reveal my feelings for him and possibly create something meaningful: finding out whether or not my emptiness would go away. Because of my inability to create purposeful action, I lost my chance. He found someone else, and I never saw him after that. To paraphrase Otis Redding, after that I was determined not to be like Vladimir and Estragon "just sittin' on the side of the road, / wasting time" (7-8). No longer would I demurely wait for Prince Charming, and, even more importantly, no longer would I wait for another to give my life meaning. I must look within first. Though I want love and will continue the search, Waiting for Godot nevertheless spoke to me then as it speaks to me now: I shall take control of my own struggle through life no matter how bewildering and incomprehensible it, the world, and the universe may be.

While waiting for Godot, Vladimir and Estragon experience the flow of time "in its purest most evident form" (Esslin 31), which means, ironically, that time is hardl shows that none of the characters ever actually knows how much time has passed. For example, in the play's beginning, Estragon and Vladimir do not even know what day it is. The characters know that they are to wait for Godot on a Saturday, but Estragon states, "but what Saturday? And is it Saturday? Is it not rather Sunday? Or Monday? Or Friday?" (10). The second act of the play claims to start on the next day, but the phrase the next day can be interpreted as any day after the first act. When Vladimir and Estragon return to the tree where they are supposed to wait for Godot, Vladimir insists that both he and Estragon were there the day before and tells Estragon, "But we were there together, I could swear it!" (68). Estragon, however, has no memory of that. Coming across Pozzo and Lucky, Vladimir and Estragon discover that Pozzo and Lucky have become blind and mute. After Vladimir pesters him about when he became blind, Pozzo states, "I woke up one fine day and was blind as Fortune. Don't Question me! The blind have no notion of time" (99). Having a limited amount of time on one's hands—a lifetime, for example—does not matter if one sees no purpose and does nothing to make life meaningful. Beckett's characters continue to go without purposeful action and, thus, live an absurd life devoid of meaning.

I confess that before my encounter with Godot, I never really thought about time or even what day of the week it was. None of it really mattered. Every day seemed just another day: school, work, friends, soccer practice, whatever. And worse, when I experienced my crush on that guy, I became completely oblivious to time. Time evaporated, and the world was slipping from my grasp. Friends disappeared; school became a blur. I cannot remember work at all. And not because I was in Never-Never Land with him that time stopped, but because I was waiting doing nothing that I let time stop, and my life became foolishly absurd. The play forced me to ask what exactly it was that I had been doing with my life, and am I now creating purposeful action? This question stays in my mind. Godot gives me pause to reflect on who I am, what I am doing here, and the dreams I want to pursue.

Ruby Cohn states, "Godot is the promise that is always awaited but never fulfilled" (45). Vladimir and Estragon never break through the state of nothingness because they use the excuse that they will be given purposeful action only when Godot arrives. Beckett ridicules people who wait for someone like Godot to tell them what to do with life. It is their excuse for inactivity. Godot will never arrive. Essentially Godot is waiting for Vladimir and Estragon to do something, but neither Vladimir nor Estragon knows what to do. But I do, and the play reinforces my resolve to continue pursuing my dreams, my purposeful action, despite how difficult or lonely the struggle. I shall not end up on the wayside waiting to "be saved" (60), shrugging my shoulders, and resignedly sighing, "Nothing to be done" (7).

Waiting for Godot : The Symbolical Meanings

Beckett is known to have commented, "I had little talent for happiness."- This sentence in itself is absurd, like the most famous drama of Beckett: Waiting for Godot. But what exactly absurdity means?

The original or dictionary meaning of absurd is 'Out of harmony'. utterly or obviously senseless, illogical, or untrue; contrary to all reason or common sense; laughably foolish or false. But the word has a different meaning when it is used int he theatre of the absurd.

Marking the difference between a good play and an absurd play, Martin Esslin opines:

If a good play must have a cleverly constructed story, these have no story or plot to speak of : if a good play is judged by subtlety of characterization and motivation, these are often without recognizable characters and present the audience with almost mechanical puppets; if a good play has to have a fully explained theme, which is neatly exposed and finally solved, these often have neither a beginning nor an end; if a good play is to hold the mirror up to nature and portray the manners and mannerisms of the age in finely observed sketches, these seem often to be reflections of dreams and nightmares' if a good play relies on witty repartee and pointed dialogues, these often consist of incoherent babblings.

Waiting for Godot is chock-full of pairs. There's Vladimir and Estragon, the two thieves, the Boy and his brother, Pozzo and Lucky, Cain and Abel, and of course the two acts of the play itself. With these pairs comes the repeated notion of arbitrary, 50/50 chances. One thief is saved and other damned, but for no clear reason. If Vladimir and Estragon try to hang themselves, the bough may or may not break. One man may die, one man may live. Godot may or may not come to save them. In the Bible, Cain's sacrifice was rejected and Abel's accepted for no discernible reason. It's minor, but Estragon's line in Act I: "My left lung is very weak […]. But my right lung is sound as a bell!" More pairs, more arbitrary damnation. Even the tone of Waiting for Godot is filled with duality: two person arguments, back-and-forth questions, disagreement-agreement, questions and (often inadequate) answers.

The tree is the only distinct piece of the setting, so we're pretty sure it matters. Right off the bat you've got the biblical stuff; Jesus was crucified on a cross, but that cross is sometimes referred to as a "tree," as in, "Jesus was nailed to the tree." That Vladimir and Estragon contemplate hanging themselves from the tree is likely a reference to the crucifixion, but it also parodies the religious significance. If Jesus died for the sins of others, Vladimir and Estragon are dying for…nothing.

But we can also think of the two men not as Jesus, but rather as the two thieves crucified along with Jesus. This fits quite nicely with gospel's tale as Vladimir tells it; one thief is saved and the other damned, so Didi and Gogo are looking at a fifty-fifty chance. The uncertainty that stems from inconsistency between the four gospels is fitting, too, since Vladimir can't be certain if Godot is coming to save either one of them.

Furthermore, Vladimir reports that he was told to wait for Godot by the tree. This should be reassuring – it means the men are in the right place. As Estragon points out, they're not sure if this is the right tree. And, come to think of it, they can't even be sure if this is a tree or not. It kind of looks like a shrub.

The tree could be the tree of life. So the tree's random blooming would suggest that it is something of a tree of life. And, according to the proverb, that means a desire has been fulfilled.

Moreover the tree's sprouting leaves could be an ironic symbol pointing out that, far from fulfilled desires, hopes have been deferred yet another day – much like Vladimir's ironic claim in Act II that "things have changed here since yesterday" when, clearly, nothing at all has..

While Vladimir and Estragon wait for Godot, they also wait for nightfall. For some reason (again, arbitrary and uncertain), they don't have to wait for him once the night has fallen. The classic interpretation is that night = dark = death. The falling of night is as much a reprieve from daily suffering as death is from the suffering of a lifetime.

There's also the issue of the moon, as its appearance in the sky is the real signal that night has come and the men can stop waiting for Godot. Estragon, in one of his "wicked smart" moments, comments the moon is "pale for weariness […] of climbing heaven and gazing on the likes of us." Though the man remembers nothing of yesterday, he does in this moment seem to comprehend the endless repetition of his life. And if the moon is weary just from watching, imagine what that says about the predicament of the men themselves.

Carrots and turnips are in one sense just a gag reel for Vladimir and Estragon's comic bits. But I was interested in their disagreement over the vegetable: "Funny," Estragon comments as he munches, "the more you eat, the worse it gets." Vladimir quickly disagrees, adding that, for him, it's "just the opposite." On the one hand, this could be a completely meaningless conversation – the point is simply that Vladimir is in disagreement, playing at opposites, adding to the bickering duality between himself and Gogo.

On the other hand, the carrot could be about the meaning of life. It could be a hint as to the differences between the way Vladimir and Estragon live their lives. Vladimir's subsequent comment, an addendum to his carrot claim, is that he "gets used to the muck as [he goes] along." He resigns himself to banality. Estragon, on the other hand, wearies as time passes – much like the weary moon he observes in Act II. When Pozzo later dishes about smoking, he claims that a second pipe is "never so sweet [as the first]. But it's sweet just the same." This is a third and distinct answer to the carrot question.

When Lucky is commanded to dance in Act I, Pozzo reveals that he calls his dance "The Net," adding, "He thinks he's entangled in a net." You would think a guy tied up on a rope leash would feel confined enough. Of course, the image of Lucky writhing in an imaginary net is a lasting image for the play as a whole, and especially for the plight of Vladimir and Estragon, who, as we've said before, are confined in a prison – or perhaps a net – of their own imaginations.

There seems to be no shortage of inane props in Waiting for Godot, and these three have one thing in common: they are all absurd objects on which the men have developed irrational dependences. Lucky cannot think without his bowler. Pozzo needs his vaporizer to speak. Estragon seems condemned to forever take his boots on and off, as does Vladimir with his hat. This is another great combination of the tragic and the comic; the situation is hilarious for its absurdity, but dismal at the same time.

Estragon is repeatedly repelled by smells in Waiting for Godot. Vladimir stinks of garlic, Lucky smells like who knows what, and Pozzo reeks of a fart in Act II. It seems every time Estragon tries to get close to a person, he is repelled by their odor. It looks to us like smells represent one of the barriers to interpersonal relationships. Estragon isn't just repelled by odors – he's repelled by the visceral humanity of those around him. There's something gritty and base about the odour of a human body, and for Estragon it's too much to handle.

There are several interpretations of Waiting for Godot, the two most well-known are the religious one and the political one.

The religious interpretations posit Vladimir and Estragon as humanity waiting for the elusive return of a saviour.

If this is the basic idea, then this makes Pozzo into the Pope and Lucky into the faithful. The faithful are then viewed as a cipher of God cut short by human intolerance. The twisted tree can alternatively represent either tree of death, the tree of life, the tree of Judas or the tree of knowledge.

Political interpretations also abound. Some reviewers hold that the relationship between Pozzo and Lucky is that of a capitalist to his labor.

This Marxist interpretation is understandable given that in the second act Pozzo is blind to what is happening around him and Lucky is mute to protest his treatment. The play has also been understood as an allegory for Franco-German relations.

An interesting interpretation argues that Lucky receives his name because he is lucky in the context of the play. Since most of the play is spent trying to find things to do to pass the time, Lucky is lucky because his actions are determined absolutely by Pozzo. Pozzo on the other hand is unlucky because he not only needs to pass his own time but must find things for Lucky to do.

Life and Works of Anton Chekhov

Chekhov is one of Russia's many important literary figures, and one of the greatest playwrights of modern times. He won the Pushkin Prize and he is known for his short stories and his plays, works that often combine elements of both comedy and tragedy. While works reflect the frequently turbulent developments specific to his homeland, their lasting appeal lies in Chekhov's talent for exploring universally human situations with such grace and dexterity.

Anton Pavlovich Chekhov was born in Tanarog, Russia, near the Sea of Azov, on January 17, 1860. The very fabric of Russian society was permanently altered when Chekhov was only one year old: on February 19, 1861, Russia's serfs were freed. Chekhov himself was the grandson of a serf, and the overturning of this older social order plays a central role in many of his writings.

When his father's business failed, the family moved to Moscow, a Russian centre for intellectuals. There, Chekhov grew intellectually, although he developed in two different directions. On the one hand, at the age of twenty he attended medical school at the University of Moscow, preparing himself for his lifelong profession as a physician. While at medical school, Chekhov also began writing to help support his family. He worked as a freelance writer for newspapers and magazines; the respect he gained from these often humorous pieces encouraged Chekhov to begin writing serious short stories. Tolstoy, an older Russian contemporary of Chekhov's, was a great influence on the young writer and medical student. Chekhov was quoted as saying that medicine was his lawful wife and literature was his mistress, and he remained devoted to his two professions throughout his life.

Chekhov graduated from medical school in 1884, and while he began his life as a physician, the period after his graduation also marks the moment when Chekhov began writing seriously. During the late eighties, Chekhov wrote both short stories, such as The Bear in 1888, and The Wedding in 1889, and plays, which include Ivanov in 1887 and The Wood Demon in 1889. Although these works are only of moderate acclaim and are not the masterpieces that Chekhov is best known for, they form an important part of his development as a literary figure. For example, Chekhov came back to The Wood Demonin 1896, and after re-working it and re-titling it, the finished product, known as Uncle Vanya, propelled Chekhov's success and fame in his own life and to this day.

During the early 1890's, Chekhov's writing experienced something of a dry spell. Unfortunately, Chekhov suffered from health problems, and he spent much of the early nineties with his family or travelling to gentler climates. During this time of travel, Chekhov was able to pursue his interest in all things French, particularly French farce, and a genre, which marks his own theatrical comedy.

In 1896, Chekhov entered the period of creativity for which he is best known. At the turn of the century, he authored four plays, commentaries on Russian society, which have gained him lasting acclaim: The Sea Gull in 1896, Uncle Vanya (a derivative of1889's The Wood Demon) in 1896, The Three Sisters in 1901, and The Cherry Orchard, his last great play, in 1904. Chekhov spent these years between Moscow and Crimea, dividing his time between his works and nursing his failing health. Olga Knipper performed in each of these four plays; in 1901, she and Chekhov married. The Cherry Orchard was first performed in Moscow on January 17, 1904, Chekhov's last birthday, with his wife in the leading role. Chekhov died of pulmonary tuberculosis on July second of that year, in Germany.

Chekhov changed the theatrical world with these four plays. He was often disappointed when they were performed as tragedies; although they each have sad elements to them, Chekhov believed that this darker side of the plays should in no way undercut the immensely funny comic elements, which pervade even in the seemingly darkest moments. This confusion of the comic and tragic genres is one of Chekhov's important contributions not only to theatre, but also to literature in general. Chekhov is also known for the emphasis he places on dialogue and off-stage action, otherwise known as "indirect action." The most important events in Chekhov's plays do not necessarily occur on Chekhov's stage; often, the audience experiences some of the most pivotal and dramatic action not by seeing it, but by hearing about it from the characters. In this concept of indirect action is an innovation on the part of Chekhov, whose impact on theatre and literature continues even today.

About The Cherry Orchard

The nineteenth century offered two important developments to Russia which are manifested in the play. In the 1830's, the railroads arrived, an important step in Russia's move into a more international sphere. More importantly, in February of 1861, Russia's vast population of serfs was liberated for good, bringing a long-awaited social change. These two dimensions, social change and the growing importance of the international community, pervade the play and even drive the plot.

The railroad facilitates Madame Ranevskyin coming and going across borders, but the intrigue itself deals with the theme of social change: the aristocratic family loses power as the former serf gains, and a whole host of other characters fall in between. With the changes in the class system, debates about the nature of progress and freedom spring up across Russia, and these questions are reflected in The Cherry Orchard as well. The theme of social change is an international theme at the moment when the play was written: countries everywhere, including the United States, were experiencing similar growing pains and similar philosophical debates.

Chekhov's writing style is very pertinent to the population of Russia at this moment. While former aristocrats still patronized the arts, there was also a growing class of less educated, nouveau-rich attending the theater. Chekhov's plays are famous for their simple language, which many hold partly responsible for his popularity. The fact that his play discusses every social class in language that everyone can understand makes his play accessible to people of all backgrounds. It makes high-brow jokes while also being universally comedic.

Chekhov had a strong sense of social duty; his play implies that a sense of social duty towards others is necessary for the advancement of humanity. This idea is manifested in the fact that nearly all of his characters are sympathetic. Chekhov felt it was important that his characters be sympathetic, and indeed, The Cherry Orchard lacks a villain. While the play certainly criticizes our faults, it only does so to guide us in the right direction: the sympathetic quality of the characters, the accessibility of the language, combined with the factors of social change makes The Cherry Orchard critical and philosophical, yet fundamentally an optimistic work.

The Cherry Orchard: Historical Context

Politics: In 1904, the year The Cherry Orchard was first produced, Russia was in a state of upheaval. The Japanese declared war on Russia on February 10, 1904, following Russia's failure to withdraw from Manchuria and its continuing penetration of Korea. The Japanese defeated Russia at the Yalu River on May 1, 1904; by October of that year the Japanese had forced Russia to pull back its forces. This war was the beginning of tensions in Asia and the establishment of Japan as a military force.

On the home front, Russia's minister of the interior, Vyacheslav Plehve, exercised complete control over the public. He forbid any political assemblies, required written police permission for small social gatherings, and forbid students to walk together in the streets of St. Petersburg, Russia's capital. On Easter Sunday of 1904, 45 Jews were killed, 600 houses were destroyed in Kishenev in Bessarabia on orders from Plehve, and the police were instructed to ignore rioting in the streets. These events culminated with Plehve's assassination on July 28, 1904. This kind of civil unrest marked the beginning of a time of great conflict and transformation in Russia that ended with the Communist Revolution in 1917. These tensions both in and outside Russia made life difficult for Russian citizens. The middle class began to assume an elevated position in society as many nobles lost their wealth and large, lavish estates. As the Ranevsky family discovers, Russia is changing and the climate is no longer hospitable to those who do not act in their own interests. Trofimov's character alludes to the strict control of the public when he speaks of the "things he's seen" that have caused him to age prematurely. When the serfs were freed, the landowners were forced to pay for labour, and as conditions in Russia worsened due to war and the totalitarian regime, revolution becomes imminent.

Transportation and Industry: The Trans-Siberian Railroad's link from Moscow to Vladivostok opened in 1904. This is the longest line of track in the world, spanning 3,200 miles between the two cities. In the United States, the first New York City subway line of importance opened on October 27, with the Interborough Rapid Transit, known as the IRT, running from the Brooklyn Bridge to 145th Street with stops in between. This system would grow to become the world's largest rapid transit system, covering more than 842 miles. These transportation systems are important because, as society became more urbanized around the world, it changed. Large plots of land, such as the cherry orchard in Chekhov's play, were broken up into smaller plots for building and industry. The railroads allowed people of all economic backgrounds to travel and allowed goods to be shipped long distances using much less manpower.

Science and Technology: Marie Curie discovered radium and polonium in uranium ore in 1904; these two new radioactive elements helped to fuel the nuclear age in the decades to come. Also in 1904, German physicists Julius Elster and Hans Friedrich Geitel invented the first practical photoelectric cell, which led to the invention of radio. The first wireless radio distress signal was sent the same year. Clearly, the time in which Chekhov wrote The Cherry Orchard— during 1903 and 1904—was a time of much change and scientific advancement. The simple way of life on the orchard was being phased out of existence; a different mindset was required for the dawning age of science and industry. The Ranevsky family is unable to adapt to this new, quickly evolving world in which discoveries are made almost weekly and change is imminent.

Literature and Drama: 1904 saw the first publication of such works as Lincoln Steffens's expose of urban squalor The Shame of the Cities, The Late Mattia Pascal, by Italian novelist Luigi Pirandello, Henry James's The Golden Bowl, and Reginald, by English writer Saki, also known as H. H. Munro. Plays which, like The Cherry Orchard, were first produced in 1904 include: Riders to the Sea by John Millington Synge, Frank Wedekind's Pandora's Box, George Bernard Shaw's Candida and How He Lied to Her Husband, and Peter Pan, or The Boy Who Would Not Grow Up, by James M. Barrie. Chekhov's style was substantially different from his contemporaries'; his self-proclaimed "farce," The Cherry Orchard, portrays psychology and human behaviour far more realistically than many of his fellow playwrights. Unlike the other plays of its time, The Cherry Orchard focuses upon an historical era and examines the whole of society rather than just characters.

The Cherry Orchard : Synopsis

The Cherry Orchard describes the lives of a group of Russians, in the wake of the Liberation of the serfs. The action takes place over the course of five or six months, but the histories of the characters are so complex that in many ways, the play begins years earlier.

The play opens in May, inside the cherry orchard estate; friends, neighbours, and servants are preparing for the long-awaited return of Madame Ranevsky, the mistress of the house, and her daughter Anya. Madame Ranevsky has two daughters. She had fled the cherry orchard five years before, after the deaths of her husband and young son. She is now returning from France, where her abusive lover had robbed and abandoned her. She has accrued great debts during her absence.

Lopakhin begins by telling the story of his own success: born a serf, he has managed to make himself a fortune. Another former serf, Firs, readies the house during Lopakhin's speeches. Firs has maintained the same post he always has, despite the Liberation. Dunyasha confesses a potential romance between her and Ephikhodof, but no one is interested.

Finally, Madame Ranevsky returns. Her friends and family are overjoyed to see her. Act I introduces many subplots: a romance between the tutor Trophimof and Anya, another hopeful romance between her sister Barbara and wealthy Lopakhin, a love triangle between the servants Dunyasha, Yasha, and Ephikhodof, the debt of the neighbor Pishtchik, the class struggles of Lopakhin and Firs, the isolation of Charlotte, etc. The main intrigue of the play, however, hinges on Madame Ranevsky's debt. Neither she nor her brother Gayef have money to pay the mortgage on the cherry orchard estate, and unless they find a solution, the state will be auctioned off in August.

Lopakhin suggests that Madame Ranevsky build villas on the estate. She can lease them and use the money to pay the mortgage. Madame Ranevsky and Gayef object to the idea, and prefer to work something out on their own. However, as spring passes into summer, Madame Ranevsky only finds herself more in debt, with no solution in sight. Strange romances between Anya and Trophimof and Dunyasha and Yasha continue, while nothing develops between Lopakhin and Barbara and Dunyasha and Ephikhodof. Firs' health is declining. Madame Ranevsky is receiving letters from her lover, and Gayef begins to consider a job at a bank. Pishtchik takes out loans from Madame Ranevsky, whose own funds are dwindling away to nothing.

On the night of the auction, no solution has arrived. Madame Ranevsky holds a ball. Charlotte performs, and guests and servants alike dance. Madame Ranevsky and Trophimof have a serious conversation about Madame Ranevsky's extravagance; not only does she continue to run up debts, but she is now considering returning to her abusive lover in France. Madame Ranevsky is nervous about the outcome of the auction; she is still hoping for a miracle.

Finally Gayef and Lopakhin return: Lopakhin has bought the cherry orchard. Barbara is furious, and Madame Ranevsky is devastated. Lopakhin, however, cannot hide his happiness: he has bought the estate where his family lived as serfs. Ironically, he encourages the party to continue, even though the hosts are no longer in the mood to celebrate.

Act IV shows Madame Ranevsky leaving the cherry orchard for the last time. Lopakhin has bought champagne, but no one except the uppity servant Yasha will drink it. Lopakhin and Trophimof share a tender farewell: Trophimof will return to the university. Charlotte complains that she no longer has a position; Ephikhodof has a new position with Lopakhin. Pishtchik is able to pay off some of his debts. Gayef has a job at a bank, Barbara a position as a housekeeper, and Yasha will stay on with Madame Ranevsky, who is returning to France. Many characters try to confirm that Firs has been sent to the hospital. Lopakhin misses his last chance with Barbara, and Dunyasha cries that Yasha is leaving.

Madame Ranevsky and Gayef share a nostalgic moment alone before leaving on a relatively optimistic note. In the last moment, we hear axes cutting down the orchard, and Firs stumbles on to stage, forgotten, locked in the house. He lies down to rest and presumably dies.

Character List

Madame Ranevsky: Madame Ranevsky is one of the leading characters in the play. She is the owner of the cherry orchard estate, and she is a woman with a complicated history. She comes from an aristocratic family, but she married beneath her, and her husband was an alcoholic. She had three children with him before his death: Barbara, Anya, and Grisha. Grisha drowned shortly after his father's death, causing Madame Ranevsky to flee in despair. Grisha died approximately five years before Act I. Madame Ranevsky took a lover in Paris, and abusive man who robbed her and took another mistress. She is returning to Russia after leaving him.

Madame Ranevsky has accumulated many debts upon her arrival in Russia, and cannot pay the mortgage on her estate. Throughout the play, her debts are a symbol of her personality; she is an excessive woman who does whatever her emotions incline her to do, regardless of consequences, financial or otherwise. One moment she cries in panic and despair about how to pay her mortgage, yet the next moment she gives her neighbour a healthy loan to pay his own. Her behaviour is irrational, and that characteristic is both her most charismatic quality and her most serious weakness.

Of all of the characters in this play, Madame Ranevsky is among those with no capacity to adapt to a changing society. She continues to be generous with her friends, and even with strangers, living the life of a kind and wealthy aristocrat, even though the power of the aristocracy no longer ensures her any wealth, and the few assets that she has are dwindling quickly. She tells herself that she can control her purse and abandon her horrible lover, yet she cannot keep even these most fundamental of resolutions. Even after losing the cherry orchard, Madame Ranevsky remains sadly unable to change: she continues to surround herself with expensive and suspicious help, such as Yasha, and she rejoins her lover in Paris, despite his abusive history.

Yermolai Alexeyitch Lopakhin: Lopakhin is the other lead character in The Cherry Orchard. He is a neighbour of Madame Ranevsky, perhaps in his thirties, unmarried. His father and grandfather were serfs on the cherry orchard estate all of their lives. Although he was born into a family of serfs, Lopakhin has managed to use the Liberation of the serfs to his full advantage and is now a wealthy landowner and a shrewd businessman.

The change in class Lopakhin has experienced during his lifetime is amazing; at the end of the pay, he is not only a wealthy man, but he is the owner of the estate where he was born a serf. Lopakhin is a symbolic character in that he epitomizes the success possible for the newly freed serfs. However, while his bank account makes him more powerful than the aristocratic former owners of the estate, he is an interesting specimen because he still has qualities that betray his modest beginnings. He is well dressed and respected, yet he is not literary or cultured; both his preposterous misquotings of Hamlet and his poor penmanship embarrass him.

Lopakhin's talent for business distinguishes him from the other characters; this attribute is both his best and worst quality. His preoccupation with money and success are his trademark. On the one hand, his savvy allows him great personal success with finances; he has completely overcome the poverty he was born into. On the other hand, as Barbara points out, he is almost too preoccupied with business to enjoy important aspects of humanity, such as love and friendship. In some sense, his appetite for business opportunities leads him to betray Madame Ranevsky, his first benefactor, by buying and cutting down her cherry orchard. Lopakhin is a complicated character, and he can be portrayed as a villain, a hero, or something in between the two. The ambiguity in his character is precisely what makes him, and all the other characters in the play, so mesmerizing to the audience.

Leonid Andreyitch Gayef: Gayef is Madame Ranevsky's older unmarried brother. He has no particular profession, and apparently lives off of the family fortune. He and Lopakhin do not get along; there is evidence to suggest that Gayef resents Lopakhin's success, for he treats all of the non-aristocratic characters with derision.

It is ironic that Gayef can be snobbish towards other characters, because he himself is a walking disaster. He is constantly running off at the mouth and embarrassing himself. His trademark behaviour is an imaginary game of billiards; whenever he has put his foot in his mouth, he acts like he is playing billiards to distract himself and others. He is humorous, but he is clumsy and ungraceful. He clearly demonstrates that being of the nobility and being a noble person are two mutually separable categories.

Although he is a constant social catastrophe, Gayef does demonstrate some ability to adapt that his sister lacks. Although he is never effective, he is always dissuading her spending. Moreover, at the end of the play, he is one character who makes a somewhat positive decision, accepting a modest position in a bank. In some ways this job is a step down, but it is also a step into reality, something which many of the characters in the play do not attain.

Barbara: Barbara is Madame Ranevsky' oldest daughter. She is somewhat old to still be single, perhaps in her twenties; her family anticipates that she will marry Lopakhin, and although she would like to, Lopakhin never proposes to her. Barbara virtually runs the estate, a fact visually represented onstage by the massive ring of keys she wears at her waist. She is a controlling person, but she cannot look out for her mother as well as she looks out for the servants. She cries frequently, usually over her mother's spending or Lopakhin's mixed signals.

Barbara's controlling practicality is her best and worst quality. On the one hand, her level head keeps the estate running when there is no money to run it with; on the other hand, the responsibility she feels towards the cherry orchard causes her nothing but grief and stress. Her desire to help and be productive keeps the household running as it drives everyone mad. Barbara's greatest wish is to join a convent or become a pilgrim. At the end of the play she takes on a position as a housekeeper.

Anya: Anya is Madame Ranevsky's youngest daughter, in her teens, the complete opposite of her fretful, responsible older sister. Anya is very innocent and appears very much a child. She is usually happy. She is an idealist, like Trophimof, but she is not as philosophical as he. Her happiness is inspiring, helping the family even through these hardships, yet it does not accomplish anything concretely productive. Anya can comfort her mother with her optimism, but she cannot influence her. It is unclear whether Anya's idealist attitude will be enough to bring her success.

Peter Trophimof: Trophimof is an important character in the play because, amid a world full of people like Madame Ranevsky and Gayef, he consistently speaks some sort of sense. He tutored Madame Ranevsky's deceased son, and as such, represents the past, although he is very concerned with the future. He is an idealist and a student. His intellectual qualities both empower him, by leading him to demand more from Russia and humanity than any other character, and hinder him, by making him appear a bit inaccessible, emotionally. The play creates a romantic tension between him and Anya, which he is too philosophical to act upon. He often speaks wisely, but he holds a powerless position and is not able to exert influence.

Firs Nikolayevitch: Firs was born a serf on Madame Ranevsky's estate, and although the serfs have been freed, Firs remains on the estate because he has no other opportunities.

Although he and Lopakhin share the same background, Firs has not been able to adapt to the changing society as Lopakhin has. Firs is a figure who represents time, a character who symbolizes the old class system. At the end of the play, he is accidentally left behind, and he presumably dies onstage. His death marks the passing of the old class system, the passing of the aristocracy's reign on the cherry orchard, and the passing of a phase in Russian history.

Dunyasha: Dunyasha is a young servant on the cherry orchard. She enjoys the attention of Ephikhodof, but is far more interested in Yasha, with whom she enjoys a romance. She is a comic character who represents many of the class issues at work in the play. Despite her humble station, Dunyasha fancies herself a lady, and her pretensions constitute some of the funniest moments in the play. These dreams of hers are both irritating and hopeful because they are all possible. Her character has a serious function when one regards her interactions with other characters: Lopakhin and Firs, for example. Both men criticize Dunyasha for not remembering her station. This criticism is ironic because both of these men are former serfs who defy conventional classifications of station. Consequently, Dunyasha's character serves to focus attention to hypocrisy, as well as hope: in this new topsy-turvy social order, no one is in a position to criticize Dunyasha's plans.

Yasha: Yasha is Madame Ranevsky's man-servant. Like Dunyasha, he is young, from the village, and extremely pretentious. He is involved with Dunyasha. He is also a very comic character, although he is also the only character in the play who seems truly cold and without consideration for anyone but himself. He follows Madame Ranevsky around like a parasite, feeding off of her loose control of her purse and begging to be taken abroad. He is a snob to most everyone, often openly rude and insulting to others in public. He refuses to see his own mother, a villager. Yasha is the only character in the play who does not appear to have any redeeming personality traits.

Simeon Panteleyitch Ephikhodof: Ephikhodof is a young clerk who works on the estate. He is a comic character, and his nickname is "Twenty-Two Misfortunes" (or "Two and Twenty Hard Knocks," depending on the translation). His entrances and exits are generally marked by his falling on or off stage. He is infatuated with Dunyasha, but she does not return his interest. At the end of the play, Lopakhin employs him. Ephikhodof is an optimistic figure, because despite the disasters which constantly follow him, he is always relatively happy. He accepts fate as it comes to him, and he deals with it calmly, if not gracefully. He also has an enormous capacity to laugh at himself, and this ability perhaps contributes to his good humor. Perhaps his significance is that we should never take ourselves too seriously: if we do, we will be disappointed, but if we don't, we can still be content even under adversity.

Charlotte Ivanovna: Charlotte is Anya's governess, although she is no longer employed at the end of the play. She is an orphan, and she is popular for her magic tricks. She is a strange character, generally treated as more of a spectacle than a person, and many of her lines address her own isolation. She is not depressed; on the contrary, she is lively and energetic, but neither does she bring great cheer to the play. Depending on the performance, she can be either an amusing or an uncomfortable character to watch.

Simeonof-Pishtchik: Pishtchik is a land-owning neighbor of the cherry orchard. He is always impressed with Charlotte's magic tricks, and he is a very social f successful jokes where others fail. He spends the play in debt, although he is able to pay off some of it at the end. His requests for loans can often be interpreted as disrespectful and selfish, as Madame Ranevsky does not have enough money for her own debt. However, because Pishtchik is able to pay some of his loans at the end of the play, he is one character who may achieve a sort of redemption through the course of the drama. The miracle that saves his estate is an optimistic aspect to the end of the play, although the fact that he has forgotten that Madame Ranevsky must leave is not.

Act Wise Summary of The Cherry Orchard

Act I

The play is set in Russia, in the late 1800's. Act I opens at dawn, in the month of May, inside Madame Ranevsky's estate. The acts are not divided into scenes, although the entrances and exits of different characters delineate distinct moments of action.

Lopakhin, a wealthy neighbour, and Dunyasha, a maid, are waiting for Madame Ranevsky, her daughter Anya, and their companions to return to their cherry orchard estate from France, where they have spent five years. The room they are in is called the nursery. Dunyasha and Lopakhin begin by discussing the tardiness of the trains, and Lopakhin recounts his childhood memories of Madame Ranevsky, who once brought Lopakhin, then a serf's son, into the main house, after his father struck him, to care for him and to wash him. After Lopakhin's speech, Dunyasha expresses her anxiety at the return of the family.

Ephikhodof, a clumsy clerk infatuated with pretentious Dunyasha, enters the nursery with a nosegay, his boots squeaking the whole way. Lopakhin sends Dunyasha for a drink, and he and Ephikhodof have a brief and comic discussion on the weather and squeaky boots. Dunyasha re-enters, and Ephikhodof falls over her on his way out. Dunyasha confesses to Lopakhin that Ephikhodof has proposed to her. Lopakhin is not interested, but Dunyasha goes on to explain her feelings; she is fond of the clerk's personality, but not his clumsiness, and she does not know what to do.

Madame Ranevsky finally arrives, bringing her daughters Barbara and Anya, her brother Gayef, Anya's governess Charlotte, and Pishtchik, a neighbour, along with her. Madame Ranevsky cries, as she often does. After a brief moment of welcome-home chaos, the stage is empty except for Anya and Dunyasha, who grew up together. Dunyasha tries to discuss Ephikhodof, but only captures Anya's attention by mentioning that Trophimof, the tutor of Anya's deceased younger brother Grisha, is in the house. Barbara, the older daughter, enters with an enormous ring of keys at her waist. Dunyasha leaves to make coffee, and the sisters reunite. Barbara is also a crier, and she cries with happiness at seeing Anya, and then with distress as Anya describes the family's financial problems. Madame Ranevsky, used to living the luxurious life, is spending money she does not have, and now the family cannot pay the interest on the mortgage; the cherry orchard will be sold in August. Lopakhin enters during this tense moment, moos like a cow at Barbara, and exits. Barbara hopes to marry Lopakhin, and society expects it. She confesses to Anya that he has not proposed, and begins crying again. She announces that she wants to become a pilgrim.

Dunyasha returns with coffee; Yasha, Madame Ranevsky's social-climbing servant, enters with bags. He does not recognize Dunyasha; when she tells him her name, he embraces her, calls her a "little cucumber," and chases her around the room. Dunyasha squeals in delight and Yasha runs out before Barbara can reprimand him.

Anya ponders the significance of tutor Trophimof's return. She briefly describes the death of her father six years early, followed shortly by the death of her younger brother, who drowned at age seven. These events prompted Madame Ranevsky to go abroad and forget her misfortunes, and Anya reflects that Trophimof, who was her brother Grisha's tutor, might remind Madame Ravensky of the tragedy.

After Anya's reflections, Firs, a former serf and present servant, enters the scene. He is talking to himself, for he is half deaf and of questionable sanity. Although he is not quite communicating with anyone else on stage, one can tell he is delighted at his mistress's return, and his comments, as usual, are nostalgic and focus on events of years gone by. He proclaims that now that he has seen his mistress Madame Ranevsky come home, he is ready to die, a comment which clearly illustrates the old social order in Russia.

Madame Ravensky, her brother Gayef, and neighbours Pishtchik and Lopakhin enter. Gayef pretends he is playing billiards, his trademark behavior. Anya says good night and exits. Firs waits on Madame Ranevsky and Barbara suggests that the guests go home. Madame Ranevsky thanks Firs profusely and starts crying again, with joy. Firs responds to her thanks with completely unrelated comments, due to his hearing problems. Pishtchik and Lopakhin begin complimenting Madame Ranevsky. Lopakhin goes on to complain about Gayef, who thinks Lopakhin a snob, and insists he loves Madame Ranevsky dearly. Madame Ranevsky is excited and begins kissing the furniture; Gayef breaks the mood by telling her of members of the household that have died in her absence. Madame Ranevsky already knows, but her reaction is interesting. She becomes very quiet and still, with none of her usual drama. This change in her behaviour emphasizes her flaws as a character; she is a creature of positive excess reacting with more emotion to the furniture of her home than to the death of her old friends.

Lopakhin is about to leave, and he changes the subject with his plan to save Madame Ranevsky's estate from auction: if she cuts down the cherry orchard and the old house, she can build villas, sell them to the nouveau rich, pay off the interest, and make a profit. Madame Ranevsky and Gayef do not understand the suggestion. Pishtchik changes the subject by asking Madame Ranevsky about Paris.

Barbara enters with Yasha and two telegrams for her mother from Paris; Madame Ranevsky tears them up dramatically; Gayef then announces that the cupboard in the room is one hundred years old. Pishtchik acts astonished, which encourages Gayef to embarrass himself, which he does frequently. He gets on his knees and recites a dramatic and ridiculous ode to the cupboard, while the rest of the company looks on, embarrassed for him and astonished. When he realizes how foolish he looks, he begins playing imaginary billiards again. Pishtchik saves the mood by swallowing an entire box of pills: although his act is equally foolish as Gayef's speech, everyone finds it wildly entertaining. Firs continues to mumble, and Charlotte, the governess enters. She is a strange personality; a social misfit. She teases Lopakhin, refuses to do a conjuring trick, and goes off to bed. Lopakhin says his good-byes. Pishtchik asks Madame Ranevsky for a loan to pay his mortgage, despite the perfectly well that she cannot pay her own; she refuses him. Firs fusses over Gayef's clothes, and Barbara discover Anya asleep. Gayef and Madame Ranevsky look out over the orchard and reminisce.

Trophimof enters in shabby student clothes to greet Madame Ranevsky. At first she appears to not know him, so he explains himself as her deceased son's tutor; then she suddenly throws her arms around and beings to cry. She is not crying in happiness, but rather mourning for her son. She is startled to see that he has grown old, and a brief discussion of age follows; the subject irks Madame Ranevsky, but it does not seem to bother Trophimof. Pishtchik and Gayef begin to say their goodnights, and Pishtchik once again asks Madame Ranevsky for a loan to pay his own mortgage. This time she agrees, and despite a brief protest on his part, Gayef also concedes the money to Pishtchik. As Madame Ranevsky, Trophimof, Pishtchik, and Firs leave, Barbara announces to Yasha that his mother wants to see him. Yasha complains bitterly about this visit; as he exits, and Gayef discusses the family's financial problems with his nieces, referring to a distant aunt as an obscure source of economic hope. Gayef continues to describe what a small hope it is; in his opinion, the aunt, although wealthy, would disapprove of Madame Ranevsky's "sinful" life. Through his rather harsh criticisms of his own sister, another example of indirect action, we learn that Madame Ranevsky married beneath her aristocratic station, and, upon the death of her husband, became another man's mistress. Anya, one of the play's two idealists, is hurt by Gayef's words against her mother; Gayef is instantly shamed, and tries (rather ungracefully) to wriggle out of the situation by changing the subject. He bemoans the way his own words constantly embarrass him, as they did with his speech to the cupboard. He swears on his honor that he will do all he can to save the property, and says goodnight. Barbara drags a sleepy Anya towards her room; Trophimof enters to watch them leave and, as Anya disappears from stage, whispers after her "My sunshine! My spring!"

Act II

Act II opens in the outdoors, in the summertime. The set consists of a bench; the town in visible in the background. Charlotte, Yasha, and Dunyasha are sitting on the bench; Ephikhodof is standing, playing a guitar. Charlotte is dressed for hunting, and is cleaning her gun. She meditates out loud on her past; she is an orphan who spent her childhood performing tricks in county fairs, and she describes her continuing feelings of isolation.

No one else appears to be listening. Ephikhodof mistakes his guitar for a mandolin, and a brief comic exchange follows, wherein Ephikhodof focuses his attention on Dunyasha, Dunyasha fawns over Yasha, and Yasha smokes a cigar and admires himself. Charlotte enthusiastically attempts to join in on the bungled conversation, but no one wants to talk to her, and she leaves in something of a huff. Ephikhodof tries to get Dunyasha alone, but she sends him away so she can be alone with Yasha. The two of them have a rather comic and pretentious conversation, which informs the audience that they have become romantically involved. With the noise of another party approaching, Dunyasha scurries off to protect their secret romance.

Madame Ranevsky, Gayef, and Lopakhin enter the scene; Lopakhin is trying to convince Madame Ranevsky to sell the cherry orchard. She changes the subject by complaining about Yasha's cigar. Three conversations ensue: Lopakhin demands an answer, but no one responds to him, Gayef considers the railroad to himself, and Madame Ranevsky p funds and her excessiveness. She drops her purse and Yasha picks up the coins. Madame Ranevsky complains that she spent too much money at lunch; she then complains that Gayef had another tirade, which embarrassed her, and Lopakhin agrees. Yasha laughs out loud at Gayef's foolishness, and Madame Ranevsky sends him away.

Lopakhin insists on the subject of the cherry orchard; there is a millionaire interested in the property. Gayef and Madame Ranevsky discuss the prospect of their wealthy aunt sending them money, but Lopakhin is scandalized to hear the amount they expect; it is nowhere near enough to pay the interest on the mortgage. Lopakhin insists that they build villas and sell them to save themselves financially; Madame Ranevsky and Gayef do not focus on the practicality of this suggestion, but, rather, moan about how tedious they find villa residents.

Madame Ranevsky follows this discussion by criticizing herself for the bad luck she has brought on herself during her life. She married an alcoholic, and when he died, followed shortly by her son, she went off with another man. She cared for this man through his illnesses, and he repaid her by robbing her in Paris and finding another woman. Madame Ranevsky attempted suicide, but instead returned to Russia. Her outpour is prompted by the fact that she has just received another telegram from her lover, asking her to return to Paris. She rips up the telegram and discusses a band, heard in the distance, with Gayef.

Lopakhin talks about his peasant roots again, referencing his poor penmanship as a symbol of his original class, and Madame Ranevsky advises him to marry, suggesting Barbara as a wife. Lopakhin goes along with the conversation, but his words do not betray enthusiasm. Gayef announces he has been offered a position in a bank, and Madame Ranevsky scoffs.

Firs enters, bringing a coat for Gayef, and through a misunderstanding, begins to discuss his recollections of the Liberation. Trophimof, Anya, and Barbara enter, and everyone sits. Lopakhin teases Trophimof about being escorted by two girls and being such an old student, and Trophimof responds by citing Lopakhin's carnivorous economic tendencies. Everyone laughs at the joke, although it may be truer than they would like. Madame Ranevsky begs Trophimof to continue a philosophical discussion from the day before; as he embellishes his ideas on the nature of man, we discover him to be another idealist, and full of good sense.

Gayef interrupts the mood by making an embarrassing ode to nature. An owl is heard, and Firs announces that a great misfortune is coming, just as it did before; he is referring to the Liberation. A tramp enters, startling the party, and begs for money, Madame Ranevsky cannot find any small change, and so gives him a considerable sum. The tramp exits, and Barbara howls in despair at her mother's spending. Madame Ranevsky announces that she has arranged the marriage for Barbara and Lopakhin. Barbara is mortified, and Lopakhin wriggles out of the situation by misquoting Hamlet.

Everyone exits except for Anya and Trophimof. Trophimof ponders that Barbara never lets them alone, and Anya considers that Trophimof has made her cease to love the cherry orchard as she once did. They both have larger, philosophical issues on their mind. Trophimof explains how the orchard makes him feel; although it is two hundred years old and has seen so much history, it frightens him that it has seen so little positive change. They philosophize together about the future; they have a romantic relationship, although being the idealists that they are, their relationship is not sexual. Barbara calls Anya into the house, and they exit.

Act III

Act III is set inside the estate, during a party in August on the day of the auction of the cherry orchard. Music is heard. Pishtchik, Charlotte, Trophimof, Madame Ranevsky,Anya, Barbara, and Dunyasha enter in the background, with assorted guests, and dance the grand-rond. Firs serves drinks. Pishtchik and Trophimof come into a sitting area and Pishtchik complains about his money troubles dozes from time to time. Barbara comes into the sitting room and Trophimof teases her, calling her Madame Lopakhin. She is angry, both at the joke, and at the expense the party represents. She leaves, and Trophimof comments to Pishtchik that Pishtchik could have done great things in his life with all the energy he has devoted to scrounging for money to pay his loans. Pishtchik agrees, and falls into a momentary panic, thinking he has lost his purse, which he quickly recovers.

Madame Ranevsky and Charlotte enter. Madame Ranevsky wonders where Gayef is, and why she had the dance. Charlotte performs card tricks for the group; they all applaud, and Pishtchik announces that he loves her. Her final magic trick involves making Anya appear from behind a shawl; she kisses her mother and quickly scurries away. She then performs the same trick with Barbara, and exits herself, with Pishtchik following.

Madame Ranevsky cannot distract herself from the outcome of the auction. Barbara insists that their wealthy aunt will have bought the cherry orchard for Anya's sake, but Madame Ranevsky knows that the aunt does not trust her enough to spend so much money on her.

Trophimof breaks in to tease Barbara, calling her Madame Lopakhin again. Barbara is upset; it's not that she doesn't want to marry Lopakhin, but he has never proposed. Despite all the discussion of how they should get married, he always wiggles out of his opportunities. Barbara thinks his hesitance is because he is too occupied with money; she herself announces that she would join a nunnery in an instant, if only she had money to join. Trophimof mocks her, and she starts crying again.

Yasha enters, laughing, to announce that Ephikhodof has broken a billiard cue, and Barbara rushes off to reprimand him. Madame Ranevsky seizes the opportunity to criticize Trophimof for teasing Barbara. He explains that he does it because she always follows he and Anya around, trying to prevent a romance. He insists her efforts are useless, as he and Anya are "above love;" Madame Ranevsky comments grimly that she must therefore be beneath it.

She begins to panic about the outcome of the auction; Trophimof points out that now it is far too late to panic, as she in essence lost the cherry orchard long before through her inaction. She announces that the cherry orchard is a symbol of her family and of her self; when they sell it, they sell her as well. She holds a telegram from her abusive lover during her tirade, and she begins to cry. Madame Ranevsky confesses to Trophimof that her lover has asked her back, and that she will go. Trophimof is devastated by her choice; he too begins crying and pleads with her. Madame Ranevsky becomes defensive and then insulting, calling Trophimof a freak for not considering love, saying he is too cold to be able to understand her.

Trophimof runs out furious, and Madame Ranevsky instantly begs him to return. A crash is heard, and Anya enters, laughing that Trophimof has fallen down the stairs. The music starts again. Trophimof and Barbara enter, and Madame Ranevsky casually apologizes. They dance;

Yasha and Firs enter, Firs complaining about his health. Yasha is irritated by the conversation, and Firs become offended.

Anya announces that she has heard that the cherry orchard has been sold, although no one knows to whom. Madame Ranevsky asks Firs where he will go if the property is sold, implying that she will not bring him with her; he announces he will go anywhere she tells him to. She notes that he looks ill, and Yasha interrupts to ask Madame Ranevsky to take Yasha back to Paris with her when she returns. Pishtchik enters, asks Madame Ranevsky to dance, and then begs her for another for another loan. She does not respond to either Pishtchik or Yasha, but her silence is as good as a yes.

Dunyasha enters, tittering about a compliment she received while dancing; both Yasha and Firs make irritated comments. Ephikhodof has followed Dunyasha out, and he maintains his good cheer despite her attempts to shoo him away. Barbara hurries in to scold Dunyasha and Ephikhodof for acting like guests. Ephikhodof sticks up for himself, but Barbara manages to remove him after a brief moment of comedy.

Lopakhin enters just as Ephikhodof leaves, coming face-to-face with a furious Barbara. Everyone rushes in to hear what happened at the sale. Before Lopakhin can answer, Gayef follows him in, wiping tears away. Lopakhin responds that the cherry orchard has, in fact, been sold. Madame Ranevsky begs for more information, but Gayef exits, taking Firs with him. Finally, Lopakhin answers the question; he has bought the cherry orchard. Madame Ranevsky falls into a chair, and Barbara throws her keys to the ground, and exits. Lopakhin begins his speech slowly, about how a millionaire immediately outbid Gayef's small sum, and then grows more and more excited as he describes his own triumph. By the end of his speech, he cannot hide his delight, and he commands the musicians to play. Anya leads her crying mother off the stage, promising her a new orchard, which symbolizes a new life.

Act IV

The scene opens in October, in the same room as Act I, but now the furniture is piled in a corner. Gayef and Madame Ranevsky stand outside, saying good-bye to the peasants. Madame Ranevsky gives them her purse, and Gayef chides her. They go into another room, and Lopakhin attempts to call them back to have some champagne, held byYasha. They will not have any, and Yasha drinks the champagne instead, criticizing its quality as he sips, while Lopakhin defends its worth.

Trophimof enters, looking for his galoshes so he can prepare to leave. He will see the family into town, and then return to the university in Moscow. Lopakhin makes a joke about how old Trophimof is to be a student; although Trophimof is irked at the joked, he and Lopakhin share a very tender farewell. Trophimof declines Lopakhin's offers of champagne and money, but he accepts an embrace, and advises Lopakhin not to draw too much attention to himself. Trophimof is still looking for his galoshes; Barbara throws a pair at him from offstage. Lopakhin again insists on giving Trophimof money, not out of pity, but as a sign of respect. Trophimof, however, then insists that as a free man, he cannot accept Lopakhin's money. The sound of axes is heard, and Anyaenters to ask that they stop cutting down the orchard until the family has left. Lopakhin is embarrassed and exits after Trophimof to see to the request.

Anya asks Yasha if Firs has been sent to the hospital. Yasha says he thinks so, but Anya asks Ephikhodof to find out for sure. Yasha is insulted that she does not accept his answer, and Ephikhodof lightly comments that he wishes he were as close to death as Firs. Barbara enters the room and asks if Firs has gone to the doctor, and Anya responds yes, although she has yet to receive a definite answer. Barbara ponders why, if Firs has left for the hospital, the note for the doctor has been left behind. Anya exits to send the note after him. Barbara announces to Yasha that his mother wants to say good-bye; Yasha responds with irritation. Barbara disappears, and Dunyasha enters, crying over Yasha. Yasha is not moved; he is excited about going to Paris, and brushes Dunyasha off. His action is cold, but it is unclear whether or not Dunyasha is crying because she is upset or because it seems the glamorous thing to do.

Madame Ranevsky, Gayef, Anya, and Charlotte enter. Madame Ranevsky acts excited about her new life, and Gayef looks forward to his new job. Anya is not going with her mother; she is going to study, and she and her mother plan their anticipated reunion. Charlotte sings, holding a bundle as though it were a baby, and then throws the bundle away as she announces she is now without a position. Madame Ranevsky insists she will find Charlotte a new job.

Pishtchik enters, exhausted from his walk. He has somehow come into some money, and he pays Lopakhin and Madame Ranevsky a token portion of the debt he accrued with them. Only after explaining his luck does he realize Madame Ranevsky is leaving; he begins crying as he says his good-byes, and wishes her well before he exits.

Madame Ranevsky takes care of her final business. Anya again confirms that Firs has been to the hospital. Then Madame Ranevsky pushes Lopakhin one final time to marry Barbara. Lopakhin agrees that he will propose, and goes to offer the champagne again, but Yasha has drunk it all.

After Madame Ranevsky, Anya, Charlotte, Gayef, and Yasha have left, Barbara enters. Lopakhin inquires as to her plans now that the cherry orchard has been sold. Barbara says she has taken a position as a housekeeper, and Lopakhin replies that he has asked Ephikhodof to take on the cherry orchard for him. Lopakhin exits, without proposing, and Barbara sits on the floor and cries for a moment. The entire household re-enters, and everyone picks up luggage and says their final good-byes; the scene is chaotic. Gradually everyone leaves the room, save Madame Ranevsky and Gayef, who share one final moment of nostalgia while Anya calls them away from without. Finally, he responds to her calls, and the room is empty for a moment.

As the doors are locked from without, Firs enters. He has been forgotten, left behind. He complains that he does not feel well, and lies on an old bench. He is still for a moment, and the play ends.

Analysis of the Play

The Cherry Orchard focuses on the tensions of changing times. This tension between what was and what is centers on different levels. One level, personal tragedy, is very specific, and the death of Madame Ranevsky's son Grisha five years before the start of the play is one example. On another level, the play centers on the complications with major changes in an entire society: the recent freedom of the serfs and the decaying power of the aristocracy are two more general aspects of Russian history which affect the play.

Lopakhin's first speech is important because it immediately introduces this theme of Russia's newfound class mobility. In 1861, the system of serfdom was ended in Russia, and although this event happened perhaps fifteen years before Act I, it drives the action of the play. Lopakhin himself points out the irony in the situation developing in Russia; Lopakhin, born a serf, is now a wealthy, well-dressed landowner, calling on his aristocratic neighbor, Madame Ranevsky, as an equal. Despite his financial success, he still refers to himself as "a peasant of the peasants," noting a difference between himself, a nouveau rich, and the aristocratic members of the upper class. This speech introduces an ambiguity in Lopakhin's character which can only be resolved in a performance of the play; it is unclear from the text alone whether Lopakhin feels love, respect, and gratitude towards Madame Ranevsky and her family, or whether he harbors some resentment towards this household that held his father and grandfather as slaves. All of the characters in the play possess a similar ambiguity, which can only be alleviated by a director's choice.

Not only are Lopakhin's intentions unclear from the text alone, but he interacts with the other characters in very complicated ways, due, in part, to his own change in class. Although Lopakhin revels in his own economic transformation, he chides Dunyasha for not remembering her place in society, acting too much like a lady when she is only a maid. The close chronology between these two moments at the very opening of the play creates a tension about class differences which pervades the entire play. Dunyasha and Lopakhin come from similar, lower class backgrounds; however, Lopakhin has been able to fulfill his aspirations and rise through the class system, while Dunyasha is still trying. Lopakhin can easily be portrayed as a hypocrite for moments like his criticism of Dunyasha.

Ephikhodof, the next character to enter, is something of a clown, and his entrances are sources of comedy. Although he is an extreme example, he is not unlike the rest of the characters in the play: they are all ridiculous in some way. Even Barbara, who seems so stern, can be portrayed as a parody. Her keys, for example, are often as enormous as they are loud, depending on the performance. These keys are attached to her throughout the play, and they are a symbol of her authority in the household; her practicality and her sense of duty are both her biggest strengths and her most ridiculous qualities. While the sight and sound of her keys are a symbol of her power, they are also an unwieldy and ridiculous object. Barbara and her keys stand in sharp contrast to the younger sister, Anya, one of the play's two idealists. Anya is a charismatic character because she is both capable of being appalled at her mother's extravagant spending, and capable of forgiving her every flaw. She may appear more comic in later acts, when she and Trophimof, the other idealist, voice their philosophies.

Anya's criticism of her mother's overspending in France is important because it is one of The Cherry Orchard's many examples of indirect action, a technique Chekhov is famous for. The action described in the speech has not taken place on the stage, and is therefore indirect; the play revolves around the character's on-stage reactions to such off-stage action, for although this sort of action is not seen, it actually drives the plot. Lopakhin's opening speech is another example of indirect action, which both informs the audience of the past and maneuvers the development of the action.

Firs is a highly symbolic character, for as the oldest character, he is a remnant of the past. He spent almost his entire life as a serf on the estate. Freedom has not changed his life as it has changed Lopakhin's; although neither is a serf now, Firs is old and has nowhere else to go, so he stays on in the household as he always has, while Lopakhin has become independent and wealthy. The two of them reflect two different sides of the Russian serfs' freedom; together on stage, they create rather a complete picture of the fate of the old serfs, while Madame Ranevsky and her brother Gayef illustrate the fate of the old aristocracy. Madame Ranevsky's often comically joyful tirades on her homeland and her family demonstrate that she is a woman of excess. This excessiveness is both her most charismatic trait and her greatest weakness; she too is a ridiculous character. The contrast in her reactions to seeing her furniture again and the reality of he acquaintances' deaths implies early on in the play that this woman is completely incapable of dealing with difficulty; she ignores problems and constantly exaggerates her abilities and her emotions to create a perfectly happy world for herself.

For Madame Ranevsky and Gayef, cutting the cherry orchard down is not an option: the estate is too important. Their inability to comprehend the sense of Lopakhin's lucrative suggestion implies that they are two characters of the old aristocracy who cannot change with the changing times. They do not understand that if they do not cut down the orchard, it will go to auction and whoever buys it will cut it down anyway. Pishtchik is another character who does not seem capable of adapting and saving himself. He feeds off of others; he knows Madame Ranevsky has her own financial problems, yet he insists on asking her for money, complimenting her and goading her until she agrees. Madame Ranevsky agrees because of her own fundamental flaw, her excessiveness; she continues to live the life of a wealthy woman even as her assets dwindle. Even Gayef, the bumbling social idiot, can criticize her for this behavior, although he is too weak to stop her. Yasha is similar to Pishtchik in the way he feeds off Madame Ranevsky. His behavior with regards to his mother demonstrates his own flaw as a character. He has not seen his mother for five years, and he is more concerned with himself and impressing the family he serves than he is with visiting his own mother. Although he and Pishtchik both have charismatic moments on stage, they are both fundamentally parasites who frequent the cherry orchard for the purpose of benefiting from Madame Ranevsky's weak control of her purse.

Charlotte and Trophimof are the two final characters who appear onstage in this act. Each appears only briefly. They are both outsiders, and it is therefore appropriate they neither is fully integrated into the action until a later act.

Act I is thematically occupied with the development of different characters' strengths and weaknesses. These themes are demonstrated again during Act II, but the central issue in Act II is the development of the play's views on Russian history, social and economic change, and the concept of progress.

These ideas of social change are demonstrated in the personalities and actions of the characters. For example, the moment when Madam Ranevsky drops her purse is a symbolic one. She is talking to herself, complaining that she spends more than she should, when she drops her purse and spills her money. This action is an accident, yet it differs very slightly from the way she behaves in general. She complains that she does not have enough money to pay her own mortgage. Then, moments later, she gives Pishtchik money for his mortgage. She laments that there is barely enough for the servants of the househ dines at restaurants and tips the waiters in gold. Her words suggest that she wants to save her money, but her actions always betray a tendency to the opposite. She is careless with her purse, whether she is dropping her money deliberately or not. After she drops it in the garden, Yasha scurries to her side to help her collect the coins; this picture continues the symbolism established at the beginning of this sequence. Although Yasha is only helping his employer to collect what she has dropped, his eagerness to help with this particular task parallels the way in which he shadows Madame Ranevsky so that he might benefit personally from her own excessive tendencies with her purse.

Another thematically loaded moment in Act II immediately follows the incident of the spilled coins; Lopakhin tries to persuade Madame Ranevsky and Gayef to sell their property as villas, and they will have none of it. The siblings hesitate for two reasons. In Act I, they explained that their estate and cherry orchard are too important to be torn down; at this moment, in Act II, they condemn the idea of dealing with villa residents as "vulgar." This exchange between the decaying aristocratic family and Lopakhin, the wealthy former serf, illustrates many of the important social issues at work in the play. Now that the serfs have been freed, the older upper class no longer has an economic position with such long-term security. However, Madame Ranevsky and Gayef appear incapable of taking any economic threat seriously. It is interesting that the prospect of having villa residents is so distasteful to them. Villa residents would not come from old money, as Madame Ranevsky and Gayef do, but would rather come from the nouveau rich created by the rearrangement of the Russian classes. Madame Ranevsky and Gayefs' resistance to Lopakhin's suggestions therefore illustrates their inability to adapt to their changing society; they continue to think themselves somehow above their problems and above having to depend on people from common families. The intrigue of the play revolves around whether or not they can overcome this current blindness to their necessity to adapt.

Firs addresses this same issue in his entrance; he recalls the happiness of the serfs immediately following the Liberation, but laments that they did not understand why they should be happy. At least before the Liberation, Russia was an ordered society. Although the Liberation created a more fair class system, it did not necessarily improve the lives of individuals or create a stronger country. Firs' choice to remain with Madame Ranevsky and Gayef, despite his freedom, demonstrates the same reservations about social change that they have, but from a different class perspective.

Trophimof has a much stronger presence in this act, and his philosophical remarks further meshes out the ideology of the play. Trophimof is the only character in the play who consistently speaks words of wisdom. The tensions he meshes out in his own views of Russian society may represent the thesis of the play as a whole, as many of the details he points out are directly dealt with in the action. Through his final discussion on the cherry orchard, Trophimof contrasts the idea of change with the idea of progress. While he is apparently in favor of the freedom of the serfs, he also does not consider the Liberation as a source of positive social change. He is optimistic, in that he hopes Russia and humanity will correct their shortcomings in the future, but he is also realistic, in that he views the Liberation as necessary change, but not sufficient.

Act III is full of juxtapositions. In this act, not only do characters' class and social differences come out, but the way in which they interact in various moments emphasizes both the extreme differences between their personalities, and the similarities. Par exaggerated distinctions between these characters that create an awareness of some quality that unites them all.

The characters in this play are all remarkably distinct from one another on a individual level, but in a greater sense, they are similar because they all possess a tendency towards excess. For example, in the scene where Madame Ranevsky and Trophimof discuss their involvement with love, Trophimof asserts that he and Anya are "above love," to which Madame Ranevsky responds that she must be "beneath love." This moment is ironic because it emphasizes the differences between these two characters. On the one hand, Trophimof has found a lovely young woman with whom he shares certain chemistry. However, he and Anya are intellectual idealists, and they will part from each other at the end of the play forever, without having taken advantage of any opportunity they might have had together. On the other hand, Madame Ranevsky is fleeing to Russia from her cheating, abusive lover. She, however, is a woman controlled too much by her passions and not enough by her intellect, and at the end of the play she will return to the side of this monster who has so mistreated her. Trophimof and Madame Ranevsky have opposite problems when one considers the details of their situations, but in terms of the end of the play as a whole, they are in the same position: they each had a good opportunity, but by being so much themselves, they have managed to lose it.

Act III also contains the pivotal moment of the play's action: the sale of the cherry orchard, bought by none other than Lopakhin himself. This moment brings together many of the central ideas in the play. In the first place, it is the most beautiful example of indirect action, the technique which Chekhov is famous for, in the entire play. The sale of the cherry orchard takes place offstage, far away, yet its expected fruition completely drives the action of the plot. Moreover, this moment, which occurs offstage, provides the most dramatic of all moments on-stage, teaching us that visual action is superfluous, and indeed, unnecessary, next to the reactions of finely sculpted characters.

This scene is a moving account of the social change occurring in Russia; Lopakhin is now the owner of the estate where his father and grandfather were serfs, and Madame Ranevsky is homeless. This moment is full of the most powerful irony in the entire play, as the roles of the two main characters have been completely reversed from the beginning of their history to this moment. Theirs is the most extreme example of the changes in class which effect each character in the play.

In addition to being the most important moment in the play in this respect, this scene also has the potential to be the most important moment in terms of the development of Lopakhin and Madame Ranevsky as characters. Lopakhin is both triumphant and tactless; Madame Ranevsky is naïve and devastated. This dual aspect of the scene exits in the text, and it can be either emphasized or done away with, depending on the performance of the play. In any interpretation of the play, however, this interpretation of this scene must control the characters' identities from the beginning of a performance, and even still there are endless possibilities. Whether Lopakhin comes off as vindictive or as lovable throughout the play, this speech can be either the moment where the audience most identifies with him and feels his triumph, or most resents him for his lack of tact. By the same token, whether Madame Ranevsky is charmingly innocent or annoyingly naïve throughout the first two acts, at this moment, the audience sees her at her weakest; we may see her as a fool who acted too late or as a poor abused woman, beaten down by misfortune.

These moments of irony and symbolism are the fabric of the entire play, not only Act III. Part of the richness of the play depends on the variety of interpretations it supports. However, in choosing one's own interpretation, the reader should bear in mind that Chekhov was disappointed when his play was performed as a tragedy; the fact that the play may contain various moral lessons should in no way undermine the light-hearted, comic moments which pervade the entire play and are just as important to its substance.

Act IV is an act when many of the play's loose ends come together. At the same time, the end of the play also remains ambiguous, and a performance may choose to either alleviate or preserve some of the loose ends that the text does not provide definite answers to.

Act IV is an act when many characters are most themselves. Lopakhin and Trophimof, for example, share a stunning good-bye. They are fond of each other, and they each make a gesture towards one another which acts as a sign of their respect for one another. Their gestures, however, differentiate in such a way that they are complete and true expressions of each man's own personality. Trophimof, for example, analyzes Lopakhin and gives him advice. This sort of mental exercise is what Trophimof, the philosophical idealist, does best, and although his words are somewhat critical, they are also well-meaning. Lopakhin, true to his recent success and consequent sense for the financial, offers Trophimof a small sum of money as a parting gift. He takes care to explain that he offers the money not out of pity, but out of respect, because he understands how inconsequential ideas of loss can be. They each offer the other the best thing they have that the other can find useful: Trophimof offers wisdom, and Lopakhin offers free money. We cannot quite know if Lopakhin follows Trophimof's advice, but we do know that Trophimof is too philosophical to accept Lopakhin's money. In this sense, their gestures are somewhat stunted, yet the scene remains extremely tender nonetheless, optimistically demonstrating that such different individuals have more in common than one would expect at the beginning of the play.

Although Lopakhin and Trophimof part so gracefully, not all of the characters' final appearances inspire optimism. While things are looking up for Pishtchik and Anya radiates hope, Charlotte forces the audience to remember that this final parting of ways is not joyous for everyone. The loss of the cherry orchard does not only affect Madame Ranevsky; as a result of the sale, Charlotte finds herself unemployed, with an uncertain future. Ephikhodof, Barbara, and Gayef have new jobs, and self-centered Yasha is allowed to travel with Madame Ranevsky, but loyal Firs is left behind altogether, and Barbara's hopes for romance with Lopakhin are dashed. In this way, the ending of the play is mixed, for while some see great opportunities ahead, other characters suffer great losses.

When Madame Ranevsky and her brother leave their family home for the final time, there is a sense that they have come to peace with the loss of the estate. The two of them look forward to the future, and their enthusiasm is contagious even if the audience doubts their abilities. It is another character, a much more minor character, who provides perhaps the most symbolic moment to Act IV: Firs. Act IV ends with Firs unmoving and unconscious, perhaps dead, forgotten, locked in the house where he was born a serf. In some ways it does not even matter whether or not he is dead: he might as well be. His position at the end of the play is symbolic ad can be read as a metaphor for the passing of the old order in Russia. This man was born a serf, and although he lived through the Liberation, he chose to maintain his position in the household because he had no other opportunities. Liberation was meaningless to him, and he stayed loyal to the family his whole life. The family, h loyal to him; for all his service, no one could even be bothered to confirm whether this sick old man had been sent to the hospital, properly cared for. This negligence provides an extremely sharp criticism of the other characters' priorities: themselves. The fact that Firs has been forgotten demonstrates a lack of respect to Firs as a person, to his long service with the family, and to all the serfs that the Russia of Chekhov's day would not be held responsible for.

It is unclear whether or not Firs has died in the final scene, and while this neglect seems cold, it is not entirely pessimistic. Firs dies symbolically, and his immobility in the last scene indicates the passing of the old order. The class system, after so much upheaval, begins to settle down again with the passing of time, the deaths of the former serfs, and the integration of their children into society. Firs' presumable death is the last phase in a long process of change, beginning with former serfs like Lopakhin gaining power, the aristocracy losing power, and ending with the deaths of those who continued to live by the old system. In some ways, The Cherry Orchard describes nothing more than the growing pains of a society, and the fact that the play ends with a potential death should not be used to label the play a tragedy. The play describes the cycle of life, and it is important that we do not know for certain whether these characters will succeed or fail, live or die, because such an ending would rob the play of its greatest asset: its infinite possibilities. It is the play's ambiguity that provides so many interpretations and so many morals to so many different people.

The Cherry Orchard : A Classic Play by Anton Checkhov

The Cherry Orchard is a classic play written by Anton Checkhov circa 1901 to 1903. There were a variety of characters along with a unique storyline. There were twelve characters in the play that played separate but important roles throughout. The protagonist in the play was Mrs. Lubov Ranevsky; she was about middle aged in the play. She was owned the cherry orchard along with the estate which the story greatly concentrates on. Yermolay Lopakhin was another key character in the play; he was the son of peasants on the estate. His family had long been a part of the Ranevsky estate. He is very worried about his image when he is around Mrs. Ranevsky. He steadily complains about his lack of education and had a very rough childhood in comparison to Ranevsky. Peter Trofimov was a student at a nearby university. He intelligent although quite immature, Lubov had believed it was because of his rough upbringing. He has opposing views with Lopakhin because of Lopakhin's views on life. Next is Leonid Gayev. He is Lubov's biological brother and he is a bit odd and at times childish. At very odd times Gayev describes billiard shots that having nothing to do with the topic. He also behaves quite different when he is not within his own social standard. Varya is yet another character in the play; she was adopted and is in loves Lopakhin but has doubts about Lopakhin's ability to move the relationship a step further. She is works very hard but she is very emotional and cries frequently. Anya is another character introduced. She is the birth daughter of Lubov and she has lived a life of comfort. She is very supportive to her mother when the estate is lost. Boris Simeonov Pischik is another character. He is a landowner like Lubov and is having money problems and continuously borrows money from others. He is known for his optimistic attitude towards life. Another important character is Charlotte. She is a private tutor for Anya's children despite the amusement she provided to the people around her, she is constantly mocked by others behind her back. Firs is a Lubov's manservant. He is elderly and always talks about the "old days" and how it used to be on the estate. He is the only think that shows the past of the estate. Simon Yephikodov is a clerk at the Lubov's estate. He is an amusing suicidal. He amuses all the people around him and he is a lover and he proposed to Dunyasha who works as a maid in the estate. The final character is Yasha; he is the manservant who follows Lubov in her travels. He has a passion for France and is not afraid to speak his mind. He once told Firs to his face that he is too old and that he should die.

Act I begins with the characters in a nursery despite the fact that no children have been there for quite some time. It was May and Lopakhin was waiting for Lubov, the owner of the estate. Lopakhin is joined by Yephikodov who enters the room and complains about weather and his life. After rude remarks from Lopakhin he is forced to leave. As Dunyasha enters she tells everyone that Yephikodov has proposed to her. As Lubov arrives with Anya, they are met by Varya, Charlotte, Gayev, and Pischik. Dunyasha makes another announcement saying that Trofimov is residing in the estates bathhouse. Anya is rejoiced. As Varya comes in to the estate she meets with Anya and they have a talk about poverty and their financial necessities. Varya tells Anya about how Lopakhin has not proposed to her yet. Anya talks about how Lubov going to Paris was because Lubov's husband and seven year old son dying. Anya goes to sleep.

After Anya goes to sleep, Lopakhin starts talking about the orchard which is going to have to be sold in in order from Lubov to pay off of her debt. The matter is debated and Firs tells about how "back in the day" jam was made out of the cherries and sold, but now this is forgotton about. Lopakhin says that more wealthier and professional people have moved in to the country side. Gayev starts to say bad things about Lopakhin and then leaves himself. Varya then enters and gives Lubov two telegrams that she rips apart. As Lopakhin departs, Pischik asks for a loan from Lubov but the request is rejected. She looks at the cherry orchard and sees what looks like her dead mother walking. It was actually just a tree which looked like a women. Trofimov then enters and has a reunion with Lubov and they talk about alt times. Lubov tells her brother that he needs to pay off his 240 rubles that he owes to Pischik and goes to sleep. Once she goes to sleep Gayev talks about of her spending problems and he might have a plan to save the cherry orchard and be able to keep the property. The act ends with Varya telling Anya that the servant quarters are being moved.

Act two begins with Yephikodov, Dunyasha, Charlotte, and Yasha talking, singing, and having a fun time. Charlotte begins to tell about her life story about how her father and mother used to perform tricks and that her mother and father were possibly never married. Yephikodov admits that he can't figure out what to do with his life in spite of the various books he has read. He says that he can't decide whether to shoot himself or not. Charlotte is abhorred by his sayings and leaves. After Yephikodov speaks to Dunyasha and Dunyasha begins to worry about Yephikodov's ongoing suicidal behavior. Dunyasha admits her love to Yasha. The scene ends with Yasha admitting that he is embarrassed to be seen with her.

As the next scene begins, Lopakhin attempts to again to convince Lubov to make her estate into cottages. Lubov attempts to change the subject and drops her purse. Yasha picks the purse up and starts laughing when he hears Gayev speak. Gayev becomes infuriated and Lubov makes Yasha go away, he does go away but still laughing. Lopakhin says that a man name Deriganov wants to buy the money. Gayev counters this by saying that a rich lady wants to send money for them; it will only be fifteen thousand though. Lopakhin says that Lubov and Gayev didn't have any sense in business and that they don't understand the fact that they are going to lose their property. Lubov goes on telling about how she had an affair with a man before her husband died and that he robbed her for her mo another woman. She admits that the telegraphs are from him and that he is asking for her to return to France. The scene ends with Lopakhin talking about his childhood and Gayev informing everybody that he has been offered a job at a bank. Lubov tells him to reject the offer.

The final scene of act two comes forth and Firs talks once again about the "good old days", before the freedom of the serfs. Lopakhin gets offended due to the fact that he is the son of a serf and he insults Firs behind his back. As Trofimov enters he and Lopakhin have a conflict and they laugh about it with the others later. Gayev starts to almost recite a poem before Anya suppresses him. Out of nowhere then comes a drunk who asks for direction but is shooed by Lubov who gives him pieces of gold. Anya, Trofimov and Varya leave due to this odd incident. Act two comes to an end with Trofimov giving a speech about hope and Varya is left alone in the woods while Trofimov and Anya go by the river. Varya starts to call for Anya in the pitch black of the night.

As act three begins the date is the 22nd of August. The scene begins with Firs serving the people of the party and Pischik is having a conversation about his poor financial status. Lubov wonders why her brother has not returned home. She also is worried about the auction that is occurring tomorrow. This leads up to Charlotte doing a variety of magic tricks and Lubov talking to Varya in private. Varya admits that she thinks that Lopakhin will never propose to her because cares about his business more than her, and that she thinks that it will be awkward if she proposes to him herself. The scene is ended by Yasha taunting Yephikodov because he has broken a pool stick.

As the second part of act two approaches, Lubov and Trofimov talk and he Trofimov says that he is in love with Anya. About Lubov's French lover problems, Trofimov advises her to ignore him due to the harm that he has caused her. Lubov responds negatively and insults Trofimov, Trofimov in outraged by her comments and departs. In the hallway he trips over himself and is laughed at by Anya. A dance has been set up at the estate and many people are invited. Firs talks more about the old days and how all these high classed people used to attend. Yasha, somehow offended, tells Firs that the time has come for him to die. Firs responds with an insult. As Pischik enters the dance he asks Lubov for more money to pay his mortgage. The scene is ended with Dunyasha showing how much she likes good compliments and how sensitive she is. Dunyasha becomes irritated with Yasha and decides that she will no longer treat him with seriousness.

As Varya enters it is the final scene of the third act. She demands Dunyasha to leave and starts yelling at Yephikodov telling him he doesn't work and that she is surprised that the estate even has a clerk. Yephikodov is deeply offended by this, though he was more afraid of her at the time than offended. Yephikodov leaves and Varya hears a noise in the hallway, she is afraid that it might be Yephikodov with a stick. It is not. Lubov asks Lopakhin if he bought the orchard and he said that he did. He says that he wants to build cottages and remove the cherry orchard. Lubov and Varya become very upset. Lopakhin lectures on the irony of how his ancestors used to work on this estate and now he owns it. Lopakhin adds salt to the wound and says "My poor dear friend, you can't turn back the clock now." At the end of the third act Lubov is still very upset and Anya tries to cheer her up and says that they will plant another cherry orchard that is better and everything will be better.

The month is now October at the beginning of the final act. All the members of the estate are getting ready to leave. The members can hear the axes hitting the branches of the once beautiful cherry orchard. As Lubov and Gayev say good bye to the peasants, Yasha insults them under his breath. As Lubov and Gayev approach the nursery Lubov admits to Gayev that she gave all of the money in her purse to the peasants. Gayev scolds her for the act and Lubov claims that she couldn't resist the urge. Lopakhin and Trofimov have a long conversation. They talk about how they will always have their differences, but they both still cared about each other. Lopakhin tries to give a loan to Trofimov, but he rejects and gives a speech. Anya then appears on behalf of Lubov, she asks Lopakhin to halt the cutting of the orchard until they have left. It is then informed that Firs has fallen ill, Yephikodov says that Firs is just old and that time has come for him to die. He admits that he in a sense looks up to Firs. The scene ends with Lubov and Yasha going back to Paris. Gayev has accepted the job offer at the bank and Varya is going to another estate to become a house keeper. Finally, Pischik unexpectedly pays back Lubov and says that he leased his property to some Englishmen who found white clay on the land.

The final scene begins with Lubov expressing her concern about Varya and Firs. She worries because Firs is still ill and that Varya is depressed due to the loss of the estate. Lubov manages to convince Lopakhin to propose to Varya and he decides he will. Lopakhin then makes small talk with Vary about the weather and her plans; Varya pretends she doesn't know what it's about. Lopakhin admits that there is no life left in the home. Varya is even sadder, Lopakhin didn't propose to her. When the time arrives for everyone to leave, Gayev gives a speech but both Anya and Varya silence him. There is lots of crying, and Lubov tells the others that she just wants to look at the house a bit longer. Gayev then makes a random referral to billiards and everybody leaves except for Gayev and Lubov. They observe the home, cry a little bit, and then leave the home. Firs then appear on the stage talking about how his life slowly slipped away and he sits on the sofa and never moves again. The curtain closes with the sound of a tree being chopped down in the orchard.

Overall, in The Cherry Orchard there were two dominant themes. One was struggle over memory and the past and wealth was another. Struggle over memory was a dominant theme due to the fact that memory has been keeping the characters of the play from happiness. Lubov wants to forget about the present day and she just wants to go back to her old life. But the house that she lives in contains the memories of her husband that she had an affair with and her seven year old son that had drowned in a nearby river. Even for the character of Lopakhin, his memories ore abhorrent also. He had a horrid childhood and was raised by peasants. Firs plays the most important role in this theme. All Firs does in the play is talk about memoires. He talks about the "old days" before the serfs were freed. Even at the end of the play, all of the other characters had forgotton him. The next dominant theme is wealth. This is an obvious theme due to the fact that the story practically revolved around it. Characters have been trying to make more, borrowing money from others, and some are even begging for it. On page 25 of Act I Gayev said, "My sister hasn't lost the habit of throwing money about." This shows that while the Lubov is doing nothing to earn money she is spending it like crazy. Finally Lopakhin, he plays the most important role in this theme. He shows the value of hard work. He was the son of peasants who worked up to his wealth and ended up buying the orchard when Lubov went into financial trouble.

Major Themes

Indirect Action: Indirect Action is a technique Chekhov was most famous for. It involves action important to the play's plot occurring off-stage, not on. Instead of seeing such action happen, the audience learns about it by watching characters react to it onstage. Lopakhin's speech at the end of Act III, recounting the sale of the cherry orchard, is the most important example of indirect action in the play: although the audience does not see the sale, the entire play revolves around this unseen action.

Mixing of Genres: Traditionally, humor and tragedy have been kept separate in dramatic works. Although Chekhov is certainly not the first playwright to mix comic and tragic elements onstage, he develops this tendency by creating a play that defies classification as either one of these two dramatic genres. Works such as The Cherry Orchard, which cannot be subjected to the traditional standards of classification, have helped build new modern literary traditions through their innovation in genre.

Symbolism: There are many symbols in this play. The keys at Barbara's waist symbolize her practicality and her power. Gay's imaginary billiards game symbolizes his desire to escape. The cherry orchard symbolizes the old social order, the aristocratic home, and its destruction symbolizes change. Firs himself is a figure of time; Anya is a figure of hope. The symbols in this play are too numerous to count, but many of them hinge on the idea of the changing social order or the specific circumstance of a given character.

Irony and Blindness: Irony appears in many instances throughout the play, and when it is not used for purely comic effect, it is tightly bound to the theme of blindness. On the one hand, the positions of the character's themselves are ironic. For example, the opposite circumstances of Lopakhin, Firs, and Dunyasha point out the irony in the now supposedly free-moving class system; characters talk about and praise a system of economic mobility. Still, they cannot see the contradiction in the situations of those around them that have no opportunity to improve their standing or are criticized for attempting to do so. In other cases, the play erects ironic moments, where the power in a given scene comes from a combination of two different images. For example, in Act II, Madame Ranevsky complains loudly about how she cannot control her money, while in the same breath she allows Yasha, the most untrustworthy character, to pick up her spilled purse. The fact that she is able to talk about her weakness and neglect the safety of her money in the same breath indicates that, despite her complaints, she is still blind to much of her problem.

Social Change and Progress: Several characters address the potential difference between social change and social progress. Firs and Trophimof are two of them. Both question the utility of the Liberation. As Firs notes, it made everyone happy, but they did not know what they were happy for. Firs himself is living proof of this discrepancy: society has changed, but his life, and the lives of countless others, have not progressed. Both characters insinuate that the Liberation is not enough to constitute progress; while it was a necessary change, it was not enough to bring mankind to the idealized future Trophimof imagines. The play leaves the impression that while change has come, there is more work to be done.

Independence, Liberation, and Freedom: This play deals with the theme of independence in many different ways. Fundamentally, it demands that we ask what it is to be free. What with the Liberation, The Cherry Orchard deals with independence in a very concrete way: shortly before the beginning of the play, much of Russia' free. The play's characters demonstrate the different degrees of freedom that result from the Liberation. On opposing ends of this question are Lopakhin and Firs. One man has been able to take advantage of his liberation to make himself independent; the other, although he is technically free, has not changed his position at all and is subject to the whims of the family he serves, as he has always been. The difference in their situation demonstrates the observations of many Russians of the time: officially liberating a group of people is not they same as making them free if you do not also equip them with the tools they need to become independent, i.e, resources such as education and land.

Trophimof, the play's idealist, offers one definition of freedom for the audience to consider when he declines Lopakhin's offer of money. According to Trophimof, he is a free man because he is beholden to no one and nothing more than his own concept of morality. His observations seem accurate in light of other forms of non-freedom in the play. Madame Ranevsky, for example, is not free in a very different way from Firs. She has enough assets to be able to control her own destiny, but she is a slave to her passions, spending extravagantly and making poor decisions in romance, and therefore cannot follow a higher moral code as Trophimof does. What with the combination of economic circumstances and the bizarre weaknesses of the characters, the play therefore suggests that there are two sources which control freedom and the lack thereof: economics, which comes from without, and control over oneself, which comes from within.

Conflict in The Cherry Orchard

Russian dramatist Anton Chekhov wrote The Cherry Orchard in which he chose to focus on the deepest desires and fears of his characters while Henrik Ibsen, considered to be the father of modern drama wrote Ghosts in which he explored and exposed the harsh reality that lay behind the many facades donned by his characters.

Both Chekhov and Ibsen spoke the ‘unspoken’ in their literary works. Through their characters, they explored many subjects that were considered taboo in their day. Many of the actions and reactions of the characters that inhabit their plays are based on the conditions of life at the time.

The central conflict of The Cherry Orchard revolves around Madame Ranevsky’s stubborn refusal to accept the merchant Lopakhin’s plan to save their heavily mortgaged estate by sacrificing their beloved cherry orchard. Ibsen’s Ghosts explores the consequences of building ‘ivory castles in moral ruins’. Helen Alving lives a lie as she hides the evils of her marriage behind a veneer of moral respectability.

Both Madame Ranevsky and Helen Alving behave in a similar way when faced with difficult situations. Their reaction to problematic events is marked by a withdrawal into illusionary worlds that are far removed from the realities of their actual lives. Illusion and self-deception are key elements that characterize the reactions of Madame Ranevsky and Helen Alving. However, Illusion is a stronger force than reality in their lives. In both these plays, the chief protagonists react to events and situations by using the force of illusions to hold their families together only to find that eventually the very fabric of their illusions have been torn apart by reality.

In Ibsen's Ghosts, illusion and reality are set into a conflict within the story. Helen Alving's marriage is blighted by infidelity and abuse. However, her reaction to this is to retreat into an illusory world in which she does not need to face reality. She maintains an illusion of a perfect marriage. Mrs. Alving, obsessed with keeping up appearances, tries to protect her late husband's reputation to shield her son from the truth about Mr. Alving. However, she not only ends up living a lie and building a memorial to her husband's false reputation, but she also ruins the lives of Oswald and Regina.

The key factor that marks Helen Alving's reactions to difficult situations is to turn her back on reality and live a life that is in essence a lie. Although she puts up with her husband's depravity, she sends away their seven year old son, Oswald, in the hope of saving him from his dead father's decadence. Maintaining the illusion of a happy marriage to a noble man, she doesn't want anyone to doubt that he was a good and honorable man even after his death. As she says, "I had always before me the fear that it was impossible that the truth should not come out and be believed. That is why the Orphanage is to exist, to silence all rumours and clear away all doubt." [1] Mrs. Alving does this to protect the children from the sin that marks their family's history. Ultimately, when Mrs. Alving is faced with the incestuous relationship between Oswald and Regina, she has no choice but to finally face the reality she was trying to escape from. She discloses the harsh truths she had concealed to protect the children. Faced with reality at the end of the play, Mrs. Alving bitterly regrets the lies on which she has built her life. As she confesses to the priest Manders, "Yes, I was always swayed by duty and consideration for others; that was why I lied to my son, year in and year out. Oh, what a coward I have been." [2] Mrs. Alving tries to protect Oswald from truths that have consequences on his life, as he has got syphilis from his father.

Like Helen Alving, Madame Ranevsky in The Cherry Orchard also inhabits an illusionary world of her own creation. Both react to the changing situations in their lives by staying cocooned in a world of illusions. Like Helen Alving, Madame Ranevsky too lacks the ability to perceive the truth of her situation. Both their reactions are marked by a tendency to shun reality – Helen Alving shuns the reality of her relationship with her husband while Madame Ranevsky shuns the reality of her financial situation. She along with her family returns to the family's estate which includes an extremely large and renowned cherry orchard. Just prior to its auction, Lopakhin suggests and wishes to implement a plan to save the estate by paying the mortgage. However, Madame Ranevsky refuses as this will mean that the cherry orchard will need to be destroyed. For her, the orchard has become a symbol of her youth and childhood and she clings to these symbols of the past instead of living in and facing the reality of her present situation.

Throughout the play, Lophakin tries to make Madame Ranevsky focus on the estate so that they can find a solution to her financial problems. However, Madame Ranevsky constantly dwells in the past. Instead of trying to find a solution to her problem, she acts as if there is no problem on hand. Her energies which should have been focused on preserving the estate are spent on holding a party instead.

This shows that Madame Ranevsky is totally out of touch with reality and is very irresponsible when it comes to financial matters. She spends her money without giving a thought to the consequences of her actions. Madame Ranevsky lives a lavish lifestyle when in reality she hasn't a dime to spare. She throws parties and hires orchestras she knows she cannot pay for. It is this type of behavior that put Madame Ranevsky deep into debt and her estate at risk.

Madame Ranevsky's refusal to accept the truth about her situation in life eventually leads to her downfall. At the end of the play, the estate is sold and the family leaves even as the cherry orchard is being cut down. Madame Ranevsky's refusal to tackle problems facing her estate and family mean that she eventually loses almost everything.

Even at the end of the play it is not certain if she has completely realized the seriousness of her situation. While Helen Alving in Ghosts is forced to confront reality eventually, Madame Ranevsky remains cocooned in her illusions returning to Paris and to her lover who had treated her so badly in the past. Mrs. Alving on the other hand is eventually compelled to recognize the Ghosts from her past that have prevented her from living just for the joy of life.

On seeing the reactions of Mrs. Alving and Madame Ranevsky to the changing situations in their lives, one would realise that many of their actions and behaviors are spurred by the dictates of society. Helen Alving's self-deceit is the result of the constraints imposed by the social structure of the time. Mrs. Alving's middle class upbringing forces her to conform to certain pre-defined ideals. These ideals compel her to deceive others around her, and, most importantly, force her to deceive herself. One can see here that the upper and middle classes were very concerned with the issue of reputation. Unlike today, when a divorce is socially accepted, in the past, people involved in such scandals were often shunned by society.

Like Helen Alving, many of Madame Ranevsky's actions and reactions also spring from social compulsions. She is a victim of social change. Due to this, former serfs gained wealth and status in society. On the other hand, the aristocratic class was impoverished. They could not tend their estates as they could no longer exploit the serfs for cheap labor. Society was still reverberating with the effect of these social reforms when Chekhov wrote forty years after the mass emancipation. Madame Ranevsky's inability to tackle problems related to her estate and family mean that she loses almost everything. Her fate can be seen as a telling comment on the fading aristocracy who are unwilling to adapt to the changes in Russia

Anton Chekhov's The Cherry Orchard portrays the social conflict present at the turn of the century in Russia. Many of Madame Ranevsky's reactions are the result of her social background. She conforms to society's expectations of how the aristocratic class behaves and cannot change or adapt to changing traditional values.

In the plays, The Cherry Orchard, by Anton Chekhov and Ghosts by Henrik Ibsen, the protagonists' reactions to changing situations are marked by a combination of illusion and reality and this is responsible for shaping the plot of the respective stories. The ability of the characters to reject or accept illusions, along with the social motifs and compulsions that motivate their decision, leads to their individual downfall.

The Cherry Orchard as a Comic Masterpiece

Henri Bergson, the French philosopher, theorized in the essay collection Comedy, that laughter springs from our perception of "something mechanical encrusted upon the living." The comic figure, Bergson maintained, is rigid or inflexible in circumstances that demand a resiliency of the mind or body. Moreover, laughter increases through a character's repeated failures to alter a rigid behavior, for it is repetition that transforms mere rigidity into the semblance of something mechanical, like a jack-in-a-box. If Bergson's ideas have any validity, there is no writer who possessed a greater sense of the comic than Anton Chekhov. Nor is that sense more fully revealed than in his last play, The Cherry Orchard, generally considered his greatest work.

From the outset, Chekhov designed the play as comedy. In a letter to his wife, Olga, quoted in Chekhov in Performance: A Commentary on the Major Plays, he said that it was to "be funny, very funny, at least in conception." Furthermore, as his later correspondence indicates, he was convinced he had done what he intended. Writing to Lilina, wife to the Moscow Art Theater's great director, Konstantin Stanislavsky, he claimed that, "in places," The Cherry Orchard was "even a farce." Stanislavsky and his co-director, Nemirovich-Danchenko, as they had with other Chekhov plays, chose to interpret the play as much more serious stuff than farce. On stage, they weighed it down as a serious drama, advertising it as such, much to Chekhov's annoyance. The playwright had never felt that either man had fully understood his plays, and he often bristled at their interpretations—yet he could hardly argue with the acclaim their theater won him. Chekhov's adherence to realism, his objectivity, made it difficult for his contemporaries to see his characters in the kaleidoscopic light in which he cast them. In The Cherry Orchard, as in all his comedies, he created characters who confront serious, often insoluble problems. From one perspective, they do elicit sympathy, even pity, no matter how passive or inept they may also seem. If their suffering is the main element the audience perceives, the comic impulse is suppressed, for, as Bergson noted, laughter is really only possible when there is an "absence of feeling." Farce, most particularly, depends on a hardening of the heart, an emotional distance that allows uninhibited laughter, often at the expense of a character's misfortune or suffering.

Some great comic writers, including William Shakespeare, have used various methods to prevent an audience from feeling too much empathy–comic asides, for example, or mistaken identities arising from the use of disguise. Chekhov, ever true to the limits of realism, uses no such devices. As a result, as J. L. Styan suggested in Chekhov in Performance, he risked misinterpretation: "Farce, which prohibits compassion for human weakness, and tragedy, which demands it, are close kin. The truth is that The Cherry Orchard is a play that treads the tightrope between them, and results in the ultimate form of the special dramatic balance we know as Chekhovian comedy."

The Cherry Orchard, depicting the passing world of twilight Russia (before the country's casualty-ridden involvement in both World Wars and its Communist Revolution), certainly has a tragic backdrop. Sometimes, when it cannot be repressed, an anxious awareness of that passing wells up in the characters, but it does not change them. Only Lopakhin really adapts, because to find his place in the new world, he must help destroy the old. He is not mercenary or callous, however, just practical. Although he has only a commercial interest in Mrs. Ranevsky's property, he is genuinely respectful towards her, partly from habitual reverence that typified the Russian peasant class from which he springs. Initially, he even tries to help her, but her inability to take action finally forces him to buy her land himself. In doing so, he severs the last invisible strings of class deference, ties that bind another character, the old manservant, Firs, until death. The play confirms Lopakhin's resourcefulness, his adaptability. He is, primarily, a flexible character, and is not therefore comical, except perhaps in his still-born efforts at wooing Varya.

The central symbol of the old Russia is The Cherry Orchard. In his way, Peter Trofimov, the perennial student, perceives it as such, but he sees nothing of worth in the ways of the past. The orchard only reminds him of human misery. He speaks of the ghosts of the serfs to Anya: Can't you see human beings looking at you from every cherry tree in your orchard, from every leaf and every tree trunk? Don't you hear their voices? His solution is not to cut the orchard down, but rather to run from it, into "ineffable visions of the future." He is a Utopian dreamer, as impractical and inflexible as Mrs. Ranevsky and her brother, and, therefore, unlike Lopakhin, he is more than slightly ridiculous. The Cherry Orchard is not simply an emblem of a Russia that has passed. As Styan suggested, "it represents an inextricable tangle of sentiments, which together comprise a way of life and an attitude to life." Its white cherry blossoms remind Mrs. Ranevsky and her brother, Gayev, of their youthful purity and innocence. To them, the orchard is a thing of great and enduring beauty, and they find Lopakhin's proposal to replace it with vacation cottages "vulgar." For Firs, the orchard is "an inviolable aesthetic symbol of the traditional order." Anya, on the other hand, drawn by her heart to Trofimov, accepts the student's dream of a future happiness, despite Trofimov's inconvenient belief that they must transcend love and practice celibacy to prepare for it.

On a more mundane level, the orchard is simply a white elephant. No one harvests its fruit, and, in fact, no one even enters it, except the anonymous, unseen woodsman who starts felling its trees in the last act. And while the orchard may be glimpsed through the windows of the house, it is the house itself that is the play's true setting, "the centre and heart of the play," as J. B. Priestley claimed in his text*Anton Chekhov*. Three of The Cherry Orchard's four acts take place inside the house, and two of them, the first and the last, occur in the same room—the nursery. It is the setting for both the arrival and departure of Mrs. Ranevsky and her entourage. The room at first vibrates with life, brimming with the excitement of the reunited family members, who animate the room with their memories and maudlin but joyous greetings to the furniture. In contrast, at the end, it is stripped of all its furnishings, all signs of life, except some odds and ends; the flotsam of the past, now abandoned, like Firs, who seems indistinguishable from the discarded sofa on which he lies immobilized at the final curtain. Staged, the room has a more immediate impact than the orchard, for it is actually present, unlike The Cherry Orchard, which remains indirectly experienced through words alone.

The orchard's presence is most keenly felt in the last act, in the sound of the axe that has begun its destruction. The most poignant and haunting presence in the play is not even identified with a locale. It comes in the sound of the breaking string, heard first in the second act, and then at the end of the play. Maurice Valency argued in The Breaking String: The Plays of Anton Chekhov, that the broken string is "the golden string that connected man with his father on earth and his father in heaven, the age-old bond that tied the present to the past." In general terms, it represents the passing of a way of life, but it relates, too, to the play's specific actions, especially Lopakhin's purchase of Mrs. Ranevsky's estate. The act gives him an overwhelming sense of emancipation, expressed in his triumphant monologue at the close of Act Three: "I've bought the estate where my father and grandfather were slaves, where they weren't even allowed in the kitchen. I must be dreaming. I must be imagining it all. It can't be true."

Most of the other characters suffer some anxious and painful moments in their ritual passage into the changing but uncertain world that the play foreshadows. Some, like Yepichodov and Charlotte, experience an identity crisis, while others, like Gayev ar disoriented and confused. Yet, as Francis Fergusson claimed in The Idea of a Theater: A Study of Ten Plays, while The Cherry Orchard is "a theater poem of the suffering of change," it is free "from the mechanical order of the thesis or intrigue" play. The tragic implications of the change drift through the comedy like the ghost of Mrs. Ranevsky's mother in the orchard, but they are not shaped into a single catastrophe and momentous reversal of fortune. The tragic elements are simply too diffuse and, like the breaking string, too distant to be distinct or fully understood. They are also muted and even subverted by the foreground elements that provide a comic counterpoint to the tragic backdrop. Much of the play's action remains routine and mundane, even trivial. Behind a facade of politeness, there is a quiet tension between those who fear change and those who welcome it, but when tension surfaces as anger or open aggression, Chekhov releases the pressure through some sort of comic safety valve. For example, in the third act, Trofimov, stung by Mrs. Ranevsky's attack on his perceptions of man/woman relationships and his childish whining, exits with theatrical indignation, only to fall down some offstage stairs to a chorus of laughter. So, too, in the second act, when the frustrated Lopakhin calls Mrs. Ranevsky "a silly old woman" because she will not agree to his plans for the estate, Gayev defuses the situation with his billiard game prattle and non-sequitur confession to a fruit candy addiction.

Most of the play's characters are idiosyncratic, and some, like Gayev and Pishchik, are wonderfully eccentric. Most, said Priestley, if "coldly considered," are also at least slightly contemptible: "Madame Ranevsky is a foolish woman only too anxious to return to a worthless young lover; Gayev is an amiable ass who talks too much; Anya is a goose and her Trofimov a solemn windbag; Lopakhin, the practical self-made man, is confused and unhappy; Epihodov a clumsy idiot; Dunyasha a foolish girl; Yasha an insufferable jumped-up lad; and Firs far gone in senility." However, Chekhov never leaves any one of them exposed to such a naked light for very long; he is too congenial for that, too, as Priestley stated, "tender and compassionate." Each character also seems to have a comic foil or nemesis, Firs and Kasha, for example, or Charlotte and Yepichodov. All also ride some sort of mental hobby horse that sporadically sends them off the track of conversation onto private, incongruous pathways, i.e., amusing non-sequiturs. Most, at the point of self-awareness, behave exactly like a jack-in-the-box, never able to suppress their foolish impulse. For example, in Act Two, Mrs. Ranevsky, berates herself for her careless waste of money, then immediately drops her purse on the ground and a moment later bestows one of her last gold coins on a panhandler. Meanwhile, Yepichodov, ever mindful of his role as an unfortunate clod, stumbles into furniture as if to prove he was not miscast for the part.

It is possible to probe such characters to reveal some darker or more sinister personality traits. Beverly Hahn, for one, argued in Chekhov: A Study of the Major Stories and Plays that the weaknesses of Mrs. Ranevsky and Gayev, their lack of will, "amounts to a complex sense of guilt and self-degradation which is both personal and yet obscurely the product of their situation of privilege." The Moscow Art Theatre audience of 1904 came from and returned to the world depicted in Chekhov's plays, and they experienced such inner guilt first hand—plus all the pain, sorrow, and pathos that Stanislavsky felt was in The Cherry Orchard and that scholars can still expose. But a reader or viewer of the play need not be quite so myopic. There is sufficient distance from Chekhov's world to free laughter from inhibition, restoring the comic balance that Chekhov felt was somehow missed in his own time.

"The Cherry Orchard" : Major Themes/ Main Conflicts

Change is the law of the cosmos. The clock of time moves on persons, and things come into existence, grow up, mature, decline and go to their resting place. So is the schedule with the socio-political orders and systems. Clash between feudalism and capitalism, tradition and modernity as well as aesthetic beauty and commercialism is central to "The Cherry Orchard."

"The Cherry Orchard" turned over its new leaf as a debut on the stage in 1904. At that time Russia was ruled over by the Tsar dynasty. Only thirteen years later, the Tsar was overthrown through a putsch.

The process of socio-political U-turns in Russia, as in the rest of the world, had kicked off showing conspicuous indications of great vicissitude in keeping with the times. The old order of feudal supremacy was on its last breaths. Agro-based economy amalgamated the Business or Agro-based economy commingled with the industrialism. The balance of power was shifting from feudal sway to industrialism/ commercialism. Huge estates and plazas were selling out and were being put to commercial use.

In "The Cherry Orchard", the change has been symbolized in the sale of Gaye family's cherished and renowned cherry orchard. With the passage of time, when Chekhov started jotting down this play unlike his contemporaries, he gave this theme a hilarious twist by highlighting the ludicrous facet of the ongoing process of socio-political change in Russia. Speaking of the social custom, Firs, the old servant of Lyubov laments:

"That's it! The peasants belonged to the masters and masters belonged to the peasants. You knew where you were. Now, its all topsy-turvy can't make any sense of it."

The revolution and the war metamorphosed everything. The post war Russia was an innovative Russia with a new political and social setup. Symptoms of the imminent revolution make "The Cherry Orchard" a political play.

Lopakhin, who comes of a serf family, represents the whole plebeian who was emerging into an industrialist class. Lyubov and her family with all its pages represent the feudal class that is, at recent times, eradicated in Russia and is not struggling for its survival on its own.

Lyubov's ménage and clan is under the obligation of their creditors. They are to pay their debt, which they cannot so their sole asset "The Cherry Orchard" is going to be sold under the law Gayev says that they are expecting some funds from Yeroslavl. On Lopakhin's enquiry, he reveals that the money is in the region of ten or fifteen thousand roubles. The amount is evidently like a drop in the bucket, which have now run into seven digits. This exasperates Lopakhin as he cries out,

"……With all due respect, you are the most frivolous, unbusiness like people I have ever met in my life."

Lopakhin's statement makes his sharp sagacity apparent in business field and impotence of the feudalism that was prevailing at that time.

In the present case, the renunciation is the penalty, Gayev's clan ought to reimburse for their reckless and lavish spending. It would not unjust to say that in the present case, the loss of tradition and estates came as a blessing, otherwise they would be soon p

Chekhov wants to convey the moral persuasion through his theme that sacrifice of aesthetic value is a necessary evil for the gratification in the recent world. “The Cherry Orchard” is a superb source of aesthetic enjoyment that is going to be put to havoc for purely materialistic interests. It is to be hewed down for building dachas. This gloomy transition reflects the on-going socio-political transition in Russia that is the striking theme of “The Cherry Orchard.”

“The Cherry Orchard” : Genre of the Play

A Comedy or Tragedy

Anton Chekhov’s The Cherry Orchard serves as a glimpse into the lives of upper middle-class Russians at the turn of the century. The play at times seems to be a regretful account of past mistakes, but at other times it seems very comedic. The final outcome tends to classify it primarily as a tragedy with no shortage of light hearted moments. It invokes many feelings within the reader: joy, regret, pity, and anger are all expressed among the interactions of several characters with rich and complicated personalities. The reader finds some parts of the characters appealing and some parts disgraceful. This complexity enhances the authenticity of the roles and in turn augments the reader’s emotional involvement.

Whether “The Cherry Orchard” is a comedy or tragedy, is a serious and a bit ambiguous question about this play. Notwithstanding, some lavishly humorous situations, characters and dialogues, “The Cherry Orchard” is barely like a comedy in the known sense. And yet Chekhov exhorted that it was a comedy and in places even a farce.

If it is a tragedy, a comparison with Aristotle’s concept of tragedy will make this ambiguity beyond question. Aristotle defined tragedy in a universal way. According to him,

“Tragedy is a representation of an action, which is serious, complete in itself and of a certain length, it is expressed in speech, made beautiful in different ways in different parts of the play, it is acted not narrated and by exciting pity and fear, it gives a healthy relief to such emotions.”

During the course of 18th century, the view of tragedy made a U-turn. The realistic vogue gripped the theatres of Europe. The audience did not favour the false exploitation of the princes in tragic plots. In the Elizabethan age, the playwrights had maintained, with a few exceptions, the outlook of social theories prevalent in the society. In the recent times, endeavours are made for composing tragedies. To the Greeks, Fate or Chance was the dominating factor, to the modern world, power of the society is overwhelming. Ergo, a tragedy of today can be wrought out of the conflict between a single human being and his surroundings.

In the light of above mentioned tragedies of different ages, “The Cherry Orchard” is not up to them. The play, in the point of fact, conforms entirely to Aristotle’s definition of comedy;

“As an imitation of characters of a lower stratum, which are not internally inferior, but whose faults and shortcomings possess something ludicrous.”

The symbolism of the sale of the cherry orchard can be sent as comical; it turns out to be a seminal icon for the memories of the family. This play is generated on seminal values of this family. No one in the family wants to see the cherry orchard go but it is ludicrous that the family does not see that the cherry orchard is going either by sale or development. Since this is a fact, it is only risible that the family should profit from the loss of the cherry orchard. The importance of seminal values should be overrun by the importance of survival. Ranyevskaya does not seem to be concerned with survival and can only see the cherry orchard as a seminal object. This is completely ridiculous and demonstrates the comical actions of Ranyevskaya. The view of the cherry orchard as seminal object also effects the true objective of the cherry orchard. Firs says:

"In the old days, forty, fifty years ago, they used to dry the cherries, they used to soak them, they used to pickle them, they used to make jam out of them, and year after year."

This caption informs the reader that the original purpose for the land was for profit. Ranyevskaya memories of the orchard as a fantastic playground disallows her to see the truth that the cherry orchard was just her parents business and it is time to change the business because times have changed. Every one of the many characters was carefully planned out to show some purpose in the message conveyed in The Cherry Orchard.

Chekhov is able to illustrate that the core of humanity is full of ludicrous emotions and ideas. The importance of the use of comedy in the play conveys with the importance of comedy in our lives. It shows the reader how the most ridiculous moments and decisions are probably the most important ones. The decisions of the characters are full of "faults that possess something ludicrous in them" which allows this to be considered a comedy. Apart from the elusive humour in "The Cherry Orchard", Chekhov was a top-Notch humourist in his own right. He came to be known early for his divergent humour. In this play, he puts the sense of humour in on lookers and readers to a trial. As a critic proposes, "Throughout, The Cherry Orchard, Chekhov places the action on a knife edge between laughter and tears. But he intends to weigh on the side of the comic, not against it." Another critic writes about Russians, "Russians very frequently laugh where one ought to weep. "The play, it is true, has plenty of emotional undercurrents but they are all of hilarious nature. Some of the critics have come up with sound reasons for labelling this play a comedy. To wind up the discussion, it may be concluded that there are arguments on either side. But the writer's word counts more than what the critics say. Since Chekhov called the play on comedy, the conclusion should certainly weigh that way.

"The Cherry Orchard" : Role of Mrs. Lyubov Ranevsky

Mrs. Lyubov Ranevsky is the protagonist figure of Chekhov's "The Cherry Orchard". She is quinquagenarian Russian lady, the owner of the estate and the Cherry Orchard around which the story revolves. Lyubov's life as well as her nature has alleviation of multi shades. She has stood in the way of hard realities of life many times and rather endeavoured to avert them.

A keen study of "The Cherry Orchard" denudes many facets of her personality. Anton Chekhov presents her before us as a representative of Feudal order. By the last breaths of 19th century, feudalism was dwindling and was replaced by commercialism. So, being a representative of feudalism, she must have to face penury, melancholy and misery. As the descendant of landlords, the current miseries are no less than an ordeal for her.

Her first name "Lyubov" means "Love" in Russian. She seems to personify love with her generosity, magnanimity, corporeal attractiveness and hedonistic nature. She is the only character in the play with suitor. But her amorous feelings waver her judgment frequently. She is sanctimoniously kind hearted and genteel as well as affectionate and sincere to all. She even adores her adopted daughter Varya and courteously behaves eve with her servants.

She has to support a large family that proves her a generous lady by nature. Her family includes her brother Leonid Gayev who has several intriguing verbal habits. Varya, her adopted daughter who is at the apex of her youth, her biological daughter who is a teenager, Charlotte, Anya the governess girls an old servants, Yasha, a young man servant and Dunyasha, a maid servant. She also splurges money on the beggars munificently. She was thrown from the sky to the earth due to her lavish habits. In act IV, Gayer advises her,

"There was no need to give them your purse Lyubov. You should not have done that you really should not".

Lyubov replies,

"I could not help myself! I could not help it!"

ntle, beautiful orchard!...... my life ...... my you .... My happiness… goodbye …. Farewell!"

Her love for aesthetic beauty has been manifested through her love for cheery orchard. To wind up her character, we can assert her with veracious representative figure of feudalism in Russia in the last breaths of 19th century. The most touching figure in a comedy also stimulates the reader's commiseration. Lyubov's character is the one and only character that fabricates the play as "A blend of smiles and tears."

"The Cherry Orchard" : The Title of the Play

Relationship between Lyubov and Cherry Orchard

Anton Chekhov's play The Cherry Orchard introduces readers to a pre-Revolution Russian family faced with the impending sale of their estate, the cherry orchard. The major character Lyubov Andreyev in the play is the possessor of the cherry orchard. It is in the play that Lyubov must ultimately decide whether to allow her cherry orchard to be cut down to make room for villas or to sell the entire estate to pay off her debts. It is her unconditional love for both the cherry orchard and what it symbolizes to her that allows her to put the estate up for sale rather than have the cherry orchard cut down.

Although she is a constituent of the Russian upper class, Lyubov is hopelessly out of touch with reality and very irresponsible when it comes to finances. She often throws money around as though there are no consequences to her actions. After her husband died and her boy was tragically drowned at the cherry orchard, she fled to Paris and bought a villa, which she soon had to sell to pay off her debts. Lyubov dines lavishly and tips han actuality she hasn't a dime to spare. She throws parties and hires orchestras she knows she cannot pay for. It is this type of behaviour that put Lyubov deep enough into debt to where her beloved estate has been put at risk.

To Lyubov the cherry orchard means so much more than the acres and acres of beautiful cherry trees and rivers; so much more than the piece of land that was featured in the encyclopaedia. To her it represents her sense of nostalgia, a longing for the past. It is the place where her grandparents lived. Her mother and father lived there as well. It reminds Lyubov of her youth. When she looks at the cherry trees she does not just see branches and blossoms, she sees a time when she walked through the orchard with her mother as a young girl. She says "I used to sleep here when I was little…and here I am like a child again." Lyubov's innocence also remains a part of the cherry orchard, for as a child she did not own serfs or squander her family's money. Even though the cherry orchard invokes thoughts of her lost husband and son, she still treasures it. The cherry orchard a piece of Lyubov's heart.

Because the cherry orchard means so much to Lyubov, it is especially hard for hero come to grips with the fact that she has two options neither of which suits her liking. Because of all the debt that she acquired so irresponsibly, it has become inevitable thither relationship with the cherry orchard will never be the same. Lyubov will only be able to maintain ownership of the cherry orchard if she has the cherry trees cut down and builds summer villas in their place. Her other option would be to sell the cherry orchard. Since she has lived on the estate all her life and loves it so dearly, Lyubov never even considers cutting down the cherry orchard. In fact she believes that to be a "vulgar" notion. Not only would the land that belonged to her family be trodden on by hundreds of visitors every summer, but also the orchard that held her childhood memories as well as those of the rest of her family would exist no longer. Because Lyubov refuses to insult the integrity of the estate by means of summer villas, the cherry Orchard ultimately goes up for sale. Lyubov can live with this only because she assures herself that the condition of the estate will be maintained. In essence, Lyubov cares more about the cherry orchard than herself and her family. If she were more concerned for herself and her family then she would have built the villas.

Unfortunately for Lyubov, her hopes to keep the cherry orchard intact were dashed when she found out that Lopakhin bought it and planned to have the villas built anyway. She was so crushed when she learned of this that she could barely stand up. She wept bitterly, consoled only by the fact that she could return to Paris and that she and her daughter, Anya, would be able to begin a new life together. Had Lyubov not loved the cherry orchard so dearly, she would have allowed the cherry trees to be cut down and the villas built, but because she did love it so, she risked her own welfare to keep it intact. Although the cherry orchard ultimately came down anyway, where it not for Lyubov's love it would have never even had a chance.

The cherry orchard : An epitome of modern theatrical technicalities

Chekhov is one of Russia's many important literary figures, and one of the greatest playwrights of modern times. He won the Pushkin Prize and he is known for his short stories and his plays, works that often combine elements of both comedy and tragedy. While works reflect the frequently turbulent developments specific to his homeland, their lasting appeal lies in Chekhov's talent for exploring universally human situations with such grace and dexterity.

Traditionally, humour and tragedy have been kept separate in dramatic works. Although Chekhov is certainly not the first playwright to mix comic and tragic elements on stage, he develops this tendency by creating a play that defies classification as either one of these two dramatic genres. Works such as The Cherry Orchard, which cannot be subjected to the traditional standards of classification, have helped build new modern literary traditions through their innovation in genre.

Chekhov changed the theatrical world with his plays. He was often disappointed when his plays were performed as tragedies; although each work has sad elements in it, Chekhov believed that this darker side of the plays should in no way undercut the immensely funny comic elements, which pervade even in the seemingly darkest moments. This confusion of the comic and tragic genres is one of Chekhov's important contributions not only to theatre, but also to literature in general.

Indirect Action is a technique Chekhov was most famous for. It involves action important to the play's plot occurring off-stage, not on. Instead of seeing such action happens, the audience learns about it by watching characters react to it on the stage. Lopakhin's speech at the end of Act III, recounting the sale of the cherry orchard, is the most important example of indirect action in the play: although the audience does not see the sale, the entire play revolves around this unseen action.

Anya's criticism of her mother's overspending in France is one of The Cherry Orchard's many examples of indirect action. The action described in the speech has not taken place on the stage, and is therefore indirect; the play revolves around the character's on-stage reactions to such off-stage action, for although this sort of action is not seen, it actually drives the plot. Lopakhin's opening speech is another example of indirect action, which both informs the audience of the past and manoeuvres the development of the action.

Irony appears in many instances throughout the play, and when it is not used for purely comic effect, it is tightly bound to the theme of blindness. On the one hand, the positions of the character's themselves are ironic. For example, the opposite circumstances of Lopakhin, Firs, and Dunyasha point out the irony in the now supposedly free-moving class system; characters talk about and praise a system of economic mobility. Still, they cannot see the contradiction in the situations of those around them that have no opportunity to improve their standing or are criticized for attempting to do so. In other cases, the play erects ironic moments, where the power in a given scene comes from a combination of two different images. For example, in Act II, Madame Ranevsky complains loudly about how she cannot control her money, while in the same breath she allows Yasha, the most untrustworthy character, to pick up her spilled purse. The fact that she is able to talk about her weakness and neglect the safety of her money in the same breath indicates that, despite her complaints, she is still blind to much of her problem.

Symbolism is also a major tool in the hands of the playwright. In "The Cherry Orchard" many symbols are employed for thematic clarification. The keys at Barbara's waist symbolize her practicality and her power. Gay's imaginary billiards game symbolizes his desire to escape. The cherry orchard symbolizes the old social order, the aristocratic hom symbolizes change. Firs himself is a figure of time; Anya is a figure of hope. The symbols in this play are too numerous to count, but many of them hinge on the idea of the changing social order or the specific circumstance of a given character.

Chekhov is also known for the emphasis he places on dialogue and off-stage action, otherwise known as "indirect action." The most important events in Chekhov's plays do not necessarily occur on Chekhov's stage; often, the audience experiences some of the most pivotal and dramatic action not by seeing it, but by hearing about it from the characters. In this concept of indirect action is an innovation on the part of Chekhov, whose impact on theatre and literature continues even today.

"The Cherry Orchard" : The Use of Symbolism

"We don't see things as they are. We see them as we are." This citation by Anais Nin articulates an essential point of view for debate about the symbolic connotation of inanimate bits and pieces, since it is our personality and our memories, which determine our character and meanings. Our feelings towards certain objects are individual, as everyone associates different things in a different manner. Insofar, "we see them as we are", since they can mirror our past, pains, hopes and our ideals. Thus they become more than just an object, but a symbol for a certain part of someone's feelings and life.

This is also the case in "The Cherry Orchard": objects as the 'nursery room', 'the bookcase' and 'the cherry orchard' take on their own symbolic life. They all share one thing in common: each one reveals something of the characters' personalities, feelings and ideals. These inanimate objects are a reflection of the characters' inner states of being. The meanings of these inanimate objects are changing analogously with the characters 'change of mood, perspective and state of mind. Thus one gets the inkling that the objects are more like persons, since it is only the characters' life, which makes and keeps them alive. 'The nursery room' may be for a stupendous person without any implicit significance, but for Lopakhin and Lyubov it is a symbol for their childhood, background and past.

The nursery room reminds Lopakhin of his origins. It makes him aware that he is "just a peasant"; no matter how rich he has become or how elegant he might be dressed, his social background still remains visible for other people. After all, one "can't make a silk purse out of a sow's ear", as his origins will be for good a part of his identity. For Lyubov the nursery room symbolizes her "innocent childhood". Being in this room, in which "she used to sleep when she was little" seems to bring her back to feel a part of that secure, carefree life and makes her feel "little again".

The bookcase has the same effect on her; all her troubles seem to be far away and she feels pure "happiness". Gayev's' 'relationship' to the bookcase is less personal, as he doesn't associate a particular personal memory with it. He considers it rather as an object, which has its own personality; hence, though it is "an inanimate object, true, but still – a bookcase"! The way he sees it is reminiscent of a hero, as it has for already hundred years "devoted itself to the highest ideals of goodness and justice" and has never deceived anyone. Being constantly and unshakably true to its 'principles', it was a source, from which "several generations of their family" have drawn courage and hope "in a better future". In the course of time a lot of things have changed: some people are dead, Gayev and Lyubov got adolescent, and the estate is probably going to be sold. However, the bookcase not being subject to any rules or changes thus becomes for Gayev a symbol of consistency and security.

The central symbol of "The Cherry Orchard", as the title might suggest, is the cherry orchard itself. The cherry orchard does not only represent an inanimate object, but it is the centre of the characters' world. Their lives could be divided into the era "before the cherry orchard was sold" and into the era after it. With this change the symbolic meaning of the cherry orchard before and after the sale also changes. The cherry orchard 'before the sale' plays a part in each of the characters' past; but it seems foremost to be part of Lyubov mind, through which the cherry orchard takes on his own symbolic life, as its symbolic meaning changes with the changes in her mind. She "can't conceive to live without the cherry orchard", as almost her whole past and memories are connected to it. Looking at it seems to revive the memories of her "happy childhood" and makes time stand still, as if "nothing has changed" in her life. In those days her attitude towards life was innocent and "bold", as she wasn't yet "able to foresee or expect anything dreadful”. She felt like the cherry orchard, "after the dark, stormy autumn and the cold winter, young and joyous again"; but now, she seems to have lost this "power of vision" and her naive view of life. That's might be the reason for her to see the cherry orchard in such an illusory light. It had become a refugee place, where she hides to escape from reality, her “problems" and "sins". The cherry orchard for her embodies a kind of paradise, into which her 'unhappy past' does not enter, but only her 'happy past'. She doesn't want to let go the cherry orchard, because she doesn't want to let go her 'happy past'. As long as the cherry orchard exists, her childhood feelings seem to continue to still exist for real. To sale the cherry orchard would mean to erase that beloved part of her life and thus sell her, too.

However, the irony is that she escapes from her 'unhappy past' to a place just like the cherry orchard, which magic only lives through the past itself. In as much as the cherry orchard represents a kind of 'Garden Eden' for her, it at the same time also is a “burden", which rests on her shoulders. As long as she continues to stick to the orchard, she won't "forget her past" and won't thus be able to create a new future.

"To begin to live in the present, one must first atone for his past and be finished with it". Unlike Lyubov, her daughter, Anya, already reached that conclusion and is willing to "leave" this burden behind her; her "love" for the cherry orchard has vanished, as it is part of her past life and has therefore nothing to do any longer with her present and future.

'The cherry orchard after the sale' thus becomes a symbol for renewal and a new beginning for the life of each character in the play: Lopakhin purchasing the estate go table to get rid of his origins. "Gay with life and wealth", he has freed himself from being only the grandson and son of serfs, who used to work on this estate. Now he has become the owner of that place and with the cutting down of the cherry orchard, he is going to leave his past and origins behind him, creating a "new living world". Also Lyubov’s “burden" of the past seems now to have become lighter; "her nerves are better" and she is going to leave for Paris, since she might have recognized that it's finished long ago and that there is no turning back".

Gayev has finally "calmed down”, too and is going to be an employee of a bank. Varya is going to leave for a new job, and Anya and Trofimov are gladly stepping towards their "new life". Also the rest of the characters have to start a new life in a new place. When they leave there won't be a soul in this place" anymore. May be not in this place, th in another place, since there are in the world "many, many wonderful places", on which one can "plant a new orchard".

The characters in the cherry orchard do not learn, why?

The cherry orchard is a struggle between the characters' incompatibility. Make a convincing case.

The world of the cherry orchard is consisting of people with difference in their behaviours, comment.

The Cherry Orchard by Anton Chekhov is a dramatic play set at a cherry orchard in Russia. Some of the characters that help set the dramatic setting of the play are Lyubov, Lopakhin, and Pishchik. These characters find life difficult because they fail to understand each other and because they passively submit to their environmental situations without making an effort to rise above them.

Lyubov is the owner of the cherry orchard, and has lived there her whole life. The estate has been handed down through the generations, and Lyubov has been left to take care of it. Since Lyubov has grown up wealthy, she has not learned to manage her money wisely. She wastefully spends and hands out money: "I haven't any money, my dove…oh, very well…give it to him, Leonid." She does not know how to work in order to regain the money she has spent. She finds herself going into debt and not being able to pay the mortgage. These problems grow so severe that she is forced to sell the orchard.

Lopakhin offers to help L Lyubov and her family to get them out of debt. He suggests several ideas such as tearing down buildings and the house, and renting homes on the land that the cherry orchard now grows. He cares not about the sentimental value the orchard holds, but the money that could be made selling it. When told the personal value of the orchard, Lopakhin replies: "The only remarkable thing about this cherry orchard is that it's very big." He also says: "There's a crop of cherries once every two years…that's hard to get rid of…nobody buys them." Though this does not make Lopakhin a greedy or uncaring person, one might think this is quite awkward.

Pishchik on the other hand is only out for himself. He too was once wealthy, but had problems spending his money. He begs for money instead of working or earning it, creating even larger debts. When he asks Lyubov for 240 roubles to pay for his mortgage, she agrees, but is turned away by Gayev's. Pishchik then relies on luck and a lottery ticket his wife gave him. Throughout the story, he refers to gimmicks in order to make money: "Well-a horse is a fine animal-You can sell a horse." He also talks about counterfeiting money in order to repay his debts. It is not until the end of the story when his luck pays off by finding a large sum of money, which he is able to pay all his debts.

The Cherry Orchard shows several examples of characters that do not learn or react to their mistakes and surroundings. Lyubov and Pishchik both have problems spending and managing their money. Pishchik, though, relies on luck. Lopakhin, on the other hand, is not sympathetic to people's feelings and is out to make money. These characters find life fail to understand each other and because they passively submit to their environmental situations without making an effort to rise above them.

Describe the cultural conflict, independence and social changes as the basic themes of the play.

Anton Chekhov's The Cherry Orchard projects the cultural conflict of the turn of the twentieth century of Russia. With a historical allusion, Chekhov exhibited the changing Russia with "slice of life" in his play. The Cherry Orchard is not only a depiction of Russian life but also an understatement of changing traditional value. Cultural conflict itself is an abstraction. To explain it, it is the traditional culture that is unable to resist the invading one.

In the play, each character has his or her own personality, which symbolizes the individual social levels of Russian society. But these characters distinguish themselves into two sides, which are conservators and investors; therefore, they conflict each other in opinion. The following developments will begin with an outlook of The Cherry Orchard to acknowledge the basic concept of the play. The second part is culture in change that explains historical background of modern Russia. Third by a contrasting method, the main idea of this part is an illustration of conflict.

The play deals with the theme of independence in many different ways.Fundamentally, it demands that we ask what it is to be free. What with the Liberation, The Cherry Orchard deals with independence in a very concrete way: shortly before the beginning of the play, much of Russia's population was not free. The play's characters demonstrate the different degrees of freedom that result from the Liberation. On opposing ends of this question are Lopakhin and Firs. One man has been able to take advantage of his liberation to make himself independent; the other, although he is technically free, has not changed his position at all and is subject to the whims of the family he serves, as he has always been. The difference in their situation demonstrates the observations of many Russians of the time: officially liberating a group of people is not the same as making them free if you do not also equip them with the tools they need to become independent, i.e., resources such as education and land.

Trofimov, the play's idealist, offers one definition of freedom for the audience to consider when he declines Lopakhin's offer of money. According to Trofimov, he is a free man because he is beholden to no one and nothing more than his own concept of morality. His observations seem accurate in light of other forms of non-freedom in the play. Madame Ranevsky, for example, is not free in a very different way from Firs. She has enough assets to be able to control her own destiny, but she is a slave to her passions, spending extravagantly and making poor decisions in romance, and therefore cannot follow a higher moral code as Trofimov does. What with the combination of economic circumstances and the bizarre weaknesses of the characters, the play therefore suggests that there are two sources which control freedom and the lack thereof: economics, which comes from without, and control over oneself, which comes from within.

Several characters address the potential difference between social change and social progress. Firs and Trofimov are two of them. Both question the utility of the Liberation. As Firs notes, it made everyone happy, but they did not know what they were happy for. Firs himself is living proof of this discrepancy: society has changed, but his countless others, have not progressed. Both characters insinuate that the Liberation is not enough to constitute progress; while it was a necessary change; it was not enough to bring mankind to the idealized future Trofimov imagines. The play leaves the impression that while change has come, there is more work to be done.

"The Cherry Orchard" : Social Realism

The history of the early twentieth century Russian society is the history of social transition, transformation. The late 19th century Russian society was struggling to be free from the shibboleth of the dying feudal aristocracy. In parallel to this struggle there was also progressive change which hastened the dawn of a mercantile middle class. At every time in the chapter of social history, a single class can't maintain its supremacy and privileged status. With a passage of time the old social order has to die yielding place to the new emerging social order. No society remains unchanged. Every society has to transform. Each society is bound to undergo change as time passes by. It is the very nature of society to undergo change. This law of social change is applicable universally in the world.

The late 19th century Russian society witnessed the soaring success of the capitalistic middle class. At very step the middle class was on the rise. At all point this class was successful. The progressive march of this class was so strong that no obstacle was going to disturb it. Furthermore the old feudal aristocracy was not only on the immediate decline, but on the verge of extinction without levelling any remnant of it. The old feudal social order was no longer in a tenable position to dictate its ethos and to impose its ideals and norms. Surprisingly enough, this class was totally ignorant and un- habituated to adaptive evolution. A new emerging class was head over heel in love with change, with progressive social transformation. But the old dying aristocratic class was allergic to change, antipathetic to change, and unprepared to embrace the costly social transformation.

In the play The Cherry Orchard Lyubov and Gayev represent the dying aristocracy. Their heavy debt forced them to put their Orchard in auction. Their orchard was sure to be lost. However, there was a route to save it by letting it on lease for the construction of summer cottage. There was a chance for the virtually dying class to live a life of adaptation and compromise. But this class was too proud to let their orchard on lease. Lyubov and Gayev were rather ready to leave the place that to see others possessing it. They fought their last battle in their hopeless and unsuccessful attempt to save the orchard. Finally they failed. The orchard fell into the much more practical and sensible man, Lopakhin.

Lopakhin represents the victoriously emerging middle-class. A man of action he believes in the necessity to take quick action man of vision he is far busier in the plan to rise above the underprivileged class through financial and practical success. Once he belonged to the working class. He was a servant in Lyubov's house when he was a child. Through hard- work and practical line of thinking he succeeded in earning money. With the huge amount of money he earned, he succeeded in changing himself from the working class to the middle class. Economically he became so strong that he bought the Cherry Orchard of Lyubov in auction on the highest purchase. Even the aristocratic was attracted towards him. Lyubov offered her daughter Varya's hand to him but Lopakhin hesitated. If Lopakhin represents the practical middle class, Trofimov represents the theoretical and visionary ideals of the class committed to embrace.

Thus, the play The Cherry Orchard presents a social phenomenon which exemplifies the old decent feudal order giving way to the rapidly expanding capitalistic and mercantile middle class. As a mode of social realism the play represents the Russian society by the end of the 19th century. At that time the society was moving towards the threshold to change. Chekhov captured the reality concerning the social transformation. The displacement of Lyubov and Gayev on account of their failure to stand in the lives of compromise and adaptation illustrates a golden fact that the early 20th century Russian society bade final adieu to the last remnant of decaying feudal structure. In most of Chekhov's plays the feudal aristocrat are presented as bored, passive, dreamy and ridiculously ideal. This mode of characterization also reveals that this class has no right to occupy foreground in the social hierarchy of Russia. The middle class people are depicted as practical, sensible, painstaking, hard- working and radical as well. This line of characterization displays the fact that the playwright is in favour for the emergence of this class.

Chekhov's The Cherry Orchard as a Comedy

Some people have called Chekhov's The Cherry Orchard a tragedy, but there's a case to be made for it being a comedy. Anton Chekhov called The Cherry Orchard "a comedy in four acts." Of course he called The Seagull a comedy, too, even though one of the main characters commits suicide at the end. I think The Cherry Orchard really is a comedy however. It's a comedy in two senses of the word, the classical and modern senses.

It's a comedy in the classical sense that, even though things look bad for a while, they all work out in the end. Some of Shakespeare's comedies are not very funny, for example Measure for Measure, in which a corrupt judge demands relations with a novice nun in order to save her brother's life. But it's a comedy because no one dies and the characters who've tried to do what's right finally get justice. A callous fate doesn't get to wipe everybody out in a classical comedy.

No one dies tragically in The Cherry Orchard, either, although Firs, the ancient servant, dies peacefully in the home that he loves. The owners of the cherry orchard and the rest of the estate, the generous Mrs. Ranevsky and her brother Gayev, are faced with having the property sold to pay their debts. They cling to happy memories of their childhood home, and hatch all kinds of plans to save it. "Oh, my orchard!" Mrs. Ranevsky cries, "after the dark autumns and the cold winters, you're young again, full of happiness!" But once they know the property is gone for good, they soon reconcile themselves to the idea. Mrs. Ranevsky returns to Paris to take care of her hapless lover, and Gayev quickly secures a job at a bank.

Mrs. Ranevsky and Gayev even pass up the chance to save the estate by selling it for summer cottages. It's a plan proposed by their friend Lopakhin, who will even loan them the money to clear the land. Lopakhin is a wealthy businessman whose father was a serf under Mrs. Ranevsky's father. But the brother and sister refuse even to consider the scheme. "Villas and villa residents--it's so vulgar, excuse me." Mrs. Ranevsky says.

So Lopakhin ends up buying the estate at auction. How times have changed. Lopakhin can't help pointing it out, although he's a kind man. "I've bought the estate where my father and grandfather were slaves, where they weren't even allowed in the kitchen," he declares triumphantly.

And, although Mrs. Ranevsky and Gayev mourn the loss of their childhood home with all its beauty and happy memories, they know its time is gone. Former serfs have become rich by commerce. The children of past gentry must now get by as best they can. Mrs. Ranevsky asks her daughter, "Are you very pleased? You are, aren't you?" and Anya answers, "Oh, yes, I am. This is the start of a new life, Mother." Gayev adds, "It's quite true, everything's all right now."

The Cherry Orchard is also a comedy in the modern sense that it's funny. It's full of wonderful, wacky Chekhov characters. There's Yepikhodov the clerk who complanins constantly, always adding, "not that I complain." There's Pischik, a neighbor, who has a great penchant for borrowing money and swallows a whole bottle of Mrs. Ranevsky's pills as a joke. "I've swallowed the lot!" he laughs. There's Yasha, the servant who fancies himself educated, and pronounces that the old servant Firs has a case of "anno domini."

Best of all there's Gayev, a good-natured man who loves to make speeches as much as everyone else hates to hear them. He congratulates a bookcase on being a hundred years old, and "educating us up to ideals of goodness and to the knowledge of a common consciousness." Later he begins, "Nature, glorious nature, glowing with everlasting radiance, so beautiful, so cold--" His nieces quickly cut him off, saying, "Uncle, you're doing it again!"

The Cherry Orchard is about how hard it can be to accept changes. It's also about how resilient people can be in the face of change. And, although a thread of sadness runs through the play, its characters are drawn with Chekhov's gentle humor. It gives us an optimistic view of humanity, which is a good thing for a comedy to do. We're left with the comforting thought that everything really is going to be all right.

Naturalism in Search of a Genre

Look! In the sky! It’s a tragedy! No, it’s a comedy! No, it’s…both? This is the dilemma directors, actors, readers, and audiences alike have experienced throughout the years when reading, watching, or performing Anton Pavlovich Chekhov’s final work, The Cherry Orchard. Originally written as a comedy, it was first produced as a tragedy by Konstantin Stanislavsky and The Moscow Art Theatre in 1904. The Cherry Orchard tells the story of Madame Ranevskaya, her brother Gayev, and her two daughters Varya and Anya, the family that owns the old estate and the orchard after which it is named. The family is nearly bankrupt and their estate is set to be sold at auction soon. Try as they might, they cannot earn, borrow, or even find the money they need to save their precious estate. The wealthy businessman and son of former serfs on the estate, Lopakhin, suggests that the family cut down the orchard, divide it into lots, and build rental property on the expanse. This, however, would destroy the very thing that they love the most: the orchard. In the end, the family cannot find the means to save the orchard, and so it is sold at auction to—ironically—Lopakhin, who intends to do with the land just what he suggested the family do. Insult is added to injury as his men begin chopping down the orchard even before the family has left the premises. While it cannot be denied that humor is found throughout The Cherry Orchard, neither can the underlying feeling of tragedy. Many scholars have questioned the ultimate genre of Chekhov’s play, and found their answer, whether or not it was the one they expected to find.

Barricelli makes much of the "sound of a snapped string mournfully dying away" found both near the end of Act II and at the very end of Act IV (348, 380). He does not hold his opinion back and firmly resolves that "regardless of Chekhov's own paradoxal assertions about his plays being comedies and not tragedies, is that the play in not an "undramatic drama" but indeed a tragic drama." (115) He implores his readers to "be able to say how [the sound] got to have this meaning [of tragedy], and how it reveals it structurally within the play." (116) Barricelli looks to Russian folklore at the time, and finds his answer.

In folklore, a player may leave his instrument behind as a "life token," an extension of himself, and if during his absence a string breaks, this is considered evil portent. The chord that snaps involves the idea of a separable soul. One may come upon several such examples of a breaking string: "If an instrument breaks for no special reason, then there will soon be a wedding, or, according to a more widespread superstition, one must expect death." (117)

While Barricelli goes on to state that only the latter part of the superstition applies, I believe that both are relevant. The symbolism of the heron and the owl, of which Gayev and Trofimov, the former tutor to Madame Ranevskaya's late son, speak, can be linked to Egyptian hieroglyphics. In the Egyptian systems, the owl symbolizes death, night, cold, and passivity, while the heron symbolizes morning and the generation of life. (118) Both meanings exemplify the very balance of comedy and tragedy in The Cherry Orchard: a simple sound that forebodes of new beginnings and endings, of life and death.

Fergusson explores the poetic aspect of The Cherry Orchard. He finds that "the larger elements of the composition—the scenes or episodes, the setting, and the developing story—are composed in such a way as to make a poetry of the theatre; but the "text", as we read it literally, is not." (386) He never addresses the question of comedy or tragedy, but merely accepts the presence of both. He describes it as "a realistic ensemble pathos," (383) explaining his standpoint by asserting that "the characters all suffer the passing of the estate in different ways, thus adumbrating this change at a deeper and more generally significant level than that of any individual's experience." (383) He takes questions the sound of the snapped string as well, calling it a "sharp, almost warning signal," but says nothing else about it. (389) Fergusson does address the irony of the play in another way, noting that in the last act "all the characters feel, and the audience sees in a thousand way, that the wish to save the Orchard has amounted in fact to destroying it; the gatherer of its denizens to separation; the homecoming to departure." (384) This statement is ultimately is the same as the question between comedy and tragedy. Are these ironies amusing or heart-breaking? Once again we find that they are both.

Remaley questions: "Is it indeed a comedy as Chekhov claimed, or a tragedy as so many producers and critics have chosen to interpret it?" (16) This can be answered once more in the final scene of Act IV, as they are leaving the orchard forever, Madame Ranevskaya and Gayev hold each other, sobbing. Gayev is unable to say anything other than, "My sister, my sister…" (379) while Madame Ranevskaya exclaims in despair, "Oh, my dear, sweet, lovely orchard!…My life, my youth, my happiness, good-bye!…Good-bye!" (379) Furthermore, in the last moment, we find that Firs, the aged and ailing valet, has been forgotten. He speaks the finals words of the play, muttering,

> "They have gone…They've forgotten me…I'll lie down awhile…I expect Leonid Andreich hasn't put on his fur coat and has gone off in his overcoat.[Sig > didn't see to it…When they're young, they're green!…There's no strength left in you, nothing's left, nothing…Ach, you…addlepate! [Lies motionless.] (380).

The audience is left with this searing and symbolic image. At this moment of solitude and death, the "sound of a snapped string" of which Barricelli spoke is heard once more, combined with the "thud of the ax far away in the orchard" (380). These concluding scenes are anything but comedic. Remaley does, however, cite many instances of humor found in The Cherry Orchard. He uses the example of Yasha, Madame Ranevskaya's manservant, who is deeply offended by Lopakhin's champagne, yet drinks the entire bottle himself (17). Another example Remaley uses is Gayev's rather long apostrophe to the antique bookcase:

Dear and most honoured book-case. In you I salute as existence devoted for over a hundred years to the glorious ideals of virtue and justice. In the course of the century your silent summons to creative work has never faltered, upholding through tears in several generations of our line confidence and faith in a better future and fostering in us the ideals of virtue and social consciousness. (18)

To drive his point home, Remaley quotes Ionesco, who comments that "it all comes to the same thing anyway; comic and tragic are merely two aspects of the same situation" (20). The tragic story is not made a comedy, or even neutralized, by its comedic elements, but rather it is made more tragic. It causes the reader to feel that much more for the characters, for in this they become that much more realistic. Life is ups and downs, highs and lows, tears and laughter.

In the end, all debate can be settled simply by going to Chekhov's personal writings. Chekhov "insists that the reader understands that his play is a description of life, and the single, all-important fact which screams for attention is that life contains both the comic and the tragic, both the ludicrous and the serious, both the painless and the painful." (Remaley, 19) He further insists that "the critic commits a serious error when he emphasizes either the sombre, pessimistic dimension or the lighter, comic dimension in his dramatic creations, for both dimensions are equally evident in life and must be equally evident in any artistic endeavour which hopes to achieve verisimilitude with life." (Remaley, 20) Chekhov intended The Cherry Orchard to be a comedic play, which it is, yet in his naturalism it became tragic as well. In fact, he struck the very heart and soul of man existence: that happiness is pain, that sorrow can be joyful, that life is found in death, and that endings lead to beginnings.

Genre-Bending in The Cherry Orchard

The following genres have all had The Cherry Orchard ascribed to them by some influential critic or playwright: Comedy, Drama, Tragedy, pastoral comedy, "Chekhovian comedy." The last genre was created specifically for the play, by Donald R. Styran; the term "pastoral" is a literary term usually denoting poems that are about shepherds, but according to Beverly Hahn, a "pastoral comedy" is the closest fit in terms of genre that The Cherry Orchard can manage. The first genre on the list is what Chekhov himself considered the play to be, as reflected in the play's subtitle: A Comedy in Four Acts. But Stanislavksy, the great director of the Moscow Arts Performing Theatre where the play was first produced, disagreed. He thought the play was a drama, and directed it as such. This annoyed Chekhov to no end. Especially irksome to the playwright was the way Stanislavsky stretched out the fourth Act to forty minutes in length, in order to heighten the emotional impact of Ranevsky's final departure. According to Chekhov, the Act should have lasted no more than twelve.

There is a fine line between pathos and comedy; as Richard Peace notes, they both involve the build-up and then release of emotional tension. The difference between is often dependent upon whether we closely sympathize with a given character's predicament or whether we maintain a certain distance from that predicament. The Cherry Orchard walks a fine line between the two. Where Chekhov may cross the line from comedy to pathos is in the amount of attention he gives to Ranevsky in terms of character development. She is, next to the orchard itself, the largest presence in the play, and thus draws the attention of readers. She is a sympathetic character, and furthermore is the one character who seems to escape the irony which distances us from the rest of the characters in the play. This has prompted some critics and readers have seen Ranevsky as a tragic hero. The play's structuring of time supports this interpretation, as well; it flows from the beginning towards a fixed end-point in the future; this fixed time frame is typical of tragedy.

Others, however, have taken Chekhov's side in the debate. And even though the subject matter of the play may appear serious, we can see that Chekhov mixes both comic elements and tragic elements in the play. First of all, though the end of the play is far from upbeat, the central character Ranevsky is alive, healthy, and perhaps better off than she was before, having the chance to leave her past behind her. Secondly, there is an element of vaudeville in the play; Yephikodov is a buffoon, and when Varya hitting Lopakhin is pure slapstick. Also, it must be noted much of the humor in The Cherry Orchard does not translate nearly as well as the symbolism. Russian culture, like any culture, has its own unique sense of humor; the challenge of translating Chekhov's jokes into the English idiom may be the main reason why there have been so many translations (90), not one of which has proven to be perfectly satisfactory. And no matter how good a translation is, it will never catch, for example, the pun on Yephikodov's words when he hands his bouquet of flowers to Dunyasha in Act One; he intends to say," allow me to communicate to you," but the word he uses in the original Russian, prisovokupit, which is a little too close to sovokupit, which means "to copulate," especially when directed towards the woman he wants to marry.

Life of Galilio Galili

Life and Works of Bertolt Brechet

Bertolt Brecht was born on February 10, 1898, in the medieval city of Augsburg, part of the Bavarian section of the German Empire. Married in 1897, his father was a Catholic and his mother a Protestant. Brecht was their first child, baptized as Eugen Bertolt Friedrich Brecht. His father, Bertolt Friedrich Brecht, worked in a paper factory. His mother, Wilhelmine Friederike Sophie Brezing, was ill with breast cancer most of his young life. He had one brother, Walter, who was born in 1900.

Brecht was a sickly child, having a congenital heart condition and a facial tic. As a result, he was sent to a sanitarium to relax. At age six he attended a Protestant elementary school (Volksschule) and at age ten a private school, The Royal Bavarian Realgymnasium (Koeniglich-Bayerisches Realgymnasium). Like most students, he was educated in Latin and the humanities, later being exposed to Nietzsche and other thinkers. He suffered a heart attack at the age of twelve but soon recovered and continued his education.

Significantly, Brecht was exposed at a young age to Luther's German translation of the Bible, a text considered instrumental in the development of the modern German language. Quotes from and references to the Bible abound throughout Brecht's work and can be found most particularly in Mother Courage and Her Children in the mouth of the chaplain.

While in school he began writing, and he ended up co-founding and co-editing a school magazine called The Harvest. By age sixteen, he was writing for a local newspaper and had written his first play, The Bible, about a girl who must choose between living and dying but saving many others. He was later almost expelled at age eighteen for dissenting about it being necessary to defend his country in time of war. By nineteen, he had left school and started doing clerical work for the war, prevented from more active duty due to health problems.

In 1917, he resumed his education, this time attending Ludwig Maximilian Universitaet in Munich, where he matriculated as a medical student. By this time, his mother was heavily drugged with morphine because of her progressing cancer. He started to write Baal at this time, a play concerned with suffering caused by excessive sexual pleasures. It sensationally depicted what were considered immoral attitudes at the time.

Brecht's own sex life is fascinating in many ways. He is thought to have had no fewer than three mistresses at any time throughout his adult life. When he was a child, the family's second servant, Marie Miller, would hide objects in her undergarments for Brecht and his brother to find. Through Brecht's poetry, we understand that his mother used to smell his clothes to determine the extent of his sexual activities. By the age of sixteen, he began to frequent a brothel as part of a conscientious effort to broaden his experiences. Between sixteen and twenty, he apparently pursued eight girls simultaneously, including Paula Banholzer, the woman who gave birth to his illegitimate child in 1919. He is known to have experimented with homosexuality, often inviting literary and musically in his room on weekends in order for them to read erotic compositions. His diaries, although vague, mention his need for both males and females to fulfil his sexual desires. Brecht's desire for experience was, throughout his life, all-consuming.

In 1921, he took his second trip to Berlin and attended the rehearsals of Max Reinhardt and other major directors. In 1922, his play Drums in the Night opened in Munich at the Kammerspiele and later at the Deutsches Theatre in Berlin. He received the prestigious Kleist prize for young dramatists as a result. Brecht also entered into his first committed relationship, his marriage with the opera singer Marianne Zoff, at the age of twenty-four. Their daughter Hanne was born the following year. Despite being married, Brecht had extramarital affairs and spent very little time with his wife or daughter. In 1923, his two plays Jungle of Cities and Baal were performed.

After moving to Berlin in 1924, he met a communist Viennese actress, Helene Weigel. His wife Marianne moved in with her parents after the birth of Hanne, and soon she stopped responding to Brecht's letters. At age twenty-six Brecht fathered his second illegitimate child, with Weigel. Their son was named Stefan. Brecht divorced Marianne Zoff and in 1929 married Helene Weigel. At this point, he was just thirty-one.

Helene Weigel gave birth to their second child, Barbara, in 1930. During this time, Brecht was by no means monogamous. He was obsessed with the idea of abandonment, and as a result, he abhorred ending relationships. The women in his life were important for his writing career, and modern feminist detractors often try to claim that his mistresses in fact wrote much of what was accredited to him. The allegation is largely untrue, but women such as Elisabeth Hauptmann did write significant parts of The Threepenny Opera. In addition, other mistresses included Margarete Steffin, who helped him write The Good Woman of Setzuan and Mother Courage and Her Children; Hella Wuolijoki, who allowed him to transform her comedy The Sawdust Princess into Herr Puntila and His Man Matti; and Ruth Berlau, who bore him a short-lived, third illegitimate child in 1944. Weigel was tolerant of his affairs, and she even warned other men to stay away from his mistresses because it upset him when they made their moves.

Brecht's writings show the profound influence of many varied sources during this time and the remaining years of his life. He studied Chinese, Japanese, and Indian theatre, focused heavily on Shakespeare (adapting, among other plays, Shakespeare's Coriolanus) and other Elizabethans, and was fascinated by Greek tragedy. He found inspiration in other German playwrights, notably Buchner and Wedekind, and he enjoyed the Bavarian folk play. Mother Courage and Her Children arguably owes much to Schiller's Wallenstein trilogy. Brecht had a phenomenal ability to take elements from these seemingly incompatible sources, combine them, and convert them into his own works.

In 1933, Brecht took his family and fled to Zurich after the burning of the Reichstag, later moving around the world to escape Nazi rule. In October 1947, during the McCarthy years, Brecht was called to appear before the House Committee on Un-American Activities. Although not an official member of America's Communist party, Brecht left the United States for Switzerland the next day. He soon reunited with Helene Weigel, and they traveled to East Berlin in 1948 and set up the Berliner Ensemble with full support from the Communist regime. Mother Courage and Her Children was the Berliner Ensemble's inaugural production. In 1950, Brecht and Weigel were granted Austrian citizenship.

Brecht's four great plays were written between 1938 and 1945. These included, for one, The Life of Galileo, which followed history slavishly. It dealt with the protagonist's self-hatred for giving up his convictions in the face of the Inquisition. The others were Mother Courage and Her Children; The Good Woman of Setzuan, which in some ways follows from Mother Courage in examining the compatibility of virtue and a capitalist world; and The Caucasian Chalk Circle, which introduces questions about power and who is entitled to own things. After this period, Brecht worked on his famous adaptation of Antigone and spent much of his energy recording his theoretical ideas.

Brecht experimented with Dadaism and expressionism in his early plays, but he soon developed a unique style that suited his own vision. He detested "Aristotelian" drama and the manner in which it (at least from his point of view) made the audience identify with the hero without enough analysis of the hero's flaws. To him, when such drama produced feelings of terror and pity and led to an emotional catharsis, the process prevented audience members from thinking. (It is the ancient quarrel between philosophers and poets once again, with another thinker trying to reform poetry.) Determined to destroy what he considered theatrical illusions, Brecht made his dreams into realities when he took over the Berliner Ensemble. In one of his early productions, he famously put up signs which said, "Glotzt nicht so romantisch!" ("Don't stare so romantically!").

Brecht received the National Prize, first class, in 1951. In 1954, he won the international Lenin Peace Prize. Brecht died of a heart attack on August 14, 1956, while working on a response to Samuel Beckett's absurdist play Waiting for Godot, written the year before. Even at the end, Brecht was very much interested in the modern drama of the day. He provided instructions that a stiletto be placed in his heart and that he be buried in a steel coffin so that his corpse would not be riddled with worms. He also left a will giving the proceeds of his various works to particular mistresses, including Elisabeth Hauptmann and Ruth Berlau. Unfortunately, the will lacked the necessary witness signatures and was therefore considered void. His widow, Helene Weigel, generously gave small amounts of money to the specified women. Brecht is buried in the Dorotheenfriedhof in Berlin.

Brechet-The Playwright

By 1936 a wide range of experimentation and innovation had established the parameters of the contemporary theatre. The training of actors in the Western theatre has since become more organized to take in concepts and programs from the earlier innovators. There are few schools today that do not acknowledge the work of Stanislavski in their training. Less obvious but equally pervasive is the influence of Reinhardt and Copeau, largely by way of their pupils in teaching. And towering above all others (save perhaps Stanislavski) is the figure of Brechet. It is reasonable to argue that Brechet absorbed, and in turn perpetuated, more influences than any other individual in the modem theatre,

Of central importance in establishing this argument is Brechet's essay "On Experimental Theatre" (1940) in which he reviews the work of Vakhtangov, Meyerhold, Antoine, Reinhardt, Okhlopkov, Stanislavski, Jessner, and other Expressionists. Brechet traces through the modem theatre the two lines running from Naturalism and Expressionism. Naturalism he sees as the "assimilation of art to science," which gave the Naturalistic theatre great social influence, but at the expense of its capacity to arouse aesthetic pleasure.

Expressionism (and by implication the other anti-illusionist theatres), he acknowledges, "vastly enriched the theatre's means of expression and brought Aesthetic gains that still remain to be exploited." But It proved incapable of shedding any light on the world as an object of human activity, and the theatre's educational value collapsed. Brechet recognized the great achievements of Piscator's work, in which he himself played a significant role, but proposed a further advance in the development of so-called epic theatre.

Brechet's Marxist political convictions led him to propose an alternative direction for the theatre that would fuse the two functions of instruction and entertainment. In this way the theatre could project a picture of the world by artistic means and offer models of life that could help the spectators to understand their social environment and to master it both rationally and emotionally. The main concept of Brechet's program was that of Verfremdungseffekt ("alienation,). In order to induce a critical frame of mind in the spectator, Brechet considered it necessary to dispense with the empathetic involvement with the stage that the illusionary theatre sought to induce. Generally, this has been understood as a deadening coldness in the productions, but such an interpretation proceeds from a general ignorance of Brechet's own writings on the subject. Rather, he insisted, as Appia, Craig, and the Symbolists did before him, that the audience must be reminded that it is watching a play.

Brechet's ideas can be approached through the image presented by the theatre he chose to work in on his return to East Germany in 1947. The auditorium of the Theatre am Schiffbauerdamm is lavish to the point of fantasy, decorated with ornate plaster figures. The stage, by complete contrast, is a vast mechanized scenic space in which everything is clearly exposed to view as theatrical and man-made. In the contrast between the comfort of the auditorium and the science of the stage lies the condition of Brechet's theatre the audience was there to be entertained but also to think scientifically.

Many of the techniques of Brechet's staging were developments of earlier work. The use of three-dimensional set pieces in a large volume of space clearly derived from Jessner. His delight in the use of machinery and in particular the revolving stage came from Piscator. The insistence on the actors' demonstrating through the physical disposition of the body their gestus ("attitude") toward what is happening derived from Meyerhold, though with Brechet the gestus was always socially based. The clearest of his alienation devices, the projection of captions preceding the scene so that the audience knows in advance what will happen and, therefore, can concentrate on how it happens, derived from Piscalor's jotter screens and film captions.

Brechet acknowledged in his work the need for the actor to undergo a process of identification with the part, and he paid tribute to Stanislavski as the first person to produce a systematic account of the actor's technique. Brechet required his actors to go beyond Stanislavski and to incorporate a social attitude or judgment into their portrayal. Characterization without a critical judgment was in Brechet's view seductive artifice; conversely, social judgment without the characterization of a rounded human being was arid dogmatism. The theatre of mixed styles and means that Meyerhold and others constructed to cope with the grotesque experience of modern living was transformed by Brechet into a political principle. He used mixed means and styles to expose the contradictions, inconsistencies, and dialectics of situations and characters theatrical effects were created through the juxtaposition of inconsistent attitudes in a character. Although the settings in Brechet's productions were clearly theatrical, the costumes and properties were not. Great care was taken to make each property and its use authentic for the period or character. In Brechet's theatre, if a chicken were to be plucked the actor did not mime or roughly approximate the action- the chicken was plucked. Costumes had to make clear the social class of the persons wearing them. This places Brechet directly in the line with the Meiningen Players, though again the gestus is particularly social rather than historical.

Brechet's methods of rehearsal were especially innovative. The methods worked out in his own company, the Berliner Ensemble, established a directing collective well advanced beyond those of Reinhardt and Piscator. In Brechet's theatre, the director, dramaturge, designer and composer had equal authority in the production. The designer had a special function; in addition to designing the sets and costumes, he also produced, for early rehearsal purposes, a series of sketches of key moments in the action. The rehearsals became a process of testing hypotheses about the play and its production. What held the collective together and made the method workable was the story, or fable. All the elements of production were synthesized for telling this story in public. At some points the music conveyed the meaning, at other times the setting, or the actors, or the words did. Brechet often invited observers to the rehearsals in order to test the clarity of the story, The process of testing could continue into the performance period. When the company was satisfied that the staging was correct, the production was photographed and a Modellbuch was prepared with photographs set against the text to show the disposition of the stage at all times and to mark significant changes of position on the part of the actors. The Modellbuch was then available (in a more advanced form than the designer's sketches) as the basis for any subsequent productions.

The Modellbuch has aroused resentment on the part of directors who prefer to respond freely to the text. Brechet's intention was not to limit but to provide a document as scientific evidence of an experiment that could be used in further research. Since the finished text was, in any case, only one facet of the fable, the model book gave evidence of other aspects of the story and it's telling.

Brechet's influence on the contemporary theatre has been both considerable and problematic. His Marxist views have proved a real stumbling block to his assimilation in the West , and his use of formalist techniques in the service of entertainment has presented difficulties in the socialist countries, There is no doubt that the settings and costumes of his productions are the features that have most influenced the contemporary theatre. Contemporary design exhibits in many ways the influences of his staging.

Brechet's Dramatic Theories

Brechet's special lexicon (theatrical jargon) may be confusing. He invented a complex language to describe essentially straightforward ideas, this lexicon includes such terms as epic-theatre, non-Aristotelian drama, alienation effect (Verfremdungseffekt) and so on. While his plays are mostly very clear and fluent, Brechet's own theorizing is not so simple. Brechet is less novel than he is supposed to be, His drama owes much to a wide range of theatrical conventions: Elizabethan, Chinese,

Japanese, Indian, Greek idea of Chorus, Austrian and Bavarian folk-plays, techniques of clowns and fairground entertainers.

Brechet's theory never arrived at a fixed and final view. His ideas changed, developed, mellowed, especially because of practice in real works on stage. Much of his theory was explanation after the writing of the plays, not the bases on which these were written, And, in the writing of plays for real performance, Brechet's sense of what works is always paramount.

In part, it was the things against which he reached at the determined Brechet's theories (and his overstatements). Among these were: • Bourgeois theatre and the fourth wall. • Anything which precludes thought, excites emotion or reinforces capitalist values Brechet disliked the twin clichés of heavily bombastic classics (Shakespeare, Schiller, and Goethe) and of naturalism in melodrama or drawing room. (This is a 19th century development, which had ossified into an invariable norm.) Naturalism was developed and perfected by such as Stanislavski and Harley Granville-Barker. Against this, reaction had already begun by the 1920s. Naturalism could go no farther; so new types of theatre arose: • Poetic drama • Satire • Expressionism (types not people) • Political theatre

Brechet had been influenced by expressionism and had collaborated with Erwin Piscator, father of political theatre and himself ready to experiment with new technique. Convinced that theatre must be an agent of social and political change, he sought a suitable form of theatre. Having found it he described it as "Epic theatre":

> "Today when human character must be understood as the 'totality of all social conditions' the epic from is the only one that can comprehend all the processes, which could serve the drama as materials for a fully representative picture of the world." (Brechet's comment, 1931, in The Three penny Opera)

The Epic Theatre

"...the epic poet presents the event as totally past, while the dramatic poet presents it as totally present."

The epic invites calm, detached contemplation and judgement; the dramatic overwhelms reason with passion and emotion, the spectator sharing the actor's experiences. Brechet's objection to "Aristotelian" theatre was an objection to Goethe and Schiller's interpretation of it - an objection to: • Catharsis by terror and pity • Identification with the actors • Illusion - the attempt to represent the present event. Brechet's idea of epic is informed by the ideas of Goethe and Schiller regarding the mood and character of epic poetry. This is a rational, calm detachment, to which Brechet aspires as a playwright.

Brechet criticises what he calls "Culinary theatre". This is theatre, which merely gives an experience, mental refreshment, as a meal is a bodily restorative. Brechet despises theatre, which provides mental foodstuffs but makes no difference to audience. He believes that the audience should be made not to feel, but to think. (Note that Brechet supposes these two to be in opposition to each other- but this need not be so best can challenge the head and heart). Dramatic theatre presents events: from the hero's viewpoint (distorting judgement,) and as happening now (preventing calm detachment).

To counter this, the illusion must be broken. Theatre must do this continually. And, therefore, the audience must be made aware that events are not present events (happening now), but past events being represented as narrative, with commentary provided to encourage our own reflection, This is not' unlike the experience of reading a book with critical notes in the margin, or as if a novelist supplied his own comment on a page facing that bearing the narrative, Some modem anti-novelists have done this,

The audience is intended to sit back, relax (hence Brechet's wish for smoking!) and reflect, as did hearers of bards in classical Greece or Anglo-Saxon England. The theatre of illusion creates a spurious present, pretending things are happening now. But the epic theatre is historical: the audience is continually reminded that epic theatre gives a report of events,

The VERFREMDUNGSEFFEKT (V-Effekt)

To discourage audience from identifying with character and so losing detachment, the action must continually be made strange, alien, remote, and separate. To do this, the director must use any devices that preserve or establish this distancing,

While the general use of these is called the V-effekt, when any such device is employed successfully Brechet calls the result a V-effekt. This is Brechet's explanation of how the device works. A child whose mother remarries, seeing her as wife not just mother, or whose teacher is prosecuted, seeing him in relation to criminal law, experiences a V-effekt. These are examples from Brechet's own plays:

In Life of Galileo a long and profound speech by the unheroic protagonist is followed by the bathetic observation: "Now I must eat". This shows the weakness of the man against the strength of the inventor. • In The Caucasian Chalk Circle when Grusche ponders whether or not to take the abandoned baby her dilemma is voiced by the Chorus while she enacts a dumb show. In the Good Person of Sezuan the frequent asides to the audience also achieve a V-effekt.

The Construction of the Plays

In order to achieve unity of action, to build suspense and sustain its naturalistic illusion the dramatic play must be taut, well made and leading to a climax of catharsis. The epic play is freer. Suspense is not needed, and the whole can be loosely knit and episodic - each part making sense on its own.

The later, mature plays do lead to some definite end: Mother Courage's loss of all her children, Azdak's judgement in favour of Grusche or the non-solution of the gods to Shante's problem. But we can isolate episodes that stand alone - Mother Courage being the most simply episodic of the later plays.

In an earlier piece, Fear and Misery of the Third Reich (Furcht und Elend des Dritten Reiches, 1934-37), this episodic structure is much more marked, The "play" is. in fact, a series of related sketches on the theme suggested by the play's tit off as five playlets, became eight, then nineteen, grew to twenty-seven and was. At last, cut to twenty-four. In performance one could (and, perhaps, should) present a selection from the total without harm to the work's integrity.

Brechet's Theory of Acting

Brechet's view is that actor should not impersonate, but narrate actions of another person, as it quoting facial gesture and movement.

"The Brechetian style of acting is acting in quotation marks,"

Brechet uses the example of an accident-eyewitness. To show bystanders what happened, he may imitate, say, the victim's gait but will only quote what is relevant and necessary to his explanation. Moreover, the actor remains free to comment on what he shows.

One of modern critic and teacher tested this idea with other students:

> "I wanted to let you know that I used the demonstrating of an accident as a rehearsal technique during my peer teaching episode and it worked very well. I started off with an overview of Brechet and his theories and then moved on to the rehearsal technique. I had prepared all example of an accident for people to demonstrate if not enough people had witnessed one. However, lots of people had witnessed accidents and they split into groups to demonstrate them. The discussion. at the end showed that they understood its relevance...Afterwards I had many people say that they had never understood Brechet before and now felt much clearer about his theories ..."(Georgie Sugg)

As the audience is not to be allowed to identify with character, 50, too, the actor is not to identify with him or her. Brechet agrees with Stanislavski that; if the actor believes he is Lear, the audience will also believe it, and share his emotions. But. Unlike Stanislavski, he does not wish this to happen. As he does not wish to put the audience into a trance, just so the actor must keep Himself free from this state: he must be relaxed, not letting muscles be tense. Even if playing someone who is possessed, the actor must not appear possessed. Brecht is opposed to frenetic and convulsive intensity on the stage. The Brechetian actor must always be in control of his emotions. Brechet sees the actor's task as greater than Stanislavsky's merging of character and actor.

This is one important element but it must be complemented by implied comment on the character's actions. The actor must show how these are wise or foolish and express, say, pity or disdain. The actor must show that he foresees where a character's actions will lead, and that his course of action is only one among many possibilities.

Since the actor should show the audience that he has chosen one action, as opposed to another, he must be aware of the presence of the audience, not, as in Stanislavsky's ideal, wrapped up in himself and oblivious of audience.

Finally, there is to be nothing improvised in his delivery: the actor's performance should be the "delivery of as finished product"

This theory is not as complicated as it appears: in the Victorian melodrama, the actor plays the villain in just such a critical way. The audience sees that the actor disapproves of the character, there is no identification of one with the other; there is awareness and enjoyment of the skill in showing villainy; the actor shows that the villain could choose an alternative course of action and that he will come to a bad end.

In the theatre of illusion the actor explores the character, trying to merge with him. Only then does he react to other characters. In the Brechetian theatre the character's inner life is of no importance, save in its effect on outward action. Brechet does not portray human nature in the individual, but human relations. The story is the point of interest, not the characters. The story is the sequence of events that is the social experiment, allowing the interplay of social forces, from which the play's lesson emerges.

The Gestus

This is Brechet's term for that which expresses basic human attitudes - not merely "gesture" but all signs of social relations: department, intonation, facial expression. The Stanislavskian actor is to work at identifying with the character he or she portrays. The Brechetian actor is to work at expressing social attitudes in clear and stylized ways, So, when Shen-Te becomes Shui- Ta, she moves in a different manner, Brechet wished to embody the "Cestus" in the dialogue- as if to compel the right stance, movement and intonation. By subtle use of rhythm pause, parallelism and counterpointing, Brechet creates a "gestic" language.

The songs are yet more clearly "gestic", As street singers make clear their attitudes with overt, grand but simple gestures, so, in delivering songs, the Brechetian actor aims to produce clarity in expressing a basic attitude, such as despair, defiance or submission.

Instead of the seamless continuity of the naturalistic theatre, the illusion of natural disorder, Brechet wishes to break up the story into distinct episodes, each of which presents, in a clear and ordered manner, a central basic action. All that appears in the scene is designed to show the significance of the basic "Gestus". We see how this works in Mother Courage, Each scene is prefaced by a caption telling the audience what is to be the important event; in such a way as to suggest the proper attitude for the audience to adapt to it - for instance (Scene 3):

"She manages to save her daughter, likewise her covered cart, but her honest son is killed."

Non-Literary Elements : Decor, Music and Choreography

These are no longer auxiliaries to text, reinforcing it - they stand alone or in opposition. Songs are not used to heighten emotion at moments of climax; they serve as commentaries, generally leading to a V-effekt thus lyrics may be wry and humorous, melodies may be jazz-influenced, jerky and unromantic, or songs may satirize popular sentiment (There is great irony in the way the public at large missed the satire in The Three penny Opera, and the songs - such as Mackie Messer/ Mack the Knife - became popular classics, though Brechet had intended them as send-ups.)

Stage designers, no longer tied to illusion, can supply non-realistic extra decor to provide background material: • In Galileo projections of maps, documents and Renaissance art works • In Mother Courage and Her Children captions of celebrated events of the Thirty Years War and a statement of what is to happen next, on stage, to Mother Courage.

In the first production of Mahagonny a scene in which a glutton eats himself to death was enacted before a backdrop showing a portrait of him in the act of eating-so the episode is shown twice1the episode is shown twice!

The visual and musical V-effekt has an anti-hypnotic quality - music is not, as in Wagner, a narcotic, reinforcing the stage illusion, For Brechet the music and the action should each make the other appear strange. (It may be that Brechet's dislike of Wagnerian opera is not wholly rational, but made on political grounds- Wagner being associated with German nationalism and the myths of Germany's heroic origin and of Germanic racial purity.)

The result of the V-effekt is a contrast: in dramatic theatre the spectator is moved but has a crushing sense of inevitability and of his own helplessness; in the epic theatre one sees things as if different and so one man try to make things different in the real world. If things can be seen to be changed, then one can attempt to bring about change.

Brechet’s Belief is that theatre can show how the suffering of those on stage could be avoided. His illogically consistent Marxism leads him to believe all (not some) human evil to result from unjust social institutions. The plays show how society could be different, if attitudes regarded as sound and unalterable could be changed. This is usually done obliquely by parallels, which are:

- Historical as in II/I other Courage and Galileo,
- Allegorical as in Mahagonny, or
- Pseudo-foreign, as in the Good Person of Sezuan.

So, the clear inadequacy of the final words of the gods in The Good Person of Sezuan makes it clear that to be good and poor (all the time) is impossible. The real solution is not for Shen Te to become Shui Ta, but for wealth to be shared so that the poor are not forced to destroy each other to survive.

Sit and Lighting

Brechet believed the stage should be brightly lit at all times; special effects to create mood were not allowed. (Logically, he could have allowed it, if accompanied by some device to draw attention to it - such as a statement from a character.) The sources of light should be plainly visible - just as those over a boxing-ring (Brechet's comparison).

The curtain is to be used for the display of titles, captions or comments. Placards may be placed in the auditorium, bearing instructions, such as "Don't stare so romantically" (from Drums in the ::-.right).The set behind the curtai realistic; that is to say, while very authentic props may be used, (as, say, Mother Courage's handcart) there will be no elaborate arrangement of these in a naturalistic stage set

The music, too, must have a visible source - musicians may even be on the stage. Interruptions for song are announced or indicated by projection of a title, or flags and

Rehearsal

Brechet made actor's tum their lines into third person narrative. Actions given in stage directions are narrated: "Then X entered. After a few silent compliments he sat down on the sofa."

Dialogue, spoken (in performance) in the present tense, becomes reported speech. For example: "Has your excellency seen the new dancing-master?" Becomes: "He asked whether Madame had seen the new dancing-master."

Brechet would include in the text spoken in rehearsal, all stage directions. He went so far as to write what he called "practice scenes". These were meant to cast new light on well-known scenes by use of ironic parallels. He wrote, too, what he called "bridge scenes" to be interpolated in the text in rehearsal but omitted in performance. But as these were written for classics that he never produced, their value is questionable.

Oddly, for one who wrote copious theoretical explanations, Brechet rarely referred to his theory during rehearsal, though some of his resulting practice was obviously familiar to the actors (say, the translation into narrative). Brechet claimed that fun application of his theory was impossible in the present state of the theatre. As a result, many of the actors of the Berliner Ensemble when questioned, seemed uncertain what Brechet's preferred style of acting was.

The Survival of Empathy

Brechet wrongly equated empathy, without which no audience will be interested in the stage action, with illusion, which is not at all necessary and comparatively novel, being a feature of naturalistic drama. For feelings that overwhelm the audience Brechet wished to substitute reason. Because naturalistic theatre aroused excessive emotion and ignored reason Brechet supposed these two, reason and empathy, to be mutually exclusive, Yet in Greek tragedy or the plays of Shakespeare both are active. The problem is not empathy as such, but the degree and kind of empathy aroused.

As a playwright Brechet's sense of what works led to the writing of scenes where the audience's empathy for the characters on stage is considerable: the heroic self--sacrifice of the dumb Katrina in Mother Courage is a notorious instance. Martin Esslin points out the psychological flaw in Brechet's reasoning:

> "Without identification and empathy, each person would be irrevocably imprisoned within himself."

Esslin duly points out that his use of the V-effekt shows how conscious Brechet was of the audience's tendency to identification. He did not eliminate it, but modified and weakened it.

Esslin suggests that this is the particular genius of Brechet's theatre, the partial failure of Verfremdungs: this creates a tension between the author's intention and our tendency to identification. We are at the same time able to feel sympathy for a character, while our reason leads us to condemn him or her roundly. In his theoretical attack upon romanticism and emotion Brechet claims to be the advocate of reason. Yet in his writing of plays, Brechet time and again creates scenes that move the audience, in spite of the distancing devices.

Because he seems genuinely to believe that his work is free of strong emotion, Brechet makes no effort to suppress or conceal this element. And because our sympathy is continually rebuffed, when emotion manages to take hold of the audience, it may be all the stronger for that.

The Failed Revolutionary

Brechet hoped in his plays to show the utter rottenness of bourgeois, capitalist society. His belief was that the audience would see that a new society must replace the old and that only Marxist society could deliver justice (and that this social change was inevitable, but that his task was to help usher it in). Brechet, for all his insistence on reason, was here quite irrational in his theory. His plays could lead audiences to many other kinds of conclusion. And, to Brechet's great dismay, they did.

The masses were not roused to revolutionary fervour; indeed, the masses did not flock to any of Brechet's plays, save the Three penny Opera, the irony of which was wholly missed and which was accepted as a happy, sentimental musical of the kind. Brechet was hoping to parody. The political allegory was undetected by the audience.

While Germany descended into Nazism, Brechet fled to the west. The would-be man of the people became the favourite of western liberal intellectuals. After the war Brechet was able to work freely in East Germany, to which he returned. But the communist establishment, which saw, betters than he did, that his work might provoke thoughts dangerous to Marxism, never wholly accepted him. Moreover as the Russian establishment had fostered the Stanislavskian tradition after Lenin came to power, it had become the dominant form of theatre in the Eastern Bloc. Non-naturalistic theatre might, therefore, be seen as the work of a dissident, and subversive of the new revolutionary establishment.

Brechet's Success

Brechet's break with naturalism was not so much a novelty as a return to earlier conventions. Bamber Gascoigne (Twentieth-Century Drama, p.124) notes the use of "alienation" in Greek Tragedy, Medieval Mystery plays, Japanese Noh plays and Jacobean drama. Characters address the audience and introduce themselves in Shakespeare, as do Trinculo in The Tempest or the porter in Macbeth. Brechet's perhaps exaggerated denunciation of empathy was an understandable reaction to bourgeois na tragedy where empathy is evoked but reason can be exercised, or the neo-classical drama of Corneille and Racine in which decorum is always preserved are not so far from Brechet's drama. Racine, in his preface to Beazer also stresses the importance of distancing.

Brechet's success was in freeing theatre from the limitations of naturalist drama. What Brechet has called "fourth-wall" theatre was confined to a narrow range of subjects and a" one play, to remain naturalistic, could not range widely in the scenes depicted. While some playwrights have accepted particular Brechetian techniques, his general effect, to cause writers to seek new conventions of representing human experience, is more important.

Some writers (such as Robert Bolt in A Man for All Seasons) are openly Brechetian while others may use some of Brechet's techniques without being aware of their provenance. We find the use of narrator or commentator as go-between for audience and characters, and creator of distancing effects in work by many playwrights, such as; • Peter Shaffer (Martin Cruz in the Royal Hunt of the Sun), • Arthur Miller (Alfieri in A View from the Bridge) and • Robert Bolt (the Common Man in a Man for All Seasons).

A less successful Brechetian device in the latter play appears when Thomas Cromwell sings an ironical song about the ship of state, but this jars with the otherwise un-ironic manner of the play and the main characters' archaic-naturalistic speech.

Presumably writer/' directors like those of the National Theatre of Brent, (whose two actors change roles to enact or "show" the Zulu War and use their audience to help with crowd scenes), could also claim Brechet as their theatrical father. Shaffer's The Royal Hunt of the Sun is close to Brechet's own Epic Theatre: •Like Galileo it is set in a historical period in which the church exercised great power; • It is a series of episodes; • It is narrated, and so shown to be in the past, by a character who stands beside his younger self, • It uses music and song, though the singer remains in character.

The play also shows the injustice of the social system and the need for change: imperialism, love of money and the evils of institutional theocracy are all laid bare. Curiously enough, towards the end of his life, Brechet accepted that his theory of Epic theatre was too formal and inadequate to show society's productivity and capacity for change - but Brechet felt unable to replace the theory with a better one.

In effect, he was conceding that the theory is often less adequate than the practice (the plays as interpreted by Brechet's company). In such cases, the practice must stand until a better theory emerges. In a sense, Brechet's critics have so refined the theory.

Brechet's Epic Theatre

Although Bertolt t Brechet's first plays were written in Germany during the 19205, he was not widely known until much later. Eventually his theories of stage presentation exerted more influence on the course of mid-century theatre in the West than did those of any other individual This was largely because he proposed the major alternative to the Stanislavski-oriented realism that dominated acting and the "well-made play" construction t11atdominated playwriting.

Brechet's earliest work was heavily influenced by German Expressionism, but it was his preoccupation with Marxism and the idea that man and society could be intellectually analysed that led him to develop his theory of "epic theatre: Brechet believed that theatre should appeal not to the spectator's feelings but to his reason. While still providing entertainment, it should be strongly didactic and capable of provoking social change.

In the Realistic theatre of illusion, he argued, the spectator tended to identify with the characters on stage and become emotionally involved with them rather than being stirred to think about his own life. To encourage the audience to adopt a more critical attitude to what was happening on stage, Brechet developed his Verfremdungs-effekt ("alienation effect")--i.e., the use of anti-illusive techniques to remind the spectators that they are in a theatre watching an enactment of reality instead of reality itself.

Such techniques included flooding the stage with harsh white light, regardless of where the action was taking place, and leaving the stage lamps in full view of the audience; making use of minimal props and "indicative" scenery; intentionally interrupting the action at key junctures with songs in order to drive home an important point or message; and projecting explanatory captions onto a screen or employing placards.

In the Epic theatre the sources of light should be visible at all times, as they are, say, in a boxing ring (Brechet's comparison). Lighting mould be uniformly bright; effects of colour and dimming are not to be allowed. This is partly explicable in terms of Brechet's taste for simplicity and austerity, partly in terms of his desire to avoid creating emotional effects.

Brechet's plays make extensive use of music in a tremendous variety of styles. He secured the services of distinguished composers, such as Weill, Hindernith, Eisler and Dessau. Music, at first, was used to break the illusion of reality merely by bringing Variety. Later Brechet evolved the theory that whereas conventionally (as in Wagner) music was a narcotic, reinforcing emotion, in the Epic theatre it should provoke thought, dispel illusion and drive out emotion. This led to the idea of "gestic" music - music, which would inform the audience about the right intellectual response to events depicted in the drama.

In the epic theatre, rehearsal might require presenting a scene from a play other than that to be produced, in order to understand a relationship. Speeches were also, in rehearsal, delivered in the third person with narrative links, or transformed into reported speech, with stage directions also converted into description or narrative. This was supposed to help the actor relax, be aware of the audience - not lost in his character, have muscular control and, eventually deliver a perfect product. From his actors Brechet demanded not realism and identification with the role but an objective style of playing, to become in a sense detached observers.

Brechet's most important plays, which included Leben des Galilei (The life of Galileo), Mutter Courage und rue Kinder (Mother Courage and Her Children), and Der gute Mensch von Sezuan (The Good Person of Szechwan, or The Good Woman of Setzwan), were written between 1937 and 1945 when he was in regime, first in Scandinavia and then in the United States. At the invitation of the newly formed East German government, he returned to found the Berliner Ensemble in 1949 with his wife, Helene Weigel, as leading actress. It was only at this point, through his own productions of his plays, that Brechet earned his reputation as one of the most important figures of 20th-century theatre.

Certainly Brechet's attack on the illusive theatre influenced, directly or indirectly, the theatre of every Western country. In Britain the effect became evident in the work of such playwrights as John Arden and Edward Bond and in some of the bare-stage productions by the Royal Shakespeare Company. Western theatre in the 20th century, however, has proved to be a cross-fertilization of many styles (Brechet himself acknowledged a debt to traditional Oriental theatre), and by the 1950s other approaches were gaining influence.

The Invention of Scientific Method

Scientific Method, the term denoting the principles, guides scientific research and experimentation and also the philosophic bases of those principles. Philosophy in general is concerned with the why as well as how of things but science occupies itself with the latter question in a very rigorous manner. The era of modern science is generally considered to have begun with the Renaissance but scientific approach to knowledge can be observed throughout the human history.

Three Characteristics of science

(1) Objectivity: Objectivity indicates the attempt to observe things as they are, without falsifying observation in accordance with the preoccupied world view. They (scientists) do not let their feelings get in the way of their observations of real things. They often work in laboratories or in other areas where they can carefully control what they are working on. They always try to report their findings so others can check them out and then utilize them in their own work. They do not clean more than they can prove. They always concern about what is rather than 'What should be' so as to derive objective reality of the things.

(2) Dealing with things not emotion: Science deals almost exclusively with things, not ideas or feeling, and with the external world and its workings, not inner states and their workings, the human body is considered to be a part of the external world, the soul is not. So, scientists work to understand the body but not the soul. Most scientists doubt whether soul exists or not. The solar system and the universe are also part of the external world, so scientists also go through them.

(3) Dealing with special way: Science deals with in a special way, employing special methods and a language for reporting results that is unique to it. At first, they make hypothesis that hypothesis is put under a test in a controlled environment to find out whether it is valid or not. The environment must be carefully controlled so that extraneous elements do not intrude to invalidate the experiment. Scientific method also involves the interplay of inductive reasoning (reasoning from specific observation and experiments to move general hypothesis and theories) and deductive reasoning (reasoning from theories to account for specific experimental results). By such reasoning processes, science attempts to develop the broad law-such as Newton's law of gravitation that has become part of our understanding of the natural world.

Aristotelian Science: Matter

To invent scientific method, thinkers of the 17th century first had to deal with the world view of the greatest scientist having influence until that time, Aristotle. Two aspects of the world, in particular, concern us: matter and motion.

(1) Theory of Matter: According to Aristotle, every material thing has both a material and a formal aspect. Matter is a thing's potentiality and form is what gives shape to matter. Aristotle found quite different between the world below the moon and the world above the Moon. In the world below the moon which he called sublunary world, there are four kinds of stuff out of which things are made. These elements are fire, water, earth and air. Aristotle said that a man has a good amount of earth in him which makes him heavy, a good amount of water which produce his blood and other internal fluids, a good amount of air which he breathes in and out, a good amount of fire which gives him heat and is in a sense the essence of the life in him. But in the world above the Moon, the planets and Moon are made out of fifth element that he called Quintessence. They are also fusion of formal and maternal aspects but their matter is quite different from that of below the Moon as the Quintessence exists in them in pure form unlike in the sublunary world.

(2) Theory of motion: Regarding the theory of motion, Aristotle had different view about the motion in sublunary world and the world above the moon. The motion of material and immaterial things in the sublunary world is rest. The motion may be natural or violent, but it is seeking for a place to get rest. If the thing moves without external force that is natural state whereas if external force is applied to move the thing that is violent state. When a stone is thrown it drops to stop somewhere though the motion is violent, anyway it searches for place having got rest. Earth, water and to a certain extent air naturally seek a place that is downward, toward the centre of the earth. Fire goes up, yet it is below the sphere of moon. Air, being mixture of fire and water, sometimes goes down and sometime up. But these elements or sublunary world seek a place for getting rest. In the world above the moon, everything is made out of Quintessence so the natural motion of celestial bodies is circular. They move in circle around the earth in every twenty-four hours. Aristotelian theory of motion gives a geocentric world picture which had lasting impact up to the seventeenth century.

The Revolt against Aristotle

During 17th century, Aristotelian, Theory was dismantled by so many scientists and thinkers. He was of the operation that all heavenly bodies move in circular motion around the earth. But Nicholas Copernicus dismantled that view by saying that it is not the sun that moves around the earth. But Nicholas Copernicus dismantled that view by saying that it is the earth that moves around the sun. But at that time he did not say it defying as it meant going against the contemporary belief of the society. Another Danish astronomer Tyco Brace is famous for discovering a new star, having no existence in Aristotelian theory. He discovered that new star in 1572 and observed that over a period of months and in 1573 published a monograph on it that made him instantly famous and instantly controversial. Actually, new starts were not supposed to come into being in the Aristotelian and Christian universe. The world below the moon was chaotic, imperfect and unpredictably changea above the moon nothing is changed all the celestial or heavenly bodies' continued to reflect God's immutable love for the world and mankind. The contemporary theologians criticized Tycho Brache's monograph but Tycho did not believe that. William Gilbert by studying about lodestones produced the theory of magnetism. He asserted that due to the magnetic quality, planetary bodied come together the found the presence of magnetic force both above and below the moon. But as for Aristotle, in the world above the moon everything is made out of Quintessence, not anything like magnetic force. But for Gilbert, earth itself is big magnet. Gilbert also facilitates the heliocentric world view. Again Kepler brought great change in Aristotelian science. Facilitating the heliocentric world view, he said that heavenly bodies do not move in circular motion as Aristotle asserted but they move in elliptical motion. He also asserted defying Aristotelian concept that when planets are near the sun, they move quickly and vice versa. He also found the mathematical relation between the planets and the distance from the sun. He also believed in the concept of inertia. Galileo also opposed the Aristotelian concept that the surface of the moon is made out of Quintessence. When he saw the moon with the telescope then he found the surface of the moon as that of the earth having rock, mountains, and valleys etc, so, the moon itself is destructible, he said. He also put forward his argument by saying that it is the sun in the center and all planets, move round the sun. Though he dismantled the Aristotelian science, he was accused of being a Bible killer by contemporary theologians. At last he recanted whatever he said before.

Rene Descartes, 17th century philosopher did not believe upon Quintessence as such, he always searched for certainty in everything. His concept was that everything must be doubted so as to derive truth. His famous dictum is: "I doubt therefore I think, I think therefore I am." He also believed that the material universe can be described in mathematical terms. He also believed that human mind always should free from any preoccupied notion and we should also reduce anything mathematically to reach in the heart of the thing. Newton also challenged Aristotelian view of the world. He got influence from Gilbert's magnetism, heliocentric worldview of Copernicus and Descartes' view about doubting. He proposed three laws of motion unlike Aristotle:

1. Everything remains in rest or in motion unless the external force is used upon it. There is no natural state of rest as such as asserted by Aristotle. It is also called the law of inertia. This law discards the so-called Quintessence.

2. The change of motion is directly proportional to the change of force.

3. Each action has an equal but opposite reaction.

These above mentioned laws by opposing Aristotelian science paved way for development of modern science.

Marxism and Literature

Literature is one of the major constituents of consciousness, and should be studied within the framework of history. As much as literature can be used as an oppressive tool to maintain and enforce the master-capitalist hegemony, it can also be used to undermine this hegemony. For Marxism, literature can be viewed in two main ways, regardless of the difference in opinion and practice among various Marxist thinkers and critics such as Lucaks, Brecht, Adorno, Raymond, Jameson and others:

As reactionary narrative that aims at marketing, devoting and enforcing the ruling classes' ideology; yet not without contradictions, that can undermine its basic thematic assumption(s). As a progressive narrative that champions the oppressed in their long and bitter struggle against the decadent bourgeois order. Some traditional Marxist critics including Lukacs stressed the importance of realism in writing and denigrated other modes of narrative like naturalism, post/modernism as less, if at all, representative of class struggle. In defense of their theoretical position, they claim that modernist writers, like Eliot, Joyce, Wolf among others dwell usually in their writings on the personal experiences of demented characters that can hardly be taken to represent the suffering and struggle of the oppressed at large. Traditional Marxists favoured realism because of its total representation of people in real situations trying to improve their social conditions by engaging with the repressive forces in the bourgeois world. They favoured narratives that compromise inherited bourgeois obsolete ethics and values. Other thinkers and writers like Brecht, Adorno, and Althusser among others considered all forms and schools of narratively suitable for exposing human suffering, class conflict and the various ideologies that dominate the world of the text and shape consciousness of the generations.

Marxism: History and Economy

Marxism regards history as a series of conflicts between the dominated majority and the dominating minority to gain power over the means and excess of production. After people have exited from their first state of nature, where they have been equal by default; they have found themselves cast into two main categories. The category of those who spend all their lives laboring in the fields and other places of production; and the category of those who usurp the labour of the working class to increase their capital. If we examine history carefully, we see how the economies of ancient and modern societies are based on slavery and exploitation.

All through human history, the masters made their wealth on the expense of the labour of their subjects. The subject works hard in the field or in the factory. The subject, whether aided by machinery or not, generates commodities through his labour. These commodities are valued according to their market price and not according to any intrinsic value in them. Their value is automatically turned into money in the hands of the master. The master gives little money to cover the minimum basic needs of the subjects; and the rest of the money turns into capital. By doing so, the capitalists ensure that their capital grows bigger and bigger, while their subjects conditions remain at the minimal level possible.

To keep this state of affairs current, the capitalists rely on a network of oppressive tools. And they die hard to keep their tools live and constantly upgraded. Religion, traditions, rigid patriarchal order, high culture, literature, philosophy are among these tools. However, Marxism sees that the capitalist culture is inherently unstable because of the insidious contradictions and conflicts it generates between the classes. Therefore, capitalist culture will come to an end altogether once the workers and the oppressed realize their potential and begin the struggle to own the means of production. Then a new phase in history, without contradictions, will begin and bring everlasting peace.

A Critique of Life of Galileo

It is a volatile point in history: the intersection of science and religion at the height of the Inquisition; it is a time when the Church reigns and a man, a physicist. Must choose life or death, himself or science. Galileo Galilei's legendary dilemma and the circumstances surrounding it are presented in Bertolt Brechet's Life of Galileo from a perspective that is clearly criticizing institutions with such control in this case, the Catholic church while reminding us that men are simply men, no matter how heroic their actions appear. These issues are expounded throughout the play; however, Scene 11 has the most significant role in Galileo's development. As it simultaneously reveals the extent of the Church's control and humanizes Galileo in just a few lines.

Despite his courage to venture into unexplored realms of science and thought, Galileo is not a hero. He is only a man. Scene 11 is the shortest scene in the play and one of only three scenes in which the title character does not appear. Yet it is here that Galileo is made completely human. In the quest for a hero, one might ignore his almost hedonistic desire for food, thought, and fine wine and the sacrifices that he makes to acquire money. These characteristics of Galileo are revealed early in the play, when he plagiarizes another man's telescope invention in order to get a salary raise from the dry (Scenes 1 and 2), and then again in Scene II when the Pope says,

> "He has more enjoyment in him than any other man I ever saw. He loves eating and. drinking and thinking, to excess. He indulges in thinking bouts! He cannot say 110 to an old wine or a new thought".

However, one cannot ignore a hero's cowardice in the face of the physical pain. In this light, he reduced from hero to ordinary man. In this scene, the Pope and the Inquisitor are in the midst of an argument over the pending examination of Galileo by the Inquisition and the torturous methods that may be involved. The scene subtly reveals the evil at the heart of the Inquisition: the Church, which should be Godly in practice, partakes in torturing individuals capable of testing the power of the institution, forcing them to conform to tile Church's will and thereby eliminating any danger of upheaval. The Inquisitor states:

"He is a man of the flesh. He would soften at once"

This describes the basic human instinct to shrink from pain. Every man has his breaking point, the point at which the pain and the fear and the shame are so great that he cannot withstand one moment more. Galileo is no different. Also, Galileo is a man of science; he knows more of how pain can be inflicted than most men. As the Inquisitor later adds,

"Mr. Galilei understands machinery."

With this knowledge added to the fear of physical discomfort, Galileo later does what most men would do under the circumstances: he recants. Because this scene reveals the negative side of the Church and the human-ness of Galileo, the audience is not distracted from the criticism of the institution. If Galileo had been portrayed as a hero, that aspect of the story would have taken precedence over the theme of institutional control; the heroics would linger and the criticism would be forgotten. Brechet is also reminding us that heroes are unnecessary man is capable of anything if he opens his mind, just as Galileo does.

Brechet clearly disagrees with institutions that hold complete control over the common man. Scene 11 illustrates just how broad and deep the control of the church is at this point in Galileo's life. Here we see only two characters, both officers of the Catholic Church, each on separate sides of the issue. Oddly enough, the individual who relents is the higher in rank, the Pope. He should have complete control because he is second only to God in the Catholic hierarchy; he is a man of science, but he is also a tool of religion, as the Inquisitor reminds him:

> "Ah, that is what these people say, that it is the multiplication. Table. Their cry is, 'The figures compel us,' but where do these figures come from? Plainly they come from doubt. These men doubt everything. Can society stand on doubt and not on faith? 'Thou are my master, but I doubt whether it is for the best.' 'This is my neighbour's house and my neighbour's wife, but why shouldn't they belong to me?' After the plague, after the new war, after the unparalleled disaster of the Reformation, your dwindling flock look to their shepherd and now the mathematics turn their tubes on the sky and announce to the world that you have not the best advice about the heavens either up to your only uncontested sphere of influence."

The Pope's duty is to serve God and tend his flock on earth, and he, like any shepherd, cannot allow God's people to wander from their faith. He must have obedience and loyalty in the name of God, and therefore must censor anything of detriment to the greater cause; despite his personal beliefs, he must do whatever is necessary to uphold the Church and it's control over the people. Thus, even the Pope falls under the cloak of the Church. He is a slave to duty and must answer first to his position and second to his personal feelings. As the Inquisitor tells him, the fate of faith is in his hands:

> "Doctors of all chairs from the universities, representatives of special orders of the Church, representatives of the clergy as a whole, who have come believing with childlike faith in the word of God as set forth in the Scriptures, who have come to Your Holiness confirm their faith: and Your Holiness us really going to tell them that the Bible can no longer be regarded as the alphabet of truth?"

He is under tremendous pressure to save the faith of the people, thereby preserving the foundations of society. The Pope must choose between duty and conscience he is adamantly against Galileo's condemnation, but so many lives would be shattered if the common people were told that there was more to the universe than they could find in the Bible. Like the little monk's parents, they would feel very alone.

> "There is no eye watching over us, after all: they would say.' We have to start out on our own, at our time of life. Nobody has planned II part for us beyond this wretched one on a worthless star. There is no meaning in our misery'".

The people rely on the Church to lead them to a better life in heaven; their faith is all that they know. It is the Pope's duty to preserve the unity that comes from shared faith, and because he is controlled by that which he governs, he cannot refuse to punish Galileo for fear of social collapse.

Brechet cleverly uses Scene 11 to plant seeds of thought in the minds of his audience members. Through the controversy of Galileo's life and the circumstances surrounding his session with the Inquisition, Galileo explores both the dangers of institutional control and the folly of elevating men to a heroic status. One will only be disappointed when both prove fallible.

Major Features of Brechetian Drama

Brechet called his theatre work by a variety' of names, including Epic Theatre, the term now generally used to describe Brechet's plays. His plays tend 10 be episodic, written as a seemingly disconnected, open-ended montage of scenes presented in a non--naturalistic, non-chronological way. The audience needs to arrive at its own conclusion of how the events are linked together. Epic Theatre presents a sequence of incidents or events that are narrated on a grand scale without the restrictions of time, place or formal plot.

Verfremdungseffekt, translated (badly) as "Alienation-effect" and {awkwardly} as "Distantation-effect". More accurately it is "the effect that makes things seem strange or different". The term refers to the use of various devices to make things appear in a new light, so we consider ,them with intellectual objectively, robbed of their conventional outward appearance. When something is presented in a strange or surprising manner and we see it afresh, a Verfremdungseffekt has been achieved. Brechet gives the example of a child whose widowed mother remarries, seeing her, for the first time, as a wife. In the plays a V-effekt may be produced by the comment of a chorus figure (the Singer or Wang) or in ordinary dialogue (as in Galileo's "now I must eat": suddenly he is seen not as the great scientific innovator but an ordinary, hungry man).

Brechet usually left the stage bare in his productions as a means of preventing the audience from experiencing a detailed illusion of reality, of some fictional dramatic location. He exposed stage machinery, opened up the physical staging to the wings and often exposed the back wall. He also exposed the lighting grid above the stage so the audience could see how lights influence the mood of the scene and influence the audience's judgement. In the Epic theatre the sources of light should be visible at all times, as they are, say, in a boxing ring (Brechet's comparison). Lighting should be uniformly bright; effects of colour and dimming are not 10 be allowed. This is partly explicable in terms of Brechet's taste for simplicity and austerity, partly in terms of his desire to avoid creating emotional effects.

The German theatre director, Erwin Piscator, greatly influenced Brechet because he advocated the use of new technologies in the theatre as a means of developing a kind of performance more like the mechanised and accelerated routines of modern life. Brechet used technological effects to fragment the realistic unity of the setting. For instance, he projected films and text on screens above the stage, forcing the audience to relate the action onstage to recent or other historical or social events. (This technique is called historification. He also used placards that announced the action to take place before the scene began, discordant music, songs, and constructivist scenery such as scaffolding, projected images and films.

Brechet's plays make extensive use of music in a tremendous variety of styles, He secured the services of distinguished composers, such as Weill, Hindernith, Eisler and Dessau. Music, at first, was used to break the illusion of reality merely by bringing variety. Later Brechet evolved the theory that whereas conventionally (as in Wagner) music was a narcotic, reinforcing emotion, in the Epic theatre it should provoke thought, dispel illusion and drive out emotion. This led to the idea of U gestic" music - music which would inform the audience about the right intellectual response to events depicted in the drama.

In the epic theatre, rehearsal might require presenting a scene from a play other than that to be produced, in order to understand a relationship. Speeches were also, in rehearsal, delivered in the third person with narrative links, or transformed into reported speech, with stage directions also converted into description or narrative. This was supposed to help the actor relax, be aware of the audience - not lost in his character, have muscular control and, eventually, deliver a perfect product Brechet also developed his own acting style for his work. He urged his actors not to empathise totally with their characters, but to stand outside them and illustrate their behaviour.

Brechet’s actors were asked to go beyond the Stanislavski system of acting where the actor identifies entirely with their character and represents the character entirely from his or her point of view. Rather Brechet encouraged a more demonstrative acting method, one that enables the actor to present the character from a number of perspectives .

The term gestus or grandgestus as used by Brechet, referred to everything an actor did in terms of gesture, stance, body language, facial expressions and intonations in order to show the significance of a scene. The ideal would be: that the storyline could be: broken down so that each scene can appear as one single action that can be translated into one simple sentence, ,so that the gestus, (the most important message of the scene)' He was also influenced by the theatre of Asia with its use of mime and gesture, clear precise vocal work, symbolic characters and graceful, rhythmic movement. He encouraged his actors to be physically fit and flexible, as his plays sometimes required dance, mime and even acrobatics.

Brechet’s theatre poems demonstrate his ideas of adopting a new acting style. In "On Everyday Theatre” in Poems of the Crisis Years 1929-1933, Brechet advises actors to observe:

> "That theatre whose setting is the street. The everyday, thousand fold, fameless but vivid, earthy theatre fed by the daily human contact Which takes place in the street, Here the woman from next door imitates the landlord: Demonstrating his flood of talk she makes it clear How he tried to turn the conversation From the burst water pipe. ..A drunk gives us the preacher at his sermon, referring the poor to the rich pastures of paradise. How useful such theatre is though, serious and funny and how dignified! They do flat, like parrot or ape Imitate just for the sake of imitation, unco imitate, just to show that they can imitate; no, they have a point to put across."

Galileo is Not a Hero but a Common Man

Tragedy of a common man who succumbs to the extreme pressures of society.

It is a volatile point in history: the intersection of science and religion at the height of the Inquisition; it is a time when the Church reigns and a man, a physicist must choose life or death, himself or science. Scene 11 is the shortest scene in the play and one of only three scenes in, which the title character does not appear. Yet it is here that Galileo is made completely human. In the quest for a hero, One might Ignore his almost hedonistic desire for food, thought, and fine wine and the sacrifices that he makes to acquire money. These characteristics of Galileo are revealed early in the play, when he plagiarizes another man's telescope invention in order to get a salary raise from the city (Scenes 1 and 2), and then again in Scene 11 when the Pope says,

> "He has more enjoyment in him than any other man I ever saw. He loves eating, drinking and thinking, to excess. He indulges in thinking bouts! He cannot say no to an old wine or a new thought".

However, one cannot ignore a hero's cowardice in the face of physical pain. In this light, he is reduced from hero to ordinary man. In this scene, the Pope and the Inquisitor are in the midst of an argument over the pending examination of Galileo by the Inquisition and the torturous methods that may be involved, The scene subtly reveals the evil at the heart a the Inquisition: the Church, which should be Godly in practice partakes in torturing individuals capable of testing the power of the institution, forcing them to conform to the Church's will and thereby eliminating any danger of upheaval, The Inquisitor states:

"He is a man of the flesh. He would soften at once"

This describes the basic human instinct to shrink from pain. Every man has his breaking point, the point at which the pain and the fear and the shame are so great that he cannot withstand one moment more. Galileo is no different. Also, Galileo is a man of science; he knows more of how pain can be inflicted than most men. As the Inquisitor later adds:

"Mr, Galilei understands machinery"

With this knowledge added to the fear of physical discomfort, Galileo later does what most men would do under the circumstances: he recants. Because this scene reveals the negative side of the Church and the human-ness of Galileo, the audience is not distracted from the criticism of the institution. If Galileo had been portrayed as a hero, that aspect of the story would have taken precedence over the theme of institutional control; the heroics would linger and the criticism would be forgotten. Brechet is also reminding us that heroes are unnecessary man is capable of anything if he opens his mind, just as Galileo does.

Brechet clearly disagrees with institutions that hold complete control over the common man. Scene 11 illustrates just how broad and deep the control of the church is at this point in Galileo's life. Here we see only Iwo characters, both officers of the Catholic Church, each on separate sides of the issue. Oddly enough, the individual who relents is the higher in rank, the Pope. He should have complete control because he is second only to God in the Catholic hierarchy; he is a man of science, but he is also a tool of religion, as the Inquisitor reminds him:

> "Ah, that is what these people say, that it is tile multiplication table. Their cry is, 'The figures compel us,' but where do these figures come from? Plainly they Come e from doubt, these men doubt everything, Can society stand on doubt and not on faith? 'Thou are my master, but I doubt whether it is for the best,' 'This is my neighbour's house and my neighbour's wife, but why shouldn't they belong to me?' After the plague, alter the new war, after the unparalleled disaster of the Reformation; your dwindling flock look to their shepherd and now the mathematicians turn their tubes on the sky and announce to the world that you have not the best advice about the heavens either up to now your only uncontested sphere of influence"

The Pope's duty is to serve God and tend his flock on earth, and he, like any shepherd, cannot allow God's people to wander from their faith. He must have obedience and loyalty in the name of God, and therefore, must censor anything of detriment to the greater cause; this despite his personal beliefs, he must do whatever is necessary to uphold the Church and its control over the people. Thus, even the Pope falls under the cloak of the Church. He is a slave to duty and must answer first to his position and second to his personal feelings. As the Inquisitor tells him, the fate of faith is in his hands:

"Doctors of all chairs from the universities, representatives of special orders of the Church, representatives of the clergy as a whole, who have come believing with childlike faith in the word of God as set forth in the Scriptures, who have come to hear Your Holiness confirm their faith: and Your Holiness is really going to tell them that the Bible can no longer be regarded as the alphabet of truth?"

He is under tremendous pressure to save the faith of the people, thereby preserving the foundations of society. The Pope must choose between duty and conscience he is adamantly against Galileo's condemnation, but so many lives would be shattered if the common people were told that there was more to the universe than they could find in the Bible. Like the little monk's parents, they would feel very alone.

"There is no eye watching over us, after all,' they would say, 'we have to start out our own, at our time of life. Nobody has planned a part for us beyond this wretched one on a worthless star. There is no meaning in our misery'"

The people rely on the Church to lead them to a better life in heaven; their faith is all that they know. It is the Pope's duty to preserve the unity that comes from shared faith, and because he is controlled by that which he governs, he cannot refuse to punish Galileo for fear of social collapse.

Brechet cleverly uses Scene 11 to plant seeds of thought in the minds of his audience members. Through the controversy of Galileo's life and the circumstances surrounding his session with the Inquisition, Galileo explores both the dangers of institutional control and the folly of elevating men to a heroic status. One "will only be disappointed when both prove fallible.

Life of Galileo: Main Conflicts of the Play

Life of Galileo is mainly concerned with age long conflict between science and theology.

The figure of Galileo, whose 'heretical' discoveries about the solar system brought him to the attention of the inquisition, is one of the Brechet's most humane and complex creations. Brechet's presentation of the phenomenon is not only one of vindictive rather it deals with lasting contention between authority and originality, science and theology, and tradition and modernity. The Life of Galileo expounds this thesis persuasively, and makes us realize some of the basic truths that rise from the interaction human being with society.

It is as clear as daylight from the history, that when, on earth, science digs up a prospect to make headway, the holy orders always situate obstructions in its way. Whosoever ventured to denude the lechery of the Church like Wycliffe and Gower, he had to face the music. Only a decade before Galileo, Guordano was burnt by the third degree for the same scepticism about the macrocosm as that of Galileo.

Spar between science and theology is the quintessence of the "Life of Galileo". This play manifests the innovative theories and discoveries about solar system of a paramount scientist and then his apostasy from his ideas as they do not accord with the Holy Writ and Aristotle's pre-set ideas. Galileo is proclaimed to be a blasphemer and heterodox by the papacy, so, as a result, he has to recant.

In the times of Galileo, The Lord's house was the most influential authority. The clergymen were more curious in sitting on the throne than performing their religious obligations. The religious order was so outrageous and anxious to be at the helm that Barberini a representative of clergy remarks candidly.

> "It is my own mask that permits me certain freedoms today. Dressed like this. I might be heard to murmur. If God did not exist, we should have to invent him."

The slate of the art scientific hypotheses of Galileo were turned over in our minds as:

"Vandalising the Holy Scriptures, the bus mess of the holy church and the men of the cloth".

The life of Galileo, every inch, highlights the Brechet's life and his own tight comer as he also had to suffer the same fate. That seems 10 help Brechet in capturing the innermost feelings and reactions of a man who is on the opposite pole of the authoritative, monarchs. His expatriation from Germany by the Nazi militia after the World War II put rum out of the circulation so that he could only carry on his opposition from abroad in a roundabout way. He and Galileo face the same quandary, though Galileo was much nearer the centre of the storm.

Brechet was fascinated to the subject by the clash of ideologies which it represented with Galileo as the champion of a new spirit on empiricism and untrammelled scientific enquiry and the house of the Lord as the defender of faith. The church acceded to the scholastic or Aristotelian view of the world and to the Ptolemaic system, both of which employed to reconcile the Biblical and the conspicuous universe.

The church, however, is by and large treated here as a lay establishment. It specific dogma is being examined in the light of its functions as a probe to practical rule. Galileo a compassionate scientist, not only feels assertive, but also becomes high and mighty for his modem theories about the rotation of the earth. It looks like that his faith in science is firm to the end. He arrogantly declares to his pupil, Andrea:

"Earth is rolling cheerfully around the sun and the fishwives, merchants, princes, cardinals and even the pope are rolling with it."

And his assertion here formulates him more a man of scientific sighting and its upholder than a man of flesh, his proclamation is that of a rational being whose basic education is that of science, he remarks:

"The universe has strayed from its centre overnight and waken up to find, it has countless centres so that one call now be seen as the centre or none e at all, suddenly there is a lot of room".

Galileo also satirizes the men of the cloth for laying down the law by saying:

"This has created a .draught which is blowing up gold embroidered skirts of the prelates and princes revealing the fat and skinny logs underneath, legs like our own. The heavens, it turns out, are empty."

Neither Galileo nor divinity goes against each other but it is the rigidity of the religious order, which only wants to safeguard the law of the jungle. They are not absorbed in their religion; they only employ the ruse to screen their perks. With the succour of science, new horizons of progree of mankind and of reason mar open. Galileo makes a supposition to wear the crown by outdoing others in Florence through his science. One of the several boo boos, he makes in the play, is on the strength of his newly acquired hard evidence.

Galileo gives an emphasis on the original of his thesis and as well as refuses Aristotelian and Biblical belief about the centre of the universe as sun. Consequently, he is taken to task by tile inquisition of the court of Pope.

The clergy falsifies his theories. The grand inquisitor recognises in him a man of flesh with no resistance to torture and Pope discerns a direct connection between Galileo's physical and intellectual appetites.

> "His thinking springs from sensuality. Give him an old wine or a new idea and he cat! Not say no."

As Homo-sapiens, he has brown trousers corporeal torment by the instruments which are shown to him in the court. After being a gaol bird for twenty four days, he is in a fit state to abjure. Galileo's recantation is a trespass in Brechet's eyes as "an inferior cunning for survival. Recantation astonishes his pupil, Andrea yells at him:

> "Wine pump! Snail eater! Did you save your precious skin?"

Brechet's introductory canto insinuates that Galileo' s apostasy put the age of reason on the back burner, but authentically, it is true that Galileo is a milestone in the chronicles of science and not a comer stone as Brechet implies.

To put our discussion in a nutshell, we can conclude that Galileo has been presented as a scientist in the first version of the play who falls foul of a tight ship and under the menace of torture, counterfeits his scientific findings. This flabbergasts his apprentices and assistants and perplexes tile world of science but it is brought 10 light at tile end of tile play to be a strategy for survival,

Life of Galileo: As an Epic Drama

The literary term 'Epic Theatre' is customarily applied to a form of opus in which the author recounts a story, using as many episodes and characters as a comprehensive account of his subject cries out for. "Life of Galileo" by Brechet is a play pregnant with all the stipulations of an epic drama. The play is a beauteous addition in the world of Epic Theatre with narrative idiosyncrasies, storyline ins and outs, high-principled theme and the term "Epic Theatre" which was first manipulated in Germany in the 1920's and has become implicitly associated with tile name of Brechet. From the beginning of his Brechet had to be skirmish in the face of battle against the prevalent theatre of his day which he dismissed as 'culinary' since like connoisseur, it delighted tile sense of taste without encroaching on the mind.

For Brechet, the traditional or dramatic theatre was a place where the audience were absorbed into a comforting fallacy which played on their emotions and left them haggard, but with a sense of satisfaction whim biased them to accept the world as they found if what he himself was looking for, was a theatre that would help to metamorphose tile world.

So, Life of Galileo is an interpretation of Brechet's Thespian thought. Narration has been given before starting any scene that is a major characteristic of an epic drama. In this play, tile author relates an account in a way that invites tile on lookers to consider the events involved and then to make their own evaluation of them.

The epic drama has been fabricated as a montage of independent incidents, whim shows a process taking place. It moves from scene to scene by curves and jumps which keeps tile audience on the ball to the way in which things are happening. So that, they may, at length, be capable to judge whether that is in right way. For an instance, in tile first scene, Galileo succinctly hints at telescope but in fourth and fifth scene, it is described point by point. Moreover, role of monks proceed scene to scene.

Change for the amelioration lies at the centre of Brechet's thinking. It shows his ripened sagacity. This propounds that the hero of the play should not be a fixed character. Galileo in the play has been presented as a round character. He, in the first version of the play, appears to be an ardent satirist and a supercilious scientist who is fully assertive of his new theories that will change the entire world, but in due course, he himself declares his scientific verdicts to be null and void under the menace of torture.

Another characteristic of "Life of Galileo" as an epic drama is that man's thinking is insured by his social situation and will change if that changes. When Sagredo puts Galileo on the alert that his discovery is theological dynamite, Galileo insists jubilantly, "Humanity will accept rational proof." But in the end of the play, the state of affairs and situations changes his outlook. It makes us feel that hero is forced to be decisive.

As an epic play, "Life of Galileo" is ample with arguments. Galileo, as well as men of the cloth make arguments on their behalf to substantiate their ideas right. Galileo gives arguments to a mathematician,

> "Gentleman to believe in the authority of Aristotle is one thing, tangible facts are another. You are saying that according to Aristotle, there are crystal spheres up there, so certain motion just cannot take place because the stars would penetrate then~ But suppose, these motions could be established? Might not that suggest to you that those crystal spheres do not exist? Gentleman, in all humility, I ask you to go by the evidence of your eyes."

Unlike traditional drama, in his play, arguments have been given with ratiocination in lieu of experiences and feelings. In this play, Brechet portrays a world that is tangible, limitless and in the strength of reality that is adaptable and able to alter. It turns the spectator into an observer and instigates him for actions.

At the end of the play, the discrepancy between the scientific and other developments of Galileo's time and the straight local social structures that prevented them from being taken for a ride, for the general benefit would have left the audience with unequivocal questions about the nature of society. Like a masterpiece epic drama language in "Life of Galileo" varies with character.

Galileo strikes a scientific and logical tone. He uses aphoristic and figurative language; it is intentionally made striking to lend force to his damnation. By contr language is occasionally fairy while that of the Florentine Mathematician and philosopher is in fun chichi and double-edged. Galileo's change with Andrea and Mrs. Sarti are direct and laconic as well as taciturn. Vanni introduces the vocabulary of manufacturing industry into the play. The Life of Galileo is replete with a number of literary, Biblical allusions and quotations from Dante, V Roe and Einstein. This stylistic choosing of the references also lend colours to its recognition as an epic drama.

In epic theatre the stage setting of the play was always a general, traditional and historical. Props (including doors) and furniture were to be purely realistic and above all of social and historical interest, costumes were to be individualised and to look threadbare. The props and pieces of scenery for "Life of Galileo" were portable and easy to assemble and remove. The bareness of the stage brings the action to light in a cool atmospheric space which was intended to counter-balance the relative lack of Epic form in the writing.

Lastly, "Life of Galileo" is an above board effort of Brechet in writing an Epic in which he goes through with flying colours. Epic theatre cuts across the traditional divisions completely and brings the people to the point of recognition

Life of Galileo : Plot Construction

Plot is the combination of incidents in a play or narrative. In the "Poetics" Aristotle puts into words that a good plot has desirable alpha and omega and he further says that it should be so constructed that no incident can be displaced or omitted, without destroying the unity of the whole. Whatever are fundamental arrangements, a plot by and large comprises of a conflict yields a base for the action. Thus, characters are exhorted to move from incident to incident. Thus, a plot is a story or play in which incident comes first than character and assigns the vital grounds to the play.

Bertolt Brechet's Epic Drama "Life of Galileo' possesses a convincing, dynamic and emergent plot. The plot makes its wav sequentially and never lets even a single incident loose during its progression till the end. The plot of the play is in the region of flush with all the degrees of excellence that a powerful and successful play should have.

Brechet has split the play into scene in lieu of acts as an epic drama weight. The plot of the play turns over a new leaf with the chronicle of the motives of the protagonist of the play. As an epic drama, its theme has been narrated at first scene as Galileo; the eminent scientist of the age is on duty to throw light on his thesis of the rotation of the earth round the sun to his pupil Andrea. Beginning of the plot is already elevated and lends a helping hand to the plot to go onward.

"Life of Galileo" contains fifteen acts of un-identical prolixity. In first two acts, Galileo's Copernican theory has been explained, Introduction of Galileo's relevants has been made over. Next four scenes are from the top to bottom developed. Galileo's theories come out of the four walls to the higher jurisdiction of the country. The inquisition puts Copernican doctrine on the index:

These scenes make Galileo's character more apparent. He is so fervent about his teachings. He is a "great but restless man." So I am enforced to fill the gaps in my knowledge." The authorities come into sight as critics and put the obstacles in hero's way. Author's style is adamant in these scenes and plot is still going on towards climax.

From seventh to ninth scene, a conflict and clash between science and theology has been described in the shape of Galileo's and clergy's logger heads. Galileo's character becomes more distinct. Author presents him in these scenes as wholehearted scientist who is committed to corroborate his hypothesis. He presents strong argument in his favour. He has also been presented as quick witted, haughty and fully assertive. He suggests,

> "People will accept rational proof someone who turns a deaf ear to the truth is just thick headed. But someone who does not have familiarity with it and calls it a crook."

Role of the men of God becomes as solid as rock in these scenes. Their real objectives and rigidity have been brought to light Bellarmin, a man of cloth, conceitedly lays the black sheep of the order bare by saying.

> "It is my own mask that permits me certain freedoms today: If God does not exist we should have to invent him"

The ornate and grandiose language lends beauty and originality to the play. Poignant arguments are offered from both sides. Music and melody is also an essence of Epic Drama. The tenth scene is pregnant with poetic beauties that are every inch pungent and sarcastic and it adds to the elaboration of the situation.

In eleventh and twelfth scene, plot gains its acme with the ardour of the situation. The inquisition summons the world's famous scientist at Rome. Here plot's form is not sombre and it moves by looking sharp. Controversies from protagonist and antagonist put them forward in their boon. Galileo says to Virginia,

> "Every Local Tom, Dick and Harry with a grind wants to be his spokesman, particularly in places where it is not exactly helpful to me. I have written a book about the mechanics of the universe that, all what people make of it or do not make of it is not my business. The inquisitor also insists on his own creed. It is the restlessness of their own brain which these people have conveyed to the unmoving earth."

Scene of clash and cross-examination from both sides is going on and Galileo is overwhelmed by that.

The plot of the play ebbs when Galileo subdues the opposite party. He is dressed on to abjure from his theories that are absolutely on the strength of true hypotheses. Galileo is set forth torture instruments, so being a man of flash and blood, he declares after deviating from his way.

> "I Galileo Galilei, teacher of mathematics and physics in Florence, abjure what I have taught, namely that the Slur is the centre static and earth is 1I0t a centre and not motionless. I foreswear, detest and curse with sincere heart and unfeigned faith, all these errors and any further opinion repugnant to Holy Church."

After recantation, the author himself condemns Galilee's "low cunning for survival" and considers it a sin that has perplexed all the world of science and has delayed many of the scientific discoveries.

To sum up or discussion, we can confidently conclude that the plot of "Life of Galileo" is logical, powerful and developing though it ends at tragic feelings.

Brechet's Long-Winded Themes as a Dramatist

Bertolt Brechet is one of leading epic dramatists of twentieth century. The term "epic theatre" which was first manipulated in Germany in the 1920's and since then it has become implicitly associated with the name of Brechet. From the beginning of his career, Brechet had to be skirmish in the face of battle against the prevalent types and forms of theatre of his day, which he booted out as 'culinary' since like connoisseur, it delighted the sense of taste without impinging on the mind.

Bertolt Brechet was born on 10th of February 1898 at Augsburg where his father was a blue-collar worker and later director of a paper mill. Brechet's life falls into three distinct phases demarcated by his involuntary banishment from his native Germany during the Hitler's murderous period. From 1898 to 1933, he is in Germany, and then he is in expatriation in various parts of the world. In 1947, he comes round again to Europe, first in Switzerland then to the heart of Germany (Bertley). The first performance of the "The Rise and fall of the city of Mahogany" by Brechet led to a revolt against Nazi, Hitler's Army and he was urged by force to take to his heels with his family to Prague.

The aftermaths of his exile can be manifestly seen in his literary compositions. There is a kind of clash between individual and society or authorities, mutinies, thinking. Turbulence sublimity of character and theme of deportation are central to his work as he himself led his life in iron-fisted conditions.

His famous literary compositions are: "The Measures Taken", "The Rise and fall of the City of Mahogany", "Life of Galileo Galilei", "The Private Life of the Master Race", "The Mother", and "Trumpets and Drums". All these plays are composed in the style of Epic Theatre. These Epic plays set a new epoch in the world drama.

For Brechet, the conventional, Thespian theatre was all abode where the onlookers were absorbed into a comforting fallacy which played on their motions and left them haggard, but with a sense of contentment which biased them to accept the world as they found it. What he himself was looking for, was a theatre that would lend a helping hand to metamorphose the world. U-turn for the amelioration lies at the centre of Brechet's thinking. His plays are the interpretations of his suppositions.

While discussing, his dramatic style of approach, narration comes first of all. He elucidates before starting any scene of his every play, about situation and characters that is going to be performed on the stage. He narrates a story in a way that leads the spectators to consider the events involved and then to make their own assessment of them.

Brechet's play has been fabricated as a montage of independent incidents, which shows a process-taking place. It moves from scene to scene by curve and jumps which keeps the audience on the ball to the way in which things are happening. So that they may at length be capable indeed, be compelled to judge whether that is in the right way. For an instance, Galileo in "Life of Galileo" succinctly hints at a telescope and religious orders. In forthcoming scene, the man of letters brings them to light point by point Elucidation of situation and them in curves and jumps is also a major technique of Brechet's work.

Brechet does not bear down his heroes with sensations and feelings. Entirely, unlike traditional heroes, his hero is not an inevitable character, rather a round one. In "Life of Galileo", in the very first version of the play, the hero is an enthusiastic satirist and a toffee-nosed scientist who is fully assured of his new theories that will change the world but in due course, he himself declares his scientific verdicts to be null and void under the menace of torture.

Another technique of Brechet's plays is that his plays have been divided into 'scenes' in lieu of acts. He does not segregate his plays into three or four acts as traditional dramatists do, but Brechet recounts a story, using many episodes and characters as a comprehensive account of his subject cries out for.

Brechet's every scene is unabridged in itself. He does not make his observers wait till end. With its consummation, every scene sows the seeds of the capacity of onlookers for action; it is a mutable and able to be altered and so spectators' eye are fixed at the course. They also brought the observers to the point of recognition.

Irony is also found in Brechet's play "Life of Galileo". With the use of this technique, Galileo was fully confident that his thesis would be held in esteem by the religious authorities of his day.

> I understand that Collegium Romanum had given his blessing to my observation "So that each one can now be seen as the centre or none at all. Suddenly, there is a lot of room." It is ironical to his part that in the end of the play, he had to back out of his ideas."

Brechet's plays have eloquent and developing as well as persuasive plot. His plots have appropriate alpha and omega. They never slacken their stability for a moment. If there is any trifling or piddling matters discussed, it is demand of the subject. Brechet's culmination of his plots is sublime but its declining points are not without grandeur and verisimilitude. The observers become a part of the plot and want to act themselves on the stage because of its fascinating power.

Brechet's art of characterisation and dialogues are also in a class by itself. He does not give any unnecessary details about lineament, robes and appearances. It is the dialogue that exposes his characters. Galileo always talks about science. Mrs. Sarfi is a household lady who treads the boards like the housewives. Andrea authenticates strenuous and fervid through his holy dialogues, ecclesiastical order speaks the language related to their incentives.

> "The inquisitor: It is the restlessness of their own brain which these people have transferred to the unmoving earth."

For the Epic Dramas, Brechet sets stages quite historical as the story demands. For the American production, Brechet and Loughton established certain parameters for the design.

Forming an opinion of the discussions, we can remark that Brechet is a beacon in the world of "Epic Theatre", He set an up to date epoch in drama, He denunciates the traits of traditional dramatic theatre and introduces entirely a unique and new mannerism and techniques that are abreast 10 cause and reason and rationality, So, consequently, Bertolt Brechet is the fabulous dramatist.

Galileo as a Scientist

Galileo Galilei, a top and high-ranking historical figure was born with zealous soul and marvellous human seat of intellect with restless nature. His oeuvre opened a new epoch in the world of science. He was a maverick who shattered the predominant ideas prevailed about the rotation of the earth. He pioneered the Copernican system as an element in the new thinking that is about to revolutionise science and society,

With the Dutch invention, telescope, Venetian Galileo explored the extra-terrestrial phases and corroborated that Copernican theory was bang on. He migrated to Florence in search of more cure and scope, For research as he had no means to aggrandise his wherewithal and research in Ptolemaic system in Venice.

> Galilee was "great but discontented man. Dissatisfaction is a necessary evil for a scientist who always looks around the prevailing universal phenomena sharply".

Galileo's brainy research on a mere hypothesis turned the table of ever set idea about the revolution of the sun and centre of the earth that had the kosher favours of theology. Galileo said;

> "Yes, I felt that first time I saw one of those, we are not the only ones to feel it. Walls and spheres and immobility! For two thousand years, people have been believing that the sun and all the stays of heaven rotate around mankind, but, now we are breaking out of it, Andrea at full speed, Because the old days are over and this is a new time."

Galileo had the calibre and zealot to metamorphose the whole world overnight. Like a first rate intellectual or philosopher denounced and despised the sloth and inefficacy to explore the universal truth of the layman, He handed out brickbats the society in these words,

> "Our cities are cramped and so are men's minds, superstitions and the plague. The universe has lost its centre overnight and woken up to find it has countless centres. Suddenly, there is a lot of room."

Galileo's heretical discoveries about the solar system brought him to the attention of the inquisition. When the Vatican Research Institute, the Collegium Romanum proves Galileo's explorations, the theological gentry immediately react against him and he is summoned up in total court for inquisition. In the court, he experiences an excruciating trail and is compelled to apostatize his theories and inventions. -'

Here a debility of his spunk comes to our knowledge that only "to save his skin" he comprises with the prevailing circumstances and perpetrate recantation. His apprentices were dumb founded by his reaction, Andrea said,

> "Like a man in the street, we said he will die but he will never recant! You came back."
>
> Galilee replies, "I have recanted but 1am going to live. Your hands are stained"

In reality, this illustrious man was forced to abjure his theories publicly in papal court. Everyone, Tom, Dick and Harry, treated him as a blasphemer who exchanged theological beliefs, Because of this astronomy, they were left two millenniums behind.

After backing out of his theories, this great man carried on his work privately, eventually, smuggling his work out of his country by his pupil, Andrea, but he could never be recognised by the society.

Brecht's Dramatic Technique in Galileo

Brecht's theory of theatre known as 'Epic Theatre' is an anti-illusionist theatre that runs counter to Aristotelian 'Theatre of Illusion'. It is in the light of this 'Epic Theatre' that we need to understand his dramatic technique. By using long pauses, harsh lightening, empty stages, episodic plot, placards announcing the change of scenes, concept of anti-hero, alienation effect or estrange3ment, narrative form and violation imposed by traditional dramatic form.

Brecht's dramatic technique is intended to create an effect of estrangement among the audience by making the characters declare boldly that whatever the audience is watching is only play-an illusion not reality. The audience is urged to remain intellectually vigilant and not identify with the characters of the play. The audience will have to maintain a critical stance. The long pauses in the play obstruct the smooth flow of the plot. Use of harsh lighting won't allow anything to be hidden so that the façade of illusion is dismantled. Empty stage makes the audience stop and think curiously about what is to follow. Unity of plot is not emphasized. The play cannot be seen as a whole where the parts serve to create an organic whole. Parts can stand on their own self. Their significance is judged in isolation and their existence doesn't depend on their contribution to the whole. This idea of the episodic plot gives against Aristotelian idea of unity of plot. Use of placards to announce the change of scene helps to remind the audience of the illusion of theatrical performance. Galileo is an anti-hero because he acts like a coward fearing the instruments of torture. He doesn't fulfill our expectations from a hero as we have traditionally understood him. He doesn't have the courage and the power to prove himself as a great figure. Rather he acts like a person who runs away from the threats and dangers. He, in short, is very anti-heroic.

Aristotelian theory of theatre laid a great emphasis on the adherence to unities of time, place and action. In Galileo, there is violation of these unities. The events of the plot cover decades and are shown to have taken place in places that are far away from one another. The hero is not a person pursuing a single action with commitment. The play talks about many actions that do not coalesce into a single uniform action. Galileo uses narrative form in that it takes past events as a material for dramatization. The play is a dramatization of past events and thus carries a sense of historical facts being narrated. It is opposed to the idea of imaginary present of drama which unfolds before us as if it were happening in front of us for the first time. The play Galileo demands the special relation between the characters and the audience. The audience are not demanded to show empathy towards the characters and be lost in sentimentality. They are urged to maintain a distance between themselves and what happens on the stage. A greater sense of detachment and critical response is demanded of them.

Significance of telescope in Galileo

Galileo, the character who has been given a central role in the play with the same name is a scientist credited with the invention of telescope and the instrument stands for the spirit of science. Telescope is a tool used by astronomers to find out the facts about the heavenly bodies and their movement. It is the window through which scientists can get the objective knowledge of the world. It is opposed to religions orthodoxy which stands for superstition, blind faith and ignorance as well as status quo. What Galileo does with the telescope is the key to understand the conflict in the play. The tension is between science represented by Galileo and telescope and the orthodoxy of religion represented by church and the different people of the ecclesiastical hierarchy.

The play refers to a time in European history when the church was the caretaker of truth. Scientific truth or the spirit of scientific inquiry was suppressed. The role of religion was very great. The scientists had to fact danger to life and were kept under observation. The church was the arbiter of truth I all areas of knowledge. However the fervour for scientific inquiry was gaining ground. If religion doesn't test established truths and holds fast to them science examines established truth. The role of telescope is very great but it was seen with suspicion by the popes and other church men. It had to be used secretly because of the hostile religious environment. Telescope in the play Galileo poses threat to religious faith and the authority by challenging earlier scientific theories and the belief held by church. In the conflict between science and the religion science has suffered. However when 'Discourse' is smuggled out of Italy into Holland, it reaches the masses and they finally know what truth. In a way it is the victory of Telescope. Thus, telescope occupies a great place in the play Galileo.

Brecht's Galileo: Hero or Anti-Hero?

"Unhappy is the land that breeds no hero."

No, Andrea: "Unhappy is the land that needs a hero."

The lines, Galileo responding to the parting words of his pupil, Andrea Sarti, who is furious and betrayed by his teacher's recantation, are from the American version of Bertolt Brecht's monumental biographical play about the great astronomer, currently onstage at the Classic Stage Company in New York, in a lean and sober production starring F. Murray Abraham. It's a production very worth seeing, both as an introduction to a rarely-staged modern classic and as a demonstration of how even the most principled of artistic visions can turn back upon themselves, if pursued with honesty.

Brecht wrote the first draft of his play in 1938, at a moment when Nazi ascendancy justified a deep pessimism about progressivism and rationality's ability to triumph in the world, when the world really did seem to need heroes for the cause of reason more than cold-eyed rationalists. He wrote the American version (in collaboration with Charles Laughton) shortly after the Americans dropped the first atomic bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki, a moment that justified apprehension at a minimum about whether the progress of science as such was good for the progress of human flourishing. In different ways, each was a moment when the themes that Galileo represented—progress, science, reason—could be questioned. Would they triumph? Should they triumph?

A critical questioning of principles by examining the historical forces that underlie them is central to Brechtian theatre. But in this case, the principles being questioned are the very ones that Brechtian theatre aims to promote.

Brecht's notion of the epic theatre was founded on the concept of the Verfremdungseffekt, usually translated as alienation or distancing effect. This was Brecht's rebuke to Artistotle's theory of drama, founded on the concept of catharsis, an emotional purging that takes place through identification with a character when he comes to a full understanding of the tragic inevitability of his fate. Brecht rejected this identification because he rejected tragic inevitability. His was to be a progressive theatre, a theatre that liberated the audience by alienating them from apparently familiar characters and situations, forcing them to confront the oppressive social structures that are, in his view, the real cause of what appears to be inevitable tragedy.

This alienation is sometimes achieved by means of what one could call theatrical tricks—direct address to the audience, for example, which reminds the audience that it is at a play, not watching real people. The use of song to comment on, rather than advance, the action has a similar purpose. But alienation is also the product of the ironic spirit that animates Brecht's greatest characters and stories.

Galileo provides an excellent illustration of this ironic spirit. The title character is a heroic figure, and would seem tailor-made for boulevard-theatre treatment, the kind of play in which a principal character struggles toward some great accomplishment and we, identifying with her, come to believe that it is we who have gone through the struggle, and leave the theatre feeling very proud of ourselves for what we've done. (The Miracle Worker is an archetypal example of the genre.) He'd be a hero in the Mosaic or Christological mold, who doesn't reach the promised land/usher in the Kingdom of Heaven on Earth—but, you know, he blazed the trail, those who come after will carry the torch further, etc. etc. But Brecht complicates this picture. His Galileo is a notably selfish hero—willing to steal other people's inventions, indifferent to his daughter (who he never teaches), seeking after glory and constantly talking about how he likes to eat well—but this isn't the main thing; that co single-minded determination to advance the cause of science, his indifference to any other ethical concern. The heart of the matter is that his recantation is an act, Brecht makes clear, of cowardice—from the perspective of his pupils, but also from his own perspective.

But what does this mean, that this is the heart of the matter? It means that the heart of the matter is a question of virtues. At that moment in history, Brecht is suggesting, the world needed a hero—a hero for science, for the idea of a truth that is not determined by social and political constraints, a truth whose liberation is, in Brecht's view, actually a precondition to any real improvement in those constraints. (In the play, the Church opposes the new science because it would lead to social disorder, as poor people realize that their suffering has no transcendent purpose, whereas the advance of science and technology offers the only practical means to end that suffering.) The world needed a hero because it needed inspiration, a figure for progressive forces to identify with and rally around. It needed an Antigone to stand up to the Church's Creon, even in the face of death.

But isn't this exactly what Brechtian theatrical principles say is an impediment to political consciousness? Isn't identification with a virtuous but tragic hero exactly what Brecht wants to deny us in the theatre?

It's worth comparing "Galileo" with another play about a solitary intellectual hero being crushed by the political establishment for holding to the truth as he sees is: Robert Bolt's "A Man For All Seasons." Bolt's Thomas More is, apparently, not a hero of science but a hero of the Church—a man whose religious convictions would not let him assent to Henry VIII's divorce, much less his Reformation, who tried to thread the needle of remaining loyal to his sovereign and to his conscience, and who was killed for it precisely because the sovereign couldn't bear being reminded that there was a needle to be threaded in this matter. But precisely because Bolt makes More's convictions a matter of his private conscience, he becomes an existential hero. As More himself says in the play, "what matters is that I believe it—or rather, no, not that I believe it, but that I believe." Bolt was not writing a brief for fidelity to the Church—indeed, the Church was supposed to be an allegorical stand-in for the Comintern, the play a parable about the persecution of Communists in the West. It didn't matter to Bolt's play that the institutional commitments of the Church and the Comintern were radically opposed—it didn't matter because he was making a play about a hero of conscience as such—and for that purpose, it doesn't really matter what his conscience actually held. At the end of the play, we see More as a hero—defeated by forces smaller than himself, but cosmically the victor precisely because in his martyrdom he showed them to be small. This is why, for all the Brechtian touches of Bolt's play—most notably, the Common Man character who is the audience stand-in, and who addresses the audience directly to comment on the action—the play is fundamentally acting contrary to the Brechtian spirit of alienation.

"Galileo," meanwhile, is a play that turns Brecht back upon himself. The play indeed shows us the social forces that drove the tragic outcome. There's a marvellous scene of the Pope getting dressed that is a synecdoche for the whole play—the new Pope is himself a scientist, and Galileo is counting on this bit of biography to ensure his personal safety as he pursues his forbidden research. Well, before he gets dressed, when he's just himself, the Pope demands that Galileo be left alone. But as vestment layers on vestment, and the man is buried in the office, institutional imperatives overwhelm conscience, and the Pope agrees to threaten Galileo with torture to achieve the necessary recantation. We see all this—but we long for Galileo to stand against this. We long for a hero—as do Galileo's pupils. And we don't get it.

And then Brecht gives himself an out. Galileo, after his recantation, continues to work in secret on his Discorsi. When his now-hostile old pupil Andrea visits him, Galileo passes him the secret book, and Andrea repents of his hostility. He gets it—his longing for a hero was just silly pre-scientific un-progressive thinking. Galileo preserved his life—and therefore was able to continue his work. And the work is all that matters. We don't need heroes—we need progress.

But Brecht won't take the out he gives himself. Galileo says: he didn't recant out of calculation that he'd be more good to progress alive than dead. He was just a coward. And Andrea's political calculation is wrong: the world did indeed need a hero, and Galileo wasn't one.

True to Brecht's goals, watching the play is an alienating, not a cathartic experience. F. Murray Abraham isn't the physical type of Brecht's Galileo—it's strange to hear this lean and hungry actor go on about feeding his belly—but he has the requisite frigid aloofness, particularly from his daughter. His early expressions of hope for progress, confidence that man will always believe the direct evidence of his senses, come off not so much as naïve as dismissive of alternative possibilities. He doesn't actually have faith in human reason, because he doesn't really have any profound human relationships that would ground faith in any aspect of the human character. Rather, he has faith in his own reason—not in his omniscience, but in the clarity of his own mind. Irrationality, whether perverse or interest-driven, isn't a concern of his, because it's just plain wrong. (Murray's Galileo bears some resemblance to our contemporary "New Atheists" in this.) But when he returns home after the recantation, he's poleaxed by fear, clutching his groin as if he'd been threatened with castration—or as if the recantation was exactly that. And after that, his one note is bitterness and self-reproof.

But all of these emotions are understated in performance; Abraham never really lets us identify with his Galileo emotionally. The supporting cast paints in bolder colors (with the exception of Amanda Quaid, who is very nearly emotionally invisible as Galileo's daughter, Virginia), with moving moments from in particular from Galileo's pupils: Aaron Himelstein as the Little Monk, Jon Devries as Federzoni, and Andy Phelan as Andrea. And the set is understated as well, except for a vast circular screen upstage on which we see depicted the objects of Galileo's study: the sun, the moon, the stars of the universe. These, not the human drama below, inspire awe. We, with Galileo's pupils, are left wanting more from our hero. Which may well be how Brecht wanted us to feel.

How far do you think Brecht is successful in applying his theories about drama in Galileo Galilei? (P.U. 2007) OR Do you think the play, Galileo Galilei, presents a conflict between the authority and free scientific inquiry, both on the institutional level and within Galileo's own character? (P.U. 2006)

Europe in the early 1930's was a cauldron of social and political unrest. Literature sought not to provide accurate images but instead provoked change and encouraged thought and evaluation. Bertolt Brecht, a renowned German playwright, attempted to highlight the undeniable triumph of reason and knowledge and emphasised victory over authoritarian oppression.

The Life of Galileo is a play that, although being set in the past, concentrates on presenting contemporary implications and consequences of the remarkable account of the struggle between Galileo's scientific discoveries and the extraordinary power and influence of the Catholic Church. The foundations of world literature have always been based on the attitudes and values of society. Authors, playwrights and poets are influenced fundamentally by the Ideologies around them. All of Brecht's plays were a form of social and political instruction. He did not consider drama to be a form of entertainment, and instead portrayed important images to the people of Europe, showing them the potential for social, political and economic change. Being a Marxist, having grown up in an ordinary German family and having seen the progress of several regimes of European history, including the ascendance of Adolf Hitler and the effects of government ideology on people, Brecht became a respected social commentator. He seldom conformed with the views of the government, and many of the ideologies the that playwright questions in The Life of Galileo were prevalent in governments in Europe at the time. It's not difficult to realize why his texts were banned from Germany not long after they became widely read. His support for the empowerment of the common man and those marginalized in society is clear, and his endorsement of socialism is outright.

In the mid 1930's, Europe was undergoing significant change. Legal, social and political traditions were being swept away by the onslaught of totalitarianism. Governments were introducing policies of restricting individual freedom and seeking to subordinate all aspects of the individual's life to the political ideology of the time. The, promises that the industrial revolution proclaimed, were unfulfilled and people were disillusioned. Fascist and totalitarian governments were taking over most of Europe, particularly in Italy, under Benito Mussolini, in the Soviet Union under Joseph Stalin and in Nazi Germany under Adolf Hitler. Each government pursued its own special goal, and anything that could foil the goal would be rejected, often at significant social and humanitarian cost. In Germany, the Nazi government sought to purify the German race and champion the common man.

In order to ensure their political longevity, governments in Europe at the time of Brecht influenced the people into believing that they were perched on the dawn of a new age. Through shocking reforms and proclamations of a bright future for all, rulers in several parts of the continent led everyone in their country to believe they were on the verge of huge changes and reforms for the better. The Nazi government successfully indoctrinated its people. The chant "Now a new age is dawning" was repeated throughout Germany. By ensuring that citizens were dazed and remained dreaming of the endless possibilities that the new age would bring, successive governments could do as they pleased in the name of change. The very first sentence of Brecht's notes on The Life of Galileo express the importance of this ideology in the text.

"It is well known how felicitously people can be influenced by the conviction that they are poised on the threshold of a new age."

Undoubtedly Brecht was aware of this policy of the Nazi planned to use his theatre to question it. Use of the words 'felicitously' and 'influenced' show that the new age of which Brecht was speaking was artificial and induced only by the evils of politics. In The Life of Galileo, however, he chooses to present a historical situation where there was potential for a new age to dawn, an age brought about by the convictions of the people, not false claims by the government. Brecht presents the character of Galileo not as a hero, but as a real and flawed human being.

Galileo's recantation put on hold for years the progress he had made and allowed the Catholic Church's teachings and values to continue unquestioned. The silent message from Brecht Is that we should put society before ourselves, just as Galileo should not have recanted to continue the momentum of thought and evaluation set against the 15th century social system. It is human nature to change and progress – in very few societies in the modern world has equilibrium been maintained. Brecht was telling those seated in the theatre to strive to change and question what they saw around them in the way that they wanted by not conforming with the views of others and not simply accepting what is set down by the government. He also pointed out the catalysts for further, genuine change in society – after all, the influence of several great reformists was spreading in the mid-1930's – Marx, Freud and Einstein, among others. Even though Galileo was presented as far from perfect, he was a man who desired change and progress. Despite Sagredo's warning that man is not 'amenable to commonsense' and predictions of Galileo being burnt at the stake; despite the onslaught of the Plague; despite Bellamarin claiming that Galileo's teachings are 'foolish and heretical'; despite all possible adversity, Galileo proclaims a new age.

"Andrea and I have made discoveries which we can no longer withhold from the world. A new era has dawned, a great age in which it is a joy to be alive."

In addition to Brecht presenting his audience with images of the Dawn of a New Age in The Life of Galileo, he similarly questions a core political ideology of the time. In 1933, Adolf Hitler came into power in Germany, Brecht's homeland. He began a campaign that included suppressing all literature that in any way questioned the beliefs of the government. He had all of Brecht's plays, poetry and books burnt in an attempt to keep the public uninformed about the potential for change in their government. Subsequently, Brecht was deported from Germany and had his passport removed. These events in the playwright's life undoubtedly had an affect on his writing and impelled him to write plays that questioned the creed of the government. The Life of Galileo, particularly the initial version written in 1939, presents the genius scientist Galileo as a man who, despite blindness, outsmarts the inquisition and ensures that his life's workings are not suppressed. In doing so, Brecht was subtly pointing out that suppressing knowledge will always be futile.

Throughout the play, Galileo sustained his belief in mankind's sense of reason. He perceived that our innate curiosity and desire to explain the universe must prevail over everything else. He remarks, "Knowledge will become a passion and research an ecstasy". The final scene of the play is particularly significant in understanding Brecht's stance on the suppression of knowledge and discovery. As Andrea, Galileo's student, heads off beyond Catholicism and into new areas, he takes with him Galileo's Discorsi, the product of a lifetime of research and experimentation. He crosses a border post with the manuscript hidden under his coat, prepared to spread Galileo's teachings throughout the world. Despite the inquisition putting Galileo under guarded house arrest and despite the Catholic Church's maintain its dominance, knowledge and reason won. Brecht saw in Galileo's case a historical precedent for successfully spreading the truth despite the adversity of the Gestapo and secret police in Germany. With every step outside of Italy, Andrea enacts how new ideas are irrepressible. The final line of the play demonstrates the implications of the new discoveries and an optimistic view of the future with Galileo's knowledge changing the face of the earth.

"We are really only at the beginning."

Brecht had strong Marxist convictions. Living in a time when the industrial revolution had taken its toll – working and living conditions were poor for millions of Europeans, Marxism offered the promise of improvements for the working class. A socialist system was particularly attractive for the masses in Germany – instead of their lives being controlled by a totalitarian government as a result of which they felt like pawns, socialism offered the potential for everyone to contribute to the country. In The Life of Galileo, Brecht conveyed several strong Marxist ideals. Galileo was portrayed not only as a scientist, but a humanitarian who could change the face of not only science, but society too. This is most abundantly clear towards the end of the play, where Ludovico points out that Galileo's discoveries could incite a revolution among the peasants, not because of scientific fact, but because the well-established social and political system could finally be questioned and changed.

"… your treatise on the satellites of Jupiter in no way disturb our peasants. Their work in the fields is too arduous. Yet it could disturb them to learn that frivolous attacks on the sacred doctrines of the Church now go unpunished."

In the 15th century, the wealthy and advantaged had dominance over their servants and workers. The peasants worked freely, but they led a limited, unenlightened life. This was *mainly due to the fact that they were intellectually cut off from the rest of the world – all*major publications were in Latin, which they were not able to read. Galileo insisted that all of his findings be published in the Vulgate so that everyone would have access to them. People believed that this could have disastrous consequences for the equilibrium in Italy. Not only would Galileo's teachings undermine the main ruling body, the Catholic Church, but each person previously suppressed would realise that the world was undergoing both scientific and social change, and that they need not be treated differently to their masters. All of the peasants were born into their role, the upper class intentionally keeping them focused only on their work and ensuring that they were kept illiterate, uneducated and totally dependant on those in control.

Until Galileo's time, the study of science and philosophy was combined. Science was not interpreted objectively, but the workings of the world were analysed according to the philosophical beliefs of the time. Ever since Aristotle had handed down the Ptolemaic system, its supremacy was unquestioned because it was protected by the combined entity of science, religion and philosophy. The Catholic Church adopted Aristotle's philosophy, and for decades it reigned unchallenged. Bellarmin remarks, 'Science is the legitimate and dearly beloved daughter of the Church, Signor Galilei'. Galileo questioned this age-old system, maintaining that science should not be related to philosophy. A group consisting of both scientists and philosophers visited Galileo in Florence to discuss his new discoveries. They refused to look into the telescope to evaluate Galileo's work, despite his constant pleading, `But really, you gentlemen need only look through the instrument!'. In a famous quote from the play, Galileo challenges the obstinate outlook of the scholars.

"The world of knowledge takes a crazy turn
When teachers themselves are taught to learn."

Instead of supporting new developments and change, the philosophers and scientists are completely unconcerned with scientific truth. As the philosopher remarks furiously to Galileo, 'The truth may lead us absolutely anything!'. Even Cardinal Barberini, the man who subsequently becomes Pope must uphold the status quo despite being a scientist and appreciating Galileo's discovery. Brecht naturalizes the upper class' inconsiderate outlook towards the working class. In the first scene, Ludovico remarks:

"My mother thinks that a little science is necessary. All the world takes a drop of science in their wine nowadays, you know"

Ludovico, an upper class gentleman, was sent to Galileo to 'take a drop of science' his position in society dictated that he should have a basic understanding of the workings of the world. Galileo made a miraculous change to Europe's approach to science. Instead of science being something handed out to only the upper class with their wine, by the end of the play, everyone in Italy and Europe had access to science through a language they could read and even through entertainers on the street! Galileo transformed expensive wine to water affordable to all, Brecht drawing clear parallels with Marxism which endorsed a classless system.

The gulf between the quest for knowledge and absolute religious faith can be very wide, and has caused problems at many points in history. Galileo's doctrines which proclaimed that the sun, rather than the earth, is at the centre of the universe displaced the accepted position of the heavens and the supremacy of the Catholic Church. When his trusted friend Sagredo asks him, "where is God In your cosmography?", Galileo responds, "Within ourselves or nowhere". In the early 20th century, when Darwin's theory of natural selection and evolution became widely studied, science once again came in conflict with the Catholic Church. The conflict between such ideologies is unmistakable in The Life of Galileo. Just as the political ideologies of Germany deported Brecht and had his literature burned, the ideologies entrenched in the Catholic Church destroyed the brilliant scientist Galileo. The similarities between the lives of Galileo and Brecht run deep in the text and were a prime motivation for Brecht writing the play. Just as he continued reforming theatre long after he was deported from his homeland, Galileo continued to secretly compose his Discorsi despite blindness and being under heavily guarded house arrest.

"We need a type of theatre which not only releases the feelings, insights and impulses possible within the particular historical field of human relations in which the action takes place, but employs and encourages those thoughts and feelings which help transform the field itself."

Brecht rose to the occasion of transforming the social field inEurope. Change around him and his strong political convictions unquestionably had an impact on his writings. In a single performance, Brecht manages to succinctly yet powerfully challenge the belief that knowledge can be suppressed and simultaneously endorse the belief of a society. In combination with his strong Marxist ideals, Brecht produced a performance that had extensive social and political significance. The ideologies of the people, the ideologies of the government and the ideologies of some of the world's greatest thinkers come together in Brecht's The Life of Galileo to provide an astonishing insight into our social reality.

"…It is a play what contains very little element of caricature. This does not turn his Galileo into the self-portrait it is sometimes alleged to be…" What is your opinion? (P.U. 2004)

The conflict between Galileo and the Church took place within a densely charged political atmosphere. The new science threatened both the Church's traditional role as aribter of doctrinal truth and its position as a great European power. What were the political issues at stake in the debate over Copernicanism? We can approach this question from two directions, asking (a) what political interests did the Church have vested in the traditional worldview; and (b) what interests did the Galileans stake in Copernican worldview. Given the profoundly human dimension of this conflict, we should also ask: what were Galileo's choices?

The first question, the Church's political investment in the Aristotelian-Ptolemaic cosmology, is about Counter-Reformation politics. In the century-and-a-half prior to Galileo's trial, Italy and the Church suffered a succession of severe setbacks. The French invasion left Italy in a state of political wreckage and set the stage for a poisonous rivalry between the Holy Roman Emperor, the Papacy, and the King of France. At the same time, the Church faced dissension within its own ranks. When the sixteenth century opened, scarcely anyone in Europe doubted the need for reform of the Church. Most called for a reform from within, but Luther, that Papal Bull-burning German, crossed the Rubicon. Breaking completely with the church, he split Christendom into two belligerent blocs, and added a vicious ideological element to the Cold War of the sixteenth century.

The Council of Trent, called ostensibly to answer the Protestant challenge, created a new, toughened Church. To combat the Protestant Heresy, the Council redefined the Church's doctrine and established iron-fisted mechanisms to enforce the creed, including the Index of Printed Books and the Inquisition at Rome. One of the most important debates at the Council of Trent was over the Question of Scripture vs. Tradition. Does religious truth rest upon the word of God alone, or does it rest upon the dual foundations of scripture together with the apostolic and ecclesiastical traditions? Since the Church was the source and guardian of tradition, its religious and political authority weighed in the balance. Years of debate and thousands of scudi went into answering this question, but the conclusion was determined by political necessity: Scripture and Tradition together, not Scripture alone, were the win bulwarks of the faith.

Galileo's trial hinged upon the Church's rigid adherence to this doctrine. Galileo did not just defend a new astronomical system; he proclaimed science to be a new criterion of authority, and hence undermined the bedrock of Roman Catholic authority.

The philosophy of Aristotle was fundamental to the new scholasticism that emerged after Trent. Arguments based upon Aristotle's physics explained and justified some of the central dogmas that separated Roman Catholics from Protestants- the Church's interpretation of the Eucharist, for example. But the issue was not simply one of physics, theology, or astronomy. The issue, as Brecht rightly portrays it, was "pernicious doctrines," which was what the inquisition was formed in the first place to deal with, and was matter with which, by the time of the trial, the Holy Office had gained a great deal of practical experience.

The carnival scene in the Life of Galileo, where the people claim their right "to say and do just what one pleases," may seem slightly contrived from an historical point of view, but it captures the essential point that in the time of Galileo the Church was engaged in a two-front war: one against high culture, which resisted conforming to Counter-Reformation patterns, and another against the people, who often perverted doctrine in aggressively original ways.

There are many historical examples of the originality of popular culture. The best know (thanks to a recent book on the subject by Carlo Ginzberg) was miller called Menocchio, of the Friuli region in northern Italy, who was denounced to the Inquisition in 1583. Menocchio owned a few books. None of them were heretical, but his reading of them was shockingly so. He became convinced for example, that the sacraments were human inventions and just so much merchandise. He said you may as well confess to a tree as to a priest; and that all men are equal because the spirit of God is in everyone. He constructed a wholly materialistic cosmology that all but denied God the creator.

Whenever Menocchio got the chance, he insolently exercised his freedom of judgment. Menocchio was brought to trial in 1599, just as proceedings against Giordano Bruno were drawing to a close. In the same year Tommaso Campanella was thrown into prison for fomenting a rebellion in Calabria. Campanella languished in prison for more than twenty years. Bruno and Menocchio went to the stake for heresy. The trial and execution of these two mean, a philosopher and a miller, symbolizes the war the Church waged against high and low cultures in an effort to impose doctrines promulgated by the Council of Trent. And it is not insignificant that Bruno and Campanella both vigorously supported Copernicus and Galileo respectively.

The attack on Galileo commenced in 1614, when the Dominican preacher Tommasco Caccini delivered a sermon denouncing mathematics as a diabolical art, mathematicians as enemies of the state and Galileo as the propagator of cosmological absurdities. Copernicus's book was placed on the index in 1616. Cardinal Bellarmino, stating the Church's position, declared that until the Copernican theory was demonstrated, a literal reading of scripture must be taken as a matter of faith. Construing the Trent decree in a narrow, bureaucratical way, Bellarmino declared that it would be extremely imprudent to rewrite Scripture in light of an unproven scientific theory – which was in fact the status of Coppernicanism in 1616. Despite Galileo's eloquent plea for separate standards of scientific authority, Bellarmino's position remained the Church's until the time of the trial.

Brecht makes Galileo's recantation the central problem of the play, rendering it as a capitulation to the authorities. Historical analysis probably cannot help us decide whether Galileo was a coward or a hero. But it may help us to decide whether or not he had a choice in the matter. Indeed, by changing the ending of his play, Brecht himself forces the question. Galileo I is about the necessity of fighting for the liberty to teach the truth. Galileo II, on the other hand, is about the social responsibility of the scientist. This can only mean that for Brecht the scientist must not just seek the truth; he must also see to it that the truth does not get into the wrong hands. Where does this leave Galileo? Did he have a choice?

One choice, a typically Renaissance option, can be illustrated by reference to one of Galileo's contemporaries – a scientist who might in fact have supplied Brecht with a more suitable model for the conception of science he advocates in Galileo II.

Giambattista Della Porta was twenty-nine years older when Galileo. He was born in Naples in 1535, and died in 1615, when Galileo was at the peak of his career, eighteen years before the trial. The two scientists knew each other; both belonged to the Academia dei Lincei, the scientific academy that sponsored Galileo's books, and they communicated with one another about Galileo's research with the telescope. There is another similarity between Galileo and Della Porta. In 1574, and again in 1590, Della Porta confronted the inquisition and was forced to recant his scientific views.

However, Galileo and Della Porta represented two very different scientific traditions. Whereas Galileo stood for the tradition of mathematical physics, Della Porta was Europe's most famous champion of natural magic. According to Della Porta, nature was a great repository of occult forces, which science can exploit for beneficial purposes. Natural magic was sixteenth-century

Italy's version of the utilitarian science was advocated by Francis Bacon and later Brecht. It promulgated a utopian image of science as the foundation for reforming society and manners.

Della Porta's major scientific discovery was that all supposed "magical" phenomena are in reality the results of natural causes, and it was his radical stance not his science of occult qualities that got him into trouble with the Inquisition. For the Church, in order to work its magic, had to maintain a monopoly over access to the occult. Indeed, the church was a vast reservoir of magical power, which it was capable of deploying for a variety of secular purposes. Della Porta, who insisted that science can exploit occult powers, thus struck a blow at the Church's monopoly over the supernatural, just as Galileo challenged the Church's monopoly over interpreting the book of nature.

Della Porta, like Brecht, was tremendously impressed by the potential of science. He knew it could do good, but also great harm. Because of this he maintained that sometimes it is necessary to write obscurely, speaking in riddles and symbolic language, lest knowledge get into the wrong hands. Although he published a popular work entitled Natural Magic, he withheld publication of his most precious secrets, the "quintessence of his science," on the grounds that they might be abused or corrupted by the people. He sent a manuscript of this work only to Rudolf II, the Holy Roman Emperor, imaging that Rudolph, whom he thought the most enlightened prince in Europe, would use it for the best ends.

The distance in attitudes toward the 'secrets of nature' between Della Porta and Galileo is almost the same as the distance that separates us from the Renaissance. For Della Porta, only a magus could rightfully penetrate into the secrets of nature. Galileo, on the other hand, declared nature to be an open book that anyone can read, provided he knows the language in which it is written, mathematics. For Della Porta, the pearls of science were too precious to be fed to swine; for Galileo, public confirmation of his discoveries was an essential component of the scientific method.

Galileo, given the style of science he practiced, took the only choice available to him. To have taken the route advocated by Della Porta, and presumably also Brecht, would have meant doing a completely different kind of science. Since the Copernican issue could not be settled in strictly scientific terms, and had necessarily to be debated on theological grounds, Galileo argued the debate in that treacherous territory. Perhaps, in light of these historical circumstances, the most appropriate dramatic form for the trial of Galileo is not epic, but tragedy.

Brecht has portrayed a conflict between the individual and the world in his Play Life of Galileo?

Most of the time Brecht portrayed a clash between the ends means between the past rational way and the present Reality or we can say the conflict between the individual and the world. It energy through different ways as a conflict between the old order and the new world, as far as Brechtian style is concern he showed the collision between the two irreconcilable ideologies.

In the plays he showed the stagnant traditional view of religion and also the pasteurization of the moral standards with an unaccommodating ideas of the established tradition but it is a human need to redefine all the rigid ad orthodox nations street's Galileo is a historical personality but its prior concern is to change the whole rigid old structure of the society is based on the so-called religious beliefs.

Galileo character seemed the representative of new scientific view, which is apposed by the obsolescent elongation of the church. The whole depiction of the church in `life of Galileo' is dictatorial one, which has a complete hold over the political matters and also on science. It seems that the domination on both classes as a opposition for the new world order or you can say free research.

'Science is ruined and church is sitting on it with fat behind'

So we can say that Galileo's new invitation is challenging because it shows the new idea about science and it became a threat to the social standards. The protagonist is of the opinion that in his day's astronomy has reached the market place and has thus broken the monopoly of an exclusive coterie. In this play when the balled singer announced that the earth is hot the center of the sun, than whole order of the society turned upside down. The builder will keep his building for himself and the woodchopper will burn his own fuel whereas.

'Princes will have to wax their own boots'

The emperor can bake his own bread for orders the soldiers want care two hoots

They'll go for stroll instead'

The whole scenario of Galileo society was so much stagnant that if they start to thuck about the new idea that awards questions arises from them. The sees the topsy-turvy Copernican macrocosm as a working model for their own social microcosm. It seemed that old order felt a threat this dread is of an existential nature like that of a little mimic's company peasants who without a divinely appointed order will begin to say;

'There is no meaning in our misery hunger is simply not having eaten and not a Test of strength'

The language or linguistic change is refocused in scene 4 when the Aristotelian philosopher commences an arid disputed by Galileo that his lens-polisher will not be able to follow the argument.

Brecht's Anti-villain hero Galileo breaks an age old age idea about the universe but also shatters the traditional concept of a hero because he accepts not virtue but martyrdom.

In the end we can say that Brecht does not simply dismiss religion as kind of pre-scientific superstition and also its necessity. In the clash between religion and. Marxism Brecht not only reconcile religion with dialectical materialism but also to develop human socially in which religion necessity is denied.

Q.7. Discuss the portrayal of the church in Life of Galileo?

For the theatre it is important to understand that this play must lose a great part of its effect for its performance is directed chiefly against the Roman Catholic Church.

Of the dramatis personae, many wear the church's garb. Actors who, because of that, try to portray these characters as odious would be doing wrong. But neither, on the other hand, has the church the right to have the human weaknesses of its members glossed over. It has all too often encouraged these weaknesses and suppressed their exposure. But in this play there is also no question of the church being admonished: 'Hands off science!' Modern science is a legitimate daughter of the church, a daughter who has emancipated herself and turned against the mother.

In the present play the church functions, even when it opposes free investigation, simply as authority.

Since science was a branch of theology, the church is the intellectual authority, the ultimate scientific court of appeal. The play shows the temporary victory of authority, not the victory of the priesthood. It corresponds to the historical truth in that the Galileo of the play never turns directly against the church. There is not a sentence uttered by Galileo in that sense. If there had been, such a through commission of investigation as the Inquisition would undoubtedly have brought it to light. And it equally corresponds to the historical truth that the greatest astronomer of the Papal RomanCollege, Christopher Clavius, confirmed Galileo's discoveries (scene 6). It is also true that clerics were among his pupils (scenes 8, 9 and 13).

To take satirical aim at the worldly interests of high dignitaries seems to be cheap (it would be in scene 7). But the causal way in which these high officials treat the physicist is only meant to show that, by reason of their past experiences, they think they can count on ready complaisance from Galileo. They are not mistaken.

When one looks at our bourgeois politicians, one cannot but extol the spiritual (and scientific) interests of those politicians of old.

The play, therefore, ignores the falsifications made to the protocol of 1616 by the Inquisition of 1633, falsifications established by recent historical studies under the direction of the German scholar Emil Wohlwill. Doubtless the judgment and sentence of 1633 were thereby made juridical possible. Anybody who understands the point of view outlined above will appreciate that the author was not concerned with this legal side of the trial.

There is no doubt that Urban VIII was personally incensed at Galileo and, in the most detestable manner, played a personal part in the proceedings against him. The play passes this over.

Anyone who understands the standpoint of the author will realize that this attitude implies no reverence for the church of the seventeenth, let alone of the twentieth century.

Casting the church as the embodiment of authority in this theatrical trial of the persecutors of the champions of free research certainly does not help to get the church acquitted. But it would be highly dangerous, particularly nowadays, to treat a matter like Galileo's fight for freedom of research as a religious one; for thereby attention would be most unhappily deflected from present-day reactionary authorities of a totally unecclesiastical kind.

Literary Criticism

A Critic is the "One who expresses a reasoned opinion on any matter especially involving a judgment of its value, truth, righteousness, beauty, or technique".

A Literary Critic is "The evaluative or interpretive work written by professional interpreters of texts. It is "criticism" not because it is negative or corrective, but rather because those who write criticism ask hard, analytical, crucial, or "critical" questions about the works they read".

A critic is one who likes or dislikes a book, a movie, a dinner. A critic does evaluate but only on the basis of personal preference. A literary critic is usually a professor of literature. Literary criticism is the act of interpreting literature and must be published in an academic publication such as a journal.

I. Introduction

Literary Criticism is discussion of literature, including description, analysis, interpretation, and evaluation of literary works. Like literature, criticism is hard to define. One of the critic's tasks is to challenge definitions of literature and criticism that seem too general, too narrow, or unworkable for any other reason. Whatever it is, literary criticism deals with different dimensions of literature as a collection of texts through which authors evoke more or less fictitious worlds for the imagination of readers.

We can look at any work of literature by paying special attention to one of several aspects: its language and structure; its intended purpose; the information and worldview it conveys; or its effect on an audience. Most good critics steer clear of exclusive interest in a single element. In studying a text's formal characteristics, for example, critics usually recognize the variability of performances of dramatic works and the variability of readers' mental interpretations of texts. In studying an author's purpose, critics acknowledge that forces beyond a writer's conscious intentions can affect what the writer actually communicates. In studying what a literary work is about, critics often explore the complex relationship between truth and fiction in various types of storytelling. In studying literature's impact on its audience, critics have been increasingly aware of how cultural expectations shape experience.

Because works of literature can be studied long after their first publication, awareness of historical and theoretical context contributes to our understanding, appreciation, and enjoyment of them. Historical research relates a work to the life and times of its author. Attention to the nature, functions, and categories of literature provides a theoretical framework joining a past text to the experience of present readers. The tradition of literary criticism surveyed here combines observations by creative writers, philosophers, and, more recently, trained specialists in literary, historical, and cultural studies.

II. Classical Antiquity

The Western tradition's earliest extended instance of literary criticism occurs in The Frogs (405 BC), a comedy by Athenian playwright Aristophar contrasting styles of Greek dramatists Aeschylus and Euripides. In the play the two dead masters of Greek tragedy compete for supremacy in Hades (the underworld), debating a fundamental dilemma of all subsequent criticism: Is the writer's first commitment to uphold and promote morality or to represent reality? Is the task of drama and other forms of literature primarily to improve or primarily to inform the audience?

Greek philosopher Plato found virtually all creative writers deficient on both counts in his dialogue The Republic (about 380 BC). Plato felt that stories about misbehaving gods and death-fearing heroes were apt to steer immature people toward frivolous and unpatriotic conduct. Besides, he argued, poetry tended to arouse the emotions rather than promote such virtues as temperance and endurance. But even at their moral best, Plato viewed writers—like painters and sculptors—as mere imitators of actual human beings, who are themselves very imperfect "copies" or imitations of the eternal idea of Human Being in the divine mind.

Greek philosopher Aristotle produced a strong philosophical defense against such criticism. His Poetics (about 330 BC) presents artistic representation (mimesis) not as mere copying but as creative re-presentation with universal significance. For example, the epic poet and the playwright evoke human beings in action without having to report actual events. Because the poetic approach to human action is more philosophical in nature than a purely historical approach, literature can show the most probable action of a person of a specific type, rather than what an actual person said or did on a particular occasion. Even the portrayal of great suffering and death may thus give pleasure to an audience—the pleasure of learning something essential about reality.

Aristotle justified the poetic arousal of passions by borrowing the concept of catharsis (purification through purging) from contemporary medicine. He suggested that tragedy cures us of the harmful effects of excessive pity, fear, and similar emotions by first inducing such emotions in us, and then pleasurably purging them in the controlled therapeutic setting of theatrical experience. The precise meaning of Aristotle's concept of catharsis has been debated for many centuries, but most critics of literature and of other arts, such as opera and cinema, find useful his isolation and analysis of six interacting aspects of performed drama: plot, character, thought or theme, diction, music, and spectacle.

Roman poet Horace offered practical advice in Ars Poetica (The Art of Poetry, about 20 BC), a witty letter written in verse to two aspiring authors. His most influential suggestion was to combine the useful (utile) and the sweet (dulce) so as to satisfy a varied audience. Some readers seek benefit, others seek pleasure, he explained, but both kinds of readers will purchase writings that instruct and delight at the same time.

A weightier treatment of poetry appears in a 1st-century AD treatise, On the Sublime, long attributed to a 3rd-century philosopher named Longinus. The unknown author of this Greek text cites passages from Greek poets Homer and Sappho—as well as from orators, historians, philosophers, and the first chapter of Genesis—to prove the superiority of discourse that does not merely persuade or gratify its audience but also transports it into a state of enthusiastic ecstasy. The author analyzes the rhetorical devices needed to achieve sublime effects but insists that ultimately, "sublimity is the echo of a great soul."

III. Middle Ages and Renaissance

In medieval Europe, where Latin served as the common language of educated people, much scholarly interest focused on Roman authors and their Greek models. To reconcile non-Christian writings with the official doctrine of the Christian church, critics interpreted them allegorically. Greek and Roman divinities, for example, might be viewed as personifications of certain virtues and vices. Scholars applied similar interpretive methods to Hebrew scriptures to show, for instance, how the biblical story of Jonah surviving in the belly of a big fish foreshadowed the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. Even the parables and metaphors of the Christian Gospels were felt to require allegorical, moral, and spiritual interpretation to achieve a deeper understanding of their meaning. By the 14th century, Italian writers Dante Alighieri and Giovanni Boccaccio suggested that works of nonreligious literature could likewise reward multiple readings beyond the literal level.

Italian translators and commentators of the late 15th and 16th centuries were in the forefront of the Renaissance rediscovery of Aristotle's Poetics, aided by the commentaries on Aristotle written by Averroës, a 12th-century Arab scholar living in Spain. Ever since the Renaissance, critics influenced by Aristotle focus on artistic representation rather than on an author's rhetorical and persuasive skills. But the view that persuasion is a major goal of literature, based on the writings of Roman statesman Cicero and Roman educator Quintilian about oratory, helped to shape literary studies well into the 18th century. Even today some critics view all poetry, fiction, and drama as more or less concealed forms of rhetoric that are designed to please or move readers and theatergoers, chiefly as a means of teaching or otherwise persuading them.

English poet Sir Philip Sidney defended the poetic imagination against attacks from English Puritans in his Defence of Poesie (written 1583; published 1595). Unlike historians or philosophers, argued Sidney, a poet affirms nothing and therefore never lies, because a poet's works are "not affirmatively but allegorically and figuratively written." Far from imitating imperfect nature, the poet creates an ideal world of the imagination where virtuous heroes invite admiring readers to imitate them. According to Sidney, philosophers outshine poets when it comes to abstract teaching, but the power to move (or, in today's language, to motivate) makes the poet ultimately superior because, for teaching to be effective, we need first "to be moved with desire to know" and then "to be moved to do that which we know."

IV. The 17th and 18th Centuries

The climate of criticism changed with the arrival on the literary scene of such giants as Miguel de Cervantes, Lope de Vega, and Pedro Calderòn in Spain; William Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, and John Milton in England; and Pierre Corneille, Jean Baptiste Racine, and Molière in France. Most of these writers specialized or excelled in drama, and consequently the so-called battle of the ancients and moderns—the critical comparison of Greek and Roman authors with more recent ones—was fought

In his Essay of Dramatic Poesy (1668), English poet and playwright John Dryden presented the conflicting claims of the two sides as a debate among four friends, only one of whom favors the ancient over the modern theater. One modernist prefers the dignified "decorum" of French drama to the confusing "tumult" of actions and emotions on the English stage. By contrast, Dryden's spokesman prefers the lifelike drama of English theater to French tragedy, which he considers beautiful but lifeless. All agree, however, that "a play ought to be a just and lively image of human nature, representing its passions and humors, and the changes of fortune to which it is subject, for the delight and instruction of mankind."

An Essay on Criticism (1711), by English poet Alexander Pope, put together in verse both ancient and modern opinions. Pope considered nature, including human nature, to be universal, and he saw no contradiction between the modern writer's task of addressing a contemporary audience and the insistence by traditional critics that certain rules derived from the practice of the ancients be followed: "Those rules of old discovered, not devised, / Are nature still, but nature methodized."

English writer Samuel Johnson, in the preface to his 1765 edition of Shakespeare's plays, observed that "nothing can please many, and please long, but just representations of general nature." Accordingly, he praised Shakespeare for creating universal characters "who act and speak as the reader thinks that he should himself have spoken or acted on the same occasion." Yet Johnson could not help objecting to what he saw as the playwright's "lack of obvious moral purpose" and "gross jests." In an earlier essay, "On Fiction" (1750), Johnson cautioned against the unselective realism of popular novels written chiefly for "the young, the ignorant, and the idle." In his view, such people are easily tempted to imitate the novelist's portrayal of "those parts of nature" which are "discolored by passion, or deformed by wickedness." Mindful of the impact of literature on the minds of all readers, Johnson demanded that vice, if it must be shown, should appear disgusting, and that virtue should not be represented in an extreme form because people would never emulate what they cannot believe—implausibly virtuous heroes or heroines, for example.

In her pioneering work, A Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792), English writer Mary Wollstonecraft addressed the specific situation of women readers. She denounced shallow novelists, who she felt knew little about human nature and wrote "stale tales" in an overly sentimental style. Since most women of her day received little education, Wollstonecraft feared that reading such novels would further hinder women's "neglected minds" in "the right use of reason."

In the third quarter of the 18th century, French philosopher, novelist, and outspoken autobiographer Jean Jacques Rousseau offered an alternative to the faith in universal human reason propounded by Pope, Johnson, and other writers. Opponents of excessive rationalism found in Rousseau an advocate of their own growing interest in the expression of emotion, individual freedom, and personal experience. But most 19th-century concepts of literature and criticism were to owe an even greater debt to a number of Germans who concluded or began their intellectual careers between 1770 and 1800: philosophers Immanuel Kant, Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von Schelling, and Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel, and writer-critics Gotthold Ephraim Lessing, Johan von Goethe, Friedrich von Schiller, and the brothers August Wilhelm von Schlegel and Friedrich von Schlegel. All of these thinkers influenced an important 19th-century movement known as romanticism, which emphasized feeling, individual experience, and the divinity of nature.

V. The 19th Century

English poets William Wordsworth and Samuel Taylor Coleridge gave memorable expression to the romantic mindset developed by their German predecessors and contemporaries. The romantics believed in the primacy of feeling, love, pleasure, and imagination over reason; in the spiritual superiority of nature’s organic forms over mechanical ingenuity; and in the ability of art to restore a lost harmony between the individual and nature, between society and nature, and between the individual and society. In revised versions of the preface to his and Coleridge’s Lyrical Ballads (1798), Wordsworth declared that “all good poetry is the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings” and that “the poet writes under one restriction only, namely, the necessity of giving immediate pleasure.” The pleasure derived from the writing and reading of poetry was to Wordsworth a loving “acknowledgment of the beauty of the universe” and an indication that the human mind was “the mirror of the fairest and most interesting properties of nature.” The critical writings of Coleridge in turn stressed the parallel between cosmic creativity and the poet’s godlike creative imagination.

In A Defence of Poetry (written 1821; published 1840), English poet Percy Bysshe Shelley elaborated on similar romantic themes. Shelley also suggested that the utilitarian science and technology of his time enhanced the “inequality of mankind” and that poetry should continue to serve as an antidote to “the principle of the self, of which money is the visible incarnation.” Throughout the Defence, Shelley speaks of poetry in a very broad sense as visionary discourse.

By contrast, two mid-century American poet-critics addressed what they considered to be unique features of poetry. In his essay “The Poet” (written 1842-1843), Ralph Waldo Emerson argued that the poet uses symbols more appropriately than the religious mystic does, because the poet recognizes the multiple meanings of symbols and the ability of language to reflect a continuously changing world, whereas the mystic “nails” symbols to a specific meaning. In a lecture on “The Poetic Principle” (1848), Edgar Allan Poe expressly distinguished pure intellect from taste and moral sense. In Poe’s view, poets need to “tone down in proper subjection to beauty” all “incitements of passion,” precepts of duty,” and “lessons of truth” so that the resulting work may be sensitively judged by our faculty of taste.

In “A Short Essay on Critics”(1840), American author and editor Margaret Fuller described three kinds of literary criticism: subjective indulgence in the critic’s own feelings about a text, apprehensive entry into the author’s world, and comprehensive judging of a work both by its own law and according to universal principles. These categories anticipate the distinctions made by English poet-critic Matthew Arnold between three kinds of critical estimations of the value of a literary work: the personal, the historical, and the real. In his essay on “The Study of Poetry” (1880), Arnold assigned great cultural significance to the unbiased critic’s “re an increasingly nonreligious time, “mankind will discover that we have to turn to poetry to interpret life for us, to console us, to sustain us.” Yet he believed that critics themselves would have to transcend the narrowness of their own society to perform their role of spiritual guidance. Only by exploring a variety of cultural traditions could they learn and teach “the best” that has been “known and thought in the world,” Arnold cautioned in his essay “The Function of Criticism at the Present Time” (1865).

In the late 19th and early 20th centuries, Arnold’s broadly humanistic views found many disciples. Some of Arnold’s younger contemporaries, however, demanded that writers become more intensely involved with the particular problems of their society. French writer Émile Zola, for example, advocated writing true-to-life works of so-called naturalistic fiction that would reflect the ills of contemporary society with scientific precision, a view Zola advanced in his essay “Le roman expérimental” (1880; translated as “The Experimental Novel,” 1893). At the other extreme, English writer Oscar Wilde favored highly personal literary styles and a critical stance acknowledging that “life imitates art far more than art imitates life,” as he wrote in “The Decay of Lying” (1889). The case for subjective art and criticism was presented most succinctly by French novelist Anatole France in the preface to his La vie littéraire(1888-1893; translated as On Life and Letters, 1910-1924): “The good critic tells the adventures of his soul among masterpieces. There is no more an objective criticism than an objective art.”

VI. 20th-Century Approaches

The social, cultural, and technological developments of the 20th century have vastly expanded the Western critical tradition. Indeed, many critics question just how “Western” this tradition can or should remain. Modern critics in the established cultural centers of Western Europe must heed not only Central Europe and North America but also areas once considered remote, including Russia, Latin America, and, most recently, the newly independent countries of Asia and Africa. At a growing number of universities, professors of literature and related fields pay increasing attention to long-neglected areas of study—for example, works by women and by non-Western writers. The following sketch of various 20th-century approaches names few living critics because it is impossible to predict who among the tens of thousands of writers publishing criticism today will ultimately outshine the others.

A. Formalism, Structuralism, and New Criticism

A text-based critical method known as formalism was developed by Victor Shklovsky, Vladimir Propp, and other Russian critics early in the 20th century. It involved detailed inquiry into plot structure, narrative perspective, symbolic imagery, and other literary techniques. But after the mid-1930s, leaders of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and its subsequent satellites in Eastern Europe demanded that literature and criticism directly serve their political objectives. Political leaders in those countries suppressed formalist criticism, calling it reactionary. Even such internationally influential opponents of extreme formalism as the Russian Mikhail Bakhtin and the Hungarian Georg Lukács would often find themselves under attack.

The geographical center of formalist orientation started to shift westward in 1926 when scholars of language and literature, most of them Czech, founded the Prague Linguistic Circle, adopting and refining some of the methods of formal analysis developed by their Russian colleagues. Beginning in the late 1940s anthropologist Claude Lévi-Strauss, critic Roland Barthes, and other mid-century thinkers and scholars initiated French structuralism by applying linguistically inspired formal methods to literature and related phenomena. Structuralism attempted to investigate the "structure" of a culture as a whole by "decoding," or interpreting, its interactive systems of signs. These systems included literary texts and genres as well as other cultural formations, such as advertising, fashion, and taboos on certain forms of behaviour.

The text-centered methods of the formalist critics were also welcomed in the United States because they meshed well with the concerns of so-called New Critics, who focused on the overall structure and verbal texture of literary works. By the 1940s, when Russian linguist Roman Jakobson and Czech literary theorist René Wellek settled at Harvard and Yale universities, respectively, the study of literature in North America had been greatly influenced by the work of Cleanth Brooks and other New Critics. Like his British contemporary Sir William Empson, Brooks applied the skill of close reading chiefly to the analysis of ambiguities, paradoxes, and ironies in individual texts.

Many New Critics looked at metaphor, imagery, and other qualities of literary language apart from both a work's historical setting and any detailed biographical information that might be available about the author. Other New Critics, however, were more historically or philosophically inclined. New Criticism as a whole was therefore meaningfully supplemented by the work of German-born literary historian Erich Auerbach and of American philosopher Susanne K. Langer, who sought to place individual texts into larger historical and theoretical contexts. Auerbach emphasized historical development in his 1946 book Mimesis, which chronicled changing styles of the literary representation of reality from Greek poet Homer to English author Virginia Woolf. Langer in turn argued that the significant emotions depicted or aroused by literature and other arts are universal human feelings symbolized by the work rather than personal sentiments expressed by a particular writer or artist.

B. Other Critical Methods

In and after the 1920s American-born British poet T. S. Eliot explored how well individual European writers measured up to his aesthetically liberal but politically conservative view of the Western tradition. Canadian critic Northrop Frye, in contrast, opposed any viewpoint narrowed by regionalism or specific ideologies; he attempted to find common elements in the worldwide multiplicity of literary traditions in his book Anatomy of Criticism (1957). Frye and like-minded critics around the globe saw literature and other art forms as manifestations of universal myths and archetypes (largely unconscious image patterns) that cross cultural boundaries. In advocating this view they took cues from British anthropologist Sir James George Frazer and Swiss psychologist Carl Gustav Jung.

In the 1960s and 1970s German philosopher-critic Hans-Georg Gadamer and French philosopher and historian Michel Foucault offered contrary mod and cultural traditions in literary criticism. Gadamer sought to engage past texts in fruitful dialogue with the present by examining different interpretations of literature throughout history; so do German critic Wolfgang Iser and other proponents of Aesthetics of Reception, which examines readers' responses to literature in a cultural and historical context. In contrast, Foucault wanted to challenge certain basic notions about the Western tradition that most Westerners take for granted. He hoped to discredit Western heritage and its powerful institutions by exposing, or "demystifying," the repressed origins and oppressive applications of that power. Among literary critics, American Stephen Greenblatt and other so-called New Historicists have similar objectives.

Today's widespread tendency to interpret texts as hiding rather than revealing what is most significant about themselves has three major sources: the writings of German philosophers Karl Marx and Friedrich Nietzsche and of Austrian psychoanalyst Sigmund Freud. Influential studies along Marxist lines of the social and economic underpinnings of culture were undertaken by German critic Walter Benjamin before World War II and by Welsh critic Raymond Williams between the late 1950s and the early 1980s. Marxist and Freudian methods of literary criticism were productively combined from the 1920s on by several American writer-critics, including Edmund Wilson and Kenneth Burke. Viewing humans as symbol-using and symbol-misusing animals, Burke approached literary works as often deceptive or self-deceptive symbolic actions that should be critically reenacted, rather than passively contemplated, by their readers.

In a comparably skeptical spirit, current feminist critics in many countries draw attention to literary evidence of ingrained prejudice against women or stereotypic views of women. Their methods often emulate Marxist critiques of oppressive ideologies or Freudian excavations of repressed desires. Contemporary feminist writings are also influenced by the gender-conscious essays of English novelist Virginia Woolf and by The Second Sex (1949), a book-length plea by French thinker and novelist Simone de Beauvoir against the second-class treatment of women. Feminist criticism explores issues relevant to women as authors, as readers, and as fictional characters, and also raises the controversial question of the possible existence of distinctly female writing—recognizably different in the character of its language from discourse shaped by male patterns of thought.

Like feminist, Marxist, and some Freudian critics, nonwhite Western critics and critics emerging in countries newly freed from colonial rule also have challenged many aspects of European and North American culture as socially and psychologically oppressive. Although these so-called multiculturalist critics are united in their opposition to Western domination, they take many different positions on particular issues of race, class, gender, language, and national or ethnic identity.

The frontal attack, initiated by Nietzsche, on any use of language as an instrument of mystification and domination has its most unwavering advocates today in scholars who practice the interpretive technique known as deconstruction. Following French philosopher Jacques Derrida and Belgian-born American critic Paul de Man, deconstructive critics assume that attributing even the most complex single meaning to a text violates the boundless signifying potential of language in a world whe no facts but only indeterminate meanings and unresolvable conflicts of interpretation. Proponents of deconstruction elaborate on textual ambiguities and paradoxes that earlier interpreters (including the New Critics) attempted to resolve. For deconstructions and other so-called postmodern critics, special difficulties in the interpretation of complex literary works forcefully suggest the general resistance of all texts to definitive meanings.

Recent non-traditional criticism does not represent a complete break with a critical tradition that has always proven hospitable to challenges to its principles. In fact, so-called Western criticism has already begun absorbing the insights of its best contemporary challengers. Undergoing transformation once again, it prepares to encounter what German writer and critic Johann Wolfgang von Goethe hoped would eventually emerge as Weltliteratur: the diverse but intertwined literatures of the world.

Poetics

Aristotle's Poetics

Plato (427–347 B.C.E.) is notorious for attacking art in Book 10 of his Republic . According to Plato's Theory of Forms, objects in this world are imitations or approximations of ideal Forms that are the true reality. A chair in this world is just an imitation or instantiation of the Form of Chair. That being the case, art is twice removed from reality, as it is just an imitation of an imitation: a painting of a chair is an imitation of a chair which is in turn an imitation of the Form of Chair. Further, Plato argues that art serves to excite the emotions, which can detract from the balanced reasoning that is essential to virtue.

Aristotle's Poetics can be read as a response to Plato's attack on art. Aristotle (384–322 B.C.E.) was a student at Plato's Academy from the time he was seventeen until Plato's death some twenty years later. He spent the next twelve years engaging in scientific research and serving as tutor to the then teenaged Alexander the Great. He returned to Athens in 335 B.C.E., and founded his own school on the steps of the Lyceum. He remained there until 323 B.C.E., when he was forced to leave as a result of his associations with Alexander. He died a year later of natural causes. The Lyceum remained open until 525 C.E., when it was closed by the emperor Justinian.

None of the works of Aristotle that we have today were actually published by Aristotle. He wrote a number of treatises and dialogues, but these have all been lost. What survives are collections of notes, possibly from lecture courses Aristotle gave at the Lyceum, which are often unclear or incomplete. The Poetics, in true form, was likely a much longer work than the one we have today. Aristotle supposedly wrote a second book on comedy, which is now lost.

The main focus of the Poetics is on Greek tragedy. Though there were thousands of tragedies and scores of playwrights, we only have thirty-three extant tragedies, written by the three great tragedians: Aeschylus (525–456 B.C.E.), Sophocles(496–405 B.C.E.), and Euripides (485–406 B.C.E.). Tragedies were performed in Athens twice annually at festivals in honour of Dionysus, the god of wine and excess. Though the tragedies likely evolved out of religious ceremonies celebrating the cycle of the seasons, they became increasingly secular. The dramatic festivals were immensely important events, and the winning playwrights achieved great fame.

The Poetics also discusses epic poetry, using the example of Homer (eighth century B.C.E.) almost exclusively. Homer wrote two great epics, the Iliad and the Odyssey , which deal with the fall of Troy and Odysseus's subsequent wanderings respectively. These epics are the source of a great number of Greek tragedies and are considered among the earliest great works of world literature.

Though the Poetics is not one of Aristotle's major works, it has exercised a great deal of influence on subsequent literary theory, particularly in the Renaissance. Later interpreters unfortunately turned many of Aristotle's suggestions into strict laws, restricting the flexibility of drama in ways that Aristotle would not have anticipated. The tragedies of Racine and Corneille in particular are formed according to these demands. Even though such great playwrights as Shakespeare often went against these laws, they were held as the model for writing tragedy well into the nineteenth century.

Important Terms used in Poetics

Mimesis: - Mimesis is the act of creating in someone's mind, through artistic representation, an idea or ideas that the person will associate with past experience. Roughly translatable as "imitation," mimesis in poetry is the act of telling stories that are set in the real world. The events in the story need not have taken place, but the telling of the story will help the listener or viewer to imagine the events taking place in the real world.

Hamartia: - This word translates almost directly as "error," though it is often rendered more elaborately as "tragic flaw." Tragedy, according to Aristotle, involves the downfall of a hero, and this downfall is effected by some error on the part of the hero. This error need not be an overarching moral failing: it could be a simple matter of not knowing something or forgetting something.

Anagnorisis: - This word translates as "recognition" or "discovery." In tragedy, it describes the moment where the hero, or some other character, passes from ignorance to knowledge. This could be a recognition of a long lost friend or family member, or it could be a sudden recognition of some fact about oneself, as is the case with Oedipus. Anagnorisis often occurs at the climax of a tragedy in tandem with peripetia.

Mythos: - When dealing with tragedy, this word is usually translated as "plot," but unlike "plot," mythos can be applied to all works of art. Not so much a matter of what happens and in what order, mythos deals with how the elements of a tragedy (or a painting, sculpture, etc.) come together to form a coherent and unified whole. The overall message or impression that we come away with is what is conveyed to us by the mythos of a piece.

Catharsis: - This word was normally used in ancient Greece by doctors to mean "purgation" or by priests to mean "purification." In the context of tragedy, Aristotle uses it to talk about a purgation or purification of emotions. Presumably, this means that catharsis is a release of built up emotional energy, much like a good cry. After catharsis, we reach a more stable and neutral emotional state.

Peripetia: - A reversal, either from good to bad or bad to good. Peripetia often occurs at the climax of a story, often prompted by anagnorisis. Indeed, we might say that the peripetia is the climax of a story: it is the turning point in the action, where things begin to move toward a conclusion.

Lusis: - Literally "untying," the lusis is all the action in a tragedy from the climax onward. All the plot threads that have been woven together in the desis are slowly unraveled until we reach the conclusion of the play.

Desis: - Literally "tying," the desis is all the action in a tragedy leading up to the climax. Plot threads are craftily woven together to form a more and more complex mess. At the peripetia, or turning point, these plot threads begin to unravel in what is called the lusis, or denouement.

Analytical Overview

Aristotle approaches poetry with the same scientific method with which he treats physics and biology. He begins by collecting and categorizing all the data available to him and then he draws certain conclusions and advances certain theses in accordance with his analysis. In the case of tragedy, this means he divides it into six parts, identifies plot as the most important part, and examines the different elements of plot and character that seem to characterize successful tragedies. He tentatively suggests that tragedy ultimately aims at the arousal of pity and fear and at the catharsis of these emotions. Then he begins to lay out certain theories as to what makes a good tragedy: it must focus on a certain type of hero who must follow a certain trajectory within a plot that is tightly unified, etc. Aristotle's conclusions, then, are based less on personal taste and more on an observation of what tends to produce the most powerful effects.

Aristotle's method raises the fundamental question of whether poetry can be studied in the same way as the natural sciences. Though there are some benefits to Aristotle's method, the ultimate answer seems to be "no." The scientific method relies on the assumption that there are certain regularities or laws that govern the behavior of the phenomena being investigated. This method has been particularly successful in the physical sciences: Isaac Newton, for example, managed to reduce all mechanical behavior to three simple laws. However, art does not seem to be governed by unchanging, unquestionable laws in the same way that nature is. Art often thrives and progresses by questioning the assumptions or laws that a previous generation has accepted. While Aristotle insisted on the primacy and unity of plot, Samuel Beckett has achieved fame as one of this century's greatest playwrights by constructing plays that arguably have no plot at all. Closer to Aristotle's time, Euripides often violated the Aristotelian principles of structure and balance in a conscious effort to depict a universe that is neither structured nor balanced. Not surprisingly, Aristotle seems to have preferred Sophocles to Euripides.

These remarks on Sophocles and Euripides bring us to another problem of interpreting Aristotle: we have a very limited stock of Greek tragedies against which to test Aristotle's theories. Aristotle could have been familiar with hundreds, or even thousands, of tragedies. All we have today are thirty-three plays by three tragedians. As a result, it is difficult to say to what extent most tragedies fit Aristotle's observations. Those that we have, however, often grossly violate Aristotle's requirement. The best example we have of an Aristotelian tragedy is Oedipus Rex, so it is no wonder that Aristotle makes such frequent reference to it in his examples.

Three points stand out as probably the most important in the Poetics: (1) the interpretation of poetry as mimesis, (2) the insistence on the primacy and unity of mythos, or plot, and (3) the view that tragedy serves to arouse the emotions of pity and fear and then to effect a catharsis of these emotions. (1) is discussed in the commentary on Chapters 1–3, (2)is discussed in the commentary on Chapter 6 and Chapters 7–9, and (3) is discussed in the commentary on Chapter 6 as well.

Summary of Poetics

Chapters 1–3

Aristotle proposes to approach poetry from a scientific viewpoint, examining the constituent parts of poetry and drawing conclusions from those observations. First, he lists the different kinds of poetry: epic poetry, tragedy, comedy, dithyrambic poetry, and most flute-playing and lyre-playing. Next, he remarks that all of these kinds of poetry are mimetic, or imitative, but that there are significant differences between them.

The first kind of distinction is the means they employ. Just as a painter employs paint and a sculptor employs stone, the poet employs language, rhythm, and harmony, either singly or in combinations. For instance, flute-playing and lyre-playing employ rhythm and harmony, while dance employs only rhythm. He also addresses the question of non-poetic language, arguing that poetry is essentially mimetic, whether it is in verse or in prose. Thus, Homer is a poet, while Empedocles, a philosopher who wrote in verse, is not. While Empedocles writes in verse, his writing is not mimetic, and so it is not poetry. In tragedy, comedy, and other kinds of poetry, rhythm, language, and harmony are all used. In some cases, as in lyric poetry, all three are used together, while in other cases, as in comedy or tragedy, the different parts come in to play at different times.

The second distinction is the objects that are imitated. All poetry represents actions with agents who are either better than us, worse than us, or quite like us. For instance, tragedy and epic poetry deal with characters who are better than us, while comedy and parody deal with characters who are worse than us.

The final distinction is with the manner of representation: the poet either speaks directly in narrative or assumes the characters of people in the narrative and speaks through them. For instance, many poets tell straight narratives while Homer alternates between narrative and accounts of speeches given by characters in his narrative. In tragedy and comedy, the poet speaks exclusively through assumed characters.

Chapters 4–5

Aristotle suggests that it is human nature to write and appreciate poetry. We are by nature imitative creatures that learn and excel by imitating others, and we naturally take delight in works of imitation. As evidence of the claim that we delight in imitation, he points out that we are fascinated by representations of dead bodies or disgusting animals even though the things themselves would repel us. Aristotle suggests that we can also learn by examining representations and imitations of things and that learning is one of the greatest pleasures there is. Rhythm and harmony also come naturally to us, so that poetry gradually evolved out of our improvisations with these media.

As poetry evolved, a sharp division developed between serious writers who would write about noble characters in lofty hymns and panegyrics, and meaner writers who would write about ignoble characters in demeaning invectives. Tragedy and comedy are later developments that are the grandest representation of their respective traditions: tragedy of the lofty tradition and comedy of the mean tradition.

Aristotle stops short of saying that tragedy has achieved its complete and finished form. He lists four innovations in the development from improvised dithyrambs toward the tragedies of his day. Dithyrambs were sung in honour of Dionysus, god of wine, by a chorus of around fifty men and boys, often accompanied by a narrator. Aeschylus is responsible for the first innovation, reducing the number of the chorus and introducing a second actor on stage, which made dialogue the central focus of the poem. Second, Sophocles added a third actor and also introduced background scenery. Third, tragedy developed an air of seriousness, and the meter changed from a trochaic rhythm, which is more suitable for dancing, to an iambic rhythm, which is closer to the natural rhythms of conversational speech. Fourth, tragedy developed a plurality of episodes, or acts.

Next, Aristotle elaborates on what he means when he says that comedy deals with people worse than us ourselves, saying that comedy deals with the ridiculous. He defines the ridiculous as a kind of ugliness that does no harm to anybody else. Aristotle is able only to give a very sketchy account of the origins of comedy, because it was not generally treated with the same respect as tragedy and so there are fewer records of the innovations that led to its present form.

While both tragedy and epic poetry deal with lofty subjects in a grand style of verse, Aristotle notes three significant differences between the two genres. First, tragedy is told in a dramatic, rather than narrative, form, and employs several different kinds of verse while epic poetry employs only one. Second, the action of a tragedy is usually confined to a single day, and so the tragedy itself is usually much shorter than an epic poem. Third, while tragedy has all the elements that are characteristic of epic poetry, it also has some additional elements that are unique to it alone.

Chapter 6

Aristotle now narrows his focus to examine tragedy exclusively. In order to do so, he provides a definition of tragedy that we can break up into seven parts: (1) it involves mimesis; (2) it is serious; (3) the action is complete and with magnitude; (4) it is made up of language with the "pleasurable accessories" of rhythm and harmony; (5) these "pleasurable accessories" are not used uniformly throughout, but are introduced in separate parts of the work, so that, for instance, some bits are spoken in verse and other bits are sung; (6) it is performed rather than narrated; and (7) it arouses the emotions of pity and fear and accomplishes a catharsis (purification or purgation) of these emotions.

Next, Aristotle asserts that any tragedy can be divided into six component parts, and that every tragedy is made up of these six parts with nothing else besides. There is (a) the spectacle, which is the overall visual appearance of the stage and the actors. The means of imitation (language, rhythm, and harmony) can be divided into (b) melody, and (c) diction, which has to do with the composition of the verses. The agents of the action can be understood in terms of (d) character and (e) thought. Thought seems to denote the intellectual qualities of an agent while character seems to denote the moral qualities of an agent. Finally, there is (f) the plot, or mythos, which is the combination of incidents and actions in the story.

Aristotle argues that, among these six, the plot is the most important. The characters serve to advance the action of the story, not vice versa. The ends we pursue in life, our happiness and our misery, all take the form of action. That is, according to Aristotle, happiness consists in a certain kind of activity rather than in a certain quality of character. Diction and thought are also less significant than plot: a series of well-written speeches have nothing like the force of a well-structured tragedy. Further, Aristotle suggests, the most powerful elements in a tragedy, the peripetia and the anagnorisis, are elements of the plot. Lastly, Aristotle notes that forming a solid plot is far more difficult than creating good characters or diction.

Having asserted that the plot is the most important of the six parts of tragedy, he ranks the remainder as follows, from most important to least: character, thought, diction, melody, and spectacle. Character reveals the individual motivations of the characters in the play, what they want or don't want, and how they react to certain situations, and this is more important to Aristotle than thought, which deals on a more universal level with reasoning and general truths. Melody and spectacle are simply pleasurable accessories, but melody is more important to the tragedy than spectacle: a pretty spectacle can be arranged without a play, and usually matters of set and costume aren't the occupation of the poet anyway.

Chapters 7–9

Aristotle elaborates on what he means when he says that the action of a tragedy is complete in itself and with magnitude. For a plot to be a complete whole, it must have a beginning, middle, and end. The beginning is a point that does not necessarily follow from anything else, which naturally has consequences following from it. The end is a point that naturally follows from preceding events but does not have any necessary consequences following it. The middle is a point that is naturally connected both to events before and after it.

The magnitude of a story is important, as it is in any art. Paintings are neither infinitesimally small nor monstrously big because they must be of such a size as to be taken in by the eye. Similarly, a tragedy must be of a moderate length so as to be taken in by the memory. Usually, time limits are set by the audience or other outside factors, but Aristotle suggests that the longer the play the greater the magnitude, provided the poet can hold the tragedy together as one coherent statement. As a general rule of thumb, he suggests the action should be long enough to allow the main character to pass through a number of necessary or probable steps that take him from fortune to misfortune or vice versa.

In insisting upon the unity of plot, Aristotle makes it clear that he does not mean that it is enough to focus the plot on the life of one individual. Our lives consist of all sorts of disconnected episodes, and the story of a man's life would rarely have the completeness necessary for a unified plot. Rather, the poet must select some series of events from a character's life—as Homer does in the Odyssey —and craft them into a coherent whole. Any part of a story that could be added or removed without any great effect on the rest of the story is superfluous and takes away from the unity of the piece.

Aristotle distinguishes between poetry and history, saying that while history deals with what has been, poetry deals with what might be: it presents the possible as probable or necessary. Poetry is superior to history because history always deals with particular cases while poetry can express universal and general truths. Tragedy gives a feeling of necessity—or at least probability—to the way certain characters behave in certain situations and thus gives us insight into general principles regarding fate, choice, and so on. The worst kind of plot is the episodic plot, where there is no seeming necessity or probability whatsoever between events.

As a medium that arouses pity and fear, tragedy is most effective when events occur unexpectedly and yet in a logical order. The ideal is to have the audience see the final outcome of a tragedy as the necessary consequence of all the action that preceded it, and yet have that outcome be totally unexpected.

Chapters 10–12

Aristotle introduces the concepts of peripetia (reversal of fortune) and anagnorisis (discovery or recognition) in his discussion of simple and complex plots. All plots lead from beginning to end in a probable or necessary sequence of events, but a simple plot does so without peripetia or anagnorisis while a complex plot may have one or both of these elements. The peripetia or anagnorisis of a complex plot should themselves be necessary or probable consequences of what came before so that they are a part of the plot and not unnecessary add-ons.

Peripetia is the reversal from one state of affairs to its opposite. Some element in the plot effects a reversal, so that the hero who thought he was in good shape suddenly finds that all is lost, or vice versa.

Anagnorisis is a change from ignorance to knowledge. This discovery will bring love and happiness to characters that learn of good fortune, and hatred and misery to those who discover unhappy truths. The best kind of anagnorisis accompanies peripetia. That is, a reversal of fortune effects a discovery or vice versa. For instance, Oedipus' discovery of who his mother is effects a reversal of fortune from proud king to horrible disgrace. Aristotle suggests that anagnorisis is possible by a number of other means as well, but it is most intimately connected to the plot when it accompanies peripetia. The two together will help to arouse pity and fear and will also help to draw the play to its conclusion.

In addition to peripetia and anagnorisis, Aristotle defines a third part of the plot—suffering—as actions of destructive or painful nature, such as murders, torture, and woundings.

In Chapter 12, Aristotle discusses the quantitative elements of tragedy—the different parts of the performance. These are the Prologue, Episode, Exode, and a choral portion consisting of Parode and Stasimon. In addition, some tragedies have songs from the stage and a Commos, a lamentation sung by both actor and chorus. The Parode is the first full statement of the chorus; everything that precedes it is Prologue. The Stasimon is a choral song in a certain meter, while action that takes place between choral songs is Episode. Everything that follows the last choral song is Exode.

Chapters 13–14

Aristotle suggests that the best kinds of plot are complex plots that arouse fear and pity. He thus concludes that three kinds of plot should be avoided. First, we should avoid plots that show a good man going from happiness to misery, since such events seem more odious than fearful or pitiable. Second, we should avoid plots that show a bad man going from misery to happiness, since this arouses neither pity nor fear and appeals to none of our emotions. Third, we should avoid plots that show a bad man going from happiness to misery, since it will also not arouse the feelings of pity or fear. We feel pity for undeserved misfortune (and a bad man deserves his misfortune), and we feel fear if the person we pity is something like ourselves.

Aristotle concludes that the best kind of plot involves the misfortune of someone who is neither particularly good nor particularly bad and whose downfall does not result from some unpleasantness or vice, but rather from hamartia—an error in judgment. A good plot, then, consists of the following four elements: (1) It must focus around one single issue; (2) the hero must go from fortune to misfortune, rather than vice versa; (3) the misfortune must result from hamartia; and (4) the hero should be at least of intermediate worth, and if not, he must be better—never worse—than the average person. This explains why tragedies tend to focus around a few families (there are many tragedies about the families of Oedipus and Orestes among others): they must be upstanding families that suffer great misfortune from an error in judgment rather than a vice. Only second-rate plots that pander too much to public taste focus on a double issue where the good fare well and the bad fare poorly.

Pity and fear—which Aristotle calls the "pleasures" of tragedy—are better if they result from the plot itself rather than the spectacle. A story like that of Oedipus should be able to arouse pity and fear even if it is told without any acting at all. The poet who relies on spectacle is relying on outside help, whereas the poet who relies only on his own plot is fully responsible for his creation.

We feel pity most when friends or family harm one another, rather than when unpleasantness takes place between enemies or those who are indifferent to one another. The deed may be done knowingly—as when Medea kills her children—or unknowingly—as when Oedipus kills his father. A third alternative is that one character plans to kill another, but then discovers the family connection between them in time to refrain from the killing.

Thus, the deed can either be done or not done, and it can take place in either ignorance or knowledge. Aristotle suggests that the best kind of plot is of the third alternative, where anagnorisis allows a harmful deed to be avoided. The second best case is where the deed is done in ignorance. And the third best is the case where the deed is done with full knowledge. Worst is the case where there is full knowledge throughout, and the premeditated deed is only refrained from at the moment of action. This scenario is not tragic because of the absence of suffering, and it is odious besides. Still, Aristotle acknowledges that it has been used to good effect, as with the case of Haemon and Creon in Antigone .

Chapter 15

Aristotle turns his attention toward the character of the tragic hero and lays out four requirements. First, the hero must be good. The character of the hero denotes the hero's moral purpose in the play, and a good character will have a good moral purpose. Second, the good qualities of the hero must be appropriate to the character. For instance, warlike qualities can be good, but they would be inappropriate in a woman. Third, the hero must be realistic. In other words, if he is drawn from myth, he should be a reasonable semblance of the character portrayed in myths. Fourth, the hero must be consistent (by which Aristotle means the hero must be written consistently, not that the hero must behave consistently). He accepts that some characters are inconsistent but that they should be written so as to be consistent in their inconsistency. Like the plot itself, the behavior of the characters should be seen as necessary or probable, in accordance with the internal logic of their personality. Thus, a character may behave inconsistently so long as we can perceive this inconsistency as stemming from a personality that is internally consistent.

From these requirements, Aristotle thinks it clear that the lusis, or denouement, should arise out of the plot and not depend upon stage artifice. Both the characters and the plot ought to follow a probable or necessary sequence, so that the lusis should be a part of this sequence. Improbable events, or the intervention of the gods, should be reserved for events outside the action of the play or events beyond human knowledge. The actual incidents themselves should not rely on miracles but on probability and necessity.

In order to reconcile the first requirement—that the hero be good—with the third requirement—that the hero be realistic—Aristotle recommends that the poet should keep all the distinctive characteristics of the person being portrayed but touch them up a little to make the hero appear better than he is. For instance, in the Iliad , Homer repeatedly describes Achilles' hot temper and yet makes him seem exceedingly good and heroic nonetheless.

Chapters 16–18

Aristotle distinguishes between six different kinds of anagnorisis. First, there is recognition by means of signs or marks, such as when Odysseus's nurse rec by virtue of a characteristic scar. Aristotle considers this the least artistic kind of anagnorisis, usually reflecting a lack of imagination on the part of the poet. Second, also distasteful to Aristotle, is a recognition contrived by the author. In such a case, the poet is unable to fit the anagnorisis into the logical sequence of the plot, and so it seems extraneous. Third is recognition prompted by memory. A disguised character may be prompted to weep or otherwise betray himself when presented with some memory from the past. Fourth, the second best kind of anagnorisis, is recognition through deductive reasoning, where the anagnorisis is the only reasonable conclusion of an agent's thought. Fifth, there is recognition through faulty reasoning on the part of a disguised character. The disguised character might unmask himself by exhibiting knowledge that only he could know. Sixth, the best kind of anagnorisis, is the kind of recognition that is naturally a part of the logical sequence of events in the play, such as we find in Oedipus Rex .

Aristotle makes seven final remarks about how a poet should go about constructing a plot: (1) The poet should be sure to visualize the action of his drama as vividly as possible. This will help him spot and avoid inconsistencies.

(2) The poet should even try acting out the events as he writes them. If he can himself experience the emotions he is writing about, he will be able to express them more vividly.

(3) The poet should first outline the overall plot of the play and only afterward flesh it out with episodes. These episodes are generally quite brief in tragedy but can be very long in epic poetry. As an example, Aristotle reduces the entire plot of the Odyssey to three sentences, suggesting that everything else in the poem is episode.

(4) Every play consists of desis, or complication, and lusis, or denouement. Desis is everything leading up to the moment of peripetia, and lusis is everything from the peripetia onward.

(5) There are four distinct kinds of tragedy, and the poet should aim at bringing out all the important parts of the kind he chooses. First, there is the complex tragedy, made up of peripetia and anagnorisis; second, the tragedy of suffering; third, the tragedy of character; and fourth, the tragedy of spectacle.

(6) The poet should write about focused incidents, and not about a whole epic story. For instance, a tragedy could not possibly tell the entire story of the Iliad in any kind of satisfying detail, but it can pick out and elaborate upon individual episodes within the Iliad.

(7) The chorus should be treated like an actor, and the choral songs should be an integral part of the story. Too often, Aristotle laments, the choral songs have little to do with the action at all.

Chapters 19–22

Having discussed plot and character, Aristotle turns his attention toward thought and then diction (he never specifically addresses melody or spectacle). Aristotle defines thought as everything that is effected by means of language. Thus, when agents try to prove or disprove a point, to arouse emotion, or to inflate or deflate a matter, they are exhibiting thought. Thought is closely linked to rhetoric, and Aristotle points to the more thorough discussion to be found in his writings on that latter subject.

Aristotle divides the subject of diction into eight parts: letter, syllable, conjunction, article, noun, verb, case, and speech. Though many of these terms are identical to our modern uses of them, we should note that Aristotle is concerned less with written language and more with spoken language. As a result, Aristotle treats the letter—the fundamental building block of language—as a unit of sound rather than as a single written character. The concept of case, unfamiliar to English speakers, deals with the different uses of a word. For instance, "with the dog" and "for the dogs" are different cases of "dog," and "walked?" and "walk!" are different cases of "walk." Speech is more like what we would call a clause than a sentence. It does not have to contain a verb, but it must be made up of significant parts.

Chapter 21 is concerned with the structure and uses of the noun, though it is concerned primarily with the uses of metaphor. Aristotle distinguishes four ways metaphor can be used. (1) The genus to species relationship, where a more general term is used instead of a specific term. Aristotle uses the example of "Here stands my ship," where "stand" is a more general way of saying "is anchored." (2) The species to genus relationship, where a more specific term is used in place of a general term. Aristotle's example is "Truly ten thousand good deeds has Ulysses wrought," where "ten thousand" is a specific term representing the more general "a large number." (3) The species to species relationship, where one specific term replaces another. (4) Metaphor from analogy, which consists of substitutions between "x is to y"-type relationships. For instance, old age is to life as evening is to day, so we can speak metaphorically about the "old age of the day" or the "evening of life."

Aristotle concludes his discussion of diction with a few remarks on style. A poet should aim for a middle ground, expressing himself with clarity but without meanness. Aristotle suggests that the use of ordinary words and ordinary language is mean and prosaic. Poetry can be spiced up by the use of foreign or strange terms, metaphor, or compounded words. However, an overenthusiastic use of such devices will render poetry unintelligible. Too many foreign words will make the poetry barbaric and too much metaphor will turn it into a big riddle. The key is to apply these devices in moderation. Of these different devices, Aristotle most values the metaphor, as it cannot be taught but only grasped intuitively. There is a certain level of genius in being able to identify similarities between dissimilar things.

Aristotle turns his attention to epic poetry. While the mimesis of tragedy is in actions told in a dramatic form, the mimesis of epic poetry is in verse told in a narrative form. Aristotle notes that there are a number of similarities between tragedy and epic poetry.

First, epic poetry must maintain the unity of plot. In this it is allied with tragedy against history. History tells us all that happened during a certain time period or to certain people, and as such it is often somewhat disconnected. Epic poetry should focus on one particular story that remains an organic whole. Homer is an excellent example of such an epic poet, as he tells a particular, connected story in the Iliad rather than trying to narrate everything that happened during the Trojan War.

Second, epic poetry must share many of the elements of tragedy. Like tragedy, it should be either simple or complex, and it should deal primarily either with a character or with suffering. Aside from spectacle and melody, the six parts of tragedy are all present in epic poetry, and epic poetry can also feature peripetia and anagnorisis.

There are also two notable dissimilarities between epic poetry and tragedy. The first is the length: an epic poem can reasonably last as long as a whole series of tragedies, provided it can be presented in one hearing. The plot of an epic poem can be far more expansive because it is not limited by the stage. Epic poetry can jump back and forth between events happening at the same time in different places in a way that would be impossible on stage. Second, epic poetry should be narrated in heroic meter, while tragedy is normally spoken in iambic meter.

Aristotle is clearly an admirer of Homer's, as almost all his examples of good epic poetry are drawn from Homer. He praises Homer for reducing his own voice in the narrative and letting the actions and the characters tell the story themselves. He uses Homer to show how epic poetry can recount exaggerated events in a believable manner. A tragedy could never get away with such marvels, since they are less credible when we see them performed. Having said this, he remarks that no plot should ever hinge on improbable events but praises Homer for managing through his art to make this flaw in the Odyssey seem insignificant. He also praises Homer as a master of using paralogisms (conclusions resulting from faulty or illogical arguments) to make lies seem believable.

Aristotle cautions against an overenthusiastic use of elaborate diction. While it is pleasing when there is no action to recount, and no character or thought to reveal, ornate diction can often obscure these more important elements when they are found together.

Chapters 25–26

Aristotle addresses a number of the criticisms that can be levelled against poetry. First among these is the accusation that the events depicted are impossible. This criticism can fall under two categories. Less grave describes the event if the impossibility arises from a lack of technical knowledge on the part of the poet. For instance, he may describe a horse galloping with both front legs thrown forward, not realizing that horses do not move like this. More grave describes the situation if the impossibility arises from the poet's inability to give an accurate description of something he knows quite well.

Aristotle answers that, often, impossible events—such as Homer's description of Achilles' pursuit of Hector in the Iliad —serve to heighten the astonishment and excitement of the story. When the poet can achieve similar effects while sta possibility, however, this route should be preferred. Aristotle lays out the general principle that a poet should always aim for a convincing impossibility in favour of an unconvincing possibility.

Further, not all poetry is meant to describe things as they are. Some poets describe things as they ought to be, and others write to accord themselves with popular opinion rather than realism. For instance, Sophocles claimed that while Euripides portrayed people as they are, he portrayed them as they ought to be. Other poets stay true to popular myths rather than realism when depicting the gods.

As for events that are not impossible but merely improbable, the poet must show either that they accord with opinion or that the events are not as improbable as they may seem.

Aristotle also discusses contradictions the poet might make in language, but this discussion is very difficult to follow without knowledge of ancient Greek. Basically, Aristotle suggests that what may at first seem to be a contradiction in language may result from a metaphorical usage or some other poetic device.

While many errors are excusable or explainable, Aristotle asserts that the only excuse for an improbable plot or unattractive characterization is if they are necessary or are put to good use. Otherwise, they should be avoided at all costs.

In Chapter 26, Aristotle addresses the question of which is the higher form, tragedy or epic poetry. The argument in favour of epic poetry is based on the principle that the higher art form is less vulgar and addressed toward a refined audience. Tragedy is performed before large audiences, which results in melodramatic performances or overacting to please the crowds. Epic poetry is more cultivated than tragedy because it does not rely on gesture at all to convey its message.

Aristotle answers this argument by noting that the melodrama and overacting are faults of the performance and not of the tragic poet himself. The recital of epic poetry could similarly be overdone without reflecting poorly on the poet. Further, not all movement is bad—take dance, for instance—but only poorly executed movement. Also, tragedy does not need to be performed; it can be read, just like epic poetry, and all its merits will still be evident.

Further, he advances several reasons for considering tragedy superior. First, it has all the elements of an epic poem and has also music and spectacle, which the epic lacks. Second, simply reading the play without performing it is already very potent. Third, tragedy is shorter, suggesting that it is more compact and will have a more concentrated effect. Fourth, there is more unity in tragedy, as evidenced by the fact that a number of tragedies can be extracted from one epic poem.

Aristotle's Theory of Imitation

Aristotle did not invent the term "imitation". Plato was the first to use the word in relation with poetry, but Aristotle breathed into it a new definite meaning imitation is no longer considered mimicry, but is regarded as an act of imaginative creation by which the poet, drawing his material from the phenomenal world, makes something new out of it.

In Aristotle's view, principle of imitation unites poetry with other fine arts and is the common basis of all the fine arts. It thus differentiates the fine arts from the other category of arts. While Plato equated poetry with painting, Aristotle equates it with music. It is no longer a servile depiction of the appearance of things, but it becomes a representation of the passions and emotions of men which are also imitated by music. Thus Aristotle by his theory enlarged the scope of imitation. The poet imitates not the surface of things but the reality embedded within. In the very first chapter of the Poetic, Aristotle says:

"Epic poetry and Tragedy, Comedy also and Dithyrambic poetry, as also the music of the flute and the lyre in most of their forms, are in their general conception modes of imitation. They differ however, from one another in three respects – their medium, the objects and the manner or mode of imitation, being in each case distinct."

The medium of the poet and the painter are different. One imitates through form and colour, and the other through language, rhythm and harmony. The musician imitates through rhythm and harmony. Thus, poetry is more akin to music. Further, the manner of a poet may be purely narrative, as in the Epic, or depiction through action, as in drama. Even dramatic poetry is differentiated into tragedy and comedy accordingly as it imitates man as better or worse.

Aristotle says that the objects of poetic imitation are "men in action". The poet represents men as worse than they are. He can represent men better than in real life based on material supplied by history and legend rather than by any living figure. The poet selects and orders his material and recreates reality. He brings order out of Chaos. The irrational or accidental is removed and attention is focused on the lasting and the significant. Thus he gives a truth of an ideal kind. His mind is not tied to reality:

"It is not the function of the poet to relate what has happened but what may happen – according to the laws of probability or necessity."

History tells us what actually happened; poetry what may happen. Poetry tends to express the universal, history the particular. In this way, he exhibits the superiority of poetry over history. The poet freed from the tyranny of facts, takes a larger or general view of things, represents the universal in the particular and so shares the philosopher's quest for ultimate truth. He thus equates poetry with philosophy and shows that both are means to a higher truth. By the word 'universal' Aristotle signifies:

"How a person of a certain nature or type will, on a particular occasion, speak or act, according to the law of probability or necessity."

The poet constantly rises from the particular to the general. He studies the particular and devises principles of general application. He exceeds the limits of life without violating the essential laws of human nature.

Elsewhere Aristotle says, "Art imitates Nature". By 'Nature' he does not mean the outer world of created things but "the creative force, the productive principle of the universe." Art reproduce mainly an inward process, a physical energy working outwards, deeds, incidents, situation, being included under it so far as these spring from an inward, act of will, or draw some activity of thought or feeling. He renders men, "as they ought to be".

The poet imitates the creative process of nature, but the objects are "men in action". Now the 'action' may be 'external' or 'internal'. It may be the action within the soul caused by all that befalls a man. Thus, he brings human experiences, emotions and passions within the scope of poetic imitation. According to Aristotle's theory, moral qualities, characteristics, the permanent temper of the mind, the temporary emotions and feelings, are all action and so objects of poetic imitation.

Poetry may imitate men as better or worse than they are in real life or imitate as they really are. Tragedy and epic represent men on a heroic scale, better than they are, and comedy represents men of a lower type, worse than they are. Aristotle does not discuss the third possibility. It means that poetry does not aim at photographic realism. In this connection R. A. Scott-James points out that:

"Aristotle knew nothing of the "realistic" or "fleshy" school of fiction – the school of Zola or of Gissing."

Abercrombie, in contrast, defends Aristotle for not discussing the third variant. He says:

"It is just possible to imagine life exactly as it is, but the exciting thing is to imagine life as it might be, and it is then that imagination becomes an impulse capable of inspiring poetry."

Aristotle by his theory of imitation answers the charge of Plato that poetry is an imitation of "shadow of shadows", thrice removed from truth, and that the poet beguiles us with lies. Plato condemned poetry that in the very nature of things poets have no idea of truth. The phenomenal world is not the reality but a copy of the reality in the mind of the Supreme. The poet imitates the objects and phenomena of the world, which are shadowy and unreal. Poetry is, therefore, "the mother of lies".

Aristotle, on the contrary, tells us that art imitates not the mere shows of things, but the 'ideal reality' embodied in very object of the world. The process of nature is a 'creative process'; everywhere in 'nature there is a ceaseless and upward progress' in everything, and the poet imitates this upward movement of nature. Art reproduces the original not as it is, but as it appears to the senses. Art moves in a world of images, and reproduces the external, according to the idea or image in his mind. Thus the poet does not copy the external world, but creates according to his 'idea' of it. Thus even an ugly object well-imitated becomes a source of pleasure. We are told in "The Poetics":

"Objects which in themselves we view with pain, we delight to contemplate when reproduced with minute fidelity; such as the forms of the most ignoble animals and dead bodies."

The real and the ideal from Aristotle's point of view are not opposites; the ideal is the real, shorn of chance and accident, a purified form of reality. And it is this higher 'reality' which is the object of poetic imitation. Idealization is achieved by divesting the real of all that is accidental, transient and particular. Poetry thus imitates the ideal and the universal; it is an "idealized representation of character, emotion, action – under forms manifest in sense." Poetic truth, therefore, is higher than historical truth. Poetry is more philosophical, more conducive to understanding than Philosophy itself.

Thus Aristotle successfully and finally refuted the charge of Plato and provided a defence of poetry which has ever since been used by lovers of poetry in justification of their Muse. He breathed new life and soul into the concept of poetic imitation and showed that it is, in reality, a creative process.

Aristotle's Theory of Tragedy

Definition of Tragedy: "Tragedy, then, is an imitation of an action that is serious, complete, and of a certain magnitude; in language embellished with each kind of artistic ornament, the several kinds being found in separate parts of the play; in the form of action, not of narrative; with incidents arousing pity and fear, wherewith to accomplish its catharsis of such emotions. . . . Every Tragedy, therefore, must have six parts, which parts determine its quality—namely, Plot, Characters, Diction, Thought, Spectacle, and Melody."

The treatise we call the Poetics was composed at least 50 years after the death of Sophocles. Aristotle was a great admirer of Sophocles' Oedipus the King, considering it the perfect tragedy, and not surprisingly, his analysis fits that play most perfectly. I shall therefore use this play to illustrate the following major parts of Aristotle's analysis of tragedy as a literary genre.

Tragedy is the "imitation of an action" (mimesis) according to "the law of probability or necessity." Aristotle indicates that the medium of tragedy is drama, not narrative; tragedy "shows" rather than "tells." According to Aristotle, tragedy is higher and more philosophical than history because history simply relates what has happened while tragedy dramatizes what may happen, "what is possible according to the law of probability or necessity." History thus deals with the particular, and tragedy with the universal. Events that have happened may be due to accident or coincidence; they may be particular to a specific situation and not be part of a clear cause-and-effect chain. Therefore they have little relevance for others. Tragedy, however, is rooted in the fundamental order of the universe; it creates a cause-and-effect chain that clearly reveals what may happen at any time or place because that is the way the world operates. Tragedy therefore arouses not only pity but also fear, because the audience can envision themselves within this cause-and-effect chain.

Plot is the "first principle," the most important feature of tragedy. Aristotle defines plot as "the arrangement of the incidents": i.e., not the story itself but the way the incidents are presented to the audience, the structure of the play. According to Aristotle, tragedies where the outcome depends on a tightly constructed cause-and-effect chain of actions are superior to those that depend primarily on the character and personality of the protagonist. Plots that meet this criterion will have the following qualities (

The plot must be "a whole," with a beginning, middle, and end. The beginning, called by modern critics the incentive moment, must start the cause-and-effect chain but not be dependent on anything outside the compass of the play (i.e., its causes are downplayed but its effects are stressed). The middle, or climax, must be caused by earlier incidents and itself cause the incidents that follow it (i.e., its causes and effects are stressed). The end, or resolution, must be caused by the preceding events but not lead to other incidents outside the compass of the play (i.e., its causes are stressed but its effects downplayed); the end should therefore solve or resolve the problem created during the incentive moment. Aristotle calls the cause-and-effect chain leading from the incentive moment to the climax the "tying up" (desis), in modern terminology the complication. He therefore terms the more rapid cause-and-effect chain from the climax to the resolution the "unravelling" (lusis), in modern terminology the dénouement.

Firstly, the plot must be "complete," having "unity of action." By this Aristotle means that the plot must be structurally self-contained, with the incidents bound together by internal necessity, each action leading inevitably to the next with no outside intervention, no deus ex machina. According to Aristotle, the worst kinds of plots are "'episodic,' in which the episodes or acts succeed one another without probable or necessary sequence"; the only thing that ties together the events in such a plot is the fact that they happen to the same person. Playwrights should exclude coincidences from their plots; if some coincidence is required, it should "have an air of design," i.e., seem to have a fated connection to the events of the play. Similarly, the poet should exclude the irrational or at least keep it "outside the scope of the tragedy," i.e., reported rather than dramatized. While the poet cannot change the myths that are the basis of his plots, he "ought to show invention of his own and skilfully handle the traditional materials" to create unity of action in his plot.

Secondly, the plot must be "of a certain magnitude," both quantitatively (length, complexity) and qualitatively ("seriousness" and universal significance). Aristotle argues that plots should not be too brief; the more incidents and themes that the playwright can bring together in an organic unity, the greater the artistic value and richness of the play. Also, the more universal and significant the meaning of the play, the more the playwright can catch and hold the emotions of the audience, the better the play will be.

Thirdly, the plot may be either simple or complex, although complex is better. Simple plots have only a "change of fortune" (catastrophe). Complex plots have both "reversal of intention" (peripetia) and "recognition" (anagnorisis) connected with the catastrophe. Both peripetia and anagnorisis turn upon surprise. Aristotle explains that a peripetia occurs when a character produces an effect opposite to th intended to produce, while an anagnorisis "is a change from ignorance to knowledge, producing love or hate between the persons destined for good or bad fortune." He argues that the best plots combine these two as part of their cause-and-effect chain (i.e., the peripetia leads directly to the anagnorisis); this in turns creates the catastrophe, leading to the final "scene of suffering".

Character has the second place in importance. In a perfect tragedy, character will support plot, i.e., personal motivations will be intricately connected parts of the cause-and-effect chain of actions producing pity and fear in the audience. The protagonist should be renowned and prosperous, so his change of fortune can be from good to bad. This change "should come about as the result, not of vice, but of some great error or frailty in a character." Such a plot is most likely to generate pity and fear in the audience, for "pity is aroused by unmerited misfortune, fear by the misfortune of a man like ourselves." The term Aristotle uses here, hamartia, often translated "tragic flaw," has been the subject of much debate. The meaning of the Greek word is closer to "mistake" than to "flaw," and I believe it is best interpreted in the context of what Aristotle has to say about plot and "the law or probability or necessity." In the ideal tragedy, claims Aristotle, the protagonist will mistakenly bring about his own downfall—not because he is sinful or morally weak, but because he does not know enough. The role of the hamartia in tragedy comes not from its moral status but from the inevitability of its consequences. Hence the peripetia is really one or more self-destructive actions taken in blindness, leading to results diametrically opposed to those that were intended (often termed tragic irony), and the anagnorisis is the gaining of the essential knowledge that was previously lacking . Characters in tragedy should have the following qualities:

First Quality: - "Good or fine." Aristotle relates this quality to moral purpose and says it is relative to class: "Even a woman may be good, and also a slave, though the woman may be said to be an inferior being, and the slave quite worthless."

Second Quality: - "Fitness of character" (true to type); e.g. valour is appropriate for a warrior but not for a woman.

Third Quality: -"True to life" (realistic)

Fourth Quality: -"Consistency" (true to themselves). Once a character's personality and motivations are established, these should continue throughout the play.

Fifth Quality: - "Necessary or probable." Characters must be logically constructed according to "the law of probability or necessity" that governs the actions of the play.

Sixth Quality: - "True to life and yet more beautiful" (idealized, ennobled).

Thought is third in importance, and is found "where something is proved to be or not to be, or a general maxim is enunciated." Aristotle says little about thought, and most of what he has to say is associated with how speeches should reveal character. However, we may assume that this category would also include what we call the themes of a play.

Diction is fourth, and is "the expression of the meaning in words" which are proper and appropriate to the plot, characters, and end of the tragedy. In this category, Aristotle discusses the stylistic elements of tragedy; he is particularly interested in metaphors: "But the greatest thing by far is to have a command of metaphor; . . . it is the mark of genius, for to make good metaphors implies an eye for resemblances".

Song, or melody, is fifth, and is the musical element of the chorus. Aristotle argues that the Chorus should be fully integrated into the play like an actor; choral odes should not be "mere interludes," but should contribute to the unity of the plot.

Spectacle is last, for it is least connected with literature; "the production of spectacular effects depends more on the art of the stage machinist than on that of the poet." Although Aristotle recognizes the emotional attraction of spectacle, he argues that superior poets rely on the inner structure of the play rather than spectacle to arouse pity and fear; those who rely heavily on spectacle "create a sense, not of the terrible, but only of the monstrous" .

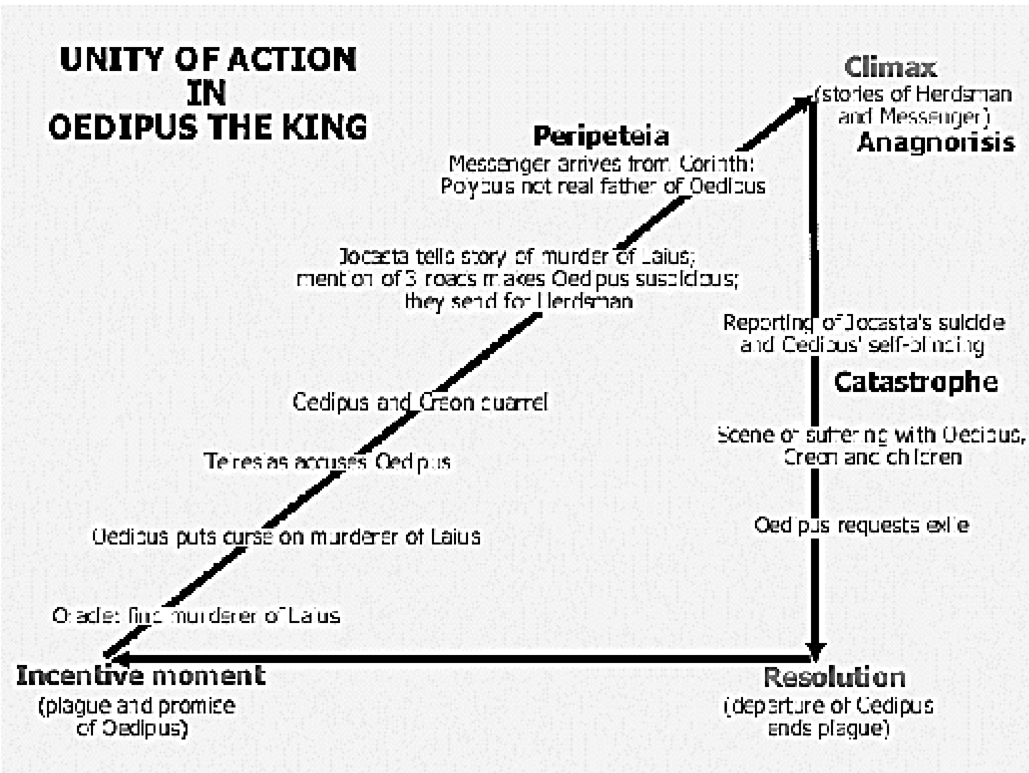
The end of the tragedy is a catharsis (purgation, cleansing) of the tragic emotions of pity and fear. Catharsis is another Aristotelian term that has generated considerable debate. The word means "purging," and Aristotle seems to be employing a medical metaphor—tragedy arouses the emotions of pity and fear in order to purge away their excess, to reduce these passions to a healthy, balanced proportion. Aristotle also talks of the "pleasure" that is proper to tragedy, apparently meaning the aesthetic pleasure one gets from contemplating the pity and fear that are aroused through an intricately constructed work of art .

Aristotle`s Concept of Plot

Introduction: - Aristotle's Poetics has often been accused of being 'lopsided' in its treatment of the subject of poetry, of devoting a major portion of the discussion to 'Tragedy' rather than any other form of poetry. This accusation, however, is met by the answer that the work is of a fragmentary nature, and a lost portion might have dealt with other forms. However, within the treatment of tragedy, there is a slight imbalance. Of all the constituent elements of tragedy, plot is given the most attentive and extensive coverage. This is not surprising, considering that Aristotle thought the plot to be the very 'soul of tragedy'. It should be remembered that Aristotle's conception of tragedy is 'biological' i.e. he compares tragedy to a living organism. Just as the living organism takes on a definite shape because of its skeleton, plot gives to tragedy an important design. Plot is as important to tragedy as the skeleton is to the living organism.

Development of Thought: - According to Aristotle tragedy is "the imitation of an action, that is serious, complete and of a certain magnitude; in language embellished with each kind of artistic ornament, the several kinds being found in separate parts of the play; in the form of action, not of narrative; through pity and fear effecting the proper purgation of these emotions".

So the tragedy is the representation of action and action consists of incidents and events. Plot is the arrangement of these incidents and events. It is better for the poet to choose a traditional story and then proceed to make out of it his own plot. Stories taken from history, mythology or legend are to be preferred, for they are familiar and easy to understand and they serve as guide-lines for characterization. Having chosen his story or having invented it, the artist must subject it to a process of artistic selection and ordering. Only relevant incidents and situation are to be selected and they are to be arranged that they seem to follow each other necessarily and inevitably. Moreover, the incidents chosen must be serious that is to say weighty of some importance, and not trivial, because tragedy is an imitation of a serious action having certain magnitude.



The making of story into plot involves what Humphry House calls "episodizing", or making into episodes. It is implied that there should be a logical connection between the events, the whole being governed by the law of probability and necessity. So the tragic plot must be a whole, complete in itself; it should have a beginning, a middle and an end. There might be earlier parts of the story the antecedents and that may be communicated by the dramatist in due course. But the beginning must be clear and intelligible even without them. It must not provoke us to ask why and how. A middle is something that is consequent upon a situation that has gone before and which is followed by the catastrophe. The middle is everything between the first incident and the last. The middle is followed by the end. An end is that which is consequent upon a given situation but which is not followed by any further incident or situation. The middle must follow naturally and inevitably upon the beginning and must logically lead to the end or the catastrophe. Thus artistic wholeness implies logical link-up of the various incidents, events and situation that form the plot.

As regards 'magnitude' the plot must have a certain length or size. It should be neither too small nor too large. The plot should be long enough to allow the process of change from happiness to misery initiated by the beginning to be properly and completely developed, but not too long for memory to encounter it as a whole. If it is too small, its different parts will not be clearly distinguishable from each other as in the case of living organism. Within these limits, the plot should be as large as possible. O.B. Hardison remarks "The precise rule is that the magnitude should be whatever is required for a change to occur from bad fortune to good, or from good fortune to bad through a series of incidents that are in accordance with probability or necessity". In other words, magnitude implies that the plot must have order, logic, symmetry and perspicuity.

The plot may have variety but it should have a unity. This unity arises from the fact that every event has a logical connection with the rest of the action and none of them is irrelevant. There might be episodes but the same must be properly integrated with the main action. Otherwise the episodic plots are the worst of all. The unity of plot does not consist in the unity of the hero; it consists in the unity of action. The plot should be an organic whole so that if one of its parts is displaced or removed the whole should be disjointed and disturbed.

A defective plot is that in which the rules of probability or necessity are not observed. The best tragic effect of pity and fear can be produced only if the plot contains elements of surprise and accident. But there should be a sort of 'inevitabi

The above discussion makes it clear that Aristotle emphasises the Unity of Action but has little to say about the Unity of Time and the Unity of Place. About the Unity of Time he merely says that tragedy should confine itself as far as possible to single revolution of the sun. No law is implied here about the Unity of Place. Aristotle only mentioned once when comparing the epic and the tragedy that epic can narrate a number of action going on simultaneously in different parts while in a drama such simultaneous action cannot be represented for the stage is one part (place) and not several parts or places. In this respect too Aristotle was very much misunderstood by the Renaissance and the French critics who deduced from his statement the rigid unity of place.

Aristotle classifies plots into three kinds: - Simple Plot, Complex Plot and Plots based on scenes of suffering.

The word Simple and Complex, here have technical terms. A simple plot is one which does not have any Peripety and Anagnorisis, but the action moves forward uniformly without any violent or sudden change. A complex plot implies reversal of intention or situation and recognition. Reversal of situation is change by which the action veers round to its opposite. Recognition is a change from ignorance to knowledge. Both these parts of the plot turn upon surprise. Aristotle, however, prefers the complex plot. The ideal tragedy is one which results from human error, error on the part of friends and relatives, error on the part of the hero himself. The ideal tragedy is a story in which the calamity is due to a false move blindly made by a friend or kinsman or by the hero himself. Atkins says "It is a tragedy brought about, not by the deliberate purpose of some evil agent, nor yet by mere chance, but by human error". F.R. Lucas agrees with Atkins and remarks "there is nothing more brilliant in 'the Poetics' than this recognition by Aristotle of the Tragedy of Error, of the Peripetia, as the deepest of all".

In Aristotle's conception, "Hamartia, Perepetia and Anagnorisis all hang together in the ideal schematisation of the tragic plot". Hamartia is the tragic error and it is related to the character of the hero but in a successful plot it is so closely worked into the plot as to be inseparable from it. The miscalculation of the hero causes a chain of incidents which result in the change from good fortune to bad which the tragic plot depicts. Both Peripetia and Anagnorisis are incidents, and parts of the plot.

The Peripetia is the fatal working of the plot to result the opposite of that intended .For example events do not turn up according to the intentions of expectation of the hero. They move in an opposite direction to his intention.

The Anagnorisis is the recognition of truth; it is the change from ignorance to knowledge. For example, Oedipus's knowledge of his parents that motivates him to some action and determines the direction of the action in the story Recognition and reversal can be caused by separate them.

Besides the complex and simple plots there are also spectacular plots. This type of plot depends on incidents of suffering, Aristotle rates it very low. It is the plot which drives its effect from the depiction of torture, murder, maiming, violence, death etc. According to Aristotle, the tragic effect must be created naturally and not with artificial and theatrical aids. Such spectacular plots indicate a deficiency in the plot.

The unravelling of the plot should be done naturally and logically and not by the use of arbitrary devices like chance, supernatural intervention etc. Atkin is of the view that "Gods should intervene only where it becomes necessary to explain the past, or announce future events external to the action". Aristotle does not consider poetic justice as necessary for tragedy. Similarly there is happiness for some of the characters and misery for others. Such a double ending weakens the tragic effect and must be avoided. It is more proper to comedy. Thus, Aristotle is against the mixture of the tragic and the comic of Tragicomedy.

Conclusion: - Aristotle's concept of plot is in keeping with what we have come to call 'classical'. There is an insistence on order, pattern, and design. The chaotic material of life should be brought under systematic discipline, so that events seem to happen in a logical sequence with no irrelevancies. There has to be a single action consisting of episodes, which are logically connected and causally related. Aristotle considers the 'fatal' plot as being more tragic. He prefers that plot which shows a change form good to bad fortune as being more fit for tragedy. Further, the complex plot involving Peripety or Discovery, or both, is preferable to simple plot. It is true that the modern concept of tragedy has changed a great deal—any living literature naturally involves change and modifications. Yet we find that in some aspects Aristotle's theory of Plot is still very much valid, for they are universal principles.

Aristotle's Concept of Ideal Tragic Hero: Hamartia

No passage in "The Poetics" with the exception of the Catharsis phrase has attracted so much critical attention as his ideal of the tragic hero.

The function of a tragedy is to arouse the emotions of pity and fear and Aristotle deduces the qualities of his hero from this function. He should be good, but not perfect, for the fall of a perfect man from happiness into misery, would be unfair and repellent and will not arouse pity. Similarly, an utterly wicked person passing from happiness to misery may satisfy our moral sense, but will lack proper tragic qualities. His fall will be well-deserved and according to 'justice'. It excites neither pity nor fear. Thus entirely good and utterly wicked persons are not suitable to be tragic heroes.

Similarly, according to Aristotelian law, a saint would be unsuitable as a tragic hero. He is on the side of the moral order and hence his fall shocks and repels. Besides, his martyrdom is a spiritual victory which drowns the feeling of pity. Drama, on the other hand, requires for its effectiveness a militant and combative hero. It would be important to remember that Aristotle's conclusions are based on the Greek drama and he is lying down the qualifications of an ideal tragic hero. He is here discussing what is the very best and not what is good. Overall, his views are justified, for it requires the genius of a Shakespeare to arouse sympathy for an utter villain, and saints as successful tragic heroes have been extremely rare.

Having rejected perfection as well as utter depravity and villainy, Aristotle points out that: "The ideal tragic hero … must be an intermediate kind of person, a man not pre-eminently virtuous and just, whose misfortune, however, is brought upon him not by vice or depravity but by some error of judgment."

The ideal tragic hero is a man who stands midway between the two extremes. He is not eminently good or just, though he inclines to the side of goodness. He is like us, but raised above the ordinary level by a deeper vein of feeling or heightened powers of intellect or will. He is idealized, but still he has so much of common humanity as to enlist our interest and sympathy.

The tragic hero is not evil or vicious, but he is also not perfect and his disaster is brought upon him by his own fault. The Greek word used here is "Hamartia" meaning "missing the mark". He falls not because of the act of outside agency or evil but because of Hamartia or "miscalculation" on his part. Hamartia is not a moral failing and it is unfortunate that it was translated as "tragic flaw" by Bradley. Aristotle himself distinguishes Hamartia from moral failing. He means by it some error or judgment. He writes that the cause of the hero's fall must lie "not in depravity, but in some error or Hamartia on his part". He does not assert or deny anything about the connection of Hamartia with hero's moral failings. "It may be accompanied by moral imperfection, but it is not itself a moral imperfection, and in the purest tragic situation the suffering hero is not morally to blame."

Thus Hamartia is an error or miscalculation, but the error may arise from any of the three ways: It may arise from "ignorance of some fact or circumstance", or secondly, it may arise from hasty or careless view of the special case, or thirdly, it may be an error voluntary, but not deliberate, as acts committed in anger. Else and Martian Ostwald interpret Hamartia and say that the hero has a tendency to err created by lack of knowledge and he may commit a series of errors. This tendency to err characterizes the hero from the beginning and at the crisis of the play it is complemented by the recognition scene, which is a sudden change "from ignorance to knowledge".

In fact, Hamartia is a word with various shades of meaning and has been interpreted by different critics. Still, all serious modern Aristotelian scholarship agreed that Hamartia is not moral imperfection. It is an error of judgment, whether arising from ignorance of some material circumstance or from rashness of temper or from some passion. It may even be a character, for the hero may have a tendency to commit errors of judgment and may commit series of errors. This last conclusion is borne out by the play Oedipus Tyrannus to which Aristotle refers time and again and which may be taken to be his ideal. In this play, hero's life is a chain or errors, the most fatal of all being his marriage with his mother. If King Oedipus is Aristotle's ideal hero, we can say with Butcher that: "His conception of Hamartia includes all the three meanings mentioned above, which in English cannot be covered by a single term."

Hamartia is an error, or a series of errors, "whether morally culpable or not," committed by an otherwise noble person, and these errors derive him to his doom. The tragic irony lies in the fact that hero may err mistakenly without any evil intention, yet he is doomed no less than immorals who sin consciously. He has Hamartia and as a result his very virtues hurry him to his ruin. Says Butcher: "Othello in the modern drama, Oedipus in the ancient, are the two most conspicuous examples of ruin wrought by character, noble indeed, but not without defects, acting in the dark and, as it seemed, for the best."

Aristotle lays down another qualification for the tragic hero. He must be, "of the number of those in the enjoyment of great reputation and prosperity." He must be a well-reputed individual occupying a position of lofty eminence in society. This is so because Greed tragedy, with which alone Aristotle was familiar, was written about a few distinguished royal families. Aristotle considers eminence as essential for the tragic hero. But Modern drama demonstrates that the meanest individual can also serve as a tragic hero, and that tragedies of Sophoclean grandeur can be enacted even in remote country solitudes.

However, Aristotle's dictum is quite justified on the principle that, "higher the state, the greater the fall that follows," or because heavens themselves blaze forth the death of princes, while the death of a beggar passes unnoticed. But it should be remembered that Aristotle nowhere says that the hero should be a king or at least royally descended. They were the Renaissance critics who distorted Aristotle and made the qualification more rigid and narrow.

Aristotle's Concept of Catharsis

Aristotle writes that the function of tragedy is to arouse the emotions of pity and fear, and to affect the Catharsis of these emotions. Aristotle has used the term Catharsis only once, but no phrase has been handled so frequently by critics, and poets. Aristotle has not explained what exactly he meant by the word, nor do we get any help from the Poetics. For this reason, help and guidance has to be taken from his other works. Further, Catharsis has three meaning. It means 'purgation', 'purification', and 'clarification', and each critic has used the word in one or the ot Tragedy arouses fear and pity, but there are sharp differences as to the process, the way by which the rousing of these emotions gives pleasure.

Catharsis has been taken as a medical metaphor, 'purgation', denoting a pathological effect on the soul similar to the effect of medicine on the body. This view is borne out by a passage in the Politics where Aristotle refers to religious frenzy being cured by certain tunes which excite religious frenzy. In Tragedy: "...pity and fear, artificially stirred the latent pity and fear which we bring with us from real life."

In the Neo-Classical era, Catharsis was taken to be an allopathic treatment with the unlike curing unlike. The arousing of pity and fear was supposed to bring about the purgation or 'evacuation' of other emotions, like anger, pride etc. As Thomas Taylor holds: "We learn from the terrible fates of evil men to avoid the vices they manifest." F. L. Lucas rejects the idea that Catharsis is a medical metaphor, and says that: "The theatre is not a hospital."

Both Lucas and Herbert Reed regard it as a kind of safety valve. Pity and fear are aroused; we give free play to these emotions which is followed by emotional relief. I. A. Richards' approach to the process is also psychological. Fear is the impulse to withdraw and pity is the impulse to approach. Both these impulses are harmonized and blended in tragedy and this balance brings relief and repose.

The ethical interpretation is that the tragic process is a kind of lustration of the soul, an inner illumination resulting in a more balanced attitude to life and its suffering. Thus John Gassner says that a clear understanding of what was involved in the struggle, of cause and effect, a judgment on what we have witnessed, can result in a state of mental equilibrium and rest, and can ensure complete aesthetic pleasure. Tragedy makes us realize that divine law operates in the universe, shaping everything for the best.

During the Renaissance, another set of critics suggested that Tragedy helped to harden or 'temper' the emotions. Spectators are hardened to the pitiable and fearful events of life by witnessing them in tragedies.

Humphrey House rejects the idea of 'purgation' and forcefully advocates the 'purification' theory which involves moral instruction and learning. It is a kind of 'moral conditioning'. He points out that, 'purgation means cleansing'.

According to 'the purification' theory, Catharsis implies that our emotions are purified of excess and defect, are reduced to intermediate state, trained and directed towards the right objects at the right time. The spectator learns the proper use of pity, fear and similar emotions by witnessing tragedy. Butcher writes: "The tragic Catharsis involves not only the idea of emotional relief, but the further idea of purifying the emotions so relieved."

The basic defect of 'purgation' theory and 'purification' theory is that they are too much occupied with the psychology of the audience. Aristotle was writing a treatise not on psychology but on the art of poetry. He relates 'Catharsis' not to the emotions of the spectators but to the incidents which form the plot of the tragedy. And the result is the "clarification" theory.

The paradox of pleasure being aroused by the ugly and the repellent is also the paradox involved in tragedy. Tragic incidents are pitiable and fearful.

They include horrible events as a man blinding himself, a wife murdering her husband or a mother slaying her children and instead of repelling us produce pleasure. Aristotle clearly tells us that we should not seek for every pleasure from tragedy, "but only the pleasure proper to it". 'Catharsis' refers to the tragic variety of pleasure. The Catharsis clause is thus a definition of the function of tragedy, and not of its emotional effects on the audience.

Imitation does not produce pleasure in general, but only the pleasure that comes from learning, and so also the peculiar pleasure of tragedy. Learning comes from discovering the relation between the action and the universal elements embodied in it. The poet might take his material from history or tradition, but he selects and orders it in terms of probability and necessity, and represents what, "might be". He rises from the particular to the general and so is more universal and more philosophical. The events are presented free of chance and accidents which obscure their real meaning. Tragedy enhances understanding and leaves the spectator 'face to face with the universal law'.

Thus according to this interpretation, 'Catharsis' means clarification of the essential and universal significance of the incidents depicted, leading to an enhanced understanding of the universal law which governs human life and destiny, and such an understating leads to pleasure of tragedy. In this view, Catharsis is neither a medical, nor a religious or moral term, but an intellectual term. The term refers to the incidents depicted in the tragedy and the way in which the poet reveals their universal significance.

The clarification theory has many merits. Firstly, it is a technique of the tragedy and not to the psychology of the audience. Secondly, the theory is based on what Aristotle says in the Poetics, and needs no help and support of what Aristotle has said in Politics and Ethics. Thirdly, it relates Catharsis both to the theory of imitation and to the discussion of probability and necessity. Fourthly, the theory is perfectly in accord with current aesthetic theories.

According to Aristotle the basic tragic emotions are pity and fear and are painful. If tragedy is to give pleasure, the pity and fear must somehow be eliminated. Fear is aroused when we see someone suffering and think that similar fate might befall us. Pity is a feeling of pain caused by the sight of underserved suffering of others. The spectator sees that it is the tragic error or Hamartia of the hero which results in suffering and so he learns something about the universal relation between character and destiny.

To conclude, Aristotle's conception of Catharsis is mainly intellectual. It is neither didactic nor theoretical, though it may have a residual theological element. Aristotle's Catharsis is not a moral doctrine requiring the tragic poet to show that bad men come to bad ends, nor a kind of theological relief arising from discovery that God's laws operate invisibly to make all things work out for the best.

Aristotle's Comparison of Epic and Tragedy

According to Aristotle, epic and tragedy have the same forms. Epic can be full of complexity. Epic of recognition can emphasize character or suffering. Because epic is in the other manner of imitation. Epic lack one form found in the tragedy- the tragedy of spectacle. Although thought and diction don not produce forms of tragedy or epic, both are important to epic as they are tragedy. Aristotle gives the example of one of the greatest poet of Greek Epic, Homer. He has cited the prime example of Epic artistry. If we talk about Iliad, we find Iliad to be simple and full of suffering. The plot of Iliad is very simple and doesn't need much explanation. Its argument is 'The wrater of Achilles'. Having bed aroused by the death of his friend Patroclus, Achilles sets out consciously to ruin hector. He succeeds in destroying hector by the end of the poem. Although some of the episodes are just added for the variation, which are 'Outside the Plot'. Aristotle describes Iliad as an 'Epic' of suffering. From the starting point, the emphasis is on the 'tragic deed' that is the end of the plot- the murdering of hector- and this deed is a episode of suffering. 'The Odyssey', on the other hand, is an epic of recognition and of character. But it can be said that odyssey is not both these forms simultaneously, one can see that the plot of odyssey is complex one. It evolved several recognition of Ulysses by Telemachuns, the neat herd, the nurse, and eventually the suitors. In this sense there is, as Aristotle remarks, "Recognition Throughout the parts of odyssey emphasizing character, however, are 'outside the plot! The most important such 'part' is tale of is wanderings. This tale has an episode plot that is simple in form and furthermore in its movement the type of plot that Aristotle seems to have in mind for the 'tragedy of character'". Having classified that Homer outstrips all other in diction and thought.

Difference between Epic and Tragedy: - The first and foremost difference between epic and tragedy arise from means and manner s of imitation. Epic uses ' Words alone' and a single meter throughout one, the other hand tragedy and harmony and employs a variety of meters in the choral sections. Again if we see, we can know that epic also uses the 'mixed' narrative manner of Homer, whereas tragedy uses the 'Dramatic' manner.

Another difference is more related to the size and contents of epic and tragedy. Though both imitation the same object is noble action. It is fact that they do so using different means and manners affect the way in ethic they present their material. Tragedy is intended for stage presentation is manner and has parts which cannot be found in epic i.e. means.

Aristotle's comment on the length of tragedy gave rise during the neo-classic period to the doctrine of unity of time. According to this doctrine, which became literally a critical dogma in seventeenth century France and in the restoration England, when Aristotle asserts that 'tragedy attempts, as far as possible, to remain, within one circuit of sun here, he refers to the time covered by the dramatic action of the play. This interpretation accords with the rationalist bias of neo-classic critics. Spectators, they argued would not believe in the reality of an action that compressed several days or, in the case of Shakespearean plays for several years into a three hour drama. One has to agree that if the spectators did not believe in the reality of an action, the tragedy would not have its proper effect. This same idea was carried to absurd extremes in England Shakespeare and his other Elizabethan contemporaries.

On the other side the twentieth century critic has rejected the idea that Aristotle formally advocated unit of time in his work 'Poetics'. In this matter, we would better probe into the Greek tragedies. Greek tragedies confine their action to a 'Single circuit of the sun' in this sense. The 'Agamemnon' and 'Eumenddes' are well-known examples of plays that cover several days. In the second place, neo-classic verisimilitude is a demonstrably false doctrine and one that is not consistent with Aristotle's explicit rejection of the theory that poetic imitation is an imitation or copying of history.

The above concept can be seen with Aristotle's view-he lived before hundreds of years. In those days, he became and even today he is known as father of criticism. He might have written the criticism as the need of his society and demand of his time. Even Greek tragedies or epics not follow him perfectly.

Else, says that both manner and means affect the ways the epic and tragedy present action. The most obvious influence is manner. Here, our great Sanskrit plays can be kept in mind while considering the Greek. The epic is recited in the mixed manner whereas tragedy is presented by many agents i.e. performed on stage. If we consider Ramayana and Mahabharata they have no time range. They cover generations. In practice, dramas especially Greek dramas were much shorter taking an average of perhaps two hours. Epic on the other hand, has no theoretical limit. In this respect the epic is line novel. Homer's 'Iliad', Virgil's Aeneid and Milton's Paradise Lost cannot be completed in one sitting while plays can be watched in one sitting or they can be read in one sitting.

Aristotle observes that at first the poets proceeded in tragedy in the same way as they did in epic. Aristotle does not mention any writers before Aeschylus. He felt that Aeschylus led the way in incorporating Homeric techniques into tragedy. The only unified trilogy that has survived is the Oresteia of Aeschylus. It is probably important as it continuous the Iliad by telling of the murder of Agamemnon by Clytemnestra, the slaying of Clytemnestra, the spying of Clytemnestra by her son orates and the cleansing of orates by the Athenian tribunal. The Oresteia is Homeric in size and content. As tragic poets assimilated the Homeric influence more fully, the trilogy lost popularity.

The last contrast between the epic and the tragedy is that there are six 'Parts' or constituent elements in tragedy. Three derived from object of imitation, two from means and one from manner Epic has only four 'parts'. Tragedy uses song also. Tragedy reader can judge all the parts but for an epic reader it's just impossible to judge all the essential parts of an epic. So he considers tragedy before an epic inspire of the fact that epic preceded tragedy in history. Tragedy includes epic. Most of the important concepts related to epic can be brought up on connection with tragedy. Epic is longer but may give less benefit as Aristotle says.

Aristotle's Preference for Tragedy: - After considering various differences between epic and tragedy question arises of superiority. Is 'Epic' better or 'Tragedy'? In 'Poetics' Aristotle discussed this question at length. He see it his own words,' if the more refined art is higher and the more refined in every case is that which of audiences. The art which imitates anything and everything is manifestly most unrefined. Tragic art stands to epic in the same relation as the younger to the older actors. So we are told the epic poetry is addressed to a cultivated audience, who do not need gesture; tragedy to an inferior public, being then unrefined, it is evidently lower of the two. Tragedy like epic poetry produced its effect even without Acton; it reveals its power by me reading. Then in all other respects tragedy is superior if this fault is not inherent in it.

According to Aristotle tragedy is superior to epic because besides having all the elements of epic, it also has same additional elements. Tragedy has better unit whole where as many incidences are scattered in epic. There are many stories in stories in epic. Tragedy ends more perfectly then epic and so it is better than epic. Tragedy keeps your concentration as it is of fewer hours while epic gives freedom to your imagination to render while reading.

Probability and Necessity: - The poet brings out the probable and necessary link up of various events both in the development of plot and also in the internal working of the character. Butcher brightly emphasis that the rule of probability and necessity refers to the cohesion of the parts. Tragic heroes like Othello, Hamlet and Oedipus Rex process a grandeur a magnificent of thought will and action which is much above the level of the average humanity. Indian actions they are true to their nature, their actions are probable and necessary outcome of their respective character and after their environment in which they are placed. Aristotle examines in detail the Plato's charge that poetry is all lies. He faces the fundamental objection that poetry present not facts but fiction. It criticizes as an untruth and unreal. Aristotle's reply is that poetry is not reality but a higher reality. Poetry transcend facts and the idea of reality is in the poets mind. It gives us the ideal reality in the poets mind.

Aristotle points out the sources of tragic pleasure :

(i) Pleasure is derived from air, natural sense of harmony and rhythm.

(ii) It is also derived from the instinct of imitation. A successful tragedy gives pleasure because it satisfies our basic instinct of imitation.

(iii) Poetry is imitation of an imitation of something which we are not familiar increases our knowledge and gives us pleasure.

(iv) The pleasure of tragedy is caused by the purgation.

(v) Tragedy imitates action and life, its pain and misery. There is emotional identification of the spectator with the person or persons who suffer on the stage. Perpetuity and Anagnorisis helped to create and heighten interest as well as emotions. All are sense, emotions and thoughts are involved. In this way we smile through our tears.

(vi) Tragedy gives aesthetic pleasure because it increases our understanding of life and its problems. The spectator gets a kind of inner illumination.

(vii) The unity of the plot diction. Spectator etc. also contributes to the sources of the pleasure in tragedy.

These are the main features of Aristotle's theory of tragedy, it must be remembered that Aristotle was writing his theory based on green drama. It is not meant for universal application. He does provide a foundation for all discussion about tragedy and his contribution is valuable.

Conclusion: - Aristotle solved most of the problems raised by Plato his mentor and also beautifies the beauty of tragedy and epic efficiently. He emphasizes the shaping part of the imagination which empowers the poet to go beyond philosophy and history.

The Nature of Poetic Truth in Aristotle's Poetics

Introduction: - Several critics are of the view that Aristotle's Poetics was primarily written as an answer to Plato's charge against poetry. Whether this is acceptable or not, Aristotle's concept of poetry certainly involves a 'defence' of poetry against the charge that poetry is a pack of lies, a copy of a copy, a shadow of shadows and twice removed from reality. We see how Aristotle takes the very concept of 'imitation' from Plato but modifies it to hold greater dimensions.

The Concept of 'Imitation': - Plato considered poetry as imitation. But to him, the imitation was of a lower order. Poets, according to him, imitated the world of appearances, which was a shadow or image of the ideal conception. Thus poetry imitated a shadow; it copied' a copy of reality, and hence, was twice removed from reality.

Aristotle took the term 'imitation' from Plato. He gave to it a much wider significance and greater dimensions. He turns the table on Plato by saying that poetry is an imitation, but imitation of a special type. The imitation in poetry is not a slavish 'copying* of the external appearances of things. It is a recreative imitation. It is a creative reproduction of objects; it involves the effort of the imagination and the intellect. It thus presents a higher truth, the truth of imagination. It universalises the particular. The poet sifts1 his material, selects the most relevant portions, imposes order and design on the chaotic material of life and universalises the particular. Thus Aristotle contends2, the truth involve in poetry is higher than that embodied in history.

Poetry and History : Universal versus Particular: - The poet does not deal with things as they had happened in the past. To do so would be the work of the historian. The function of the poet is to relate what may happen—what is possible according to the laws of probability and necessity:

The poet and historian differ not by writing in prose or in verse. The true difference is that one relates what has happened, the other what may happen.

The poet could take for his material, things as they are, as they are said or thought to be, or things as they ought to be. He uses creative vision to make something 'new' out of the material of life. But what are these materials of life? Are they the external happenings and events which took place historically? No. Poetr the basic elements in human nature, and the permanent possibilities of human nature. History, on the other hand, deals with the concrete particulars of existence. The historian is restricted to the particular happenings, or the existent facts. The poet's view is larger, deeper, more generalised. He presents the universal through the particular.

Poetry has this in common with philosophy: there is a search for Truth—universal truth. The historical facts appear in a chronological order. I, them, there is not a logical sequence or causal chain. But in poetry, there is the governing appearance of design imposed on the confused material taken from We.

The Government of Probability and Necessity: - The poet, as has been already remarked, imposes order on the confused tangle of life. The poet eliminates the irrelevant matter, the nonessential, or the merely incidental. The law of probability and necessity refers to the internal structure of the poem. It brings about the close cohesion of the parts. There has got to be a 'necessity' about the events following one another. There has to be a 'necessary' relationship between the events, and between the characters and events. There is a probably causal relationship between the incidents.

One might argue that this kind of order and design is far removed from real life, in which things often happen without apparent cause. Things often happen in a haphazard manner, with no proper causal relationship in life. Why, then, should we say that poetry's truth depends upon the law of probability and necessity, or order and the establishment of proper relationship between cause and effect? The very fact that the poet selects his material and imposes order on it, and produces an effect of 'inevitability' about the sequence of events, embodies the essence of poetic truth. It is through this process of ordering the material into a cohesive1 whole that a poet achieves the idealisation of appearances. The poet takes the haphazard material of the life as we see it. He imagines a cohesive while composed out of this material. He creates this cohesive whole out of the chaotic material. Thus the truth embodied in poetry is of a higher order than that of history.

Imaginative Truth: - The men and women we meet in poetry are not 'real' in the usual sense of term. They are always slightly different, either better or lower than average. Their thoughts and words are not thoughts and words of ordinary men and women. The probable laws of their behaviour cannot be measured against the standards of average humanity. The rules of ordinary experience do not govern the higher creations of- poetry. Poetry imitates the 'essence' and not the appearances. It reveals the ideal possibilities inherent in human life. All that the truth of poetry demands is that the actions of the character in the poem be logical. The events presented by the poet should have a relationship not only with one another, but also with the character placed in the midst of these events. Aristotle agrees that poetry presents not facts, but fiction. But this does not make poetry 'unreal' or 'untrue'. The truth of poetry is a "higher reality*, because poetry rises above facts. In this it becomes 'ideal'; it presents something as it might have been, or ought to be, according to the idea of the poet. It is the imaginative power which makes poetic truth different from historical truth. And it is this that makes poetry 'universal' and permanent in its truth.

Likely Impossibility is Preferable to Unlikely Possibility: - Aristotle makes a valid statement in connection with poetic truth. He remarks that in poetry the 'likely impossibility is preferable to the 'unlikely possibility'. The poet, Aristotle is quite willing to admit, tells lies; the poet is not concerned with actualities. But what matters, tells lies; the poet is not concerned with actualities. But what matters, is the way of telling these lies. It is of the utmost importance that these 'lies' be convincing, credible, probable. The most impossible occurrence, incident, or character becomes credible through the poet's vivid handling. Indeed, we find that we are quite willing to believe the 'fantastic' in actual life even if it seems quite unlikely. But the same thing would appear incredible in art, if it is not presented in a 'realistic' manner. Poetic illusion has to be created with a master-touch, otherwise the required 'suspension of disbelief will not be produced. It is' the poet's artistic capabilities which can create this poetic illusion, by ordering the events in a causal sequence. It would then appear as if the events could have happened under a particular set of circumstances. Through the poet's art, "the impossible not only becomes possible, but natural and even inevitable."

Kinds of Improbabilities and Irrationalities: - The probable is that which appears rational, and hence gains our credibility. Anything improbable is irrational. The impossible is that which is not possible physically. But the impossible can be made to look 'probable' if it is given a logical inevitability through art. The improbable does not really have a place in art. But there are some types of improbabilities which can be overcome in their presentation.

Material improbability, with regards to material facts, can be overcome. It can be made to look logically inevitable by artistic skill. Improbabilities are admitted in poetry as they are conducive to the heightening of the poetic effects of wonder and admiration. Homer, says Aristotle, could handle 'lies' very well.

The 'irrational' is much more difficult to handle if it is the introduction of the marvellous. But the supernatural elements are easily believed, if it is in accordance with the general beliefs and received opinion. The supernatural elements are easily admittable in epic poetry, but less so in tragedy which is presented on stage. On stage, irrationalities appear less credible.

In dramatic poetry, the events presented must be the logical and natural outcome of the preceding events. Each event has to lead naturally to the next. There is a complex interrelationship between character and event in drama. Cause and effect have to be logically presented. Hence, the place for the irrational, the supernatural, and the marvellous is highly restricted in drama. Nor is there much place for 'chance' or 'accident'. Chance events do not have rationality while drama requires its events to be governed by the law of probability and necessity. Chance is allowed only if the poet's great skill can overcome its apparent irrationality.

Moral Improbability: - The one kind of improbability which cannot be overcome through the skill of any poet is 'moral improbability'. This is the improbability arising out of the violation of the basic laws of human behaviour. These violate the very principles of human nature, and do not have a place in poetry at all. They cannot be glossed1 over by any skilful technique, for they are absolutely untrue, concep truth depends on the basic truths of human nature—the eternal emotions, thoughts, feeling, and actions of human beings. If it violates these very objects of imitation, it cannot have any credibility. Logical and moral necessities are at all times to be adhered to.

Conclusion: - Poetry then, is 'imitation', but not a photographic presentation of the world of appearances and all its mundane trivialities. Poetry's truth is based on the basic elements of human nature, the everlasting, universal aspects of human life. Poetry ignores the nonessentials, removes irrelevances, and concentrates on the essentials. It presents the 'universal', while history deals with particular events. Poetry takes the particular and makes it into the universal. But the process of imitation is in keeping with the law of logicality, probability and necessity. Poetic truth is higher than that of history. The particular object taken by the poet is transfigured, "so that the higher truth, the idea of the universal, shines thought it". Aristotle defends poetry against the charge that it is full of lies.

Aristotle enunciates a doctrine which holds good for all ages—-the presence of a universal element in all great .poetry, accounting for its permanent appeal, while at the same time he showed how a reconciliation might be effected between poetry and philosophy. "Plato had indeed shown that an element of intuition was common to the processes of philosopher and poet alike; but it remained for Aristotle to complete the vindication of poetry, and to recommend the claims of philosophy and poetry by showing that both were avenues to the higher truth."

Aristotle on Characterization

According to Aristotle, "Tragedy idealises—imitates men as better (or higher)—and Comedy caricatures, i.e. shows men as worse (lower) than they actually are." The characters in a tragedy should be life-like, convincing, acceptable, consistent, reasonable, and impressive. They should be people of better sort.

The four essentials of characterization as mentioned by Aristotle in Chapter XV of the Poetics are as follows:—

1. The Characters must be good.

2. The Characters must be appropriate.

3. They must be true to life.

4. The characters must be consistent.

A character is good, if his words and actions reveal that his purpose is good. Entirely wicked characters, even when assigned minor roles, are unfit for tragedy. Wickedness may be introduced only when required by the necessities of the plot. Wanton or wilful introduction of wickedness must be avoided; and when introduced even wicked characters must be made good in some respects. Wickedness must be mixed up with some good as in actual life.

The characters must be appropriate, that is, must be true to type or status. For example, a woman must be shown as womanly and not manly, a slave must be given a character appropriate to his status, and the king to his kingly status. Manliness would not be appropriate in a woman, and vice versa. If the characters are taken from some known myth or story, they must be true to tradition.

The characters must be true to life. They must have the virtues and weaknesses, joys and sorrows, loves and hatreds, likes and dislikes, of average humanity. It is essential to arouse to feeling of pity and fear in the spectators. If they are not true to life, they would not be able to arouse fear and pity. The characters must be of an intermediate sort, mixtures of good and evil, virtues and weaknesses, like us.

Fourthly, the characters must be consistent. They must be true to their own natures, and their actions must be rational, not rash. There should be no sudden changes in character. If the dramatist has to represent an inconsistent person, then he must be, 'consistently inconsistent.'

And lastly, "The ideal there must be an intermediate kind of person, a man not primarily virtuous or just, whose misfortune, however, is brought upon him not by vice or depravity, but by an error of judgement." Furthermore, he must be a man of' reputation and prosperity'.

Relative Importance of Plot and Character in Poetics

Aristotle's Controversial Statement on Plot: - Aristotle lists six formative1 elements of tragedy. Of these he gives the primary place of importance to the plot. Indeed, he devotes a major portion of his discussion of tragedy to Plot. Plot he says is the very soul of tragedy; it is the principle of tragedy. He then makes the famous statement which led to such a great deal of controversy. He declares: "A tragedy is impossible without plot, but there may be one without character." The statement has led to plenty of hostile criticism, especially from the modern critics, who consider that Aristotle is depressing the value of character to that of plot. Some critics have misread Aristotle's statement, and have accused him of being absurd. How, they ask, can there be tragedy without 'character' as used by Aristotle, before we go into the relative importance of plot and character in a tragedy.

The Necessity of Plot: - Aristotle defines tragedy as in imitation of an action. What is action? It is a process of change, and in tragedy, a process of change from happiness to misery. The action is made up of a number of logically connected incidents. One can say that the plot is the arrangement of the incidents. However, it is important to note that Aristotle did not consider the term 'action' as clearly and wholly external. It involves inward activity also. To him, plot did not mean an abstract pattern of action largely independent of the specific character, or agent.

In drama characters are not described; they act. They reveal themselves through their speech and action. Without action in this sense, there can be no drama at all. The plot contains the kernel1 of the action. It is through the plot that the change from happiness to misery is shown. Aristotle defines tragedy thus : Tragedy is but of an action of life, and life consists in action, and its end is a mode of action, not a quality. Now Character determines men's qualities, but it is by their action that they are happy or the reverse. Dramatic action, therefore, is not with a view to the representation of character; character comes in as subsidiary to the actions. Hence the incidents and plot are the end of tragedy, and the end is the chief thing of all. Again, without action there cannot be a tragedy; there may be without character.

We see that the two elements of plot and character seem to be set against one another in sharp and impossible opposition. It is also obvious that one cannot take the last sentence of the above quotation in a literal sense. The confusion in the discussion of this question arises from the ambiguity2 in the use of the words 'plot' and 'character'. In the popular sense, the antithesis3, between the two terms is based on the fact that the term 'character' is not seen in its full dramatic value. It is made to stand for the abstract impression of character, rather than signifying "characters producing action," as it should in the dramatic sense.

The 'plot' in the full sense of term is the 'action', and includes not only the circumstances and incidents which form the main part of 'plot' as popularly thought, but also 'character' in the full dramatic sense of 'characters producing action'. Thus we find that an antithesis between 'plot' and 'character' is not possible. .

Ethos and Dionoia- Two Aspects of 'Character': - In one sense, 'character' can be taken to mean the dramatic personages. If used in this sense, the antithesis between plot and character at once becomes absurd, for how can there be a plot without the agent ? It is apparent that Aristotle did not use the term to mean dramatic personage.

In the second sense, 'character' is that bent or tendency or habit of mind, which is revealed only through the speech and action of a dramatic personage. It is in this sense that Aristotle uses the term 'character', when he says that tragedy is possible without character. He means that tragedy is passible even if character delineation4 is not too strong, i.e., even if the characters are mere types, or marked only by class characteristics, or lacking in those distinctive qualities out of which dramatic action grows.

Aristotle uses two words for the elements in the character of a person—ethos and dionoia. Both these elements determine the cause of action, as well as the quality of action. Ethos is the moral element, while dionoia .is the intellectual element. It is through character, consisting of both these elements that the moral self of a person finds "outward expression." Both these elements reveal themselves in the speech and action of the personage. If a person has a tendency to do good, he is called virtuous. As Humphry House says, this tendency to do good or bad is not realised if it is merely inherent1; it is realised only through actions, and it is only through the past actions that one forms an idea1 of the character's 'character'.

Character is Formed Through Action: - We have certain qualities or abilities inherent in us, such as the ability to see, hear, etc. Our moral self is acquired by our actions in the past. We learn to become good or bad by acting well or ill, just as a builder learns to build building by building. "By repeated acts of a certain kind, w habit or a certain bent of character. In this way, qualities of characters are legacies of past acts," says Humphry House.

Character is formal through action, and is revealed through actions. When Aristotle talks of tragedy without character, he means that the dramatic personages do not reveal their character, their moral bent which makes them act in a particular manner. This moral bent is revealed in the purpose of an action, as well as in the means adopted to bring about that end. In some plays the moral bent need not be revealed because there is no situation which demands the person to make a choice. There may not be a situation in which the person has to decide on a course of action. As such, in the absence of the need to make a choice, a moral choice involving .intellectual reasoning, the 'character' of the person is not required to be revealed. In such a tragedy all that matters, is the plot. Thus tragedy is possible without 'character', but it is not possible without plot.

It will be noted that the necessity of making a choice, which requires deliberation2 and thought about the means, is conducive3 to the 'individualised' characters. Aristotle's theory thus allows for 'individualised' characters. Each situation would demand a choice from such characters; each choice would require, deliberation and thought, which would be expressed in their speech. Such speeches would be in the nature of presentation of an action, for they reflect an inward mental activity; an inward activity which would soon be manifested externally. They would reflect the inward 'movement towards the choice' ultimately made by the dramatic character.

In Prometheus, there is no outward movement: the main situation at the end is what it was at the beginning. There is a conflict of two surperhuman wills, neither of which can surrender to the other. Yet the dialogue is not mere conversation. Each of Prometheus' speech is a step forward in the action. His words are equivalent to deeds. This is action, though not consisting of outward doing. Thus we find that some of the Greek plays were not only devoid of intricate plots, but presented an unchanging situation.- Similarly, in Milton's Samson Agonistes, the speeches of Samson form an integral part of the action.

Character is Realised through Action and thus Subordinate to Plot: - It has to be realised that dramatic characters exist through what they say or do. The character is 'actualised' through the action. It is the action of the person that leads to either happiness or misery. The plot is the ground work, or the design through the medium of which ethos derives its meaning _and dramatic value. "The most beautiful colours", says Aristotle, "laid on confusedly, will not give as much pleasure as the chalk outline of a portrait" Ethos, divorced from plot is like a daub of colour, beautiful in itself, but, which apart from form gives little pleasure. A play is like a living organism. Its animating principle is the plot, according to Aristotle. Without it the play could not exist. It is the plot which gives to the play its .inner meaning and reality, as the soul does to the body. The true significance of the tragedy lies in the plot. It is through the plot that the end, or the intention, of tragedy is realised. It is the sequence of events which produce, the emotional effect special to tragedy. In the plot there are the reversal of situations and Discoveries, which most powerfully evoke the tragic feeling. Thus plot is supreme and character is subordinate to it, says Aristotle.

Aristotle's Doctrine: Disputed by Modern Critics: - Modern critics have assailed the doctrine of the primary, importance of plot as propounded by Aristotle. They argue that plot is a mere external framework, a - piece of mechanism devised to illustrate the working of character. The 'Character' of a person lies in thought prior to action, and is implied in it. Events have no meaning or interest, except in so far as they are supposed to proceed from will. A man's character defines, expresses and interprets action. But the issue has been confused by such questions. The actual question is not whether one element can be shown ultimately to contain the other. The question is, which of the two is the more fundamental as regards the artistic conception and dramatic structure of a play.'

Action is the first necessity to a play. But mere action is not enough. Action, to be dramatic, must stand in relation to certain mental states. We like to see the feelings out of which it grows, the motivating force of will which carries it out to the end. Drama is will or emotion in action. But in real life all mental activity does not manifest itself in outward activity. However, the action of drama cannot consist in an inward activity that does not go beyond the sphere of thought and emotion. Even where the main interest is centred in the internal conflict, this conflict must manifest itself in individual acts, and in concrete relations with the world outside. The action and reaction within the mind itself become dramatic, only when they are brought out into a plot which gives them significance. In this connection Butcher observes that only certain characters are capable of dramatic treatment. Passive characters are not fit for drama. Plot is not, as some critics say, a mere external, or an accident of inner life. In the action of drama, character is revealed and defined. Plot does not overpower characters, it is the very medium through which character is discerned.

The Trend in Modern Drama: - Modern drama shows a marked tendency to lay greater stress on the delineation of individual character. Greek dramatists of the ancient age were, to some extent, impeded2 in the development of character, because of the ready material they had to work with. They were more or less confined to a group of legends whose main outlines were already fixed. The freedom of the Greek poet in delineating character was restricted by the choice of subject-matter. . `.

Modern drama brings us to another world. A richer and more varied inner life is opened up. The sense of personality is developed. Characters become more complex. Actions tend more and more to take place within the human mind itself. The frontier between action and passion threatens to fade away.

In Shakespeare, character assumes infinite variety; contradictory elements are brought together—contradictions which do not yield to psychological analysis. Loves, honour, ambition, jealously are the prevailing motives of modern tragedy. But Shakespeare, while deepening the subjective personality of man, does not lose sight of the "objective ends of life and corresponding phases of character." He maintains a balance between these two sides of human experience. He does not permit the dramatic action to become subservient to the portrayal of individual character.

Hamlet, as F.L. Lucas says, could be said to be the first modern man, who realised that, "Action is transitory--a step, a blow, The motion of a muscle-this way or tha and in-the after vacancy We wonder at ourselves like men betrayed : „ Suffering is permanent, obscure, and dark, and shares the nature of infinity."

In Hamlet, it is true that character becomes 'dramatic by an intellectual and masterly inactivity which offers resistance to the 1. recognized; made out clearly that prompt ordinary men to action. Events seem to be brought about by acts of arrested volition2, and not by the energy of free will. We find that the inaction is indeed an active force making Hamlet desist from doing anything. Just as some men are compelled to act. Hamlet has this energetic resisting force which stops him from acting. Thus the non-acting itself becomes a form of action.

There is the increased tendency to exhibit character in growth, in successive stages of its development. A Greek tragedy takes a few significant scenes out of a hero's life; these are bound together by a causal relationship, and made to constitute a single concentrated action. The modern would not have such a concentrated action. They would include much more than the Greek dramatists. In modern drama, the dramatic theme often encompasses the whole process, beginning at the moment when a deed is dormant3 in the mind until it has developed into action and brought about its consequences. The period encompassed by the action is enlarged. It is only natural that the characters should also expand in new and complex directions. The ancient stage gives us no such example of character development as we have, for instance, in Macbeth.

The mystery of the human personality becomes of supreme interest in modern drama starting with Ibsen. He fastens on the contrast between what man dreams of and what he really is, .and works towards the culminating moment of disillusionment. Strindberg dramatizes obsessive egotism. And Chekov celebrates the frustrated and inarticulate4 hero. There is an impulse towards self-discovery, which splits up the human psyche into abstractions (the theatre of the soul). Modern drama has indeed brought the delineation of character into new and stronger relief.

Character and Plot should be harmoniously blended in an Ideal Tragedy: - Modern dramatists have explored the deep recesses6 of human mind. They have represented the abnormal and strange impulses of man. But too much of this can hamper dramatic art. Too much of subjectivism and psychological interest can lead to dramatic lyrics but not to successful drama. Goethe, for example, with all his poetic genius did not surmount this pitfall. His reflective, emotional characters, who view life through the medium of individual feeling, seldom have the requisite energy to carry out a tragic action, as S.H. Butcher comments. Drama demands a balance between plot and character. Drama is a representation of a complete and typical action, whose lines converge on a determined end, which evolves out of human will in such a manner that action and character are each in turn the outcome of the other. Drama requires a fusion of the two elements, plot and character.

Conclusion: - When Aristotle says that a tragedy can be possible without character, but not without plot, it is to be noted that he is not saying that a tragedy without character is the ideal type. Indeed, he says that a poet should utilise all the formative elements of tragedy to produce an ideal tragedy.

possibility of drama with, or without, one or the other element. The characters cannot act without reference to the situation in which they are placed. Thus the situation influences their very feelings, the very motives that spring them to action. In this sense plot becomes fundamental to drama. A passive character will produce no action and as such, has no place in drama.

It is unfortunate that Aristotle has not discussed an essential aspect of drama—namely conflict. The tragic action is in essence the outcome of conflict. And to be tragic, the conflict must be both inside and outside man. It is out of this conflict that plot and character both develop. Ultimately, however, plot is the first necessity of drama, artistically speaking.

Apology for Poetry

Sir Philip Sidney

Sir Philip Sidney, for three centuries the type of the English gentleman, was the son of Sir Henry Sidney, lord deputy of Ireland under Queen Elizabeth, and Lady Mary Dudley, daughter of the Duke of Northumberland. He was born at Penshurst, Kent, November 30, 1554, and was named after his godfather, Philip II of Spain, then consort of Queen Mary. He was sent to Oxford at fourteen, where he was noted as a good student; and on leaving the university he obtained the Queen's leave to travel on the Continent. He went to Paris in the train of the ambassador to France, saw much of court society there, and was in the city at the time of the massacre of St. Bartholomew. Proceeding to Germany he met, at Frankfort, the Protestant scholar Hubert Languet, with whom, though Languet was thrice his age, he formed an intimate and profitable friendship. He went on to Vienna, Hungary, Italy, and back by the Low Countries, returning to England at the age of twenty, an accomplished and courtly gentleman, with some experience of practical diplomacy, and a first-hand knowledge of the politics of the Continent.

Sidney's introduction to the court of Elizabeth took place in 1575, and within two years he was sent back to the Continent on a number of diplomatic commissions, when he used every opportunity for the furthering of the interests of Protestantism. He seems everywhere to have made the most favorable impression by both his character and his abilities. During the years between 1578 and 1585 he was chiefly at court and in Parliament, and to this period belong most of his writings. In 1585 he left England to assume the office of Governor of Flushing, and in the next year he was mortally wounded at the battle of Zutphen, dying on October 17, 1586. All England went into mourning, and the impression left by his brilliant and fascinating personality has never passed away.

Sidney's literary work was all published after his death, some of it against his express desire. The "Arcadia," an elaborate pastoral romance written in a highly ornate prose mingled with verse, was composed for the entertainment of his sister, the Countess of Pembroke. The collection of sonnets, "Astrophel and Stella," was called forth by Sidney's relation to Penelope Devereux, daughter of the Earl of Essex. While they were both little more than children, there had been some talk of a marriage between them; but evidence of any warmth of feeling appears chiefly after Penelope's unhappy marriage to Lord Rich. There has been much controversy over the question of the sincerity of these remarkable poems, and over the precise nature of Sidney's sentiments toward the lady who inspired them, some regarding them as undisguised outpourings of a genuine passion, others as mere conventional literary exercises. The more recent opinion is that they express a platonic devotion such as was common in the courtly society of the day, and which was allowed by contemporary opinion to be compatible with the marriage of both parties.

In 1579 Stephen Gosson published a violent attack on the arts, called "The School of Abuse," and dedicated it without permission to Sidney. It w

Sidney composed his "Defense of Poesy," an eloquent apology for imaginative literature, not unmingled with humor. The esthetic theories it contains are largely borrowed from Italian sources, but it is thoroughly infused with Sidney's own personality; and it may be regarded as the beginning of literary criticism in England.

Sir Philip Sidney's Apology for Poetry

Philip Sidney in his "Apology for Poetry" reacts against the attacks made on poetry by the puritan, Stephen Gosson. To, Sidney, poetry is an art of imitation for specific purpose, it is imitated to teach and delight. According to him, poetry is simply a superior means of communication and its value depends on what is communicated. So, even history when it is described in a lively and passionate expression becomes poetic. He prefers imaginative literature that teaches better than history and philosophy. Literature has the power to reproduce an ideal golden world not just the brazen world.

Charges of Stephen Gossen

(a) Poetry is the waste of time.

(b) Poetry is mother of lies.

(c) It is nurse of abuse.

(d) Plato had rightly banished the poets from his ideal world.

Sidney's Reply to the Charges

Poetry is the source of knowledge and a civilizing force, for Sidney. Gossoon attacks on poetry saying that it corrupts the people and it is the waste of time, but Sidney says that no learning is so good as that which teaches and moves to virtue and that nothing can both teach and amuse so much as poetry does. In essay societies, poetry was the main source of education. He remembers ancient Greek society that respected poets. The poets are always to be looked up. So, poetry is not wasted of time.

To the second charge, Sidney answers that poet does not lie because he never affirms that his fiction is true and can never lie. The poetic truths are ideal and universal. Therefore, poetry cannot be a mother of lies.

Sidney rejects that poetry is the source of abuses. To him, it is people who abuses poetry, not the vice- versa. Abuses are more nursed by philosophy and history than by poetry, by describing battles, bloodshed, violence etc. On the contrary, poetry helps to maintain morality and peace by avoiding such violence and bloodsheds. Moreover it brings light to knowledge.

Sidney views that Plato in his Republic wanted to banish the abuse of poetry not the poets. He himself was not free from poeticality, which we can find in his dialogues. Plato never says that all poets should be banished. He called for banishing only those poets who are inferior and unable to instruct the children.

For Sidney, art is the imitation of nature but it is not slavish imitation as Plato views. Rather it is creative imitation. Nature is dull, incomplete and ugly. It is artists who turn dull nature in to golden colour. He employs his creative faculty, imagination and style of presentation to decorate the raw materials of nature. For Sidney, art is a speaking picture having spatiotemporal dimension. For Aristotle human action is more important but for Sidney nature is important.

Artists are to create arts considering the level of readers. The only purpose of art is to teach and delight like the whole tendency of Renaissance. Sidney favours poetic justice that is possible in poet's world where good are rewarded and wicked people are punished.

Plato's philosophy on ' virtue' is worthless at the battlefield but poet teaches men how to behave under all circumstances. Moral philosophy teaches virtues through abstract examples and history teaches virtues through concrete examples but both are defective. Poetry teaches virtue by example as well as by percept (blend of abstract + concrete). The poet creates his own world where he gives only the inspiring things and thus poetry holds its superior position to that of philosophy and history.

In the poet's golden world, heroes are ideally presented and evils are corrupt. Didactic effect of a poem depends up on the poet's power to move. It depends up on the affective quality of poetry. Among the different forms of poetry like lyric, elegy, satire, comedy etc. epic is the best form as it portrays heroic deeds and inspires heroic deeds and inspires people to become courageous and patriotic.

In this way, Sidney defines all the charges against poetry and stands for the sake of universal and timeless quality of poetry making us know why the poets are universal genius.

Main Ideas in 'An Apology for Poetry' and its Significance

An Apologie for Poetrie may for purposes of convenience be divided into sixteen sections.

1. The Prologue

Before launching a defence of poetry, Sidney justified his stand by referring in a half-humorous manner to a treatise on horseman-ship by Pietro Pugliano. If the art of horsemanship can deserve such an eloquent eulogy and vindication, surely poetry has better claims for eulogy and vindication. There is a just cause to plead a case for poetry since it has fallen from the highest estimation of learning to be 'the laughing stock of children.'

2. Some Special Arguments in Favour of Poetry

Poetry has been held in high esteem since the earliest times. It has been 'the first light-giver to ignorance.' The earlier Greek philosophers and historians were, in fact, poets. Even among the uncivilized nations, in Turkey, among the American Indians, and m Wales, poetry enjoys an undiminishing popularity. To attack poetry is, therefore, to cut at the roots of culture and intelligence.

3. The Prophetic Character of Poetry

The ancient Romans paid high reverence to the poet by calling him Vates, which means a Diviner, a Prophet, or a Foreseer. The etymological origin of Greek word 'poet' is Poiein, and this means 'to make'. Hence the Greeks honour the poet as a maker or creator. This suggests the divine nature of poetry.

4. The Nature and Function of Poetry

Poetry is an art of 'imitation' and its chief function is to teach and delight. Imitation does not mean mere copying or a reproduction of facts. It means a representing or transmuting of the real and actual, and sometimes creating something entirely new. The poet, so Sidney declares, "lifted up with the vigour of his own invention, doth grow in effect another nature, in making things either better than Nature bringeth forth, or, quite a new, forms such as never were in Nature, as the Heroes, Demigods, Cyclops, Chimeras, Furies, and such like."

Commenting on the creative powers of the poet, Sidney further states: "Nature never set forth the earth in so rich tapestry as divers poets have done, neither with pleasant rivers, fruitful trees, sweet smelling flowers, nor whatsoever else may make the too much loved earth more lovely. Her world is brazen, the poets only deliver a golden."

5. The Three Kinds of Poetry

The three kinds of poetry, according to Sidney, are : (a) Religious poetry, (b) Philosophical poetry, and (c) Poetry as an imaginative treatment of life and nature. He calls special attention to the third class of poets, for 'these be they that, as the first and most noble sort may justly be termed vates.' They 'most properly do imitate to teach and delight, and to imitate borrow nothing of what is, has been, or shall be, but range, only with learned discretion, into the divine consideration of what may be, and should be.'

6. Various Sub-divisions of the Third Kind of Poetry

Poetry proper may further be divided into various species—the heroic, lyric, tragic, comic, satiric, iambic, elegiac, pastoral and others. Poets generally make use of verse to apparel their poetical inventions. But verse is 'an ornament and no cause to poetry since there have been many most excellent poets that never versified, and now swarm many versifiers that need never answer to the name of poets.'

7. Superiority of Poetry to Philosophy and History

In the promotion of virtue, both philosophy and history play their parts. Philosophy deals with its theoretical aspects and teaches virtue by precept. History teaches practical virtue by drawing concrete examples from life. But poetry gives both precepts and practical examples. Philosophy, being based on abstractions, is 'hard of utterance and mystery to be conceived.' It cannot be a proper guide for youth. On the other hand, the historian is tied to empirical facts that his example drags no necessary consequence. Poetry gives perfect pictures of virtue which are far more effective than the mere definitions of philosophy. It also gives imaginary examples which are more instructive than the real examples of history. The reward of virtue and the punishment of vice is more clearly shown in Poetry than in History. Poetry is superior to Philosophy in the sense that it has the power to move and to give incentive for virtuous action. It presents moral lessons in a very attractive form. Things which in themselves are horrible as cruel battles, unnatural monsters, are made delightful in poetic imitation. Poet is, therefore, the monarch of all sciences. 'For he doth not only show the way but giveth so sweet a prospect into the way, as will entice any man to enter into it.' The poet does not begin with obscure definitions which load the memory with doubtfulness, 'but he cometh to you with words set in delightful proportion, either accompanied with, or prepared for, the well enchanting skill of music; and with a tale forsooth he cometh unto you, with a tale which holdeth children from play, and old men from the chimney corner. And pretending no more, doth intend the winning of the mind from wickedness to virtue.

8. Various Species of Poetry

The pastoral poetry treats of the beauty of the simple life, and sometimes, of the miseries of the people under hard Lords. Why should it be disliked? Elegiac poetry deals with the weakness of mankind and wretchedness of the world. It should evoke pity rather than blame. Satiric poetry laughs at folly, and iambic poetry tries to unmask villainy. These also do not deserve to be condemned.

Nobody should blame the right use of comedy. Comedy is an imitation of the common errors of our life presented in a ridiculous manner. It helps men keeping away from such errors. Tragedy, which opens the greatest wounds in our hearts, teaches the uncertainty of this world. Nobody can resist the 'sweet violence' of a tragedy.

The lyric which gives moral precepts and soars to the heavens in singing the praises of the Almighty, cannot be displeasing. Nor can the epic or heroic poetry be disliked because it inculcates virtue to the highest degree by portraying heroic and moral goodness in the most effective manner. Sidney asserts that the heroical is 'not only a kind, but the best and most accomplished kind of poetry.'

9. Main Objections Brought Against Poetry by its Enemies

A common complaint against poetry is that it is bound up with 'rhyming and versing'. But verse is not essential for poetry. 'One may be a poet without versing, and a versifier without poetry' Verse is used for convenience. It produces verbal harmony and lends itself easily to memorizing. It is the only fit speech for music. It adds to words a sensuous and emotional quality.

10. Four Chief Objections to Poetry

There are some more serious objections to poetry, namely:

(a) That there being many other more fruitful knowledges, a man might better spend his time in them than in this;

(b) That it is the mother of lies :

(c) That it is the nurse of abuse, infecting us with many pestilent desires; and,

(d) That Plato had banished poets from his ideal republic.

11. Replies to These Objections

Sidney dismisses the first charge by saying that he has already established that 'no learning is so good as that which reacheth and moveth to virtue, and that none can both teach and move thereto so much as poetry.'

His answer to the second objection that poets are liars is that of all writers under the sun the poet is the least liar. The Astronomer, the Geometrician, the historian, and others, all make false statements. But the poet 'nothing affirms, and therefore never lieth,' his aim being 'to tell not what is or is not, but what should or should not be.' So what he presents is not fact but fiction embodying truth of an ideal kind.

The third charge against poetry is that its entire species are infected with love themes and amorous conceits, which have a demoralising effect on readers. To this charge Sidney replies that poetry does not abuse man's wit, it is man's wit that abuseth poetry. All arts and sciences misused bad evil effects, but that did not mean that they were less valuable when rightly employed. Shall the abuse of a thing make the right use odious? Certainly not.

Sidney is rather perplexed at the last charge, namely Plato's rejection of poetry. He wonders why Plato found fault with poetry. In fact, Plato warned men not against poetry but against its abuse by his contemporary poets who filled the world with wrong opinions about the gods. So Plato's objection was directed against the theological concepts. In Ion, Plato gives high and rightly divine commendation to poetry. His description of the poet as 'a light winged and sacred thing' in that dialogue reveals his attitude to poetry. In fact by attributing unto poetry a very inspiring of a divine force, Plato was making a claim for poetry which he for his part could not endorse. Not only Plato but, Sidney tells us, all great men have honoured poetry.

12. Why is Poetry not honoured in England as it is elsewhere?

Why has England grown so hard a step-mother to Poets? Asks Sidney. He thinks that it is so because poetry has come to be represented by 'base men with servile wits' or to men who, however studious, are not born poets. He says that 'a poet no industry can make, if his own genius be not carried unto it'. Another cause is the want of serious cultivation of the Poetic Art. Three things necessary for producing good poetry are Art, Imitation, and Exercise which are lacking in the present generation of poets.

13. A Brief Review of the State of Poetry in England from Chaucer to Sidney's own Time

Sidney says that few good poems have been produced in England since Chaucer. Chaucer did marvellously well in Troilus and Cresseida. The Mirrour of Magistrates also contains some beautiful passages. Earl of Surrey's Lyrics also deserve praise. Spenser's The Shepherds Calender is worth reading. English lyric poetry is scanty and poor. Love lyrics and sonnets lack genuine fire and passion. They make use of artificial diction and swelling phrases.

14. Condition of Drama

The state of drama is also degraded. The only redeeming tragedy is Gorboduc which itself is a faulty work. A tragedy should be tied to the laws of poetry and not of history. A dramatist should have liberty to frame the history to his own tragical convenience. Again many things should be told which cannot be shown on the stage. The dramatists should know the difference between reporting and representing. They should straightway plunge into the principal point of action which they want to represent in their play. There should be no mingling of tragedies and comedies; English comedy is based on a false hypothesis. It aims at laughter, not delight. The proper aim of comedy is to afford delightful teaching, not mere coarse amusement. Comedy should not only amuse but morally instruct.

15. Advantages of the English Language

The English language has some definite advantages. It is appreciable for its adaptability to ancient and modern systems of versification. It admits both the unrhymed quantitative system of the ancient poetry and the rhyme peculiar to modern language.

16. Summary

Poetry is full of virtue-breeding delightfulness. It is void of no gift that ought to be in the noble name of learning. All the charges laid against it are false and baseless. The poets were the ancient treasurers of the Grecian divinity; they were the first bringers of all civility. There are many mysteries contained poetry. A poet can immortalize people in his verses.

Significance of "An Apology for Poetry"

An Apology for Poetry is the most important contribution to Renaissance literary theory. Sidney advocates a place for poetry within the framework of an aristocratic state, while showing concern for both literary and national identity (Griffiths). Sidney responds in Apology to an emerging antipathy to poetry as expressed in Stephen Gosson's The Schoole of Abuse (1579). Gosson offers what is in essence a puritan attack on imaginative literature (Griffiths). What is at stake in Sidney's poetry's nobility. The significance of the nobility of poetry is its power to move readers to virtuous action (Robertson). True poets must teach and delight – a view that dates back to Horace.

In an era of antipathy to poetry and puritanical belief in the corruption engendered by literature, Sidney's defense was a significant contribution to the genre of literary criticism. It was England's first philosophical defense in which he describes poetry's ancient and indispensable place in society, its mimetic nature, and its ethical function (Harvey). Among Sidney's gifts to his contemporaries were his respect for tradition and willingness to experiment (Robertson). An example of the latter is his approach to Plato. He reconfigures Plato's argument against poets by saying poets are "the least liar" (Leitch). Poets never claim to know the truth, nor "make circles around your imagination," nor rely on authority (Letich). As an expression of a cultural attitude descending from Aristotle, Sidney, when stating that the poet "never affirmeth," makes the claim that all statements in literature are hypothetical or pseudo-statements (Frye). Sidney, as a traditionalist, however, gives attention to drama in contradistinction to poetry. Drama, writes Sidney, is "observing neither rules of honest civility nor of skillful poetry" and thus cannot do justice to this genre (Leitch).

In Sidney's day anti-theatricality, an aesthetic and ideological concern, flourished among Sidney's circle at court (Acheson). Theatre became a contentious issue in part because of the culmination of a growing contempt for the values of the emergent consumer culture. An expanding money economy encouraged social mobility. Europe, at this time, had its first encounter with inflation (Davies). London's theatres at that time grew in popularity so much that by 1605, despite the introduction of charges, London commercial theatres could accommodate up to eight thousand men and women (Hale). Sidney had his own views on drama. In Apology, he shows opposition to the current of his day that pays little attention to unity of place in drama (Bear), but more specifically, his concern is with the "manner" that the "matter" is conveyed (Leitch Sidney). He explains that tragedy is not bound to history or the narrative but to "laws of poesy," having "liberty, either to feign a quite new matter, or to frame the history to the most tragical conveniency".

Sidney employs a number of strategies to assert the proper place of poetry. For instance, he argues against the way in which poetry was misaligned with youth, the effeminate and the timorous. He does so by introducing the idea that "poetry is the companion of camps" and by invoking the heroes of ages past (Leitch). Sidney's reverence for the poet as soldier is significant because he himself was a soldier at one time. Poetry, in Apology, becomes an art that requires the noble stirring of courage (Pask).

Sidney writes An Apology for Poetry in the form of a judicial oration for the defense, and thus it is like a trial in structure. Crucial to his defense is the descriptive discourse and the idea that poetry creates a separate reality (Harvey). Sidney employs forensic rhetoric as a tool to make the argument that poetry not only conveys a separate reality, but that it has a long and venerable history, and it does not lie. It is defensible in its own right as a means to move readers to virtuous action.

Sydney's Definition of Poetry and its superiority over Philosophy & History

Philip Sidney defends poetry in his essay "Apology for Poetry" from the accusations made by Stephen Gosson in his "School of Abuse" dedicated to him. There, Gosson makes some objections against poetry. Sidney replies to the objections made by Gosson very emphatically, defending poetry in his essay. Sidney does this in a very logical and scholarly way.

The major objections against poetry are:

(a) "that there being many other more fruitful knowledges, a man might better spend his time in them then in this";

(b) that it is the mother of lies;

(c) that it is the nurse of abuse; infecting us with many pestilent desires; and

(d) that Plato had rightly banised poets from his ideal republic.

Sidney's replies to these objections:

(a) Defending poetry against the first charge, he says that man can't employ his time more usefully than in poetry. He says that "no learning is so good as that teacheth and moveth to virtue, and that none can both teach virtue, and thereto as much as poetry".

(b) His answer to the second objection that poets are liers is that of all writers under the sun the poet is the least lier. The poet creates something by emotion or imagination against which no charge of lying can be brought. The astronomer, the geometrician, the historian and others, all make false statements. But poet "nothing affirms, and therefore never lieth", his end being "to tell not what is or what is not, but what should or should not be". The question of truth or falsehood would arise only when a person insists on telling a fact. The poet does not present fact but fiction embodying truth of an ideal kind.

(c) The third objection against poetry that it is the nurse of abuse, "infecting us with many pestilent desires or wits" may be partly justified, but for this a particular poet may be blamed but not poetry. To this charge, Sidney replies that poetry does not abuse man's wit but it is man's wit that abuses poetry. All arts and sciences misused had evil effects, but that did not mean that they were less valuable when rightly employed. Abuse of poetry, according to Sidney, is not the problem of poetry but of the poet.

(d) The fourth objection that Plato had rightly banished the poets from his ideal republic is also not tenable because Plato sought to banish the amoral poets of his time, and not poetry itself. Plato himself believed that poetry is divinely inspired. In "Ion", Plato gives high and rightly divine commendation to poetry. His description of the poet as "a light-winged and sacred thing" reveals his attitude to poetry. Sidney concludes, "So as Plato banishing the abuse, not the 'Thing', not banishing it, but giving due honour unto it, shall be our patron and not adversary".

In this way, Sidney very strongly defends poetry against the accusations made by Stephen Gosson on poetry.

Superiority of poetry over history and philosophy:

In the promotion of virtue, both philosophy and history play their parts. Philosophy deals with its theoretical aspects and teaches virtue by precepts. History teaches practical virtue by drawing concrete examples from life. But poetry gives both practical and precepts examples. Philosophy, being based on abstractions, is "heard of utterance and mystery to be conceived." It cannot be a proper guide for youth. On the other hand, the historian is tied to empirical facts that his example drags no necessary consequence. Poetry gives perfect pictures of virtue which are far more effective than the mere definitions of philosophy. It also gives imaginary examples which are more instructive than the real examples of history. The reward of virtue and the punishment of vice is more clearly shown in poetry than in history. Poetry is superior to philosophy in the sense that it has the power to move and to give incentive for virtuous action. It presents moral lessons in a very attractive manner. Things which in themselves are horrible as cruel battles, monsters are made delightful in poetic imitation. Poet is therefore the monarch of all knowledge. "For he doth(does) not only show the way but giveth(gives) so sweet a prospect into the way as will entice any man to enter into it."

The poet does not begin with obscure definitions which load the memory with doubtfulness, "but he cometh(comes) to you with words set in delightful proportion, either accompanied with or prepared for the well-enchanting skill of music and with a tale for suit he cometh unto you, with a tale which holdeth(holds) children from play and old man from the chimney corner. And pretending no more, doth intend the winning of the mind from wickedness to virtue."

An Apology for Poetry : An epitome of Renaissance Criticism

Sidney's Apologie for Poetrie (1580-81) was intended as a reply to Stephen Gosson's School of Abus (1579) Gosson had inducted poetry on four counts: that a man coaid employ his time more usefully than in poetry that it is the mother of lies, that it is the nurse of abuseramt that, Plato had rightly banished poets from his ideal state. Sidney in his Apology replies to each of these charges, drawing copiously, in the absence of critical authorities in England, on the ancient classics and the Italian writers of the Renaissance: in particular, on Homer, Plato, Aristotle, and Plutarch, among the Greeks, Virgil, Horace and Ovid, among the Romans; and Minturno, Scaliger, and Castelvetro, among the Italians. Yet it is an original document.

Sidney's Apology is not only a reply to Gosson but much more. It is a spirited defence of poetry against all the charges that had been laid at its door since Plato. He says that poetry is the oldest of all branches of learning; it is superior to philosophy by its charm, to history by its universality, to science by its moral end, to law by its encouragement of human rather than civic goodness. Among its various species the pastoral pleases by its helpful comments on contemporary events and life in general, the elegy by its kindly pity for the weakness of mankind and the wretchedness of the world, the satire by its pleasant ridicule of folly, the comedy by its ridiculous imitation of the comm life, the tragedy by its moving demonstration of 'the uncertainty of this world, and upon how weak foundations guilden roofs are builded,' the lyric by its sweep praise of all that is praiseworthy, and the epic by its representation of the loftiest truths in the loftiest manner. Neither in whole nor in parts, thus, does poetry deserve the abuse hurled on it by its detractors.

Hence Sidney says that a man might better spend his time in poetry. The poet is not a liar; the poet uses veracity or falsehood to arrive at a higher truth. It is not poetry that abuses man's wit but man's wit that abuses poetry. Plato found fault not with poetry, which he considered divinely inspired, but with the poets of his time who abused it to misrepresent the gods.

Sidney's Apology is a veritable epitome of the literary criticism of Italian Renaissance; and so thoroughly it is imbued with this spirit, that no other work, Italian, French, or English can be said to give so complete and so noble a conception of the temper and the principles of Renaissance criticism. Sidney is the herald of Neo-classicism in England. He is essentially a theorist of the exuberant imagination. He fuses the romantic and the classical tendencies. His Defence of Poetry is the earliest attempt to deal with the poetic art, practically and not theoretically. His judgements are based on contemporary literature and show ample good sense and sound scholarship. It is not merely empty, abstract theorising: apart from the unities, his judgements are not governed to and great extent by rules and theories. His ultimate test is of a practical kind, i.e., the power of poetry to move to virtuous action. He has thus contributed to the appreciation of literature in the concrete.

Sidney's work is comprehensive enough to incorporate all the existing forms of poetry in his age. He gives his views on the nature and function of poetry, on the three unities, on tragedy and comedy, and on diction and metre. It is the pioneer in dramatic criticism. As a French critic has observed. Sidney's Defence of Poetry "gives us an almost complete theory of neo-classical tragedy, a hundred years before the 'Art Poetique' of Boileau.'"

Sidney's Apologie for Poetrie has rightly been valued as "one of the outstanding performances in English criticism and one which inaugurated a new phase in critical history. " Outmoded though some of the critical opinions contained in it now are, yet it provides a singularly lofty and noble introduction to the long line of English treatises on the art of poetry. Its significance lies in the fact that it comes at a time when most of the gentlemen shunned the name of being called a 'poet.' Sidney's vindication of poetry and his serious treatment of the poetic art enthused a new confidence in them and poetry came to be looked upon as a noble and worthy pursuit, no more a 'laughing stock of children.' Sidney boldly faced the traditional objections to poetry and he tried to dispel the mists of prejudice that had gathered around it. His approach was not only negative but he positively tried to bring out the value of poetry in the social and intellectual life of society. He presented his arguments in the lost lucid and persuasive manner. He was treating poetry as a poet with 'illuminating insight' and 'inspiring enthusiasm.' Professor Atkins says:

"Nowhere else do we find the same happy mingling of the ideal and the practical, the same blend of dignity and humour; of controlled enthusiasm and racy colloquialism; or again, that unstudied simplicity and grace which everywhere pervade the work. "

What was precisely the influence of this treatise on Sidney's contemporaries is only a matter of conjecture. It was circulated in manuscript among his friends and other literary circles during his life and ' was soon quoted in the best critical places—in Puttenham's Arte of 1589, in Harington's Apologie of 1598.' Its influence on Ben Jonson, Shakespeare and other dramatists is quite obvious. It gives incentive to creative writing. When this treatise was written, English literature stood at the lowest ebb. In less than twenty-five years after its publication, it became one of the glories of the world. Apart from its influence on the creative writers of the Elizabethan age. Sidney's treatise showed the direction of later criticism, the neo-classical as well as the romantic. The neo-classical critics made a fetish of his views on the observance of the unities, and the romantic critics like Shelley drew inspiration from its fountain for supporting their theory of creative imagination Even to the modern readers it continues to charm 'with its idealism, its sanity, its humour, and its grace. '(Atkins).

The Apologie is a kind of formal beginning of literary theorizing in England, and a brilliant enough one. The essay reflects and telescopes not only the continental criticism of the century but a certain amount of classical Greek and Roman as well. Sidney was well-acquainted with the classical Greek and Roman critics. "But it all matters little. Sidney wrote, not a pedant's encyclopaedia, but a gentleman's essay.

Points to Remember

1. Written in 1680-81 as a reply to Gosson's School of Abuse, Sidney's Apology is an epitome of Renaissance criticism, the foundation on which the castle of the future criticism of Sidney's age rests.

2. A spirited defence of poetry on the whole; poetry's oldest branch of knowledge, superior to philosophy, history and science.

3. Shows Sidney's good sense and sound scholarship; a great contribution towards the appreciation of literature; gives an almost complete theory of neo-classical tragedy.

4. A blend of the ideal and the practical, of dignity and humour; of sincerity and irony, of controlled enthusiasm and racy colloquialism. (Atkins)

5. Its deep influence and circulation. Influence on Ben Jonson and Shakespeare and Shelley quite apparent.

6. "The essay reflects and telescopes not only the continental criticism of the country but a certain amount of classical Greek and Roman as well."

Sidney Contributions to English Criticism

Sidney's Apology is an important Renaissance document. It is a synthesis of the critical doctrines of Plato, Aristotle, Horace, Scaliger, Minturno, and a host of other critics. It brings together romanticism and classicism. It is the first attempt in English to deal with the poetic art, practically and not theoretically.

On the nature and function of poetry, on the three unities, on tragedy and comedy, and on diction and metre, Sidney represents contemporary trends. Everywhere his work reflects the influence of Aristotle and Plato and other classical writers. But his originality lies in the skill with which he has draws upon, selected, arranged and adapted earlier ideas and then has put forth his own ideas, independently arrived at. He makes use of 1. Italian critics, 2. Classical critics, Plato and Aristotle 3. Roman critics, Horace and Plutarch. 4. He also shows the influence of the medieval concept of tragedy, and 5. His didactic approach to poetry is typically Renaissance approach. However, his manner of presentation, his freshness and vigour, and his logical faculty are characteristically his own. His style has dignity, simplicity, concreteness, and a racy humour and irony. It is an illuminating piece of literary criticism as well as a fine piece of creative literature.

Sidney approached poetry not as a pedantic critic, but as a responsive reader. While most of his contemporaries were busy framing rules of rhetoric and prosody, he was paving the way for creative literature. He was preparing an audience who could 'feel' the emotional impact of literature and appreciate it. Sidney felt that literature was a great dynamic force and it had the power 'to move', 'to uplift' and to satisfy emotionally and aesthetically. J. W.H. Atkins has pointed out that "to him poetry was a natural human activity enabling men to sing to beauty and truth, and to satisfy their longings for a world transformed, thus nurturing in them what was good and noble. Moreover, so far from being merely an instrument of moral teaching, it was a concrete and inspiring revelation of human deals, and thus, in a sense, a criticism of life. This, then with its element of permanent truth, was the substance of Sidney's message to an age perplexed and even hostile."

No doubt Sidney has freely drawn on earlier critics, yet he has tried to arrive at his own conception of poetry. The basic question he meets is: why is poetry valuable. The second section of his essay deals with the nature and value of poetry. This is followed by an examination of the objection to poetry. The fourth section presents a critique of the contemporary literary poetry and of morality.

His definitions of poetry, two in number, speak of his greatness as a critic. The first is :"Poesy, therefore, is an art of imitation, a representing, counterfeiting, or figuring forth; to speak metaphorically, a speaking picture, with this end,—to teach and delight." The second is :"it is not rhyming and versing that maketh a poet. ...but it is that feigning notable images of virtue or vice, or -what else, with that delightful teaching; which must be the right describing note to know a poet by. "

His defence of poetry is unique. It logically refutes the contemporary charges of the puritans against poetry. Poetry is universal; the first light-giver to ignorance and the first nurse. The earliest recorded or preserved utterance of any nation is a form of poetic expression alone. The ancients delivered wisdom only through poetry. The first philosophers and scientists came before the people in the garb of poets. The poet is a creator, like God. The world created by the poet is a better world than ours. Only in the poetic world do we come across true lovers, constant friends, and excellent men. These characters are perfect. The bad men in this world have unmixed badness, and such villains are not allowed to go unpunished. Poetry is superior to history and philosophy. The poet has both the general and the particular example. But the philosopher is only theoretical, for he has examples. The historian has examples, but no precepts. The historian speaks of what has been, not of what ought to be. The philosopher is vague and speaks of what should be.

The poet speaks of both what is and what should be of what is universal and what is particular. Poetry has liveliness and passion which are lacking in history and philosophy.

Sidney's remarks on tragedy, tragi-comedy and comedy speak of his knowledge of the contemporary trends of literature and his wide readings. In the field of drama his observations were true not only in his age but are also true and valid even today. His observations on satire and various forms of poetry are of great significance so are his views on diction, metre and verse. Surprisingly enough Sidney offers the best defence of metre. Praising English, he says that only in English can rhyme be observed "very precisely."

The essay reflects and telescopes not only the continental criticism of the century but a certain amount pf classical Greek and Roman as well. Further, Dramatic criticism in England began with Sir Philip Sidney. Sidney was 'the president of chivalry and nobleness.' He was, as Hakluyt called him the finest flower of the garden of wit and art. He saw that Poetry in his own days had fallen from high estimation to be the laughing stock of children. Gosson in his 'School of Abuse' has condemned poetry and had called it the mother of lies and the nurse of abuse. He had pointed out that there were better professions and vocations than that of a poet and that the suggestion of Plato should be followed in turning out the poets from the state. Sidney who was himself a poet could not relish the idea and sharply and violently reacted against the views of Gosson and the Puritans. He wrote a pitiful defence of Poetry and based the claims for poetry on its divine origin, its prophetic nature, its cultural value, its universal appeal, its elevating power and its alluring methods. He said that poetry was the most ancient and 'full of virtue breeding delightfulness.' He replied to all the charges made by the critics of his days and put back poetry to its own pedestal. He made it popular and freed it from the bondage and slavery of the Puritans. He revitalised it and gave it new life and vigour. It was to his attempts that Poetry was again read with interest and poets like Shakespeare and Spenser md others made England 'nest of singing birds.'

Points to Remember

1. Apologie—an important Renaissance document—a synthesis of the critical doctrines of Plato, Aristotle, Horace, Scaliger, Mintumo and a few other Italian critics—a union of romanticism and classicism, first important English document in criticism.

2. Sidney represents contemporary trends on the nature and function of poetry, on the three dramatic unities, on tragedy and comedy.

3. His originality lies in the selection, arrangement and adaptation of earlier ideas. Also original in his style, presentation, etc.

4. Approached poetry not as a pedantic critic but as a responsive reader. He has his own conception of poetry. His defence of poetry is sound, logical and convincing. His view that "it is not riming and versing that maketh a poet" has proved to be a universal utterance.

5. He has rightly upheld the superiority of poetry over history, philosophy and science.

6. He regards the poet as God, the creator.

7. Sidney's remarks on tragedy, tragi-comedy and comedy speak of the contemporary trends of literature and his wide ranging interests.

8. "Dramatic criticism in England began with Sir Philip Sidney." (Spingarn).

9. Sidney, "the president of chivalry and nobleness," "the finest flower of the garden of wit and art."

10. Sidney revitalised poetry and gave it new life.

Literature and Virtue in Sidney's "Apology for Poetry"

In "An Apology for Poetry" Sir Philip Sidney attempts to reassert the fundamental importance of literature to society in general as well as to other creative and intellectual endeavours. Though Sidney's work does provide a synthesis (and in some cases an aberration) of much Greek and Roman literary theory, his argument aspires to go beyond an esoteric academic debate. Literature can "teach and delight" in a manner which other methods of communication do not possess (138). The moral/ethical impact any literary text has upon a reader is of paramount importance to Sidney. The argument Sidney presents and develops is built around the assumption that literature has the capacity to teach most effectively and to demonstrate virtue. Perhaps in better understanding how Sidney specifically supports this claim, we can better assess its strength or validity

Sidney places literature in a hierarchical relationship with all other forms of learning; literature inhabits the highest and most influential tier. Literature is "the first light-giver to ignorance", and from it all other sources of knowledge have been nurtured (135). As the first use of language beyond the completely utilitarian, literature stretches and expands language to accommodate broader and more conceptual inquiries. Though an ardent admirer of Platonic philosophy, Sydney, in order to serve his intellectual exercise, rewrites or rehabilitates Plato's harsh stance on the worthlessness of literature. Unlike Plato's poet who perpetuates images far removed from the Truth, Sidney's poet can dip into the world of Forms, the Ideal, and provide us with knowledge of virtue. While the tangible world of appearances "is brazen, the poets only deliver a golden" (137).

Against the established disciplines of history and philosophy, Sidney also uses a revision of Aristotle's Poetics to help demonstrate how literature mediates the interests of both forms of knowledge in order to teach virtue. Where philoso universal, history is consumed with the particular. Literature is able to deal with the same abstract moral/ethical (universal) concepts with which philosophy grapples by providing examples rooted in concrete, albeit fictionalized, details. History is too concerned with the accurate recording of facts to make any conjectures on such broad, less substantiated concepts. Literature exists between and above history and philosophy because the knowledge it conveys (knowledge of the good) is the best and most useful knowledge that exists. As Sidney states, "no learning is so good as that which teacheth and moveth to virtue, and that none can both teach and move thereto so much as poetry" (149).

Sidney attempts to provide an utterly rational foundation for his claims, however. He develops a systematic analysis of the mechanisms employed by literature to teach virtue. He sorts literature according to its works and its parts. The works of a literary text can be seen in four specific ethical effects which it should seek to elicit in a reader. Sidney defines these four as: the purifying of wit, enriching of memory, enabling of judgement, and enlarging of conceit (139).

In order to purify the wit, literature must engage the intellect in new and different ways. By allowing the reader to view a particular idea, character, or situation from a new or novel vantage point, literature is able to provide a vicarious, condensed education available through no other medium. Memories gathered from these fictional experiences provide a common frame of reference between otherwise disparate individuals. Fictional examples become touchstones which can be understood and experienced more easily by others. Literary memories point toward a more universal experience and invite the reader to find new and possibly profound meaning(s) in personal experiences as well. Sidney implies that a life without such memories would surely be impoverished. Building upon the first two works, literature also provides a reader with ample and necessary practise in making moral/ethical judgments. A literary text provides a safe outlet for such judgments to be made, discussed, and re-examined. Personal and societal codes of behaviour are shaped, both strengthened and challenged, by this practise. Literature engages the reader actively with virtue as a part of this decision making process. To enlarge the conceit, literature also expands a reader's knowledge and understanding of language (in terms of style, structure, form) as well. This, in turn, opens new modes of expression, new metaphors, to a reader. The ability to create new and different texts is stamped into the very nature of literature. The ability to articulate and teach virtue effectively is constantly in flux from generation to generation. Literature is constantly in demand of new metaphors in order to remain resilient and relevant. Each narrative, housing the potential to fundamentally redefine and re-evaluate itself, represents a metaphor for the world. Thus it is vital that literature possess this self-perpetuating but continually evolving quality.

To discuss literature in its various parts, Sidney develops a series of stylistic, structural, and thematic categories: pastoral, elegiac, iambic, satiric, comic, tragic, lyric, and heroic. Each category (part) of literature also attempts to elicit a specific ethical response from the reader. The parts themselves are arranged hierarchically as well, with the heroic being placed at the top. Though an interesting (if historically outdated) method of division, Sidney's categories seem to elaborate more than advance his general argument, however. He places more emphasis on the ethical questions posed by the works of a literary text, rather than its parts.

Sidney concludes his comprehensive defense of literature by attempting to answer various challenges to its merit and continued support. The most serious of these allegations, that literature is "the nurse of abuse, infecting us with pestilent desires", Sidney is forced to acknowledge as true to a greater or lesser extent. This might seem, at first glance, to refute or undermine the argument he has laboured so long to create. Sidney, however, has qualified his praise of literature from the onset. Literature can contribute to learning virtue but does not ensure virtuous action. Because he is aware of the fact that literature can and is abused by some, Sidney describes literature as a tool with the greatest potential for good, but not an inherently virtuous invention in and of itself. The destructive qualities evoked by literature are products of the fallible fragile human beings who created it, rather than an indictment of the evil nature of all literature in general. Do not, as Sidney states, "say that poetry abuseth man's wit, but that man's wit abuseth poetry" (150).

Sidney's responses have become the mainstay of the supporters of a liberal arts education. Unfortunately, literature has become sanctified to the extent that knowledge of literature has become practically synonymous with virtuous action. Such modern interpretations of Sidney's defense of literature seem to strike against the very heart of his argument. Sidney seems to understand all too well that human beings house both virtuous and vicious impulses; it is within our power to infuse our creations with both the sinister and the sublime. Because this is true of any human invention, Sidney counsels that the potential of literature for good or ill should not be easily discounted or dismissed.

Sir Philip Sidney: The Saviour of Poetry

"Who's your Parent?" asked God. "Poets are my parent" replied Sidney. We cannot thank Sidney enough for his hard work to save dignity of poetry. Back in Sidney's time a lot of people began to question poetry and its value. Puritans were distasteful towards poetry and Stephen Gosson took the lead and stained fabric of poetry with variety of accusations. He wrote School of Abuse and aimed at Sir Philip Sidney. In response to the School of abuse Sidney invoked his muse and wrote An Apology for Poetry. This document An Apology for poetry is like the flowing river which surfaces poetry's Antiquity, Universality, its long journey from the evolution of human learning till date. Also, poetry's nature and purpose is highlighted which states its nucleus purpose that is to "teach and delight". Penetrating into poetry Sidney has also described its kinds, which includes religious, philosophical and poetic. However, defense wouldn't have been a good defense until the attack is refuted. Stephens's charges on poetry are taken up one by one, dismantled and refuted. Charges such as poets, piper and jesters are the caterpillar of commonwealth, corrupter and plague-spots of society and so he goes on. Throughout Sidney in his case has been referring to big bang names like Aristotle, David, Homer, Dante, Shakespeare, Plato and many others. This helps in making his defense not only strong but much more authentic.

Sidney begins to ennoble poetry by discussing its nature and usefulness. Poetry is the mother of all learning and the first light giver to ignorance. Prestigious names have been given to poets in all parts of the world such as, vales – the prophet by Romans, maker by Greeks. Further Sidney says that all imagination literature comes from the poet and in saying this he brings Plato into the fold of poets and his dialogues in poetry. Poetry is not all rhyming and versifying. Poetry from Plato's divine madness has become divine gift. Descending from Plato we hear Aristotle saying that poetry is an art of imitation and its end has to teach and delight. A poet beautifies nature, and poetry adds colours to life. Great genuine role models are created by poets that of a bravery, heroism and worthy man. Many characters larger than life characters were created. And to do all this poets are certainly not dependent on nature. Poets don't have this limitation to which rest of the arts are chained. Astronomer, historian and physician have to rely on the nature for their work and research unlike poets who create their own new or better world.

Poetry has numerous kinds and Sidney presenting the case on poetry has talked about its kinds. The three major kinds are religious poetry, philosophical poetry and poetic. Religious poetry included biblical poets such as David, Solomon, Moses and other. The Holy Books are written in rhyme and verses. In the Holy Scriptures in which there is no evil Jesus himself uses poetical language. Hence, we can believe that when these Holy men were the messengers of God so God gave us His words in poetry. The second kind is philosophical poetry includes Tyrtaeus, Lucan and others. Philosophy if stands on its own cannot teach because it is a poor guidance for youth and appeals only to those who are already learned. And the last but real form of poetry is the imaginative and creative one. It inspires in men the desire of well-being thus, it is no less than history or philosophy. This poetic is even superior to science for the reason that it not only show the right way but makes the entrance attractive enough for the man to enter. Even the repulsive things of life seems comforting if comes from the mouth of a poet. Irresistible aesthetic charm lies in the poetic.

The last form is then further divided into variety of poetry type. Pastoral, displays the beauty of nature and misery of a man. Through pastoral poetry the question of right and wrong is raised. Elegiac, stimulate our pity on the weaknesses of mankind and wretchedness of the world. Satiric, ridicules man's follies and he feels ashamed to laugh at him. Morality is the key which is through and through achieved with the help of these various kinds of poetry. The Lyric, out of all the other types majorly lyric is mishandled and was not being used at Sidney's time in its true essence. Comic serves as warning men of their common errors and kind heartedly correcting them without even letting them know it. Tragedy opens bitter wounds and endow with catharsis. Despite horrifying audience it teaches the uncertainties of life. Last but not the least, Heroic type has given us character larger than life. The goodness at its peak both instructs and delights. Achilles was born of this mother.

Without testing Stephen's patience, the charges on poetry shall be listed first and later answered. The charges were, poetry is useless and waste of time. It is the mother of lies and collection of falsehood. Invoked evil fancies thus having degrading and enfeebling influence. Importantly Stephen took the liberty of using Plato's dialogue Republic to say that Plato who is most looked upon had banished poets from his ideal state. How now can we allow poets to breath in ours?

Straight-forward defense method is used by Sidney. The first allegation that poetry is useless is refuted by Sidney in the first portion of his document in which he say, no learning is a good learning until it teach and delight and no art can do it but poetry. Also, there cannot be any profitable use of ink and paper, which at the time of Sidney was quite expensive. The second charge is that poetry is mere a lie and the answer of Sidney is simple and amusing. Poetry never made an attempt to say that it is the truth rather other arts like history, physiology and astronomy does claim to be truthful and most of the times they fell on their face. Poetry is all fiction. And to find truth in fiction is lack of common sense. Poetry's job is not to teach or tell what to do or what not to do rather it tells what should be and what should not be. Poetry arouses evil desires is not wholly correct. There is kind of poetry which is little contaminated with love. If we see deep within even the love isn't so evil and bad it is natural and innate in us. To praise a beauty and go mad behind it is one form of passion. Stephen seems to have a problem with love but then he should restrict his charge to only one part of poetry not blames poetry as a whole. All art are misused and if poetry fell on corrupt hands doesn't mean the genre is corrupt. Plato is used by Stephen to prove his stance against poetry. Plato in Sidney's opinion is poetic himself. He says his dialogues flow like flowers in a stream. Plato was only against poets who portray gods in false manner and he asked to banish the abuse of poetry not poetry wholly. Plato in Sidney's eyes is a patron of Poetry not an enemy.

Lastly, if Plato was against poets and all kinds of poetry, does it matter when his successor Aristotle was in favour of poets and thought of them as an essential part of society. Plato or no Plato poetry survives even now. Since the evolution of this world the poetry exists and it continues to move zillions of hearts every second.

Euphemisms in "An Apology for Poetry"

Euphemisms are agreeable terms substituted for offensive ones; a garbage collector becomes a sanitation engineer. Sir Philip Sidney, in his "An Apology for Poetry," also known as "A Defense of Poesy," not only had to make his subject matter agreeable to a skeptical aristocracy, but also had to defend it against a growing Puritan movement that saw poetry as evil. He uses three euphemisms to do so: horses, Scripture and war.

Poetry as Horsemanship

At the time of the essay's writing, 1579, poetry had fallen into the realm of disrepute predicted by Shakespeare in "A Midsummer Night's Dream" when king Theseus compares poets to madmen, their subject matter "airy nothing." Sidney euphemizes poetry as comparable to the royal sport of horsemanship; he parallels the truth behind poetic phrases with that of the natural compliments that good horses evoke. A horse may "have a good seat"; a lady may "be fair of face." Sidney insists that both the utilitarian horseman's phrase and that of the poet ring true as compliments to beauty, answering the Puritan charge that poetry is "the mother of lies."

Poetry as Scripture

Sidney moves from the euphemism of poetry as sport to a second euphemism addressed to the Puritan members of his audience, who regarded poetry as ungodly. In his most daring passage, Sidney points out that Holy Scripture is poetry by noting that the "psalms of David are a divine poem . . . fully written in metre"; he ends by labelling the Psalms a "heavenly poesy." Poetry takes on the name of prophecy itself, as Sidney brazenly comments that it should not be "scourged out of the church of God." By destroying poetry, one destroys Scripture, he asserts.

Poetry as Warrior

Having addressed both aristocrats and zealots, he devotes the remainder of the essay to euphemizing poetry both for the wise and the working man. He aligns poetry with ancient Greek philosophers and attests that "of all sciences . . . poetry is the Monarch." He also scorns its sordid reputation as the plaything of theatrical mummers by saying that "poetry is the companion of the camps." In personifying poetry as a warrior rather than a mere player, he brings it into the fellowship of English commoners embarked on wars.

Poetry Defended Thrice

In a masterstroke, Sidney uses personification, metaphor and analogy as defenses to poetry's critics. He insists that the art "imitate[s] to teach and delight," thus personifying it as a true actor of good repute; it is "reined with good discretion," metaphorically comparing a poet to an admirable horseman; it borrows "nothing of what it is, hath been or ever shall be," a daring rewrite of Ecclesiastes 1:9 that puts poetry squarely back into the realm of Scripture. Thus he apologizes for, and defends, the poetic muse by cloaking her in figurative language, poetically rendered euphemisms.

Apology for Poetry : A General Estimate

An “Apology for Poetry” is a compelling essay refuting the attack on poetry by Puritan and fundamentalist Stephen Gosson. This complex article written by Sir Phillip Sidney represents the decisive rebuttal defending poetry. His strong emotive passages defend the uncongenial comments of poetry from Gosson. Although, his justification for the rebuttal is alluded to Gosson’s durable attacks on poetry; it is known Gosson’s remarks prompt Sidney’s attitude to defend not only against Gosson but as well as Plato. Stephen Gosson’s Puritan credentials, disregards him as the primary source for submitting the essay.

Sidney addresses the poetic contributions and principles demonstrated by Aristotle, Plato, and other European scholars. Plato’s Republic implements most of the poetic knowledge Sidney reinforces in his defense. The abundance of sciences portrays significant purposes in life; Sidney concedes poetry as a superior subject. Sidney conveys several rational ideologies to sustain the defense of poetic theory. Poetics is subjected through the emphasis of imitation, generates purposes of learning, objects history and philosophy, and educates observers on knowledge, virtue and practical conceptions of poetry.

The influence of Plato and Aristotle on Sir Philip Sidney's concise essay reinforces a substantial argument defending poetry. His advocacy on poetry is primarily constituted on the theories of Aristotle's poetics, as well as the acceptance on Plato's poetic contribution. The function and form of poetry according to the theories of Platonism is defended and reconciled by Sidney. Further words and sanctions from Aristotle provide ammunition in support of the defense. Plato's considerable concern had been with the education of men achieving moral excellence; however, Socrates un-deniable favor of poetry banished the poetics from the Republic because of Plato's questioning moral effects (Samuel 383). Sidney agrees with Plato's doctrine that educational instruction is moral excellence and a capacity of universal knowledge which equips a mature virtuous man. To further the protection of poetry, he interprets Aristotle's quote concerning the form of poetry as, "all virtues, vices and passions so in their own natural state laid out to the view that we seem not to hear of them but clearly to see through them (An Apology for Poetry 140). Nature provides its own natural resources for man to achieve universal knowledge; if man allows the aesthetics of nature to implement his mind, all virtues are achieved. Sidney acknowledges and makes frequent references of the essence to Plato's "the beauty of virtue" (Samuel 387). Throughout the essay, Sidney validates Plato's conception, "Like the painter who portrays not Lucretia, whom he never saw, but the outward beauty of such a virtue, the form of goodness—which seen, they cannot but love" (Samuel 387). Plato's profound theory on aesthetics is a significant pathway to poetry, because poetry is beautiful and man cannot help but to love moral excellence.

Sidney upholds the truth and defense against the Socratic charges opposing poetry, "the poet, nothing affirmth, he therefore never lieth". He delivers the expression that poetry is the truer ideal then other earthly being. "The defense of poetry as a mimetic art has already been made in the assertion that poetry imitates universal ideas, and clothes them in human form, yet does not mar their superhuman beauty". Plato apprehended high standards for men to attain knowledge and wit, so they no longer continue foolish thoughts. Sidney gravitates to the Platonism theory on ones worth, "It is a good reason, that whatsoever, being abused, doth must harm, being rightly used—and upon the right use each thing receiveth his title –doth most good". Sidney recognizes Plato as a poetic writer, "And truly even Plato whosoever well considereth , shall find that in the body of his work, though the inside and strength were philosophy, the skin as it were and beauty depended most of the poetry". Aesthetics is the primary inspiration for Plato's poetry; he defines literature is that which is inspired. Poetic material can only evolve through inspiration, an inspiration that distinguishes art from gift, and poetry is a gift. Sidney's constant focal point within the Defense reflects the Platonism analogy of inspiration. The beauty proposition Plato theorized is the secret to the poet's power in elevating men to virtue.

An Apology for Poetry indicates the conception of defense against poetry, and also the supports Platonism theories. Although it is uncertain of Plato's true emotive intentions regarding poetry, Sidney appears to have an understanding of depicting the bases of Plato's poetic contraction. The decisive attitude Plato portrays on poetry speaks volumes from the influence Socrates input about poetry.

In the essay, Sidney administers two dissimilar definitions of poetry. The first most persistently used definition, " Poesy therefore is an art of i termeth it in his word Mimesis, that is to say, a representing, counterfetting, or figure forth: to speake metaphorically, a speaking picture: with this end, to teach and delight" (Dowlin 573). Sidney utilizes this definition as the primary focal point of defending what he perceives as durable and probable knowledge. This particular statement generates a broader perception and division of various types of poetry:

Religious, which imitates "the inconceviable [but nonetheless real] excellencies of God"; philosophical, which deals with moral, natural, astronomical, and historical matter, and which merely copies rather than invents or feigns; and the work of the "right poets", who "to imitate borrow nothing of what is, hath been, or shall be: but range with only learned discretion, into the divine consideration of what may be, and should be" (Dowlin 574).

The second definition is more complex and definite, "But it [poetry] is that faying notable images of virtues, vices, or what else, with that delightful teaching, which must be the right describing note to know a Poet by" (Dowlin 574). Both definitions are of great importance, but the second defines the ideals of forming images or patterns of perfection, that reject verse or any other accessory that distinguishes characters of poetry. All these contributions numerously appear as important techniques constituting poetry.

Sidney's second definition provides a considerable association with the Republic's tenth book; he sought after certain passages from Plato, transpiring the words into memorable phrases, discussing images, and explaining the virtues and vices poetry instructs. Even though Sidney acknowledges Plato within his writings, he opposes several analogies Plato insists. In Sidney's Two Definitions of Poetry, the author suggests Sidney purposely neglects Plato's "images of virtues and vices" but adds, "or what else", a probable notion that Sidney's phrase "or what else" was replaced by Plato's "all things divine". The expression "or what else", is perceived as a remark that accepts or opposes divine inspiration. These minor replacements add a perplexing point of purpose to Sidney's true intentions in defending poetry.

The reading of An Apology of Poetry is detailed with Sidney's anti-historical and anti-philosophic dispositions. He constitutes an argument defend poetry as the superior option over history and philosophy. Prior to Sidney's revelation of poetry, he read and was instructed on the concepts of history. Sidney is no stranger to history and philosophy, but his overachieving knowledge of learning, gravitates his thoughts on the conceptual framework of poetry. According to History in Sidney's Apology, the author Elizabeth Donno suggests, "Sidney had a theoretical distrust of any over-insistence on the value of history". There is a falsehood of Sidney's anti-historical or anti-philosophic dispositions; there was no rejection of the subjects, but he sought after profound ways to express history and philosophic ideologies by using poetry. "the Historian proper makes himself a discourser exhibiting the capacity for reflection and reason for profit and an Orator, yea a Poet sometimes for ornament" (Donne 284). Sidney shows himself as an orator "making excellent orations"; he considers himself to be a poet, in painting forth what has already been created, "the effects, the motions, the whisperings of the people". The historian often reflects a divine inspirer, or allocation opinions:

"in telling his opinion and reasons in religion, sometimes the lawyer in shrewing the cases and benefits of laws, sometime a natural philosopher in setting down the cases of strange thing which the history compels him to speak of, but most commonly a moral philosopher either in the thick part when he sets forth virtues or vices and the natures of passion or in the politic (as he often does) with matters of the estate" (Donne 286).

Historians do not profess one specific art, they deal with all arts according to which ever art instructs their lives.

Sidney acknowledges the pleasure from reading ancient, medieval and modern historians. In regards to Sidney's essay, establishes poetry as the chief and most efficient of several arts. Sidney insists that philosophy, law, history and divinity, are considered the only devices that deal with a man's internal manners. Other subjects such as astronomy, music, mathematics, and supernatural philosophy are only practical matters dealing with the external self. In Sidney's view, philosophy and history are merely rejected as strategic ploy. Historians instruct on facts and not the possible. Philosophers educate in an abstract manner, delivering vague ideas. He declares history and philosophy make use of poetry, he names Plato as a sophisticated philosopher, "of all the philosophers I have ever esteemed most worthy of reverence, and with great reason: since of all philosophers he is the most poetical" (Donne 288). A successful philosopher borrows and quotes phrases from Plato. Historians are "bound to tell things as they were" (Donne 289), and he is consequently engaging when his thoughts pattern poetry.

Poets are teachers, and their instruction is advocating the virtues and vices that indicate moral excellence. There is a poetic license that validates the truth, and deliberates a theory of what is possible and probable. A poet is the least the least liar, but poetry does not reflect affirmation. Historians and philosophers' value fiction, opinionate reason, and often fabricate the truth. The function of poetry is to teach and to delight, but poetry also delivers knowledge, moving one to act off inspiration and emotions. Entertainment is circled around the works of poets. The most important subject is centered through the act of praxis (practice), a subject that is not practiced is considered a durable element.

According to Allusive Coherence in Sidney's Apology for Poetry by John Hunt, states "the critical consensus that the Apology is a fundamentally Aristotlelian work has been tested by recognition of its many Platonic elements and its extensive use of Stoic, Neoplatonic, and Christian ideas". An Apology for Poetry, shows how often Sidney alluded to several concepts from other authors. He maintains the concept to all knowledge is religious: "to restore the soul as much of its lost perfection as is possible", a condition of enlightenment that aspires the soul into a state of felicity. The soul is lifted up from the boundaries of moral consciousness:

Learning, under what name so ever it come forth, or to what immediate end so ever it be directed, the final end is to lead and draw us to as high a perfection as our degenerate souls, made worse by their clay lodgings, can be capable of. For some that thought this felicity principally to be gotten by knowledge, and no knowledge to be so high and heavenly as acquaintance with the stars, gave themselves to Astronomy… (An Apology for Poetry).

Sidney's final recommendation to end education is soul searching, finding the inner happiness that leads to perfection.

Sidney's Dramatic Criticism

(a) Tragedy and Tragi-Comedy

Sidney's remarks on tragedy and comedy are equally illuminating and interesting. Says Spingarn in this connection, "Dramatic criticism in England began with Sir Philip Sidney. Cultural references to the drama can be found in critical writings anterior to the Defence of Poesy; but to Sidney belongs the credit of having first formulated, in a more or less systematic manner, the general principles of dramatic art." These principles, it need hardly be said, are those which, for half a century or more, had been undergoing discussion and modification in Italy and France, and of which the ultimate source was the Poetics of Aristotle. "Dramatic criticism in England was thus, from its very birth, both Aristotelian and classical, and it remained so for two centuries."

The Senecan drama and the Aristotelian precepts were the sources of Sidney's theory of tragedy. The oratorical and sententious tragedies of Seneca had influenced dramatic theory and practice throughout Europe from the very outset of the Renaissance. Ascham, indeed, preferred Sophocles and Euripides to Seneca; but he is an exception, and in direct opposition to the usual opinion of contemporary critics. Sidney, in his account of the English drama, could find but one tragedy modeled, as it should be, on the Senecan drama. The tragedy of Gorboduc, however, has one defect that provokes Sidney's censure,—it does not observe the unities of time and place. In all other respects, it is an ideal model for English playwrights to imitate. Its stately speeches and well-sounding phrases, approach almost to the height of Seneca's style; and in teaching most delight fully notable morality, it attains the very end of poetry.

The ideal tragedy—and in this Sidney closely follows Aristotle and the Italians—-is an imitation of a noble action, in the representation of which it stirs, "admiration and teaches commiseration", and teaches the uncertainty of the world and the weak foundations upon which golden roofs are built. "It makes kings fear to be tyrant, and tyrants manifest their tyrannical humours." Sidney's censure of the contemporary tragedy is that it outrages the grave and weighty character of tragedy, its elevated style, and the dignity of the personages represented, by mingling kings and clowns, and introducing the most inappropriate buffoonery. Never did the ancients, like the English, "match hornpipes with funerals". The English dramas are neither true comedies nor true tragedies and they disregard both the rules of poetry and honest civility. Tragedy is not tied to the laws of history, and may arrange and modify events as it pleases; but it is certainly bound by the rules of poetry. It is evident, therefore, that the Defence of Poesy, as a French writer has observed, "gives us an almost complete theory of neo-classic tragedy, a hundred years before 'Art Poetique' of Boileau; the severe separation of poetic forms, the sustained dignity of language, the unities, nothing is lacking."

(b) Comedy

Sidney's theory of comedy is based on the body of rules and observations, which the Italian critics, aided by a few hints from Aristotle, had deduced from the practice of the Greek dramatists. Sidney defines comedy, "as an imitation of the common errors of life, which are represented in the most ridiculous and scornful manner, so that the spectator is anxious to avoid such errors himself." Comedy, therefore, shows the "filthiness of evil", but only in, "our private and domestically matters". It should aim at being wholly delightful, just as tragedy, should be maintained by a well-raised admiration. Delight is thus the first requirement of comedy; but the English comic writers err in thinking that delight cannot be obtained without laughter, whereas laughter is neither an essential effect of delight nor is necessary for it. Sidney thus distinguishes delight from laughter. The great fault of English comedy is that it stirs laughter concerning things that' are sinful, i.e. wicked rather than merely ridiculous— forbidden plainly, according to Sidney, by Aristotle himself—and concerning things that are miserable, rather to be pitied than scorned. Not only should comedy produce delightful laughter, but also it should mix with it that delightful teaching which is the end of all poetry. Human follies or errors, rather than human vice and wickedness, or the poverty of men, are the proper themes of comedy. Sidney's distinction between delight and laughter is psychological and the most original part of his treatise. It should also be noted that the aim of comedy is to expose and ridicule human folly such as affectation, hypocrisy, so that such follies may be corrected. Thus, he makes comedy a weapon of social reform. Comedy is not merely to provide delight; it must also correct and improve. As vice cannot be corrected merely by being laughed at, it is excluded from the domain of comedy. Similarly, a poor man is not to be laughed at for lie is not at fault for his poverty.

(c) The Unities:

The unities of time and place were first formulated in Italy and France about the middle of the 15th century. The first mention of the unities in England is to be found, more than a dozen years later, in this Defence of Poesy, and it cannot be doubted that Sidney derived them directly from the Italian critic Castelvetro. Sidney in discussing the tragedy of Gorboduc, finds it, "faulty in time and place, the two necessary companions of all corporal actions; for where the stage should always represent but one place, and the uttermost time presupposed in it should be, both by Aristotle's percept and common reason, but one day, there (i.e. in Gorboduc) is both many days and many placer, inartistically imagined." He also objects to the absurdities of the English stage, where on one side Africa and on the other Asia may be represented, and where in an hour a youth may grow from boyhood to old age. How absurd this is, commonsense, art, and ancient examples ought to teach the English playwright; and at this day, says Sidney, even the ordinary player in Italy will not err in it. If, indeed, it be objected that one or two of the comedies of Plautus and Terence do not observe the unity of time, let us not follow them when they err, but when, they are right; it is no excuse for us to do wrong because Plautus, on one occasion, has done likewise.

The rule of the three unities did not receive such, rigid application in England, as is given by Sidney, until the introduction of the French influence nearly three quarters of a century later. Ben Jonson is considerably less stringent in this respect than Sidney.

Philip Sidney: His Ideas on Poetry

Definition of Poetry:

But before proceeding to defend an art so ancient and univer¬sal, it is necessary to define it; and the definition which Sidney gives agrees substantially with what might be designated Renaissance Aristotelianism. "Poetry", says Sidney, "is an art of imitation, for so Aristotle termeth it, that is to say, a representing, counterfeiting or figuring forth; to speak metaphorically, a speaking picture, with this end,—to teach and delight." Poetry is, accordingly, an art of imitation and not merely the art of "versifying"; for although most poets have seen fit to apparel their poetic inventions in verse, verse is but the raiment and ornament of poetry, and not one of its causes or essentials. Rhyming and versing do not make one a poet. "One may be a poet without versing", says Sidney, "and d versifier without poetry." Speech and reason are the distinguishing features between man and brute; and whatever helps to perfect and polish "speech deserves high commendation. Besides this, verse is the most fitting raiment of poetry, because it is the most dignified and compact, not colloquial and slipshod. It is also an aid to memory, for one word in it is fitted with another that by remembering the one you recall the other. But with all its merits, it is not an essential part of poetry, of which the true test is this – feigning notable images of vices and virtues, and teaching delightfully.

Function of Poetry:

In regard to the object, or function of poetry, Sidney is at one with Scaliger. The aim of poetry is accomplished by teaching most delightfully a notable morality; or, in a word, by delightful instruction. Not instruction alone, or delight alone, as Horace had said, but instruction made delightful; and it is this dual function which serves not only as the end but as the very test of poetry. The object of all arts and sciences is to lift human life to the highest altitudes of perfection; and in this respect they are all servants of the sovereign or poetry, whose end is well-doing and not well-knowing only. Virtuous action is, therefore, the end of all learning; and Sidney sets out to prove that the poet, more than anyone else, fulfils this end.

Then Sidney proceeds to examine the objections that have been brought against poetry, and refutes them one by one. But, first, he demonstrates the superiority of poetry over history and philosophy. The ancient controversy—ancient even in Plato's days—between poetry and philosophy is once more reopened. The gist of Sidney's argument is that while the philosopher teaches by precept alone, and the historian by example alone, the poet conduces most of virtue because he employs both precept and example. The philosopher teaches virtue by showing what virtue is and what vice is, by setting down, in abstract argument, and without clarity or beauty of style, the bare principles of morality. The historian teaches virtue by showing the experience of past ages; but, being tied down to what actually happened, that is, to the particular truth of things and not to general possibilities, the example he depicts draws no necessary consequence. The poet alone accomplishes this dual task. What the philosopher says should be done is, by the poet, pictured most perfectly in some one by whom it has been done, thus coupling the general notion with the particular instance. The philosopher, moreover, teaches the learned only; but the poet teaches all, and so is, in Plutarch's phrase, "the right popular philosopher". He seems only to promise delight, and moves men to virtue unaware. But even if the philosopher excels the poet in teaching, he cannot move his virtuous action as the poet can, and this is of higher importance than teaching, for what is the use of teaching virtue, if the pupil is not moved to act and accomplish what he is taught? On the other hand, the historian deals with particular instances, with vices and virtues so mingled together in the same personage that the reader can find no pattern to imitate. The poet improves, upon history; he gives perfect examples of vices and virtues for human imitation; he makes virtue succeed and vice fail, and this history can but seldom do. Poetry does not imitate nature; it is the reader who imitates the example of perfection presented to him by the poet. He is thus made virtuous. Poetry, therefore, conduces to virtue, the end of all learning better than any other art or science, and so deserves the palm as the highest and the noblest form of human wisdom.

Poetic Imitation: Creative Process

The basis of Sidney's distinction between the poet and the historian is the famous passage in which Aristotle explains why poetry is more philosophic and of more serious value than history. The poet deals, not with the particular, but with the universal — with what might or should be, not with what is or has been. But Sidney, in the assertion of this principle, follows Minturno and Scaliger, and goes farther than Aristotle would probably have gone. All arts have the works of nature as their principal object of imitation, and follow nature as actors follow the lines of their play. Only the poet is not tied to such subjects, but creates another nature better than nature herself. For, going hand in hand with nature, and being enclosed not within her limits, but only by, "the zodiac of his own imagination", he creates a golden world in place of nature's brazen; and in this sense he may be compared as a creator with God. Where shall you find in life, asks, Sidney, such a friend as Plyades, such a hero as Orlando, such an excellent man as Æneas?

Puritan Objections to Poetry: Sidney's Defence of it

Sidney then proceeds to answer the various objections that have been made against poetry. These objections, partly following Gosson and Cornelins Agrippa, and partly his own inclinations, he reduces to four. In the first place, it is objected that a man might spend his time more profitably than by reading the figments of poets. Poetry is a mere waste of time. But since teaching virtue is the real him of all learning, and since poetry has been shown to accomplish this better than all other arts or sciences, this objection is easily answered. The study of poetry is most profitably for it imparts delightful instruction and so moves man to virtuous action. In the second place, poetry has been called the mother of lies; but Sidney shows that it is less likely to tell a lie than other sciences, for the poet does not assert the figments of his imagination as facts, and, since he affirms nothing, he cannot ever be said to lie. The poet never affirms and so he never lies for to lie is to affirm that to be true which is not true in reality. A poet's truths are ideal and universal. Thirdly poetry has been called, "the nurse of abuse", that is to say, poetry misuses and debases the mind of man by turning it to wantonness and by making it unmartial and effeminate. But Sidney argues that it is man's wit that abuses poetry, and not poetry that abuses man's wit; and as to making men effeminate, this charge applies to all other sciences more than to poetry, which in its description of battles and praises of valiant men, stirs courage and enthusiasm. That is why in ancient times great warriors carried the words of poets with them. Lastly, it is poin poetry that Plate, one of the greatest philosophers, banished poets from his ideal commonwealth. But Plato's Dialogues are in reality themselves a form of poetry; and it shows ingratitude in the most poetical of philosophers, that he should defile the fountain which was his source. "Yet, though Sidney perceives how fundamental are Plato's objections to poetry, he is inclined to believe that it was rather against the abuse of poetry by the contemporary Greek poets that Plato was chiefly cavailling; for poets are praised in the Ion, and the greatest men of every age have been patrons and lovers of poetry".— (Spingarn). It should be remembered that in the Ion Plato has called poets "light and winged things", moved by divine frenzy.

Modern Tragedy

Raymond Williams (1921-1988)

Raymond Williams was one of Britain's greatest post-war cultural historians, theorists and polemicists. He was a distinguished literary and social thinker and was concerned to understand literature and related cultural forms not as the outcome of an isolated aesthetic adventure, but as the manifestation of a deeply social process that involved a series of complex relationships between authorial ideology, institutional process, and generic/aesthetic form. He was the author of many works; most notable among them is "Modern Tragedy".

Raymond Williams was born into a working-class family in Pandy, a village on 31August 1921, in the parish of Llanfihangel, in Monmouthshire, Wales, and was educated at Abergavenny Grammar School and Trinity College, Cambridge. He became a member of the Communist Party in his first year as an undergraduate and collaborated with Eric Hobsbawm—an undergraduate contemporary —in writing a pamphlet in defence of the Russian invasion of Finland. Two undergraduate years at Cambridge were followed by conscription into the British Army in 1941, active service as a tank officer during the Allied invasion of Europe, and a further undergraduate year at Cambridge when the war was over. After a short period spent editing small-circulation magazines in London, he settled first in Sussex and later in Oxford as a salaried lecturer for the Oxford Extra-Mural Delegacy (Oxford's organization for adult education), expounding for the benefit of (putatively) working-class audiences that trust in culture and mistrust of capitalism, and that belief in D. H. Lawrence which some Marxists and ex-Marxists shared with the followers of F. R. Leavis.

On joining the army, Williams seems to have lost touch with the Communist Party. Later he became a supporter of the Labour Party, but appears for a long time to have been interested less in the political than in the cultural objections to capitalism. After theLabour victory at the general election of 1966, he resigned from the Labour Party inprotest against the elitist cynicism or ruling-class character of Mr. Harold Wilson's leadership. In spite of resuming support for Labour later, he then became one of the half dozen or so freestanding Marxists who fostered the analytical outrage with which the English New Left and the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament have embarrassed the Labour leaders, eased Mrs. Thatcher's way electorally, and made the Labour Party as unelectable as like-minded Democrats have made successive Democratic presidential candidates in the United States.

From an early stage, Williams wanted to be a writer rather than a don and a novelist as well as a critic and from his first period in Cambridge was a journalist and public speaker. Public speaking and small-circulation journalism remained with him for the rest of his life, along with an interest in film and television, while Border Country(1960)—his first and only tolerable novel—gave confusing insights into what he was trying to say morally and politically.

Border Country gave a low-keyed account of relations between a father and a son. Though it dealt with politics, it was dominated not by politics but by gratitude, nostalgia, and death, and by its account of the idyllic solidarity of a rural Welsh village. The novel resisted the idea that the meritocratic son or the entrepreneurial trade unionist was better than the dying railway man, and there was an anti-intellectual implication that a natural, unreconstructed, conservative way of life was more real than the academic way of life, which the son had adopted.

Border Country, though published later, was written at the same time as Kingsley Amis's Lucky Jim, which dealt with the academic problem from the academic end. But Amis had no experience he was willing to disclose in order to match the experience that Williams disclosed in Border Country, no yardstick except a satiric yardstick with which to compare a farcical university with the University of Oxford, and no more interest in explaining what he had learned from his mandarin education in Oxford than Williams had, as a novelist, in explaining what he had learned from his mandarin education in Cambridge.

In 1961 Williams returned to Cambridge for a third time, now as a lecturer (later a professor) in the Faculty of English. At the same time he became a fellow of Jesus College, to which he was brought by M. I. Finley, the American Marxist historian,.

Raymond Williams : Modern Tragedy

Introduction

Like Culture and Society, Modern Tragedy discussed texts—the main tragic texts and texts about tragic theory that had been written in Europe and the United States since Ibsen—and extracted from them a political message about the inadequacy of individuation and about the desirability of revolution. Modern Tragedy was written in a dense, coded prose. Decoded, it manifests the confusion between the cultural elite and the people which was a feature of Williams's doctrine throughout his work and which became particularly troublesome in this book, where dramatic and fictional tragedy were presented as realizations of the "shape and set" of modern "culture," and the dramatists and novelists who had produced it were assumed to represent "our" minds and experience.

This thesis was both elitist and anti-elitist, naïve about the prospect of bridging the gap between the cultural elite and the people but emphasizing the affiliations that kept Williams, as a member of the former, in conscious empathy with the latter. The effect was nevertheless odd, implying that Strindberg, Brecht, and Arthur Miller, for example, were not arcane, and amalgamating the "we" who went to their plays or listened to Williams's lectures in Cambridge with the "we" who had been described appreciatively in Border Country. However deep Williams's desire was to make "critical discrimination" relevant to the people among whom he had grown up, moreover, it neglected the consideration that critical discrimination was in fact a minority activity which spoke meaningfully only to those who had already heard Leavis's voice.

In Drama from Ibsen to Eliot (1952) Williams had criticized the English theatre as a manifestation of literary decline and for failing to achieve either "the communication" of an "experience" and a "radical reading of life," or that "total performance" which reflected "changes in the structure of feeling as a whole." In Modern Tragedy the central contentions were that "liberal" tragedy, while being liberal because it emphasized the "surpassing individual," and tragic because it recorded his defeat by society or the universe, reflected the inability of the money-oriented privacy of the bourgeois ethic to provide a "positive" conception of society. It was the "individual fight against the lie" embodied in "false relationships, a false society and a false conception of man" that Ibsen had made central, but it was the liberal martyrs' discovery of the lie in themselves and their failure to relate themselves to a "social" consciousness that heralded the "breakdown of liberalism" and the need to replace its belief in the primacy of "individualist" desire and aspiration by a socialist perception of the primacy of "common" desire and aspiration.

Williams wished to give tragic theory a social function. He pointed out that "significant suffering" was not confined to persons of "rank," and that personal belief, faults in the soul, "God," "death," and the "individual will" had been central to the tragic experience of the present. It was the "human agency" and "ethical control" manifested in revolution and the "deep social crisis through which we had all been living" that were the proper subjects of "modern" tragedy, and it was human agency and ethical control that tragic theory needed to accommodate. The first point that had to be explained was the Burkean point that revolution caused suffering. The second point was the anti-Burkean point that revolution was not the only cause of suffering, that suffering was "in the whole action" of which "revolution" was only "the crisis," and that it was suffering as an aspect of the "wholeness" of the action that needed to be considered. And this, of course, disclosed the real agenda in Modern Tragedy—the use of tragic texts to formulate a socialist theory of tragedy in which revolution would receive a literary justification and society would become more important than the individual.

In all this Williams was moving out from the defensiveness of Culture and Society and making a central feature of the argument that, when the revolutionary process was complete, "revolution" would become "epic," suffering would be "justified," and pre-revolutionary institutions, so far from being the "settled … innocent order" that they had claimed to be, would be seen to have been rooted in "violence and disorder." This was the route by which tragedy and tragic theory could remove cynicism and despair, could give revolution the "tragic" perspective that Marx had given it, and could show what tragedy had hitherto failed to show, that "degeneration, brutalization, fear, hatred and envy" were endemic in existing society's "tragic" failure to "incorporate … all its people as whole human beings." It was also the route by which tragedy and tragic theory could incorporate the fact that further "degeneration, brutalization, fear, hatred and envy" would be integral to the "whole action"—not just to the "crisis" and the revolutionary energy released by it or the "new kinds of alienation" which the revolution against alienation would have to "overcome … if it was to remain revolutionary," but also, and supremely, to the connection between "terror" and "liberation."

Williams's rhetoric was ruthless, and yet in retrospect looks faintly silly. Nor were the tasks that he attributed to tragic theory plausible. It remains

Modern Tragedy, while reiterating the formal denial that revolution was to be identified with the violent capture of power and identifying it rather as a "change … in the deepest structure of relationships and feelings," implied, more than any other of Williams's works, a circuitous but indubitably evil attempt to encourage the young to think of violence as morally reputable. In evaluating Williams, one wishes to be just. He should not be dismissed merely because his followers have helped to keep their party out of office, since many of them, and perhaps he also, regarded party politics as merely a convenient way of inserting their moral messages into the public mind. Like the theorists of the student revolution of the Sixties, Williams was "against liberalism," but those who are against liberalism for conservative reasons do not need his sort of support. They should not be misled by the "organicism" of Culture and Society, which ignored the moral solidarity of twentieth-century English society and used the language of solidarity in order to subvert such solidarity as monarchy and two world wars had created by denying that it existed. The most general fault in critical works is not avoided by even Williams.

Most of the critical books are written with and on the general assumption of some creative work by others. To write or give views on others is certainly not objectionable. What seems objectionable is the way of giving views or opinions without quoting the original creative work. What most of the critics do is very non-critical in a sense. They give first their own understanding of the work and then their views or opinions against or for this said work. What they do in this way is the critical analysis of their own understanding. It seems having nothing to do with the understanding of the writer's work or others' views about it. While going through a book of criticism one should keep in mind the original work the criticism is about.

Modern Tragedy : Chapter wise Summary

Tragedy and Tradition

William's writings in the post-war period had a kind of existentialist motif of blocked individual liberation. This essay is a discussion on the common and the traditional interpretations of tragedy. He has used his power of perception and has come with a strong thesis on the evolution of tragedy in the essay. In the previous essay, he tells the basics of tragedy in these words: we come to tragedy by many roads. It is an immediate experience, a body of literature, conflict of theory, an academic problem.

He believes that tragedy is not the death of kings; it is more personal and general. Tragedy is not simply death and suffering and it is certainly not accident. Nor is it simply a response to death and suffering. It is a particular kind of event and particular kind of response which are genuinely tragic and which the long tradition embodies. His basic thesis in this article is: the meaning of tragedy, the relationship of tradition to tragedy and the kinds of experience which we mistakenly call tragic.

We usually try to make a contrast between the traditional and the modern and try to compress and unify the various thinking of the past into a single tradition. About tradition Williams explains: it is a question, rather of realizing that a tradition is not the past; but an interpretation of the past – a selection and evaluation of ance than a neutral record and the present serves as a link between the traditional and the modern. When the unique Greek culture changed, the chorus which was the crucial element of dramatic form was discarded and the unique meaning of tragedy was lost. People think that the medieval period produced no tragedy, but Monk's Tale is the example in which we see protagonist falling from prosperity to adversity. Later tragedy became more secularized in the Renaissance and Neoclassical age. Now a change was visible. The moving force of tragedy was now quite clearly a matter of behaviour, rather than either a metaphysical condition or metaphysical fault.

Lessing (1729-81) was a noted German critic and dramatic poet. His major contribution to idea of tragedy is (a) a theoretical rejection of neo-classicism (b) a defence of Shakespeare (c) and an advocacy and writing of bourgeois tragedy. He said the Neoclassicism was a false classicism and the real inherit of the Greeks was Shakespeare and the real inherit of Shakespeare was the new national bourgeois tragedy. RW doesn't agree with Lessing he holds that Shakespeare was not the real inherit of the Greeks; rather he was a major instance of a new kind of tragedy. The character of Elizabethan tragedy is determined by a very complicated relationship between elements of an inherited order and elements of a new humanism. If the historical idea of the development is to be fully understood, we must understand the complicated process of secularization. In a sense, all drama after Renaissance is secular and the only fully religious tragedy we have is Greek because Elizabethan drama was totally secular. There was a concept of good and evil and poetic justice.

Hegel (1770-1831) was a famous German Philosopher did not reject the moral scheme of poetic justice but he described it as a triumph of ordinary morality and the work that embodied it as a social drama rather than tragedy. What is important for Hegel is not the suffering 'mere suffering' but its causes. Mere pity and fear are not tragic. Tragedy recognizes suffering as 'suspended over active characters entirely as the consequence of their own act'. It does not consider the external contingency beyond the control of the individual i.e. illness, loss of property, death or the like. For genuine tragedy, there must be individual freedom and independence. This conscious individuality is the only condition of tragedy.

Williams points two differences between modern and ancient tragedies. First, in ancient tragedy, the characters clearly represent the substantive ethical ends; in modern tragedy, ends are wholly personal. Secondly, in ancient tragedy, there is not only the downfall of conflicting persons and ends in the achievement of eternal justice. An individual may surrender his partial and under a higher command; in modern tragedy, the whole question of resolution is more abstract and colder. Reconciliation, when it comes, will often be within the character and will be more complicated. Hegel's interpretation of tragedy is part of a general philosophy rather than a historical criticism.

Schopenhauer (1788-1860) and Nietzsche (1844-1900) are two German philosophers whose views also contributed to the development of tragedy. Before Schopenhauer, tragedy was associated with (a) ethical crises (b) human growth and (c) history. He secularized the idea of fate when he said, 'the true sense of tragedy is the deeper insight, that is not his own individual sins that the hero atones for, but original sin, i.e. the crime of existence itself'. Tragedy, according to Nietzsch which it resolves in a higher unity. There the hero, the highest manifestation of the will, is destroyed, but the eternal life of the will remains unaffected. According to him, the action of tragedy is not moral, not purgative, but aesthetic.

Tragedy and Contemporary Ideas

Tragedy and Contemporary Ideas presents the discussion on tragedy in relation to the contemporary ideas. The writer has discussed the four things:

(a) Order and accident.

(b) The destruction of the hero.

(c) The irreparable action and its connections with death.

(d) The emphasis of evil.

It is generally said that there is no significant meaning in 'everyday tragedies' because the event itself is not tragic; only becomes so with a through a shaped response. Williams does not agree to this view. He cannot see how it is possible to distinguish between an event and response to an event, in any absolute way.

In the case of ordinary death and suffering, when we see mourning and lament, when we see people breaking under their actual loss, we have entered tragedy. Other responses are also possible such as indifference, justification, and rejoicing. But where we feel the suffering, we are within the dimensions of tragedy. But a burnt family or a mining disaster which leaves people without feeling are called Accidents. The events not seen as tragic are deep in the pattern of our own culture: war, famine, work, traffic, and politics.

To feel no tragic meaning in them is a sort of our bankruptcy. Rank was the dividing line because the death of some people mattered more than others. Our middle class culture rejects this. The tragic of a citizen could be as real as the tragedy of a prince. The emerging middle class rejected rank in tragedy. The individual was not a state; but the entity in himself.

Order in tragedy is the result of the action. In tragedy, the creation of order is related to the fact of disorder, through which the action moves. It may be the pride of man set against the nature of things. In different cultures, disorder and order both vary, for there are parts of varying general interpretations of life. We should see this variation as an indication of the major cultural importance of tragedy as form of art.

The most common interpretation of tragedy is that it is an action in which the hero is destroyed. The fact is seen irreparable. In most tragedies, the story does not end with the destruction of the hero; it follows on. It is not the job of the artist to provide answers and solutions; but simply describe experience and raise questions. Modern tragedy is not what happens to the hero; but what happens through him. When we concentrate on the hero, we are unconsciously confining our attention to the individual.

The tragic experience lies in the fact that life does not come back, that its meanings are reaffirmed and restored after so much suffering and after so important a death. Death gives importance and meaning to life. The death of an individual brings along the whole community in the form of rituals and condolence as in Adam Bede; so tragedy is social and collective and not individual and personal. Death is absolute and all our living simply relative. Death is necessary and all other human ends are contingent (social collectivity). Death is universal so a man tied to it quickly claims university.

Man dies alone is an interpretation and not a fact; because man dies in many different conditions i.e. among machines, due to bombs, in the arms, with or without family, in their presence and absence. When he dies, he affects others. He alters the lives of other characters. To insist on a single meaning is not reasonable. Our most common received interpretations of life put the highest value and significance on the individual and his development; but it is indeed inescapable that the individual dies. Tragedy dramatizes evil in many particular forms: not only Christian evil but also cultural, political and ideological. Good and evil are not absolute. We are good or bad in particular ways and in particular situations; defined by pressures we at one received and can alter and can create again.

Rejection of Tragedy

This essay is a study of the rejection of tragedy in modern age with special reference to Bertolt Brechet who founded epic theatre as compared to the emotional theory of Aristotle. He rejected the conventional idea of tragedy and made tragedy more experiential and rational. He also said, 'the sufferings of this man appeal me because they are unnecessary'. He made people think above the situation presented in the tragedy and not within. Aristotelian drama enforced thinking from within and Brechet's theatre from without. He used distancing affects to turn people like who sit in the chair, smoke and observe. He showed that the audience wanted to see. Williams has discussed six plays: The Three Penny Opera, Saint Joan of the Stockyard, Die Massnahme, The Good Woman of Sezuen, Mother Courage and Her Children and the Life of Galileo. In the last play mentioned, the hero is offered two choices one between accepting the terms or the other being destroyed. Nevertheless, the hero recants. Tragedy in one of the older terms has been rejected by Brechet.

He then discusses Brechet's theatre and tells us why he rejected the classical tragedy and introduced rational theatre.

Theatre or theatre is the branch of the performing arts concerned with acting out stories in front of an audience using combinations of speech, gesture, mime, music, dance, sound and spectacle — indeed any one or more elements.

What he wanted theatre to be, Brecht believed that the theatre's broadest function was to educate. "It is the noblest function that we have found for 'theatre'". Brecht wanted the answer to Lenin's question 'Wie und was soll man lernen?' ('How and what should one learn?'). He created an influential theory of theatre, the epic theatre, wherein a play should not cause the spectator to emotionally identify with the action before him or her, but should instead provoke rational self-reflection and a critic the stage. He believed that the experience of a climactic catharsis of emotion left an audience complacent. Instead, he wanted his audiences to use this critical perspective to identify social ills at work in the world and be moved to go forth from the theatre and effect change.

Hans Eisler has noted that these plays resemble political seminars. Brecht described them as "a collective political meeting" in which the audience is to participate actively. One sees in this model a rejection of the concept of the bureaucratic elite party where the politicians are to issue directives and control the behaviour of the masses. For this purpose, Brecht employed the use of techniques that remind the spectator that the play is a representation of reality and not reality itself, which he called the Verfremdungseffekt (translated as distancing effect, estrangement effect, or alienation effect). Such techniques included the direct address by actors to the audience, transposition of text to third person or past tense, speaking the stage direction out loud, exaggerated, unnatural stage lighting, the use of song, and explanatory placards. By highlighting the constructed nature of the theatrical event, Brecht hoped to communicate that the audience's reality was, in fact a construction and, as such, was changeable.

Another technique that Brecht employed to achieve his Verfremdungseffekt was the principle of historicisation. The principle of 'historicizaton' is a fundamental part of the Marxist aesthetics developed by the Germany Modernism theatre practitioner Bertolt Brecht. The content of many of his plays dealt with fictional tellings of historical figures or events. His idea was that if one were to tell a story from a time that is contemporary to an audience, they may not be able to maintain the critical perspective he hoped to achieve. Instead, he focused on historical stories that had parallel themes to the social ills he was hoping to illuminate in his own time. He hoped that, in viewing these historical stories from a critical perspective, the contemporary issues Brecht was addressing would be illuminated to the audience.

In one of his first productions, Brecht famously put up signs that said "Glotzt nicht so romantisch!" ("Don't stare so romantically!"). His manner of stagecraft has proven both fruitful and confusing to those who try to produce his works or works in his style. His theory of theatre has heavily influenced modern theatre. Some of his innovations have become so common that they've entered the theatrical canon.

Although Brecht's work and his ideas about theatre are generally considered as belong to modernism. Modernism is a trend of thought which affirms the power of human beings to make, improve and reshape their environment, with the aid of scientific knowledge, technology and practical experimentation, there is recent thought that he is the forerunner of contemporary postmodern theatre practice. This is particularly so because he questioned and dissolved many of the accepted practices of the theatre of his time and created a political theatre. Political theatre is drama or performing art which emphasizes a political issue or issues in its theme or plot that involved the audience in understanding its meaning. Moreover, he was one of the first theatre practitioners to incorporate multimedia into the semiotics. Semiotics, or semiology, is the study of sign, both individually and grouped in sign systems of theatre.

Raymond Williams' Concept of 'Tragedy and Tradition'

William's writings in the post-war period had a kind of existentialist motif of blocked individual liberation. The essay 'Tragedy and Tradition' is a discussion on the common and the traditional interpretations of tragedy. He has used his power of perception and has come with a strong thesis on the evolution of tragedy in the essay. Raymond Williams takes the subject of tragedy as a form of art and tragedy as an experience. He retraces the tradition of tragedy as he believes in the continuity of tradition. He doesn't want to reject the present by the past or vice versa; but he thinks that concept of tradition is important to understand modern tragedy. In the previous essay, he tells the basics of tragedy in these words: we come to tragedy by many roads. "It is an immediate experience, a body of literature, conflict of theory, an academic problem"

He believes that tragedy is not the death of kings; it is more personal and general. Tragedy is not simply death and suffering and it is certainly not accident. Nor is it simply a response to death and suffering. It is a particular kind of event and particular kind of response which are genuinely tragic and which the long tradition embodies. His basic thesis in this article is: "The meaning of tragedy, the relationship of tradition to tragedy and the kinds of experience which we mistakenly call tragic"

Discussing the historical development of tragedy, Williams says that when the unique Greek culture changed, the chorus which was the crucial element of dramatic form was discarded and the unique meaning of tragedy was lost. He says that things change and concepts change. On the basis of our concepts we tend to seek permanent meanings in art, which, according to Williams, is a serious mistake. People think that the medieval period produced no tragedy, but 'Monk's Tale' is the example in which we see protagonist falling from prosperity to adversity. Thus again, according to him, is the result of the fixation to an absolute meaning of tragedy. He says: "It is not that we lack the evidence. But we fail to use it because it doesn't fit our idea of tragedy"

Later tragedy became more secularized in the Renaissance and Neoclassical age. During Renaissance, there is a precise emphasis on the fall of famous men, as 'Rank' was still important because the fate of ruling class was the fate of the city. But with the dissolution of feudal world, the practice of tragedy made new connections. The stories were transformed. During the neoclassical period emphasis on dignity and nobility of the hero continued. But the moving force of the tragedy was now a matter of behaviour rather than a metaphysical condition. The real question of tragedy now was moral than metaphysical. The tragic error was moral, a weakness in an otherwise good man who could still be pitied. After Williams has discussed the idea of tragedy, he gives his reading of 18th and 19th century tragic theories.

Lessing was a noted German critic and dramatic poet. He said the Neoclassicism was a false classicism and the real inheritor of the Greeks was Shakespeare and the real inherit of Shakespeare was the new national bourgeois tragedy. Raymond Williams doesn't agree with Lessing. He holds that Shakespeare was not the real inheritor of the Greeks; rather he was a major instance of a new kind of tragedy. The character of Elizabethan tragedy is determined by a very complicated relationship between elements of an inherited order and elements of a new humanism. If th development is to be fully understood, we must understand the complicated process of secularization. The only fully religious tragedy we have is Greek because Elizabethan drama was totally secular. Williams calls it a case of 'Backward assimilation' which ignores 'forward assimilation'. Secular drama was a major step in the historical development in the idea of tragedy. In fact, Elizabethan tragedy anticipates the trends of Humanism and Romanticism. Raymond William says: "In one sense, all drama after Renaissance is secular"

Elizabethan drama was secular in practice but retained a Christian consciousness. Neo-classical is the first stage of substantial secularization. It insisted on relating suffering to moral error. Tragedy, in this view, shows suffering as a consequence of moral error and happiness as a consequence of virtue; meeting the demands of poetic justice. The weakness is that morality is static and moral emphasis is merely dogmatic. Further he discusses Hegel who didn't reject the moral scheme of poetic justice but he said that emphasis on morality would make a work social drama not tragedy. Tragedy, he said, was a specific kind of spiritual action. What is important for Hegel is not the suffering 'mere suffering' but its causes. Mere pity and fear are not tragic. It does not consider the external contingency beyond the control of the individual i.e. illness, loss of property, death or the like. To Hegel, conscious individuality, individual freedom and self-determination are essential for genuine tragic action. Hegel asserts that tragedy recognizes suffering as: "Suspended over active characters entirely as the consequence of their own act."

The modern tragedy is wholly personal and our interest is directed not to the abstract ethical questions but to the individual and his conditions. As with Karl Marx, Renaissance tragedy has been seen as the result of the conflict between dying feudalism and the new individualism. Individual suffers, not because he is conflict with gods or fate, but with the process of the social transformation. Tragic hero, in Marxist Criticism becomes 'world historical individual', in conflict with 'world-spirit'. Williams reads Schopenhauer who believes that tragedy and sufferings are rooted in human nature and that these above and beyond particular causes. To this tragic sense of life, ethical and historical considerations are irrelevant. Misfortunes and sufferings are not exceptions but normal facts of life. So, the meaning of tragedy is resignation to the nature of life. For Nietzsche, tragedy dramatizes a tension which is resolved in higher order. According to him, the action of tragedy is not moral, not purgative, but aesthetic. Williams argues that we usually try to make a contrast between the traditional and the modern and try to compress and unify the various thinking of the past into a single tradition. About tradition Williams explains:

"It is a question, rather of realizing that a tradition is not the past; but an interpretation of the past – a selection and evaluation of ancestors rather than a neutral record and the present serves as a link between the traditional and the modern".

Tragedy in Contemporary Ideas

This part deals with the contemporary tragic theories and literature. He presents the discussion on tragedy in relation to the contemporary ideas. The writer has discussed the four things: order and accident, the destruction of the hero, the irreparable its connections with death and the emphasis of evil. The tragic experience of every age is unique. Williams says that modern and its suffering are very complex and it would be a mistake to interpret the tragic experience of the modern man in the light of the traditional concepts. Tragic experience attracts the beliefs and tensions of a period.

It is neither possible nor desirable to have a single permanent theory of tragedy. Such an attempt would be based on the assumption that human nature is permanent and unchanging. Rejecting the universalistic character of tragedy, Williams says:"Tragedy is not a single or permanent fact, but a series of conventions and institutions. The varieties of tragic experience are to be interpreted by reference to the changing conventions and institutions"

It is generally said that there is no significant meaning in 'everyday tragedies' because the event itself is not tragic; only becomes so with a through a shaped response. Williams does not agree to this view. He cannot see how it is possible to distinguish between an event and response to an event, in any absolute way. In the case of ordinary death and suffering, when we see mourning and lament, when we see people breaking under their actual loss, we have entered tragedy. Other responses are also possible such as indifference, justification, and rejoicing. But where we feel the suffering, we are within the dimensions of tragedy. But a burnt family or a mining disaster which leaves people without feeling are called Accidents. The events not seen as tragic are deep in the pattern of our own culture: war, famine, work, traffic, and politics. To feel no tragic meaning in them is a sort of our bankruptcy. Rank was the dividing line because the death of some people mattered more than others. Our middle class culture rejects this. The tragic of a citizen could be as real as the tragedy of a prince. The emerging middle class rejected rank in tragedy. The individual was not a state; but the entity in him. Williams is averse to any kind of theorizing so he declares: "It is necessary to break the theory if we are to value art"

Raymond Williams rejects the argument that event itself is not tragic but becomes so through a shaped response. It is not possible to distinguish between an event and response to an event. We may not response but it doesn't mean that the event is absent. Suffering is suffering whether we are moved by it or not. In this way, an accident is tragic even if we do not apply to it the concepts of 'ethical claim' or 'human agency'. He also doesn't seem to approve the distinction between accident and tragedy. Famine, war and traffic and political events are all tragic. It is often believed that tragedy was possible in the age of faith and it was impossible now, because we have no faith. Williams, on the contrary, believes that the ages of comparatively stable belief do not produce tragedy of any intensity. Important tragedy seems to occur, neither in periods of real stability not in the periods of open and decisive conflicts. Its most common historical setting is the period preceding the complete breakdown of an important culture. Its condition is the tension between the old and the new order. In such situations, the process of dramatizing and resolving disorder and sufferings is intensified to the level which can be most readily recognized as tragedy. Order in tragedy is the result of the action. In tragedy, the creation of order is related to the fact of disorder, through which the action moves. It may be the pride of man set against the nature of things. In different cultures, disorder and order both vary, for there are parts of varying general interpretations of life. We should see this va the major cultural importance of tragedy as form of art. We can see his argument as under: "I do not see how it is finally possible to distinguish between an event and response to an event" and further "behind the façade of the emphasis on order, the substance of tragedy withered"

The most common misinterpretation of the tragedy is that hero is destroyed at the end. Our attention is so concentrated on the hero that we miss other aspects of tragedy. Reading of Hamlet without the Prince Hamlet is nothing but reading it without the State of Denmark would also be meaningless. Destruction of the hero is normally not the end of the action. In most tragedies, the story does not end with the death of the hero; it follows on. It is not the job of the artist to provide answers; but simply describe experience and raise questions. Modern tragedy is not what happens to the hero; but what happens through him. When we concentrate on the hero, we are unconsciously confining our attention to the individual. The tragic experience lies in the fact that life does not come back, that its meanings are reaffirmed and restored after so much suffering and after so important a death. Death gives importance and meaning to life. The death of an individual brings along the whole community in the form of rituals and condolence as in 'Adam Bede'; so tragedy is social and collective and not individual or personal. Death is absolute and all our living is simply relative. Death is necessary and all other human ends are socially collective. Death is universal so a dead man quickly claims universality. When we confine ourselves to the hero, we are, unconsciously, narrowing the scope of tragedy. By attaching too much attention to the death, we minimize the real tragic sense of life. Man dies alone is an interpretation; not a fact; when he dies, he affects others. He alters the lives of other characters. To insist on a single meaning is not reasonable. The tragic action is about death but it need not end in death. Moreover, what about the other characters who are destroyed? Williams says: "We think of tragedy as what happens to the hero but ordinary tragic action is what happens through the hero"

There is a growing belief that in the modern age, the true nature of man is evil and evil is more potent and attractive. Tragedy shows us that evil is inescapable and irreparable; a sole reminder against the illusions of humanism and optimism. The theory of evil is significant in tragedy but not without limitations. There has always been a great emphasis on evil as a source of tragedy. But there is a tendency to generalize evil. He thinks that most of the great tragedies of the world end not with absolute evil but with evil experienced and lived through. Tragedy dramatizes evil in many particular forms: not only Christian evil but also cultural, political and ideological. Good and evil are not absolute. We are good or bad in particular ways and in particular situations; defined by pressures we at one received and can alter and can create again. Williams rejects that man is naturally evil or good. His dictum will finalize my answer because he declares: "Man is naturally not anything and we are good or bad in particular ways in particular situations"

Raymond Williams' views on 'Rejection of Tragedy'

Williams' essay 'Rejection of Tragedy' is a study of the rejection of tragedy in modern age with special reference to Bertolt Brechet who founded epic theatre as compared to the emotional theory of Aristotle. He rejected the conventional idea of tragedy and made tragedy more experiential and rational.

He made people think above the situation presented in the tragedy and not within. Aristotelian drama enforced thinking from within and Brechet's theatre from without. He used distancing affects to turn people like spectators who sit in the chair, smoke and observe. He showed what the audience wanted to see. Williams has discussed six plays: The Three Penny Opera, Saint Joan of the Stockyard, Die Massnahme, The Good Woman of Sezuen, Mother Courage and Her Children and the Life of Galileo. In the last play mentioned, the hero is offered two choices one between accepting the terms or the other being destroyed. Nevertheless, the hero recants. Tragedy, says Williams, in some of its older senses is certainly rejected by this 'complex seeing'. The major achievement of Brechet is recovery of history as a dimension of tragedy. In tragedy we must see continuity and desire for change. Catastrophe should not halt the action or push the contradictions of life into background. Suffering should be avoided because suffering breaks us, Brechet thinks that our will to struggle should not die under the weight of sufferings. Brechet's own words are the precise expression on this new sense of tragedy: "The sufferings of this man appall me, because they are unnecessary"

Brechet believes that response to suffering is crucial and weight of suffering is borne by all of us. Even the spectator becomes a participant. As a participant he can condemn or comprehend the sufferings. And for this purpose, he needs some active principle which he finds in the system. But system makes its principles for its defense not for its rejection. Our disgust is directed against morality; not upon the system. Under these circumstances morality serves the cause of the cruel system and religion and spiritualism lose their effectiveness. Morality, religion and spiritualism are used by the exploiting class as a shield against public resentment. Brechet rejected and exposed the validity of the so-called refined sentiments of goodness, love and sacrifice. There are, to him, fake sentiments, romanticized on purpose. Love, he thinks, separates us from humanity. The emphasis on love can look like growth but it is often a simple withdrawal from the human action. Love is defined and capitalized in separation from humanity. Williams declares: "An evil system is protected by a false morality"

Brecht's narrative style, which he called 'Epic Theater', was directed against the illusion created by traditional theater of witnessing a slice of life. Instead, Brecht encouraged spectators to watch events on stage dispassionately and to reach their own conclusions. To prevent spectators from becoming emotionally involved with a play and identifying with its characters, Brecht used a variety of techniques. Notable among them was the alienation or estrangement effect, which was achieved through such devices as choosing (for German audiences) unfamiliar settings, interrupting the action with songs, and announcing the contents of each scene through posters.

Brecht first attracted attention in the Berlin as the author of provocative plays that challenged the tenets of traditional theatre. In 'St. Joan' a modern-day Joan of Arc advocates the use of force in the fight against exploitation of workers. In his play, 'Mother Courage and her Children' Brechet invites us to see what happens to a good person a bad society. Through Sheen Lee, he seeks to show how goodness is exploited by gods and men and how good person is alienated. The anti-and Her Children' shows an indomitable mother figure who misguidedly seeks to profit from war but loses her children instead. Brechet's play 'Good Woman of Sezuin' presents a kind-hearted prostitute. She is good but she is alienated. Brecht called this a parable play, the kind-hearted prostitute is forced to disguise herself as her ruthless male cousin and exploit others in order to survive. According to Brechet the most alienated are the best. He collects life from all corners of the world when he says: "Today when human character must be understood as the totality of all social conditions, the epic theatre is the only one that can comprehend all the processes which could serve for a fully representative picture of the world."

He rejected the idea that suffering can ennoble us. Bad societies, he thinks, needs heroes and it is bad life that needs sacrifices. He considers it a sin against life to allow oneself to be destroyed by cruelty. His mature dramas show that it is not possible to label people good or bad. Goodness and badness are the two alternate labels in the same individual. We have a split consciousness and live under this tension. Williams calls it 'Complex Seeing' which was rejected by the traditional conception of tragedy. 'Mother Courage and her Children' is a dramatization of conflicting instincts in a person who is not consciousness of these conflicts. But the case in 'The Life of Galileo' is different. Galileo is fully conscious and is free in making a choice. Galileo deals with the responsibility of the intellectual to defend his or her beliefs in the face of opposition from established authorities, in Galileo's case the Roman Catholic Church. We can admire or despite Galileo but Brechet is not asking us to do this. He is only telling us what happens to consciousness when it caught in a deadlock between individual and social morality. We are so used to tragedy and martyrdom under such circumstances that we are unable to see this experience in a radically different way – complex seeing and accept the complexity of the situation as a fact of life. Facts that are concealed and brought to light as in, 'The Life of Galileo' Barberini says: "It is my own mask that permits me certain freedoms today. Dressed like this. I might be heard to murmur. If God did not exist, we should have to invent him."

Williams in this case presents the example of Mother Courage and comments that the history and people come alive on the stage, leaping past the isolated and virtually static action that we have got used to in most modern theatre. The drama, in his opinion, simultaneously occurs and is seen. It is not 'take the case of this woman' but 'see and consider what happens to these people'. The point is not what we feel about her hard lively opportunism; it is what we see, in the action, of its results. By enacting a genuine consequence, in Williams' view, Brecht raises his central question to a new level, both dramatically and intellectually. The question is then no longer 'are they good people?' Nor is it, really, 'what should they have done?" It is, brilliantly, both 'what are they doing?' and 'what is this doing to them?' In Williams' opinion, to detach the work from its human purpose is, Brecht sees, to betray others and so betray life. It is not, in the end, what we think of Galileo as a man, but what we think of this result.

Raymond Williams: Order, Accident and Experience

Obviously the possibility of communication to ourselves, we, who are not immediately involved, depends on the capacity to connect the event with some more general body of facts. This criterion, which is now quite conventional, is indeed very welcome, for it poses the issue in its most urgent form.

It is evidently possible for some people to hear of a mining disaster, a burned-out family, a broken career or a smash on the road without feeling these events as tragic in the full sense. But the starkness of such a position (which I believe to be sincerely held) is of course at once qualified by the description of such events as accidents which, however painful or regrettable, do not connect with any general meanings. The real key, to the modern separation of tragedy from 'mere suffering', is the separation of ethical control and, more critically, human agency, from our understanding of social and political life. The events which are not seen as tragic are deep in the pattern of our own culture: war, famine, work, traffic, and politics. To see no ethical content or human agency in such events, or to say that we cannot connect them with general meanings, and especially with permanent and universal meanings, is to admit a strange and particular bankruptcy, which no rhetoric of tragedy can finally hide.

But to see new relations and new laws is also to change the nature of experience, and the whole complex of attitudes and relationships dependent on it. Its most common historical setting is the period preceding the substantial breakdown and transformation of an important culture. Its condition is the real tension between old and new: between received beliefs, embodied in institutions and responses, and newly and vividly experienced contradictions and possibilities. If the received beliefs have widely or wholly collapsed, this tension is obviously absent; to that extent their real presence is necessary. But beliefs can be both active and deeply questioned, not so much by other beliefs as by insistent immediate experience. In such situations, the common process of dramatising and resolving disorder and suffering is intensified to the level which can be most readily recognized as tragedy.

The most common interpretation of tragedy is that it is an action in which the hero is destroyed. This fact is seen as irreparable. At a simple level this is so obviously true that the formula usually gets little further examination. But it is of course still an interpretation, and a partial one. We move away from actual tragedies, and not towards them, when we abstract and generalise the very specific forces that are so variously dramatized. We move away, even more decisively, from a common tragic action, when we interpret tragedy as only the dramatization and recognition of evil. You see, my business is trying to arouse human pity, There are a few things that'll move people to pity, a few, but the trouble is, when they've been used several times, they no longer work. Human beings have the horrid capacity of being able to make themselves heartless at will. So it happens, for instance, that a man who sees another man on the street corner with only a stump for an arm will be so shocked the first time that he'll give him sixpence. But the second time it'll be only a three penny bit. And if he sees him a third time, he'll hand him over cold-bloodedly to the police. It's the same with these spiritual weapons.

Tradition and the Individual Talent

T. S. Eliot (1888-1965)

Thomas Stearns Eliot, an American-born scholar, sophisticated eclectic, and poetic genius claimed by both the United States and England, is the twentieth century's touchstone author and critic. His monumental verse, written during a period of emotional turmoil and personal re-evaluation, gave voice to the post-World War I trauma that left a generation in doubt about the future of civilization. His style transcended previous literary movements with a surprising sense of humor. Both frustratingly obtuse and dazzlingly memorable, his masterworks redirect attention from the collapse of Edwardian respectability to the birth of modernism.

It seems inconceivable that so British a poet could be an American Midwesterner. The seventh son of brick maker Henry Ware Eliot and poet and biographer Charlotte Stearns, Tom Eliot was born in St. Louis, Missouri, on September 26, 1888. His distinguished intellectual family derived from immigrants from East Coker, Somersetshire, a setting that Eliot returns to in his poetry. After completing studies at Smith Academy and a year at Milton Academy, he turned his back on America and cultivated the air, grace, and mannerisms of a London dandy.

Heavily influenced by Irving Babbitt at Harvard, Eliot earned a B.A. in literature and an M.A. in philosophy and Sanskrit, all in four years. To increase his fluency in French, he studied for a year at the Sorbonne in Paris, then returned to Harvard for doctoral work in philosophy. Eliot had traveled in Germany and begun a doctoral dissertation at Merton College, Oxford, when he married Vivienne Haigh-Wood. As World War I engulfed Europe, health problems kept him out of the army.

After Eliot's father altered his will to underscore disappointment in his son's marriage, Ezra Pound influenced Eliot to remain in the British Isles and join the Bloomsbury Circle, a powerful intellectual force in England in the 1920s and 1930s. Following brief teaching stints at High Wycombe and Highgate Junior School, from 1919 to 1922, he worked for Lloyds Bank and began submitting verse of subtle brilliance to magazines. His poems departed from the modish romantics to concentrate on the mystic outlook of the metaphysics and the Christian divines.

Forever done with teaching and money handling, Eliot entered the book world for life as director of publisher Faber & Faber. He distinguished himself with a remarkable first collection, Prufrock and Other Observations (1917), followed by Ara vos prec (1920) and The Sacred Wood (1922). Immediately, he began composing two controversial works, The Waste Land (1922), winner of The Dial award, and The Hollow Men (1925), a profound verse of postwar malaise and a prime influence on the "lost generation." Among scholarly successes were Three Critical Essays (1920), Andrew Marvell (1922), and The Criterion, a literary quarterly he published and edited from 1923 to 1939. He received British citizenship in 1927 and sought baptism and confirmation in the Church of England. In 1932, he returned temporarily to the United States as Harvard's Charles Eliot Norton poetry professor and undertook a series of lectures on U.S. campuses.

A period of Anglo-Catholic thought influenced Eliot's The Journey of the Magi (1927), Ash Wednesday (1930), and The Four Quartets (1943), a war commentary begun in 1935. He exercised versatility in a melodrama, Sweeney Agonistes (1932), and two stage works: The Rock (1934), a pageant with choruses, and Murder in the Cathedral (1935). The latter, a poetic drama commemorating a significant act of violence perpetrated by Henry II, was performed on the site of the assassination of Bishop Thomas à Becket at Canterbury Cathedral's Chapter House.

Subsequent works displaying Eliot's piety and religious philosophy include The Family Reunion (1939), The Idea of a Christian Society (1940), and The Cocktail Party (1950), the most successful of his stage dramas. A lighter work, Old Possum's Book of Practical Cats (1940), is the basis for Cats, the longest-running production in stage musical history. Less noteworthy are The Confidential Clerk (1954) and The Elder Statesman (1958), both more suited to reading than to acting. Lauded as English literature's most incisive critic, Eliot surveyed a range of interests with Homage to Dryden (1924), The Use of Poetry and the Use of Criticism (1933), Elizabeth Essays (1934), and On Poetry and Poets (1957).

In 1948, Eliot received the Nobel Prize for literature for his erudite treatment of modern sterility. He died in 1965; his ashes were interred in the village church of East Coker, the ancestral home of the Eliot family.

Tradition and Individual Talent : Summary

The essay Tradition and Individual Talent is an attack on certain critical views in Romanticism particularly up on the idea that a poem is primarily an expression of the personality of the poet.

Eliot argues that a great poem always asserts and that the poet must develop a sense of the pastness of the past. There is great importance of tradition in the present poem. Tradition should not be inherited but should be obtained by great labour. Past should be altered by present as much as the present is directed by past.

In fact tradition acquires a wider significance in Eliot’s writing. It involves a historical sense that is really essential for any work of art. This historical sense involves a perception, not only of the past ness of past but also its present ness. This sense compels a poet to write not only being near to his generation, but to the whole of literary tradition starting from Homer. Thus to write poetry is to write with a consciousness of the timeless and temporal and of the interrelation between the two. In any work the past should be altered by the present just as the present is directed by the past.

In this way, present affects the past as past effects the present because present poet adopts the tradition of past with hard labour. A good writer or poet identifies his position in present with the comparison to past writers. Therefore, the combination of temporal and timeless is, as whole tradition.

The meaning of the poem is not possible in isolation. Not poet, no any artist has his complete meaning unless we link him/ her to a chain of all poets. Impotence and value of any poet can't be judged in isolation. So there must be the tradition to compare are with another.

To create a good poem, one should surrender the self. This self-sacrifice of personality gives birth to a good poem. One should negate his mind. In doing so one loses his individuality and his personality. All the personal emotions, feelings and experience should be sacrificed. There should not be the personal image of poet in his poetry. Poetry should be impersonal. But it does not mean that the poet should not write his personal feelings, but there personal feelings should be converted in to art's feelings. Therefore, we as a critic should not look for personality of poet in his poem because the text is objective. The theory that the poet should surrender his personality is depersonalization. The poet's personal feelings and emotions should be depersonalized. He must be an impersonal and objective like a scientist.

The progress of the artist is a continual self-sacrifice a continual extinction of personality is the individual talent. To make the concept of depersonalization clear, Eliot brings analogy of creating sulphuric acid.

Sulpher dioxide (Feeling) + oxygen (Emotion) + platinum (Mind of Poet) = Sulphurous Acid (Poem) (No trace of Poet's Personality)

As the platinum itself remains unaffected, the mind of the poet remains unaffected also. Poet's personality is just an agent or medium to active the relation between emotion and feelings. So, the poet is never a creator, but like catalyst.

Poetry is not a turning loose of emotion but an escape from emotion. Eliot point is more like what Keats uses his term 'negative capability'.

Eliot stands against Romantic poets who think that poetry is spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings and personal emotions. Romantic writer says poetry is expression of personality and inspiration. But Eliot says poetry is not so but an escape from personality. Poetry is organization rather than inspiration. So, the critic should be objective while treating the poems. The belief that there is a poet speaking in a poem should be checked.

Tradition and individual talent : Analysis

Eliot's essays actually map a highly personal set of preoccupations, responses and ideas about specific authors and works of art, as well as formulate more general theories on the connections between poetry, culture and society. Perhaps his best-known essay, "Tradition and the Individual Talent" was first published in 1919 and soon after included in The Sacred Wood: Essays on Poetry and Criticism (1920). Eliot attempts to do two things in this essay: he first redefines "tradition" by emphasizing the importance of history to writing and understanding poetry, and he then argues that poetry should be essentially "impersonal," that is separate and distinct from the personality of its writer. Eliot's idea of tradition is complex and unusual, involving something he descr historical sense” which is a perception of “the pastness of the past” but also of its “presence.” For Eliot, past works of art form an order or “tradition”; however, that order is always being altered by a new work which modifies the “tradition” to make room for itself. This view, in which “the past should be altered by the present as much as the present is directed by the past,” requires that a poet be familiar with almost all literary history - not just the immediate past but the distant past and not just the literature of his or her own country but the whole “mind of Europe.”

Eliot's second point is one of his most famous and contentious. A poet, Eliot maintains, must “self-sacrifice” to this special awareness of the past; once this awareness is achieved, it will erase any trace of personality from the poetry because the poet has become a mere medium for expression. Using the analogy of a chemical reaction, Eliot explains that a “mature” poet's mind works by being a passive “receptacle” of images, phrases and feelings which are combined, under immense concentration, into a new “art emotion.” For Eliot, true art has nothing to do with the personal life of the artist but is merely the result of a greater ability to synthesize and combine, an ability which comes from deep study and comprehensive knowledge. Though Eliot's belief that “Poetry is not a turning loose of emotion, but an escape from emotion; it is not the expression of personality, but an escape from personality” sprang from what he viewed as the excesses of Romanticism, many scholars have noted how continuous Eliot's thought - and the whole of Modernism - is with that of the Romantics'; his “impersonal poet” even has links with John Keats, who proposed a similar figure in “the chameleon poet.” But Eliot's belief that critical study should be “diverted” from the poet to the poetry shaped the study of poetry for half a century, and while “Tradition and the Individual Talent” has had many detractors, especially those who question Eliot's insistence on canonical works as standards of greatness, it is difficult to overemphasize the essay's influence. It has shaped generations of poets, critics and theorists and is a key text in modern literary criticism.

According to Eliot, "Every nation, every race, has not only its own creative, but its own critical turn of mind..." (page 47). And herein lies the impossible task of defining tradition. All we do is based upon this creative or critical turn of mind, based upon our religions or our morals or our art; and this has been true throughout all of history. And this is - on one side - tradition. But when a nation rises and falls, when a kingdom expands or a city dies in a cloud of flame, tradition is lost. I would add to Eliot's words that every city, every family, every individual has his or her own tradition. Habits, ideas, though process - these are all part of this "turn of mind" that Eliot speaks of in his essay. Thought process is tradition; although Eliot says, "Yet if the only form of tradition...consisted in following the ways of the immediate generation before us...'tradition' should be positively discouraged," still my claim is this: tradition is in one's own critical and creative turn of mind, within one's self - the masses have no place in this tradition, no place in its creation, its encouragement, or its defining. And so this word, as many others, goes forever undefined; it eludes the human mind as something invisible and impalpable eludes our fingers, as a scent eludes our grasping hands. This is tradition. And beyond this, we can only speculate.

"Criticism is an inevitable as breathing, and that we should be none the worse for articulating what passes in our minds when we read a book and feel and emotion about it." (T. S. Eliot Tradition and individual talent, 1920, page 48)

I really never thought about how much we criticize authors and poets. When we read a book we compare it to another author of the same genre or we compare it to another book by that same author. In almost every single one of Literature classes in my secondary school, we compared one writer to another one. Whenever you read a book or a poem there is some kind of criticism going on inside your head. When we criticize a poet, author, or some other writer we always look at their history, we have to find out every part of their background because that may explain why they wrote this or that. I have to ask, why do we do this? I'm sure there are times where the author/poet/whoever is not writing about their life and general experiences but something they are interested in. It is a tradition in schools, that we have to learn not only the poem or a novel, but also we have to know everything about the writer. In my opinion is that, when we getting older and older we realize that we do not need to look after the writer's life to understand his or her work. Without knowing these facts we can enjoy the book and understand it.

Eliot's Depersonalization theory

In "Tradition and Individual Talent", Eliot opposes the Romantic conception by advancing his theory of impersonality in art and opines that the artistic process is a process of depersonalization and that the artist will surrender himself totally to the creative work. Eliot particularly objected to the great Romantics as well as Victorians who exaggerated the need to express human personality and subjective feeling and he says, "The progress of aim artist is a continual self-sacrifice, a continual extinction of personality."

Eliot holds that the poet and the poem are two separate things and "that the feelings or the emotion, or vision, resulting from the poem is something different from the feeling or emotion or vision in the mind of the poet." Hence, he elucidates his theory of impersonality by examining, first, the relation of the poet to the part and secondly, the relation of the poem to its author. Eliot realizes that the past exists in the present. "No poet, no artist of any art, has his complete meaning alone. His signification, his appreciation, is the appreciation of his relation to the dead poets and artists. You can value him alone. You must set him for contrast and comparison among the deads."

Eliot points out the relation of the poem to its author; and says that the poem has no relation to the poet. There is detached or alienation between the poet and his poem. The difference between the mind of a nature poet and that of an immature one is that the mind of a nature poet is "a more finely perfected medium in which special or varied feelings are at liberty to enter into new combinations". According to Eliot, the art emotion is different from personal emotion. A successful artist is he, who can generalize emotion in the reader's one while he himself seemed to be unaffected by any emotion. In the other hand he should be depersonalized in experience he describes in the poem.

Eliot brings the analogy of chemical reaction to explain the process of depersonalization. In this respect he has drawn a scientific analogy. He tells that a poet shoul sold of platinum which makes sulphurus acid. He says, "When the two gases, previously mentioned (oxygen and Sulpher dioxide) are mixed in the presence of a filament of Platinum. They form Sulphurous acid. The combination takes place only he the Platinum is present; nevertheless, the newly formed acid contains no trace of Platinum, and the Platinum itself is apparently unaffected has remained inert, neutral, and unchanged. The mind of the poet is the shred of Platinum. It may partly or exclusively operate upon the experience of the man himself; but, the more perfect the artist, the more completely separate in his will be the man who suffers and the mind which creates, the one perfectly will be the mind digest and transmute the passions which are its material."

Eliot next compares the poet's mind to a receptacle in which are stored numberless feelings, emotion, images, phases etc. , which remain there in an unorganized and chaotic form till, "all the particles which can unite to form a new compound are present together." Thus poetry is organization rather than inspiration. And the greatness of a poem does not depend upon the greatness or the intensity of the emotions, but upon the intensity of the process of poetic composition. The more intense the poetic process, the greater the poem.

He strongly believes that "the differences between art and the event are always absolute. Eliot illustrate his view by a few examples among which one is of Keats' One to a Nightingale, which contains a number of feelings which have nothing particular to do with the nightingale, but which the nightingale ,partly perhaps because it's attractive name, and partly because of its reputation served to bring together. He illustrates his theory by a few examples. The artistic emotion evoked by Dante in his treatment of the episode of Paolo and Francesca is different from the actual emotion in the situation. The artistic emotion may approximate to the actual emotion as in Agamemnon the artistic emotion approximates to the emotion of an actual spectator; in Othello to the emotion of the protagonist himself.

Eliot believes that the main concern of the poet is not the expression of personality. He says, “the poet has, not a personality to express but a particular medium which is only a medium and a personality, in which impressions and experiences combine in peculiar and unexpected ways, impressions and experiences which are important for the may take no place in the poetry, and those which become important in the poetry may play quite a negligible part in the man, the personality”. Again, there is no need for poet to try to express new human emotions in poetry. The business of the poet. Eliot says, is not to find new emotions, but use of the ordinary ones and, in working them up in poetry, to express feelings which are not in actual emotions at all". Eliot's final definition of poetry is: "poetry is not a turning loose of emotion, but an escape from emotion: it is not the expression of personality, but an escape from personality."

It is not the expression of personality but an escape from personality. He emphasizes the same theory of impersonality in art. The emotion of art is impersonal. It has its life in the poem and not in the history of poets. So, honest criticism and sensitive appreciation is directed not upon the poet but upon the poetry. The poet's biography is not to be studied the structure of the poem and its evocative powers are important.

Eliot's theory of depersonalization has been criticized by critics like Ransom and Yvor Winters. Ransom regards Eliot's theory as "very neatly a doctrine of poetic automation".

To Fei Pai Lu, Eliot's theory of depersonalization is completely vague. He says, "in the name of impersonality", Eliot by turns commends and censures poets and artist.

From what we have said, above it follows that there is no connection between the poet's personality and the poem. The feelings of the poetry need not necessarily his own.

Concept of Tradition and Historical Sense

In his essay "Tradition and the Individual Talent" Eliot spreads his concept of tradition, which reflects his reaction against romantic subjectivism and emotionalism. He also signifies the importance of the tradition. He opines that tradition gives the reader something new, something arresting, something intellectual and something vital for literary conception.

Tradition, according to Eliot, is that part of living culture inherited from the past and functioning in the formation of the present. Eliot maintains that tradition is bound up with historical sense, which is a perception that the past is not something lost and invalid.

According to Eliot tradition is a living culture which is inherited from the past and also has an important function in forming (shaping) the present. To Eliot tradition is bound up with historical sense of a poet or writer. Historical sense is a perception that past is not something that is lost or invalid. Rather it has a function in the present.

It exits with the present. It exerts its influence in our ideas, thoughts and consciousness. This is historical sense. It is an awareness not only of the pastness of the past but the presence of the past. On this sense the past is our contemporary as the present is.

Eliot's view of tradition is not linear but spatial. Eliot does not believe that the past is followed by the presence and succession of a line. On the contrary, the past and the present live side by side in the space. Thus it is spatial.

Then Eliot holds that not only the past influences the present but the present, too, influences the past. To prove this idea, he conceives of all literature as a total, indivisible order. All existing literary works belong to an order like the member of a family. Any new work of literature is like the arrival of a member or a new relative or a new acquaintance. Its arrival and presence brings about a readjustment of the previous relationship of the old members. A new work takes its place in the order. Its arrival and inclusion modifies the order and relationship among all works. The order is then modified. A new work of art influences all the existing- literary work, as a new relative influences the old members of a family. It is this sense that the present modifies the past as the past modifies the present. The past is modified by the present also in the sense that we can look at the past literature always through ever renewing perceptive of the present.

A new work of art cannot be evaluated in isolation without reference to past literature and tradition. Evaluation is always comparative and relative. It calls for a comparison with the past that is with tradition. The value of a work depends on how well it is adjusted into the order of existing literary works. No poet, no artist of any art has his complete meaning alone. His significance, his appreciation is the appreciation of his relation to the dead poets and artists. You cannot value him alone. You must set him for contrast and comparison among the dead.

A work of art has two dimensions- it is at once personal and universal. It is an individual composition, but at the same time, its inclusion into tradition determines its worth and universal appeal. A writer must be aware that he belongs to a larger tradition and there is always an impact of tradition on him. Individual is an element formed by and forming the culture to which he belongs. He should surrender his personality to something larger and more significant.

In his conscious cultivation of historical sense, a writer reduces the magnification of personal self, which leads to depersonalization and impersonal act.

When a writer is aware the historical sense, it does not mean that he is influenced by the past or his own self. Rather the writer should minimize the importance of his personal self, which will lead him to depersonalization and impersonal act.

Tradition is a living stream. It is not a lump or dead mass. But the main current does not always flow through the most noted authoress.

Eliot regrets that tradition in English world of letters is used in prerogative sense. This is one reason of the undeveloped critical sense of the English nation. They are too individualistic on intellectual habits.

Eliot criticizes the English intellectuals. According to Eliot to the English intellectual tradition is something that should be avoided. They give much more importance on individualism and are critical about the historical sense or tradition.

Like Arnold, Eliot views tradition as something living. For both the word “tradition” implies growth. Eliot recalls Edmund Burke what Burke did for political thought, by glorifying the idea of inheritance, Eliot has done for English literary criticism. Burke, famous English politician, gave emphasis on the experience of the past in politics. In the same Eliot also gives emphasis on the past regarding English criticism.

Tradition does not mean uncritical imitation of the past. Nor does it mean only erudition. A writer draws on only the necessary knowledge of tradition. He must use his freedom according to his needs. He cannot be completely detached .Often the most original moments of a work of art echo the mind of earlier writers. Though it sounds paradoxical it is true. It is paradoxical but true that even the most original writings sometimes reflect the thinking of the past or earlier writers. So, there is nothing which is absolutely original.

A partial or complete break with the literary past is a danger. An awareness of what has gone before is necessary to know what is there to be done in the present or future. A balance between the control of tradition and the freedom of an individual is essential to art.

Eliot said elsewhere that by losing tradition we lose our held on the present. Hence, a writer should be aware of the importance of tradition.

Idea of Individual Talent in relation to tradition

Thomas Stearns Eliot, being a classicist, shows, both in his literary criticism and creation, an anti-romantic tendency against individualism and subjectivism. He regards poetry as the expression of the personality of the poet and gave emphasis on inspiration and intuition . Eliot's idea is also different from the neo-classicists who believed that the writer must follow the rules of the ancients and the poetry must be didactic. According to Eliot, an individual talent cannot be expressed without some connection with tradition. Eliot's 'Tradition and Individual Talent' holds his idea of individual talent and tradition. At first, Eliot brings out the general 'tendency to insist' on finding out the individual talent of a poet: "We dwell with satisfaction upon the poet's difference from his predecessors, especially his immediate predecessors: we endeavour to find something that can be isolated in order to be enjoyed."

But Eliot's view is that if we 'without prejudice,' approach to a poet's work of not only "the impressionable period of full maturity", we will find that the individual talent is influenced by tradition. He assured that "Not only the best , but the most individual parts of his work may be those in which the dead poets, his ancestors, assert their immortality most vigorously ."

However, he also tells that this 'tradition' does not mean "following the ways of the immediate generation before us in a blind or timid adherence to its success." "It cannot be inherited, and if you want it you must obtain it by great labour."

Tradition involves the 'historical sense' which again involves 'a perception not only of the pastness of the past, but of it's presence. That is, a creative artist, though he lives in a particular age or social environment, does not work merely with his own generation in view, but acts with a conviction in general. However, Eliot accepts that "novelty is better than repetition".

As his 'principle of aesthetic,' Eliot says that no individual talent has his complete 'meaning' or 'value' alone. "His significance, his appreciation is the appreciation of his relation to the dead poets and artists", in contrast and comparison.

According to Eliot, there is a 'conformity' between the new works of an individual talent and the old works of tradition. The new work of art modifies the 'ideal order' of the existing works which was a complete order before the arrival of the new one. "The past should be altered by the present as much as the present is directed by the

the relation, proportion, values of each work of art toward the whole are readjusted after each of the work of art of an individual talent.

There must be a standard to judge an individual talent. Eliot says that an individual talent "must inevitably be judged by the standards of the past," "not amputated by them". This judgment is not for declaring any of them good or bad, but with this, they are measured by each other. However, "we do not quite say that the new is more valuable because it fits in: but it's fitting in is a test of its value-a-in".

To speak farther about the duty of the individual talent in connection with his relation with the past, Eliot says, "he can neither take the past as a lump, an indiscriminate bolus, nor can he from himself wholly on one or two private admirations, nor can he form himself wholly upon one preferred period".

In order to know the tradition, he must judge critically what are the main trends and what are not. He must also be conscious of the fact that "art never improves, but that the material of art is never quite the same". He must be aware of the changing mind which is a development which abandons nothing 'enroute'. ["But the difference between the present and the past is that the conscious present is an awareness of the past in a way and to an extent which the past's awareness itself cannot show."]

The conscious or (unconscious?) cultivation of the sense of the past or tradition which sharpens the sensibility is very important for an individual talent in the process of his poetic creation. Eliot says,

"What is to be insisted upon is that the poet must develop or procure the consciousness of the past and that he should continue to develop this consciousness throughout his career."

The progress of an artist or individual talent is a continual self-sacrifice, a continual extinction of personality. That is, an individual talent must surrender himself totally to the creative work. Eliot has explained his idea of the 'depersonalization' with a suggestive scientific analogy of introducing finely filiated platinum into oxygen and sulphur dioxide. When these two gases are mixed in the presence of a filament of platinum, they form sulphurous acid. This combination happens only when the platinum is present. Yet there is found no trace of platinum in the newly formed acid. Eliot here compares the mind of the poet to the shred of platinum which, being a catalyst, remains unaffected, inert, neutral and unchanged even after sacrificing itself to the gases. Eliot says that the mind of the poet or individual talent "may partly or exclusively operate upon the experience of the man himself." But the more perfect the artist is the more completely separate the mind will be. Consequently, "the more perfectly will the mind digest and transmute the passions which are its material".

Eliot opposes Wordsworth's theory, 'emotion recollected in tranquillity'. He says, "The business of the poet is not to find new emotions, but to use the ordinary ones [and, in working them up into poetry, to express fee actual emotion at all. And emotion which he has never experienced will serve his turn as well as those familiar to him."]

Eliot's belief is that the main concern of the poet is not the expression of personality. He says that "the poet has, not a 'personality' to express, but a particular medium, which is only a medium and not a personality, in which impressions and experiences combine in peculiar and unexpected ways."

From the above discussion, we see that in Eliot's theory of individual talent, tradition has a great part. Tradition helps the individual talent produce good poetry. Both of them are closely inter-related and inter-dependent. Eliot's idea of tradition and individual talent cannot be without criticism as well. Sean Lucy admits the necessity of tradition for individual talent, but he opines that a conscious cultivation of the sense of tradition is not necessary for the individual writer in all epochs. He thinks that Eliot might have been impelled to adopt such an attitude by the 'danger of literary anarchy' which was present in the extreme individualism of the 'spirit of revolt' which infected so much of European art and thought during the 1920s and part of 1930s.

Concept of comparison and contras with the dead

By tradition Eliot means all those habitual actions, habits and customs, from the most significant religious rites to our conventional ways of greeting a stranger, which represent the bloodkinship of the same people living in the same place. Tradition is a need and importance of an outside authority of the poet.

Allegiance to 'inner voice' simply means doing what one likes. The poet must allow allegiance to some other authority outside himself. He must learn and practice inner self-control. He must revise and re-revise his artistic work. Mature art is only possible in this way. His concept of tradition is enlightened and dynamic. Tradition is always growing. In Tradition and Individual Talent, Eliot regards the whole of European literature from Homer down to his own day as forming a single literary tradition. Tradition is dead, it lives in the present. When a great work of art is produced, the tradition is enhanced or modified to some extent. A great artist must have a sense of tradition and he must pass this tradition to the next generations; otherwise he will be isolated. Therefore, Eliot rightly says that: "You cannot value him alone; you must set him, for contrast and comparison, among the dead"

Eliot's conception of tradition is an enlightened and dynamic one. An idea of tradition is essential for it makes us realise our kinship with "the same people living in the same place". But we must remember that the conditions of life which produced some particular tradition have changed and so the tradition, too, must change. Tradition is not something immovable, it is something constantly growing and becoming different from what it previously was. We must learn to distinguish between the essential and the unessential, the good and the bad, in a particular tradition and only the good and the essential must be followed and revived. While we should justly be proud of our own tradition this should not make us look down on other peoples who are not so lucky in this respect. In short, tradition must be used intelligently, changes in the conditions of life must be taken into consideration, and only the best should be pre fostered. Eliot's tradition continues and lives in the present. When a really great work of art is produced, this tradition is modified and a great work of art can be possible only when the artist has a sense of this literary tradition. Great artists modify the existing tradition and pass it on to the future. A sense of tradition is essential for the creation of good poetry, but individual talent, too, is of paramount importance. Indeed, the two, tradition and individual talent, are not opposite concepts. Eliot reconciles the two, and shows that both have an essential role to play in the process of poetic creation. Individual talent is needed to acquire the sense of tradition, and this individual talent also modifies the tradition so acquired. So Eliot propounds: "The poet must develop the consciousness of the past and that he should continue to develop this consciousness throughout his career"

But the question is how should the individual writer have this idea of tradition and how can he invest his individual talent in it? The artist must have the historical sense so that his individual talent may be differentiated. This historical sense is the sense of the timeless and temporal, as well as of the timeless and temporal together. Tradition represents the accumulated wisdom and experience of ages, and so its knowledge is essential for really great and noble achievements. According to this view, tradition is not anything fixed and static, it is constantly changing, growing and becoming different from what it is, and it is the individual talent which so modifies it. A writer in the present must seek guidance from the past, he must confirm to the literary tradition. The past directs the presents and is itself modified and altered by the present. The work of a poet in the present is to be compared and contrasted with works of the past, and judged by the standards of the past. But this judgment does not mean determining good or bad. The comparison is to be made for knowing the facts, all the facts, about the new work of art. The comparison is made for the purposes of analysis, and for forming a better understanding of the new. It is in this way alone that we can form an idea of what is really individual and new. It is by comparison alone that we can sift the tradition from the individual elements in a given work of art. In this way, does Eliot reconcile the concept of tradition with individual talent and stresses their respective roles in the process of poetic creation. What Eliot means in gist is that: "Tradition is a matter of much wider significance. It cannot be inherited, and it you want it you must obtain it by great labour"

According to Eliot, the impersonal elements, i.e. the 'tradition', the accumulated knowledge and wisdom of the past, which is acquired by the poet to produce a great work of art. It is the duty of every poet to acquire, to the best of his ability, this knowledge of the past, and he must continue to acquire this consciousness throughout his career. Such awareness of tradition, sharpens poetic creation. Thus the individual talent of the artist is set against this tradition, observed, and evaluated. In this way, his art is better perceived, understood, valued and appreciated. Eliot further emphasies that point in the following lines: "No poet, no artist of any art, has his complete meaning alone. Hi significance, his appreciation is the appreciation of his relation to the dead poets and artists"

Thus, the idea of tradition for individual talent is unavoidable for a great work of art. The poet must also realize that art never improves, though its material is never the same. The mind of Europe may change, but this change does not me

Shakespeare and Homer have grown outdated and lost their significance. The great works of art never lose their significance, for there is no qualitative improvement in art. There may be refinement, there may be development, but from the point of view of the artist there is no improvement. For example, it will not be correct to say that the art of Shakespeare is better and higher than that of Eliot. Their works are of different kinds, for the material on which they worked was different. His view of tradition requires, as most criticize him, a ridiculous amount of erudition. It will be pointed out that there have been great poets who were not learned, and further that too much learning kills sensibility. However, knowledge does not merely mean bookish knowledge. It is wisdom which can also be learnt from the school of life as Shakespeare, Dickens and many others have done.

T.S. Eliot as a critic

Eliot is one of the greatest literary critics of England from the point of view of the bulk and quality of his critical writings. His five hundred and odd essays occasionally published as reviews and articles had a far-reaching influence on literary criticism in the country. His criticism was revolutionary which inverted the critical tradition of the whole English speaking work. John Hayward says: "I cannot think of a critic who has been more widely read and discussed in his own life-time; and not only in English, but in almost every language, except Russian."

As a critic Eliot has his faults. At times he assumes a hanging-judge attitude and his statements savour of a verdict. Often his criticism is marred by personal and religious prejudices blocking an honest and impartial estimate. Moreover, he does not judge all by the same standards. There is didacticism in his later essays and with the passing of time his critical faculties were increasingly exercised on social problems. Critics have also found fault with his style as too full of doubts, reservations and qualifications.

Still, such faults do not detract Eliot's greatness as a critic. His criticism has revolutionized the great writers of the past three centuries. His recognition of the greatness of the Metaphysical poets of the 17th century resulted in the Metaphysical revival of the 20th century. The credit for the renewal of interest in the Jacobean dramatists goes to Eliot. He has restored Dryden and other Augustan poets to their due place. His essay on Dante aroused curiosity for the latter middle ages. The novelty of his statements, hidden in sharp phrases, startles and arrests attention. According to Eliot, the end of criticism is to bring readjustment between the old and the new. He says: "From time to time it is desirable, that some critic shall appear to review the past of our literature, and set the poets and the poems in a new order."

Such critics are rare, for they must possess, besides ability for judgment, powerful liberty of mind to identify and interpret its own values and category of admiration for their generation. John Hayward says: "Matthew Arnold was such a critic as were Coleridge and Johnson and Dryden before him; and such, in our own day, is Eliot himself."

Eliot's criticism offers both reassessment and reaction to earlier writers. He called himself "a classicist in literature". His vital contribution is the reacti romanticism and humanism which brought a classical revival in art and criticism. He rejected the romantic view of the individual's perfectibility, stressed the doctrine of the original sin and exposed the futility of the romantic faith in the "Inner Voice". Instead of following his 'inner voice', a critic must follow objective standards and must conform to tradition. A sense of tradition, respect for order and authority is central to Eliot's classicism. He sought to correct the excesses of "the abstract and intellectual" school of criticism represented by Arnold. He sought to raise criticism to the level of science. In his objectivity and logical attitude, Eliot most closely resembles Aristotle. A. G. George says: "Eliot's theory of the impersonality of poetry is the greatest theory on the nature of the process after Wordsworth's romantic conception of poetry."

Poetry was an expression of the emotions and personality for romantics. Wordsworth said that poetry was an overflow of powerful emotions and its origin is in "Emotions recollected in tranquillity". Eliot rejects this view and says that poetry is not an expression of emotion and personality but an escape from them. The poet is only a catalytic agent that fuses varied emotions into new wholes. He distinguishes between the emotions of the poet and the artistic emotion, and points out that the function of criticism is to turn attention from the poet to his poetry.

Eliot's views on the nature of poetic process are equally revolutionary. According to him, poetry is not inspiration, it is organization. The poet's mind is like a vessel in which are stored numerous feelings, emotions and experiences. The poetic process fuses these distinct experiences and emotions into new wholes. In "The Metaphysical Poets", he writes: "When a poet's mind is perfectly equipped for its work, it is constantly amalgamating disparate experiences; the ordinary man's experience is chaotic, irregular, and fragmentary".

Perfect poetry results when instead of 'dissociation of sensibility' there is 'unification of sensibility'. The emotional and the rational, the creative and the critical, faculties must work in harmony to produce great work of art. Critics stressed that the aim of poetry is to give pleasure or to teach morally. However, for Eliot the greatness of a poem is tested by the order and unity it imposes on the chaotic and disparate experiences of the poet. Wimsatt and Brooks are right in saying: "Hardly since the 17th century had critical writing in English so resolutely transposed poetic theory from the axis of pleasure versus pain to that of unity versus multiplicity."

Eliot devised numerous critical concepts that gained wide currency and has a broad influence on criticism. 'Objective co-relative', 'Dissociation of sensibility', 'Unification of sensibility' are few of Eliot clichés hotly debated by critics. His dynamic theory of tradition, of impersonality of poetry, his assertion on 'a highly developed sense of fact' tended to impart to literary criticism catholicity and rationalism.

To conclude, Eliot's influence as a critic has been wide, constant, fruitful and inspiring. He has corrected and educated the taste of his readers and brought about a rethinking regarding the function of poetry and the nature of the poet process. He gave a new direction and new tools of criticism. It is in the re-consideration and revival of English poetry of the past. George Watson writes:

"Eliot made English criticism look different, but not in a simple sense. He offered it a new range of rhetorical possibilities, confirmed it in its increasing contempt for historical processes, and yet reshaped its notion of period by a handful of brilliant institutions."

His comments on the nature of Poetic Drama and the relation between poetry and drama have done much to bring about a revival of Poetic Drama in the modern age. Even if he had written no poetry, he would have made his mark as a distinguished and subtle critic.

T.S Eliot : The Metaphysical Poets

The Essay: Its Significance

Eliot's essay on The Metaphysical Poets was first published as a review of J.C. Grierson's edition of Metaphysical Lyrics and Poems of the 17th Century. But the essay is much more than a mere review. It is a critical document of much value and significance. It is an important landmark in the history of English literary criticism, it has brought about a revaluation and reassessment of Donne and other Metaphysical poets, and has caused a revival of interest in these poets who had been neglected for a considerable time. It is in this essay that Eliot has used, for the first time, the phrases Dissociation of Sensibility and Unification of Sensibility, phrases which have acquired worldwide currency and which, ever since, have had a far reaching impact on literary criticism.

Eliot's Purpose

Eliot begins the essay by praising Grierson's scholarly edition of metaphysical lyrics and poems of the 17th century. This book is an admirable piece of criticism in itself, as well as a provocation to criticism. It is a great irritant to thought. It sets Eliot himself thinking, and he proposes to consider the significance of the label 'Metaphysical' which has generally been used as a term of abuse to indicate the quaint tastes of these poets, and also to examine whether the so-called 'metaphysical' poets constituted a school or movement in themselves, or were they merely a continuation of some older tradition.

Difficulties in the Way

Eliot is quite conscious of the difficulties of the task he has undertaken. First, it is difficult to define the term, "metaphysical" and explain the characteristics which differentiate metaphysical poetry from other kinds of poetry. Secondly, it is difficult to decide which poets practised it and which did not, and which of their verses have such characteristics. In the beginning of the 17th century, there are noticeable three different schools of poetry: First, there is Donne, a late Elizabethan, and Marvell and Bishop King who are very close to him. Secondly, there is Ben Jonson and his, courtly school, of poetry, a kind of poetry which expired in the next century in the verses of Prior. Thirdly, there is the religious poetry of Herbert, Vaughan and Crashaw. It is difficult to find characteristics which are common to all those poets, and which are dominant enough to mark out these poets as constituting a separate, distinct group.

Metaphysical Poetry: Its Characteristics

Eliot then proceeds to examine one by one with suitable illustrations the characteristics which are generally considered ‘metaphysical’. First, there is the elaboration of a simile to the farthest possible extent to be met with frequently in the poetry of Donne and Cowley. The most striking instance of such elaboration is the famous conceit of a pair of compasses in Donne’s A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning. Secondly, there is the device of the development of an image by rapid association of thought requiring considerable agility on the part of the reader. For example, in Donne’s A Valediction: of Weeping, we got three separate images: the picture of the geographer’s globe, the tears of the poet’s beloved, and the picture of the Great Flood. Though these three pictures are entirely separate, the poet has unified them by stressing the likeness between his lady’s tears and the globe, and further that they are capable of overflowing the earth. Thirdly, on other occasions Donne produces his effects by sudden contrasts. Thus in the line, “A bracelet of bright hair about the bone”, the most powerful effect is produced by sudden contrast of the associations of ‘bright hair’ and ‘bone’. But such telescoping of images and contrast of associations are not a characteristic of the poetry of Donne alone. It also characterises Elizabethan dramatists like Shakespeare, Webster, Tourneur and Middleton. This suggests that Donne, Cowley and others belong to the Elizabethan tradition and not to any new school. The dominant characteristics of Donne’s poetry are also the characteristics of the great Elizabethans.

Dr. Johnson’s Definition

Eliot then takes up Dr. Johnson’s famous definition of metaphysical poetry, in which the great doctor has tried to define this poetry by its faults. Dr. Johnson in his Life of Cowley points out that in Metaphysical poetry “the most heterogeneous ideas are yoked violence together”. They bringing together of heterogeneous ideas and compelling them into unity by the operation of the poet’s mind is universal in poetry. Countless instances of such fusion of opposite and dissimilar concepts can be cited at random from all poets. Such unity is present even in the poetry of Johnson himself. The force of Dr. Johnson’s remark lies in the fact that in his view the Metaphysical poetry could only Yoke by violence dissimilar ideas. They could unite them or fuse them into a single whole. But this is not a fact. A number of poets of this school have eminently succeeded in uniting heterogeneous ideas. Eliot quotes from Herbert Cowley, Bishop King and other poets in support of his contention. Therefore, he concludes that Metaphysical poetry cannot be differentiated from other poetry by Dr. Johnson’s definition. The fault which the learned doctor points out is not there, and the unity of heterogeneous ideas is common to all poetry.

The Special Virtue of the Metaphysicals

As a matter of fact, it is futile to try to define metaphysical poetry by its faults. Even such a shrewd and sensitive critic as Dr. Johnson failed to do so. Eliot, therefore, purposes to use the opposite method, the positive approach, and point out the characteristic virtue of this school of poetry. He would show that Donne and the other poets of the 17th century, “were the direct and normal development of the precedent age”, and that their characteristic virtue was something valu disappeared. Dr. Johnson has rightly pointed out that these poets were 'analytic'; they were given too much analysis and direction of particular emotional situations. But he has failed to see that they could also unite into new wholes the concepts they had analysed. Eliot would show that their special virtue was the fusion of heterogeneous material into a new unity after its dissociation. In other words, he would show that metaphysical poetry is distinguished from other poetry by unification of sensibility, and that subsequently, dissociation of sensibility, overtook English poetry, and this was unfortunate.

Unification of Sensibility

The great Elizabethans and early Jacobians had a developed unified sensibility which is expressed in their poetry. By 'sensibility' Eliot does not merely mean feeling or the capacity to receive sense impressions. He means much more than that. By 'sensibility' he means a synthetic faculty which can amalgamate and unite thought and feeling, which can fuse into a single whole the varied and disparate, often opposite and contradictory experiences. The Elizabethans had such a sensibility. They were widely read, they thought on what they read, and their thinking and learning modified their mode of feeling. Thus in the poetry of Chapman and others there is, "a sensuous apprehension of thought"—a unification of thought and feeling—and a recreation of thought into feeling. Their reading and thinking alters theirs feeling, this modified feeling is expressed in their poetry, and hence their unification or synthesis of thought and feeling. Eliot gives concrete illustrations to show that such unification of sensibility, such fusion of thought and feeling, is to be found in the poetry of Donne as well as in much of modern poetry, but it is lacking in the poetry of Tennyson.

Dissociation of Sensibility

The fact is that after Donne and Herbert a change came over the mind of England. The poets lost the capacity of uniting thought and feeling. The 'unification of sensibility' was lost, and 'dissociation of sensibility' set in. After that the poets can either think or they can feel; there are either intellectual poets who can only think, or there are poets, who can only feel. The poets of the 18th century were intellectuals, they thought but did not feel; the romantics of the 19th century felt but did not think. Tennyson and Browning can merely reflect or ruminate, i.e. mediate poetically on their experience, but cannot express it poetically. Eliot expresses this view in words which have become famous, which are frequently quoted, and which clearly bring out his capacity for 'trenchant phasing', his originality and critical insight. He writes: "Tennyson and Browning are poets and they think; but they do not fell their thought as immediately as the odour of a rose. A thought to Donne was an experience; it modified his sensibility. When a poet's mind is perfectly equipped for its work, it is constantly amalgamating disparate experience; the ordinary man's experience is chaotic, irregular, fragmentary. The latter falls in love, or reads Spinoza and these two experiences have nothing to do with each other, or with the noise of the typewriter or the smell of cooking, in the mind of the poet these experiences are always forming new wholes."

Metaphysical Sensibility

In other words, the metaphysical poets had a mechanism of sensibility—a unified sensibility—which enabled them to assimilate and fuse into new wholes most disparate and heterogeneous experiences. They could feel their thoughts as intensely as the odour of a rose, that is to say they could express their thoughts through sensuous imagery. In his poems, Donne express his thoughts and ideas by embodying them in sensuous imagery and it is mainly through the imagery that the unification of sensibility finds its appropriate expression. The operation of the unified sensibility in Donne may be illustrated by the following lines from Dante's Paradise: Within its depths I saw ingathered, bound by love in one mass, the scattered leaves of the universe: substance and accidents and their relations, as though together fused, so that what I speak of is in one simple flame. In the above lines the spiritual experience, which is so very different from the ordinary experience, has been expressed by Dante concretely by a masterly use of the imagery of light. Dante has given expression to his spiritual experience in sensuous terms, in a visual image, the simple flame. This is also frequently the method of Donne.

Milton and Dryden: Their Influence

In this respect, the poets of the 17th century were the successors of the Elizabethan dramatists. Like them, the Metaphysicals, too, could be simple, artificial, difficult or fantastic. Then came Milton and Dryden, and their influence was most unhealthy, because as a result of their influence there set in a 'dissociation of sensibility' from which English poetry has recovered only in one modern age. Both Milton and Dryden were great poets and they rendered important service to the cause, of poetry. Under their influence, the English language became more pure and refined. But at the same time, the feeling became more crude. It is for this reason that the feeling expressed in Gray's Country Churchyard is cruder and less satisfying than the feeling expressed in Marvell's Coy Mistress.

There was another effect of the influence of Milton and Dryden, an effect which was indirect and which manifested itself at a later date. Early in the 18th century there was a reaction against the intellectual and ratiocinative (given to reasoning and argumentation) poetry of the pseudo-classics. The pendulum swung to the other extreme, and the poets thought and felt by fits and starts. They lacked balance and they reflected. By 'reflection' Eliot means that they 'ruminated', they 'mused', they 'mediated poetically', they enjoyed the luxury of dwelling upon some feeling, but could not express that feeling poetically. In some passages of Shelley's Triumph of Life and in Keats' second Hyperion, we find a struggle toward a unification of sensibility. But Shelley and Keats died young, and their successors, Tennyson and Browning, could only reflect. They mediated upon their experiences poetically, but failed to turn them into poetry. The Metaphysical poets certainly had their faults. But they had one great virtue. They tried, and often succeeded in expressing their states of mind and feeling in appropriate words and imagery. They had 'unified sensibility' and they could find verbal equivalents for it. They were, therefore, more mature and better than later poets.

The Modern Age: Its Metaphysical Temper

Eliot then proceeds to examine the close similarity between the age of Donne and the modern age, and the consequent similarity between the sensibility of the Metaphysicals and the modern poets. The Metaphysicals are difficult and the poet in the modern age is also bound to be difficult. As he puts it, "Our Civilization comprehends great variety and complexity, and this variety and complexity, playing upon a refined sensibility, must produce various and complex results. The poet must become more and more comprehensive, more allusive, more indirect, in order to force, to dislocate, if necessary, language into his meaning." Hence the modern poet also uses concepts and methods very much similar to those of the Metaphysicals who also lived in complex and rapidly changing times. Like them the modern poet also transmutes into sensations, and transforms feelings into thought or states of mind.

In other words, Donne and the other Metaphysicals are in the direct current of English poetry, and the modern poets are their direct descendants. This current flows direct from the Elizabethan age right upto the modern age. Only, and unfortunately, this continuity was broken for some time under the influence of Milton and Dryden who are great masters of language, but not of the soul. The poet must look not only into their hearts and write, but also they must look in to "the cerebral cortex, the nervous system and the digestive tracts."' The poet has different faculties and sensibilities, must achieve a unification of his sensibilities, and must express this unified sensibility into his poetry. Only such a poetry would be complete; but it would be complex and difficult. The Metaphysicals, as well as the moderns, have this complexity, and also this completeness and maturity.

The Essay: Its Significance

Eliot's essay on The Metaphysical Poets is one of the most significant critical documents of the modern age. Eliot has thrown new light on the metaphysical poets, and shown that they are neither quaint nor fantastic, but great and mature poets. They do not represent a digression from the mainstream of English poetry, but rather a continuation of it. His theory of the 'dissociation of sensibility', has caused much critical re-valuation and rethinking. In the words of Frank Kermode, the poets henceforth began, "to charge their thinking with passion, to restore to poetry a truth independent of the presumptuous intellect."

What, according to T. S. Eliot, is 'dissociation of sensibility'? What is his charge against Milton and Dryden in the essay on 'The Metaphysical Poets'?

Eliot's theory of the 'dissociation of sensibility' may be said to be an attempt to find some kind of historical explanation to the dissolution of the tradition of unified sensibility which found its perfection in the writings of Dante and Shakespeare. The unified sensibility was a sensibility which was the product of a true synthesis of the individual with the traditional, of feeling with thought and of the temporal with the eternal.

It was not only representative of the mind of Europe but also of the traditions of European thought and culture. But unfortunately, according to Eliot, the unified sensibility were suddenly disrupted in the seventeenth century as a result of a split in the creative personality of the artist, for which he formulated his famous theory of the 'dissociation of sensibility.'

For Eliot, as with Coleridge, poetry is a union of opposites but whereas Coleridge explains that this reconciliation of opposites is brought about by the synthetic power of the secondary imagination, Eliot replaces the words 'secondary imagination' by the words 'unified sensibility' to express the operation of the poet's mind. Eliot assigns primacy to the poetic sensibility which for him is the basis for writing poetry.

By 'sensibility' Eliot does not merely mean feeling or the capacity to receive sense impression. He means much more than that. By 'sensibility' he means a synthetic faculty, a faculty which can amalgamate and unite thought and feeling, which can fuse into a single whole the varied and disparate, often opposite and contradictory experiences, the sensuous and the intellectual.

The great Elizabethans and early Jacobeans had developed a unified sensibility. That is why they were widely read, and their thinking and learning modified their mode of feeling. Such a fusion of thought and feeling is to be found in the poetry of Donne as well as in much of modern poetry, but it is lacking in the poetry of Tennyson. The fact is that after Donne and Herbert a change came over the mind of England. The poets lost the capacity of unifying thought and feeling. The 'unification of sensibility' was lost, and a 'dissociation of sensibility' set in. After that the poet can either think or they can feel; there are either intellectual poets who can only think, or there are poets who can only feel. The poets of the 18th century were intellectuals, they thought but did not feel; the romantics of the 19th century felt but did not think. Tennyson and Browning can merely reflect or ruminate but cannot express their experience poetically.

Eliot writes: "Tennyson and Browning are poets and they think; but tl y do not feel their thought as immediately as the odour of a rose. A thought to Donne was an experience; it modified his sensibility. When a poet's mind is perfectly equipped for its work, it is constantly amalgamating desperate experience; the ordinary man's experience is chaotic, irregular, and fragmentary. The latter fails in love, or reads Spinoza and these two experiences have nothing to do with each other, or with the noise of the typewriter or the smell of cooking; in the mind of the poet these experiences are always forming new wholes." (The Metaphysical Poets).

The Metaphysical poets like the Elizabethans have a unified sensibility. They were the successors of the Elizabethan dramatists. Like them, the Metaphysicals, too, could be simple, artificial, difficult or fantastic. Then came Milton and Dryden and their influence was most unhealthy, because as a result of their influence there set in a 'dissociation of sensibility' from which English poetry has recovered only in the modern age. Both Milton and Dryden were great poets and they rendered important service to the cause of poetry. Under their influence, the English language became more pure and refined. But at the same time, the feeling became more crude. It is for this reason that the feeling expressed in Gray's Country Churchyard is cruder and less satisfying than the feeling expressed in Marvell's Coy Mistress.

There was another effect of the influence of Milton and Dryden, an effect which was indirect and which manifested itself at a later date. Early in the 18th century there was a reaction against the intellectual and ratiocinative (given to reason and argumentation, poetry of the pseudo-classics). The pendulum swang to the other extreme, and the Poets thought and felt by fits and starts. They lacked a balance and they reflected. By 'reflection' Eliot means that they 'ruminated', they 'mused', they 'mediated poetically', they enjoyed the luxury of dwelling upon some feeling, but could not express that feeling poetically. In some passages of Shelley's Triumph of Life and Keats' second Hyperion, we find a struggle toward a unification of sensibility. But Shelley and Keats died young and their successors, Tennyson and Browning, could only reflect. They meditated upon their experiences poetically, but failed to turn them into poetry. The Metaphysical poets certainly had their faults. But they had one great virtue. They tried, and often succeeded in expressing their states of mind and feeling in appropriate words and imagery. They had 'unified sensibility' and they could find verbal equivalents for it. They were, therefore, more mature and better than later poets.

A Critique of Theory of the Dissociation of Sensibility

Although the theory of the 'dissociation of sensibility' cannot claim to be an original concept, its importance is beyond question, and its influence has been abiding for it was Eliot who for the first time found a convincing expression and idiom to the widespread belief of a split in the personality not only of the artist but also in modern men and women.

Their doctrine, like all his other critical concepts, has its own limitations and also its proper field of application. Although the theory of the 'dissociation of sensibility' is generally applicable to metaphysical poetry, it is not true of all the poems of the metaphysical poets. Mr. Leishman, for example, in The Monarch of Wit says that the concept of the 'dissociation of sensibility' cannot be applied to all the poems of John Donne. Eliot himself, as Leishman goes on to explain, discovered 'a fissure of thought and sensibility' in John Donne which means that "in the terminology of 1921, Donne's sensibility was dissociated. Similarly it has been pointed out by a large number of critics that although the doctrine of the 'dissociation of sensibility' can be justified with reference to some of the poems of the metaphysical poets, it has been unduly extended to the Elizabethan dramatists.

The second criticism that is commonly levelled against Eliot's appraisal of the metaphysicals is that although the metaphysical poets received high praise from Eliot, in actual practice his creative and critical work has very little of metaphysical quality. In his poems such as The Waste Land, The Hollow Men and Four Quartets, the metaphysical quality of his earlier verse seems to have almost disappeared. Mr. Duncan in The Revival of Metaphysical Poets even doubts the metaphysical quality of his earlier verse.

But in spite of all these criticisms, Eliot's theory of the 'dissociation of sensibility' is undoubtedly one of his most significant contributions to critical analysis is and judgment, for it exerted a tremendous influence over the creative and critical talents of his contemporaries so that the poets became conscious of the traditions of the unified sensibility. To Sum up, in the words of frank Kermode, the poets henceforth began, ‘to charge their thinking with passion, to restore to poetry a truth independent of the presumptuous intellect.’
